Ibai frowned. No one was around. But wait, no, that was probably a good thing. He was supposed to be sneaky. He jumped through space again, this time reappearing on the next floor up. Still no one. He jumped again, and this time there was a group of strangers looking directly at him, including several reapers. Many of them carried guns.

"Hello!" said Ibai.

'An aberration!'

"Kill it!"

He teleported away as the gunfire erupted, reappearing in a bedroom a few floors down. "Well, that was unfortunate." He shrugged it off and looked around.

He saw a girl with four horns on her face. She was staring at him with wide gray eyes.

"Hello," Ibai said cheerily. "You don't look like you want to kill me. What is your name, young lady?"

She stood up from the edge of her bed, hesitant. "...Who are you?"

"Oh, my name is Ibai. And yours?"

"...Emiliana.""

"900

“What a pretty name,” said Ibai. “Why are you in here all by yourself?”

Emiliana lowered her brow at him. “Shouldn’t you know that already?”

“Mm. Probably. But I don’t. Do you know what is going on outside?”

“Some kind of battle.”

“Right. It’s dangerous. You shouldn’t be here. So why are you?”

“...I’m being held prisoner.”

“Prisoner? Why? Did you do something wrong?”

“No.”

“Oh, so like a hostage, then?”

“I suppose so, yes.”

“Well, that seems pretty unfair. Not to mention boring.”

She only squinted at him.

Ibai laughed suddenly. “I understand! Not being allowed to leave! You can’t possibly know how much I sympathize with you! By the way, what’s wrong with your face?”

Emiliana chose not to answer that.

“Oh, I bet you’re a servant, aren’t you? You’re one of those super-rare mucus users I heard about, right? Do you fight using snot bubbles? Could you show me?”

“Er, I think you mean mutation users...”

“Do I? Well, that sounds way less cool. Hey, where’s your reaper?”

“I don’t know, actually. She’s being kept somewhere else.”

“Oh, should we go find her, then? I bet I know where she is. Ooh, and then we could all go on an adventure together!”

Emiliana hesitated again. “What do you mean by adventure?”

“I don’t know. That’s how adventures work, right?”

“Uh...”

"Sounds like a plan!" He grabbed her hand and teleported them both into the next room. They appeared in midair, having to fall a few inches before touching the floor again, and Emiliana ended up stumbling forward.

"What in the world was that?!"

"Neat, eh?"

"But--all that--?! What was all that stuff that flashed by?! All those lights!"

"Oh, those?" A beat passed, and then he gave a lame shrug. "Anyway, let's keep going. It'll take a couple more jumps to reach the dungeon."

"Dunge--"

They teleported once more, three floors down this time. Another troupe of armed strangers with reapers was right there to greet them.

'It's an aberration!'

"Hellooo!"

'It's got an Elroy!'

"Bye-bye!"

And they vanished behind a muddy curtain. When they reappeared, there was no light, and Ibai had to fumble around in the dark for a bit before finding the switch on the wall.

The ceiling lit up in intervals, revealing a long, arching corridor full of musty prison cells, all wrought from ancient rock and steel but still airtight even to this day."

"901

"How do you know she is here?" Emiliana asked.

"Well, I don't, but the cells on this floor are super old and were designed specifically to hold reapers. Normal cells won't work even with soul-empowerment, because normal cells have to allow air in, and reapers can squeeze through even the smallest of physical gaps. Unless you're using a soul net, I suppose. But those require added maintenance since they need electricity and other science-y stuff. Which didn't even exist way back then, anyway. Or hadn't been discovered yet, I guess. Whatever."

"You... seem to know a lot about it."

"Do I? That's cool. Studying is boring, but knowing stuff is fun. Hey, what's your reaper's name?"

Emiliana seemed reluctant, still, but said, "Chergoa."

"Lovely. HEY, CHERGOA! CAN YOU HEAR US?!"

After a beat, Emiliana blinked. "She can."

"You lead the way, then," said Ibai.

Emiliana proceeded down the length of the hall, shouting out to Chergoa intermittently, and soon, Ibai could hear the reaper's responses.

'You sound really close now.'

Emiliana stopped in front of a cell on their right. "I think she's in here."

"Okay," said Ibai. "Be right back." And he teleported inside on his own.

It was pitch dark inside, but he did not need light to see her. To his eyes, reapers were very small, human-shaped toys. Tiny action figures, in truth.

As soon as Chergoa saw him, she began bobbing frantically up and down. 'Holy shit, an aberration! How did you--?!'

With nowhere for her to run, Ibai just scooped her up with his shadow. "Shh, it's okay. I'm not going to hurt you."

'What--?!'

They jumped out again, and he held the reaper up for Emiliana to see. "Here she is! Safe and sound!"

"Thank you!" Emiliana moved to take Chergoa from him.

Ibai recoiled from her touch, keeping the reaper well in hand. "Ah.

That's okay. I'll keep her safe for you."

The relief on Emiliana's face disappeared. "No, please, I would much rather she be--"

"Sorry," said Ibai. "It's not that I don't trust you. It's that I don't trust her. No offense, Chergoa."

Chergoa made no response.

"I know how most reapers see me." He frowned. "If I let her go, I'm sure she'll just run away. And then she'll make you run away. And then we won't be able to go on an adventure together! So I'll hold onto her for now."

"902

Emiliana didn't seem pleased by that information, but she chose not to argue.

Ibai took her hand again, but then paused, thinking. "Oh, I almost forgot to ask: is there anyone else you want me to bust out of here before we go? The more the merrier, I say!"

"...No," said Emiliana.

"Are you sure? No other hostages or anything? It seems odd that you two would be the only ones."

She kept a flat expression and shrugged. "If there are any others, they weren't with me."

"Hmm." Ibai tilted his head and squinted. "That's funny, because I heard one of those soldiers earlier say that I had 'an Elroy'--as if to imply that there was more than one. I forget how many children House Elroy currently has, but it seems a fair bet that you're one of them and that more are being held hostage here right now."

That seemed to put Emiliana at a loss for words.

Chergoa spoke up for her. 'The rest were killed. Very recently, too, so it's not surprising that those soldiers didn't know. Please don't ask her any more about it. She's been through considerable trauma already.'

“Ah, that makes sense, then. Oh, and I’m sorry to hear that.”

‘Don’t worry about it,’ said Chergoa, abruptly changing her tone. ‘So what’s this you said about going on an adventure? Because that sure sounded interesting.’

Ibai’s face lit up again. “I’m glad you think so! Let’s go find some fun stuff to do! See if we can put her mind at ease!”

Ibai jumped all three of them up a few floors and immediately ran into another group of unfamiliar soldiers. These ones were already in the middle of subduing a handful of Blackburn guards, and they were all facing the other way or otherwise too busy to notice the new arrivals. Even their reapers didn’t seem to sense Ibai’s presence yet.

“--word of an aberration in the building!” one the soldiers was yelling. The target of his anger was a Blackburn servant with a half-melted face, pinned against the wall alongside his reaper. “If you know something, tell me now!”

As Ibai looked over the scene, his smile waned. That servant’s name was Rafael, and Rafael was a dynamite checkers player.

After a beat, however, Ibai’s smile returned, even wider and toothier than before."

"903

Ibai teleported, leaving Emiliana behind but keeping Chergoa wrapped in a brown tail, and reappeared next to the man who’d been hassling Rafael. Ibai’s shadow ballooned around the man and his reaper, and Ibai jumped away again with both in tow. This time, he reappeared next to the wall.

The man, however, reappeared in the wall. In an instant, his flesh completely fused with the rock, cracking it only slightly and creating a lifeless human statue embedded in otherwise smooth stone.

He didn’t get time to admire the craftsmanship, however. The other reapers had noticed him by now, and the fight broke out anew. Ibai jumped from enemy to enemy, creating even more havoc while they were already scrambling to contain the thrashing Blackburns.

It didn’t last very long at all, and by the end, Ibai had collected two more reapers for himself. One final reaper was fleeing down the hallway, but Ibai caught up to him easily enough, bringing the number of trophies to four. He could've called it five, but he decided that it wasn't fair to count Chergoa. All the same, he returned to the other Blackburns with a grin on his face and a hop in his step.

"Thank you, m'lord," one of them said. "You saved us."

'Indeed,' said Rafael's reaper. This one's name was Ustox. 'But you aren't supposed to be here, are you?'

"Aw, c'mon!" whined Ibai, waving his captured toys around. "All the action's out here!"

'As you say, m'lord. We could certainly use your help. But how long have you possessed this teleporting power?'

"Er. N-not long..."

'Indeed? I suppose it doesn't matter. Here, m'lord.' Ustox bobbed his tiny body toward the others, and they all seemed to understand. In addition to Ibai's captives, the others had captured five more enemy reapers, all currently rendered unconscious.

And the Blackburns offered them to him.

Ibai blinked at the apparent gifts. "W-what are you doing?"

'Our House is outnumbered,' said one of the other Blackburn reapers. 'We need you strong, Lord Ibai.'

This was too sudden.

Ibai could hardly believe what he was hearing. For more than thirty years, everyone had told him the exact opposite of this. They'd told him how much trouble he'd been in, how he should try to be more thoughtful, more careful, more gentle.

That was simply the way of things.

But now...? He didn't understand. Were they testing him? Surely not. That would be cruel."

"904

--BELATED donation bonus week (day 7/7, page 1/3)--

A ripple of cries and protests went through the few captive reapers who were still conscious, but it was Emiliana who proved the most vocal.

"You can't be serious!" she yelled. "These are your fellow Rainlords! They would certainly have showed you mercy! You must do the same for them!"

'Don't listen to her, m'lord,' said Ustox. 'Perhaps they would have been merciful at first, but once the full truth came out, our executions would be assured.'

"What 'full truth'?!" said Emiliana.

Ustox ignored the question.

Rafael spoke up now that the burns on his face were gone. "It's okay, m'lord. You won't get in trouble this time. Go on, if you want to."

Oh, he wanted to. That wasn't the issue. "But what if Mama and Papa find out? Or Mel? They would never forgive me."

'As far as anyone else is concerned, you were never here,' said Ustox. 'The battle in this corridor simply grew too chaotic, and we were unable to take any of the enemy reapers alive.'

"No!" cried Emiliana. "You mustn't kill them!"

Ibai's eyes widened with anticipation, and he bit his lip. "I-I've never consumed a human soul before..."

'That can't be true,' said Ustox, sounding abruptly surprised. 'To manifest that ability of yours, you must've consumed at least a few.'

"No," said Ibai. "It was only ever animals. I... I tried to think of it like hunting. I even put the meat and fur to use. When possible. So... this is... this is new."

'I see,' said Ustox. 'I apologize, then. Please forgive my ignorance, m'lord. I thought--well, never mind. We will speak no more on the matter, if that is your wish. I implore you to do whatever you think is best.'

Emiliana was shouting again--something about honor this time--but Ibai had stopped listening.

Ibai truly did not know what to do now. He stared at the reapers with hunger in his eyes. Just this once, it might be okay. He would be able to see what it was like. He had a feeling that humans souls were much more potent than animal souls--and another feeling that reaper souls were stronger still. All he needed to do was crush them with his shadow and then teleport before their ethereal remains disappeared. It would be so easy.

But for some reason, he didn't. He stopped himself."
"905 -- CIII.

Ibai handed the reapers off to Rafael and the others, keeping only Chergoa for himself.

And everyone abruptly stopped yelling. They were all staring at him now, even his own family members. Only the faint rumble of distant battle prevented complete silence.

"Ensure no harm comes to them," Ibai said, uncertain if those words were his own or his father's or Uncle Mel's. "They don't deserve to die, and we won't be so afraid of their future actions as to execute them unjustly, either."

More silence, until Rafael spoke up. "...A-are you certain, m'lord?"

Ibai grinned. "The rain fears not the torch," he said.

That only made everyone stare again.

Ibai became impatient. "What's the matter?"

'We are just--' Ustox broke himself off. 'As you wish, m'lord. Rafael, let us go.'

Rafael still seemed a bit awestruck, but after a moment, he blinked and looked at Chergoa. "What about her, m'lord?"

"Oh, she's with me! We're going on an adventure together!"

Chapter One Hundred Three: 'Ye who must hold firm...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector's armor kept crumbling. His clothes kept burning. And he kept losing extremities to the Lady Blackburn's very annoyingly well-placed attacks. Even Haqq's shield couldn't stand up to her destruction power--Hector had lost an arm, shoulder, and half his face figuring that out. She seemed particularly intent on clipping his legs, and Hector was equally intent on not allowing that to happen. If it weren't for Asad, he definitely would've been dead by now.

But here he was. Still alive. Still keeping hold of Duvoss and Xuan. He really wished they'd hurry up and finish regenerating already. He knew the chaos of a fight tended to make time feel longer, but this was getting to be a bit much.

He just focused on avoiding Nere's attacks. His shield and body could weather Ismael's flames, if absolutely necessary. Ismael seemed to be trying to close in on him, probably for some kind of explosive attack, but Asad was keeping him at bay while also giving Nere glass javelins to worry about.

And then he saw Darktide finally snatch Dimas out of the air and snap the man in half, ripping Iziol from his body in one smooth motion.

Hector didn't get the chance to keep watching, but knowing that Salvador was now alone against Melchor, Hector had a dreadful feeling that he was about to be seeing a whole lot of liquid mercury again."

"905 -- CIII.

Ibai handed the reapers off to Rafael and the others, keeping only Chergoa for himself.

And everyone abruptly stopped yelling. They were all staring at him now, even his own family members. Only the faint rumble of distant battle prevented complete silence.

"Ensure no harm comes to them," Ibai said, uncertain if those words were his own or his father's or Uncle Mel's. "They don't deserve to die, and we won't be so afraid of their future actions as to execute them unjustly, either."

More silence, until Rafael spoke up. "...A-are you certain, m'lord?"

Ibai grinned. "The rain fears not the torch," he said.

That only made everyone stare again.

Ibai became impatient. "What's the matter?"

'We are just--' Ustox broke himself off. 'As you wish, m'lord. Rafael, let us go.'

Rafael still seemed a bit awestruck, but after a moment, he blinked and looked at Chergoa. "What about her, m'lord?"

"Oh, she's with me! We're going on an adventure together!"

Chapter One Hundred Three: 'Ye who must hold firm...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's armor kept crumbling. His clothes kept burning. And he kept losing extremities to the Lady Blackburn's very annoyingly well-placed attacks. Even Haqq's shield couldn't stand up to her destruction power--Hector had lost an arm, shoulder, and half his face figuring that out. She seemed particularly intent on clipping his legs, and Hector was equally intent on not allowing that to happen. If it weren't for Asad, he definitely would've been dead by now.

But here he was. Still alive. Still keeping hold of Duvoss and Xuan. He really wished they'd hurry up and finish regenerating already. He knew the chaos of a fight tended to make time feel longer, but this was getting to be a bit much.

He just focused on avoiding Nere's attacks. His shield and body could weather Ismael's flames, if absolutely necessary. Ismael seemed to be trying to close in on him, probably for some kind of explosive attack, but Asad was keeping him at bay while also giving Nere glass javelins to worry about.

And then he saw Darktide finally snatch Dimas out of the air and snap the man in half, ripping Izio from his body in one smooth motion.

Hector didn't get the chance to keep watching, but knowing that Salvador was now alone against Melchor, Hector had a dreadful feeling that he was about to be seeing a whole lot of liquid mercury again."

"906

Hector tried raising platforms beneath Nere to trip her up, but she was simply too fast; and the one time he actually succeeded, Nere just leapt off the platform as if she'd expected it to be there.

Asad, however, employed a better strategy. With a clenched fist, he raised a huge bed of powdered quartz beneath Ismael and Nere, slowing them both down as they suddenly had to go from running on stone to stomping through clumps of sand. Of course, they also had superhuman strength in their legs, so the sand only offered a brief opening as they adjusted their running motion accordingly. But that was enough for Asad.

A quartz spike gored Nere through the stomach, then spawned dozens of barbed branches in quick succession, exploding out of her torso and severing the top half of her body from the bottom. Her arms moved to destroy the quartz, but it was already too late. The glass cut cleanly up through both shoulders, stopping her movement completely before proceeding to encase her neck and head.

Hector looked on in horrified awe. He would definitely have to steal that technique, he decided.

And it had gone almost unnoticed thus far, but Asad was the main reason why none of the fallen Blackburns had been able to return to the fight. Even when he'd been fending off two or three opponents at once, Asad managed to coat the severed heads in quartz and prevent regeneration. Ismael or Melchor would sometimes break someone free, but Asad would just coat them again without losing a beat. Hector, at least, managed to provide some assistance on that front, recoating a couple with iron when Asad didn't have the time.

Now, with Nere taken down, Hector checked on Lord Salvador again. Darktide already had him pinned and was almost finished extracting his reaper.

Only Ismael, Melchor, Asad, and Hector remained. The last four combatants. How he'd ended up in this position was entirely beyond him, but the good news was that Xuan's head, neck, and shoulders had finished regrowing.

He heard Garovel ask the question that was already on his mind.

‘How much longer?’

‘He just needs one hand,’ said Duvoss.

In calmer circumstances, Hector might have asked why. He also might have complained about it, because that was still way too long to wait--especially now that he was watching a living metal monster barreling toward him."

"907

Hector was getting accustomed to running in full plate armor. He glimpsed a nearby corridor and considered fleeing through it, but the narrower quarters struck him as more of a death sentence than anything. He proceeded straight ahead, bounding over a pile of rocks that used to be part of the high ceiling and trying to reach Asad.

Frozen mercury shot up around Hector, caging him in completely, but Asad was close enough now to punch through with glass-coated fists. They kept running together. Hector decided to leave a few iron walls in their wake, while Asad was busy keeping Ismael away.

The first wall was simple enough--it spanned the entire length of the foyer, but it wasn't nearly tall enough, and Darktide just splashed right over it. The second wall, at least, was a large enough obstacle that Darktide chose to break through rather than lose time scaling it. The third was the same, not enough to buy even a moment of extra time.

The fourth, however, was not a wall at all. Instead, Hector materialized a sphere where he expected Darktide to be, but still made it massive enough to look like a wall for the brief glimpse Melchor would get of it after busting through the third. So when his liquid body slammed into it, no doubt expecting to smash it down, the sphere began rolling away instead, creating a moment of stumbling confusion as Melchor ended up rolling with it. Hector had even added a few dents in its surface, so the giant ball ended up veering off to the left and distracting Melchor for a moment more.

It was a stupid trick, Hector knew, but extra time was extra time, regardless of how he achieved it. And now he had the opportunity to work on an old scheme: a soul-empowered maze. It had hidden his presence against Karkash. Maybe it could do so against Melchor.

He set to work, creating a four-way intersection with himself and Asad at the center, then expanding each branch in three different directions. Then again. And again. All while he and Asad kept pressing through the tunnels together.

Melchor wasn't having it, though. The same kind of explosion that had subdued Xuan shook the chamber once again. Hector's tunnels shattered under the impact and went flying, sending him and Asad along with them. White dust filled the air just as before, but Dimas wasn't around to clear it away this time."

"908

Hector found himself upside down and in a corner, bundled around Duvoss, Garovel, and Xuan. He scrambled back to his feet, a bit surprised to discover that he wasn't missing any limbs or even armor. His shoes had blown right off his feet, and his ear drums had been ruptured, but he was too concerned with present circumstances to even notice. The only thing on his mind now was that he'd lost track of Asad through all the dust.

But Garovel hadn't. 'Run left. Melchor is still after us.'

Hector bolted, following the scarcely visible wall. Then he stopped, but not because he wanted to. Something had a grip on his armor below the knee. He couldn't quite see what it was, but there was no way he was going to wait around and find out. He annihilated the armor above the knee, slid his leg free, and kept running.

He came upon a sudden clearing in the dusty clouds and saw Asad. The Sandlord was already fighting Ismael yet again. Hector hadn't been able to watch their repeated clashes very closely, but knowing all he did about Asad, it was informative enough just seeing that the Lord Blackburn had not yet fallen to him.

"Oh, hey, I'm still alive," came Xuan's voice, and Hector looked down to see that the man had regained consciousness. His already small body was still only half-regenerated, but at least he had lungs and elbows now.

Hector didn't get a chance to respond. A tidal wave of mercury barreled through the fog after him. He launched himself out of its path with a slanted iron platform, but the mercury made a sharp turn and kept up the chase. Wide-eyed behind his helm, Hector launched himself again before he could even stop to regain his balance and went flipping sideways through the air.

A bed of sand softened Hector's fall, and a massive barricade of crystalline spears shot up to defend him from another cage of frozen mercury that tried to box him in. They kept an escape route open for him while simultaneously launching daggers at Melchor, not that they did much good. Hector fled the glass shelter just as Darktide crashed through it, sending fist-sized shards in all directions.

Another iron platform shot Hector up past the second floor, all the way to the third, and his bare feet hit cold rock again. He checked on Xuan again and wanted to cry when he saw that barely any progress had been made after all that effort."

"909

Already, tendrils of mercury had made it up to the third floor. Hector leapt away from them with the aid of more platforms, scraping the broken ceiling with the back of his breastplate and jostling another boulder loose. It fell toward Melchor, who slapped it aside like a volleyball.

Meanwhile, Xuan was busy laughing. "That Darktide sure is a tough bastard, isn't he?"

Hector landed with a metal thud and promptly launched himself away again. "Please stop distracting me, Lord Xuan."

Midair, a tendril caught up to him and found his shield. Hector gripped the handle with all his might and wrenched it free, but the tendril settled for his bare leg instead. And when Hector landed again, a second tendril was already there, snaking around the other leg and crushing its armor.

He was in no position to run away this time, he knew, and in a moment, the mercury would surround him again, preventing even his ability to materialize iron. So he used it while he still could. He poured everything into adding spikes to his armor. Maximum volume.

The spikes exploded out, each one thick as a tree trunk, covering his armor and his shield and creating a small pocket at the center for Hector and his three passengers. The spikes also appeared on the back of his armor, lifting him off the floor and sending his giant cluster of iron needles over the third floor's guardrail.

They fell, though Hector could hardly feel it from inside. He couldn't see the fruits of his concentration, either, but it didn't matter, because he just kept pushing for more. More spikes. More iron. More defense.

Hector's work quickly filled the length of the chamber and caught on the second floor's porous walls and crumbling staircase. They were stuck fast now, suspended above the first floor like some kind of grisly ornament, all while the iron spikes continued to grow, touching the ground and even reaching toward the ceiling.

Hector pressed his soul into the iron, hoping the shield's passive enhancements would be carried along as well, but unfortunately, that did not seem the case. And with no light, he couldn't see Xuan's progress. He could only hear the muffled crack of iron above him and feel the fierce vibrations in his metal cocoon.

And then Darktide broke through. The foyer's dim light poured in, along with a river of living mercury, searching and grasping for Xuan."

"910

Hector tried to stay bundled up, but too much of Xuan had regenerated. The Seadevil could no longer fit inside the small pocket of safety between Hector's chest, arms, and shield. So the mercury seeped through the cracks, and Hector could only thrash against it.

It was like trying to fight ten opponents at once, all with invisible hands guiding the flow of mercury, pummeling Hector's whole body, tearing at him, swarming him. A tendril wrapped around one of Xuan's regenerating arms and tore it off. Another tendril tried to do the same to the other arm, but Hector used the point of his shield to chop it off. And he saw Xuan's one remaining hand. It was nearly complete. The stubby fingers were all that was still needed.

And then Hector felt himself being pulled away by the legs. Only Garovel stayed with him, having somehow repositioned himself to Hector's hand, hiding just behind the battered shield. Melchor spat the pair of them out like old chewing gum, and Hector clattered to the floor in his crushed armor.

Before even standing, he stared back up with wide eyes, wanting to know if he'd bought enough time for Xuan. And he still couldn't tell. Chunks of shattered iron were falling all around him, crashing into the rock and making the room tremble, and Hector had to annihilate the pieces that would have otherwise fallen on him.

When he saw Darktide again, the man was a writhing mass of marbled silver. Moving, shifting. Struggling.

And then a white flame burst out of the mercury like a sword, smoldering and bright. Swirling trails of white seeped through the hole, growing as the flame did, until a plume of smoke finally spewed outward, accompanied by a booming laugh that filled the foyer.

Darktide splashed down to the first floor while the Seadevil billowed up to the second. The liquid mercury shuddered violently, almost boiling, and Hector couldn't tell if that was the result of anger or just a dose of Xuan's acid.

'Hector,' came Garovel's strained voice, 'stop using the shield...'

Hector let it drop to the floor and heard Garovel let out a groan of relief. He armored up his other hand so that he could pick it up again. The leather glove underneath was shredded, but he wasn't presently concerned about the added discomfort."

"911 -- CIV.

'You okay?' Hector asked, mindful of Darktide's bristling form.

Garovel did not answer.

'Garovel?'

Still nothing.

He supposed there was no use worrying about it now. Melchor seemed more interested in Xuan at the moment, but Hector knew he could turn and crush him anytime. But of course, given that Melchor didn't know about the shield's power or the temporary nature of it, the man was probably thinking Hector would be too annoying to kill first. Hopefully.

He watched as the two monstrous Rainlords clashed again. Xuan appeared to be keeping his distance this time, letting his smoke waft around more so that he could use it to screen his attacks. Pillars of white flame flashed intermittently, lighting up the foyer each time like a very slow strobe. And Melchor's inhuman shadow appeared during each flash, sweeping across the smoke with a boom that invoked more earthquakes.

It was quite obvious to Hector that his role in their battle was concluded. He decided to go help Asad, who was still occupied with Ismael.

Theirs was a battle of more human proportions, though only just. Asad flipped through the air on clear platforms, hurtling glass boulders and molten quartz and inconvenient mounds of sand. Ismael proved quick on his feet, however, and with pan-forma, he could pick and choose which attacks to avoid while still drawing upon a plentiful supply of flesh for his potassium-fueled volleys of lavender fire.

Hector moved to intervene, but something else stopped their battle cold.

A brown shadow appeared in thin air, and from it, a smiling man stepped forth, along with a reaper and a young woman.

And even with the horns on her face, Hector immediately recognized her from her photograph.

He saw Ismael's sunken eyes go as big as marbles.

Chapter One Hundred Four: 'Chaos, be ended...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When Ibai saw his father there, he bit his lip. "Oh. Um. Hello, Papa."

"Ibai!" the man yelled with two voices. "What are you doing here?!"

"Um. Frankly, I didn't realize you were in this room."

"You can't be--! You have to leave now!"

"Aw, but I can help!" He looked toward the man with the tattoos. "Is that the guy you're fighting? Mm, he looks scary. Here." Ibai teleported behind Asad and wrapped his arm around the man.

"Behind you!" came someone else's warning.

The Sandlord turned but not fast enough."

"911 -- CIV.

'You okay?' Hector asked, mindful of Darktide's bristling form.

Garovel did not answer.

'Garovel?'

Still nothing.

He supposed there was no use worrying about it now. Melchor seemed more interested in Xuan at the moment, but Hector knew he could turn and crush him anytime. But of course, given that Melchor didn't know about the shield's power or the temporary nature of it, the man was probably thinking Hector would be too annoying to kill first. Hopefully.

He watched as the two monstrous Rainlords clashed again. Xuan appeared to be keeping his distance this time, letting his smoke waft around more so that he could use it to screen his attacks. Pillars of white flame flashed intermittently, lighting up the foyer each time like a very slow strobe. And Melchor's inhuman shadow appeared during each flash, sweeping across the smoke with a boom that invoked more earthquakes.

It was quite obvious to Hector that his role in their battle was concluded. He decided to go help Asad, who was still occupied with Ismael.

Theirs was a battle of more human proportions, though only just. Asad flipped through the air on clear platforms, hurtling glass boulders and molten quartz and inconvenient mounds of sand. Ismael proved quick on his feet, however, and with pan-forma, he could pick and choose which attacks to avoid while still drawing upon a plentiful supply of flesh for his potassium-fueled volleys of lavender fire.

Hector moved to intervene, but something else stopped their battle cold.

A brown shadow appeared in thin air, and from it, a smiling man stepped forth, along with a reaper and a young woman.

And even with the horns on her face, Hector immediately recognized her from her photograph.

He saw Ismael's sunken eyes go as big as marbles.

Chapter One Hundred Four: 'Chaos, be ended...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When Ibai saw his father there, he bit his lip. "Oh. Um. Hello, Papa."

"Ibai!" the man yelled with two voices. "What are you doing here?!"

"Um. Frankly, I didn't realize you were in this room."

"You can't be--! You have to leave now!"

"Aw, but I can help!" He looked toward the man with the tattoos. "Is that the guy you're fighting? Mm, he looks scary. Here." Ibai teleported behind Asad and wrapped his arm around the man.

"Behind you!" came someone else's warning.

The Sandlord turned but not fast enough."
"912

--BELATED donation bonus week (day 7/7, page 2/3)--

Ibai pulled Asad through the hole in space and, with a great crack, relocated the man inside the northern wall.

The tattooed man and the wall competed for existence. And the wall lost.

Asad's tattoos burned fiercely golden, enhancing the surly look in his similarly yellow eyes and illuminating Ibai's gaping face as he fled into another teleport.

Ibai reappeared next to his father. "Okay," he said, watching the Lord Najir step from the crumbling wall unscathed, "I may have miscalculated that one."

Ismael grabbed his son's arm. "How did you--?! Agh, it doesn't matter! Just leave! These people will kill you!"

"Eh, I don't know, Papa. I'm pretty tough to kill."

"Ibai!"

Asad interjected with two voices as well. "Did that aberration just call you 'Papa'?"

Ismael placed himself in front of Ibai. "Stay away from him!"

And even though Ibai was interested in their conversation, he couldn't help noticing the thunderous clash between Xuan and Melchor on the other side of the room. He stared with wide eyes and a wider grin as each attack made the castle shiver. "So this was where the quakes were coming from!"

A glass prison brought Ibai's attention back to his father and Asad. Ismael was already bashing it down with burning fists. Ibai figured he should just teleport everyone out, but then he noticed that Emiliana was missing.

The girl was with Asad and Hector now. And she was yelling something at them that Ibai couldn't hear over all the mayhem. He could, however, hear Chergoa speaking up, as the reaper still remained in Ibai's grasp.

'If you are Ibai's father,' she said, 'then you must be an important member of House Blackburn.'

Ismael merely ignored her and pulled Ibai toward the door, but the reaper wasn't done.

'If I promise to support you in protecting Ibai, will you agree to a temporary ceasefire?'

That made Ismael acknowledge her, at least. "Why would you possibly do that?!"

'I doubt I can make you understand right now,' said Chergoa. 'But I am a member of House Elroy, and I am giving you my word. If you are still a true Rainlord, like I believe you are, then you know that I will honor my promise.'

Her words stopped the Lord of House Blackburn in his tracks. The man stared at her hard, then at Asad, whose attacks had noticeably stopped.

'Please,' said Chergoa. 'I'm only asking for a ceasefire. Not your surrender.'

"913

--BELATED donation bonus week (day 7/7, page 3/3)--

Ibai frowned at his father. "It's not over already, is it, Papa? I barely got to fight!"

Ismael didn't seem to hear him. "A ceasefire," the man said, almost inaudibly. "Yes, a ceasefire..."

'So you agree, then?' said Chergoa.

"Yes."

'Alright, then call off your monster.'

Before Ismael could move, however, Melchor came splattering toward them. The mercury bubbled and sizzled beneath trails of smoke and steam, and Melchor's liquid mass seemed to have trouble keeping its shape, dripping like hot wax.

Ismael ran over to him, pulling Ibai along as well. "Melchor!" he shouted. "Stand down! For now, this battle is over!"

"What are you saying?" came Darktide's growling voices.

"Just stand down! I command you!"

And Melchor needed no further convincing. The mercury liquid coalesced into a human form once more and regained the pale skin color that all Blackburns shared. Orric melted out of the man's naked body and fell into his hand. Melchor dropped to his knees, breathing heavily and sweating, looking as if he were about to retch.

Xuan arrived, still bursting with smoke and fire, as Ismael was pulling off his own overshirt to drape around Melchor's shoulders.

"What's all this, then?" said Xuan. "Surrendering? Wait--is that an aberration?"

Ibai was busy pulling off his pants.

Chergoa spoke up again. 'We've reached a temporary understanding,' she said. 'Em, tell him.'

Emiliana placed herself in front of Melchor and raised both hands toward Xuan. "Please stop fighting. There's been a big misunderstanding, and we're requesting a ceasefire. Please."

The Seadevil just continued to hover there, swirling in place and hardly seeming human enough to have a voice at all anymore. Slowly, however, he lowered himself down to the ground and took on his usual, smaller visage. And of course, he was also stark naked.

Asad lent him his robe, which fit Xuan like a blanket.

Everyone else had released their reapers, and by extension, their hyper-states, but Xuan still clung to his. "Return the children to us," he said with two voices. "Only then will my cousins agree to talk to you."

"Very well," said Ismael.

"Good." Xuan looked over at Asad and Hector. "Don't let that thing eat Duvoss while I'm out, yeah?"

"What do you--?"

Duvoss melted out of Xuan's body, and Xuan fell flat on his face, unconscious.

And when Melchor saw that, he collapsed onto his side, also out cold."
"914

"I believe an explanation is in order," said Asad.

'Several explanations,' added Qorvass.

“Indeed.” Ismael took a haggard breath and exchanged looks with Rholtam. “But first, we must inform everyone of the ceasefire. Does anyone here have a working phone or com device?”

Asad shook his head. “My earpiece was destroyed in the fight.”

“As was mine,” said Ismael.

They both looked at the young black man, who seemed to have difficulty removing his gaze from Ibai even as he answered them.

“...I didn’t bring anything,” Hector said. “I figured it would just get broken.”

Ismael turned to Ibai, who was still trying to put his pants on Melchor. They seemed a little snug around the thighs. “Ibai, can you... tell our forces to stand down? Quickly?”

Ibai popped up to his feet again, leaving Melchor with an impressive butt crack. “Sure thing, Papa!”

Ismael held up a hand. “Ah, but before you do--please, release the reaper.”

“Aw, but we were gonna go on an adventure...”

“Ibai.”

“Tch.”

‘We’ll take a rain check on that adventure,’ said Chergoa. ‘Ha. Get it? Rain check?’

Ibai laughed. “I do get it! You’re funny!” He let her return to Emiliana and then teleported away in his underwear.

--++--++--

The feeling was that of a slow boil, beginning in the pit of his stomach, reaching up through his chest and all the way into his head.

It had been thirty years since he’d felt anger like this.

Raw fury. So powerful and blinding that he knew the dam inside him would burst if he so much as moved. And he wanted to save this anger, to bottle it up inside and use it later. But right now, he couldn’t even blink. He just stared at the wall, expressionless, waiting for his brain to stop feeling so numb, for his sense of reason to start working again.

It was just too much to process at once. Everything Axiolis had told him.

The children, captured. The Rainlords, at war with each other, in addition to the Vanguard.

And Mariana...

Zeff had thought he would be able to handle it better than this. They'd both been members of the Vanguard. The notion that she might leave on a mission one day and never come back had crossed his mind before, as the reverse had undoubtedly crossed hers. They'd both known it could happen. They'd planned for it.

But not this. Betrayed by their own comrades. This was something else."

"915

--donation bonus day (Page 1/3)--

Zeff could feel that old well filling up. In the back of his head, he could feel it. He thought it had run dry ages ago, but now he realized that every drop was still there. And now there was more.

Hatred.

That was how he'd kept himself sane the first time. He'd poured all of his anger, misery, and confusion into that dark place. And the result was the old well. Distilled and purified. A reservoir that he'd kept for Abolish. It had helped him more than a few times in the past.

It would do the same for the Vanguard, he figured. For Lawrence and Dergoz and whoever else stood in his way.

He only needed to focus. To let it all drain in there. To add it to the well. Years of meditation, of discipline, of emotional control--it all served him now.

And at length, as his head finally started to clear, Axiolis' voice began to register again.

'-please.. it's been over an hour... Talk to me, Zeff. Please, just say anything.'

He turned his stone gray eyes toward the reaper. But what Zeff saw made him rear back in his seat.

Axiolis was different. The reaper wasn't a large bat with white eyes anymore--like he'd been for as long as Zeff had known him. Instead, Axiolis just looked like some kind of abominable monster--so much so that Zeff still wasn't even certain what he was seeing.

'...Are you okay?' the reaper asked.

Staring, he said, "You're not the same."

'...What?'

"You look... very different."

Ax was briefly quiet. 'Hmm. What do I look like, exactly?'

"Ah..."

'Take your time and tell me.'

Zeff sat up straight and tried harder to understand what his eyes were telling him.

It almost looked like some kind of gnarled dragon, though decidedly more marine, what with its lithe body and dark-on-top, light-on-bottom coloration. It did have wings, but Zeff couldn't tell how large they were, because they were kept retracted into long grooves on its back, with sections rearing up into the shape of a dorsal fin. The scaly underbelly was similar, bearing space for its thick legs and hooked claws to fold up into its chest cavity. A pair of small, twisted horns crowned its head, just above its reptilian eyes.

But it was the creature's huge mouth that made Zeff realize what he was looking at, because just beyond the jagged teeth poking out, he noticed a few faint trails of lingering white frost."

"916

--donation bonus day (Page 2/3)--

Before informing Axiolis, however, Zeff had something else he wanted to say. “I’ve never heard of this happening before. I thought each servant could only see reapers one way for as long as they live.”

‘Usually, that is the case, but in rare instances, it can change. Very rare. I’ve never had it happen to a servant of my own.’

“Do you know why this happened?”

Axiolis seemed hesitant. ‘Mm... well, it sounded sensible enough to me in the past, but now I’m not sure I want to believe it.’

“Explain.”

‘Supposedly... a change in the way you view reapers is reflective of a change that has already occurred in yourself. It indicates a kind of mental paradigm shift.’

“Ah. Then I suppose it does not bode very well for my mental state that I am now seeing you as an ice-breathing hellbeast of Lhutwë.”

The reaper floated back a little. ‘Of Lhutwë? You mean I’m--?’

“A lhugleoth, yes. It’s quite hideous.”

‘...Huh. A full-size one?’

“Full-size?”

‘Yes. They could grow to be twenty meters in length, you know.’

“They were also mythical, Ax.”

‘You don’t know that.’

“You’re, what, four thousand years old now?”

‘Thereabouts.’

“Have you ever seen a lhugleoth?”

‘Well, no, but maybe I just never looked hard enough.’

“I’m sure that’s it. I don’t know what I was thinking.”

‘I’m not entirely in love with your tone right now.’

“You do recall our people putting a stop to all of that water god nonsense back when my grandfather was a child, don’t you?”

‘Yes, well, just because the rest of you are dirty heathens doesn’t mean I have to be.’

Zeff merely gave a resigning nod.

‘I still love you, though.’

“Thank you.”

A beat passed. ‘...So am I full-size or not?’

“No,” said Zeff, able to release an amused breath but not quite able to manage a laugh. “You’re about the size of a horse.”

‘Mm. That’s a little disappointing.’

Zeff sighed and rubbed his face. He stood up and realized that he was half-dressed. He’d only managed to get that far before Axiolis had told him to sit down and listen. He resumed the task now, appreciative of the armored vest that someone had left for him by the fireplace.

‘By the way, you shouldn’t tell other people that you see reapers differently now.’”

"917

--donation bonus day (Page 3/3)--

“Why?” asked Zeff, pulling his vest on. “Are you worried people will think I’ve gone mad?”

Axiolis paused. ‘Yes. Exactly that, yes.’

“Do you think I’ve gone mad?” Zeff considered wearing a tie. It wasn’t the most battle-appropriate attire, but a significant part of him didn’t really care about that right now. He was thinking more about what calming effect it might have on him. A certain sense of order and professionalism could help him keep a clear head. Maybe.

‘To be honest, I hope you have. A little, at least. Because I’m fairly certain that I’ve lost some of my marbles, too.’

“Oh? How so?” He decided in favor of the tie. He liked the blood red one on the dresser.

‘Well, for instance, I know we shouldn’t fight Lawrence. He and Dergoz have a good forty years on us in terms of both experience and soul-syncing. And they can use pan-rozum. In my mind, I know these things. Attacking them by ourselves would almost be suicide. And yet... I’d go with you to hunt them down right now, if you asked me to.’

Zeff nearly smiled. “That’s not fair. I wanted to be the unreasonable one.”

‘I apologize.’

He stared at himself in the mirror, not able to see Ax reflected behind him but still knowing the reaper was there. “It’s alright. I just have to remember them. Francisco, Emiliana, Marcos, Ramira. And Gema. Any word on her whereabouts?”

‘No. I would’ve told you earlier if there had been.’

“That girl...”

‘We’ll find her.’

Zeff straightened his tie. “Yes, we will.”

They left the room. His brethren had chosen one of Rheinhal’s nicer hotels for their headquarters, he noticed, and that was saying something in this resort town. If he were in a better mood, the luxury might have been appealing.

Axiolis led him out into the street, and Zeff immediately turned east in order to see the castle on the hill there. A few of its turrets were missing, and the red paint on its walls was rather heavily marked up, but Rhein’s Keep was still standing.

Zeff didn’t have to go any farther, however. Octavia Redwater found him before he could find her.

She smiled that tiny, wrinkled smile of hers. “It is so very good to see you again, Zeff.”

He hadn’t even thought about what he should say to this woman, and that seemed like a mistake now that she was in front of him. Too many thoughts stirred in his head at once. Gratitude, apologies, questions. Far too many.

He settled on a silent hug, instead."

The little old woman shivered with apparent surprise at his embrace. "Oh! I didn't realize you were the hugging type, Zeff."

'He usually isn't,' said Ax, sounding perhaps even more surprised.

Zeff released her. "Thank you for everything you have done for my family."

Octavia gave a low snort. "Fat lot of good it's accomplished." She locked arms with him, and they began walking together. "Honestly, darling, I'm surprised you don't hate me. I assume Axiolis has filled you in on everything?"

"He has."

"Then you know three of your children were captured under my watch."

'While you were here,' Ax reminded her, 'trying to rescue Zeff and his son. We can hardly fault you for another House's betrayal.'

"Even so, you shouldn't--"

'I'll hear no more of that,' said Ax. 'Not when you could have turned the Eloys over to the Vanguard whenever you wanted.'

"Ax is right," said Zeff. "You will accept our appreciation, whether you think it appropriate or not."

She snorted again. "You are much bossier than I remember."

It was true that it had been some time since he'd last spoken with this woman. There'd been various Council meetings over the years, sure, but those were purely business, and Zeff recalled multiple occasions where Octavia had attempted to converse with him afterward, only for him to brush her off. And all because of that old resentment he'd felt when she'd tried to forbid him from rejoining the Vanguard in his youth.

What a fool he'd been.

He wanted to apologize to her a dozen times over, but he was too ashamed of himself to broach the subject now. And of course, there were more pressing matters at hand, anyway. "When will you launch your next assault on the Keep?" he asked. "I would like to be a part of it."

"This evening."

He frowned.

"I know," she said. "That is longer than you care to wait, right now. But Sanko is supposed to arrive sometime today. Wendy is waiting for her at the airfield right now. So as difficult as it may be, I must ask you to be patient."

He tried not to scowl. "Patient..."

"I'm sorry."

And when Zeff did not respond, she seemed to become uncomfortable.

"Perhaps you would prefer to depart for Luzo, instead," Octavia said. "I hear the siege on Marshrock has been proceeding more quickly than expected, thanks to your Sandlord friend.""
"919 -- CV.

Ax had informed Zeff of Asad's involvement, along with the sudden appearance and assistance of Chergoa's brother, and while Zeff was thoroughly glad to hear that their siege was progressing well, he could not imagine leaving Rheinhal right now, not while he knew that Francisco and Dennex were here.

"I will wait with you," he said.

"Are you sure?" Octavia asked. "Because if I were in your position, I don't know if I would be able to control myself."

Zeff nearly told her that 'he was not her' before thinking better of it. "I'll stay close to you," he said instead. "If I step out of line, you can give me a good caning."

The day drew on from there, painfully slow. He met with the other family heads in turns, as they came and went from their patrols, and he exchanged words with each. It was frustrating, to say the least, but he felt that it was also good, seeing everyone's support like this. These were his people. His kin. Redwater, Merlo, Stroud, Garza, and Zabat. Commanding more than sixty servants in total.

They offered him their sympathies, of course. But they also offered him their anger, which he found much more comforting. Their desire for justice. The Rain's justice.

But of them all, Rayen Merlo surprised Zeff the most. By appearance, she had not changed since Zeff's childhood. Unlike Octavia, Rayen was a large woman, soft-faced and motherly-looking, until she really started sharing her feelings. The vitriol in her voice nearly rivaled that in Zeff's own heart. And he could not have appreciated it more.

At length, however, word finally arrived.

"Sanko is here," said Octavia.

Chapter One Hundred Five: 'The Gargoyle of Korgum...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Zeff had never met Field Marshal Sanko before, but he knew the woman as soon as he saw her. She had that inexpressible something about her, a kind of invisible aura that every servant who stood at the top of the world seemed to possess. He'd felt the same thing when he met each of Sermung, Jackson, and Lamont. The Crystal Titan, the Star of the West, and Iceheart.

And now, the Gargoyle, too.

Axiolis had explained it to him once. These were people who had acquired such immense synchronization with their reapers that it made their passive soul defenses begin to feel oppressive to the less powerful people around them. It was a kind of gravitational pull created by the sheer strength of their souls."

"919 -- CV.

Ax had informed Zeff of Asad's involvement, along with the sudden appearance and assistance of Chergoa's brother, and while Zeff was thoroughly glad to hear that their siege was progressing well, he could not imagine leaving Rheinhal right now, not while he knew that Francisco and Dennex were here.

“I will wait with you,” he said.

“Are you sure?” Octavia asked. “Because if I were in your position, I don’t know if I would be able to control myself.”

Zeff nearly told her that ‘he was not her’ before thinking better of it. “I’ll stay close to you,” he said instead. “If I step out of line, you can give me a good caning.”

The day drew on from there, painfully slow. He met with the other family heads in turns, as they came and went from their patrols, and he exchanged words with each. It was frustrating, to say the least, but he felt that it was also good, seeing everyone’s support like this. These were his people. His kin. Redwater, Merlo, Stroud, Garza, and Zabat. Commanding more than sixty servants in total.

They offered him their sympathies, of course. But they also offered him their anger, which he found much more comforting. Their desire for justice. The Rain’s justice.

But of them all, Rayen Merlo surprised Zeff the most. By appearance, she had not changed since Zeff’s childhood. Unlike Octavia, Rayen was a large woman, soft-faced and motherly-looking, until she really started sharing her feelings. The vitriol in her voice nearly rivaled that in Zeff’s own heart. And he could not have appreciated it more.

At length, however, word finally arrived.

“Sanko is here,” said Octavia.

Chapter One Hundred Five: ‘The Gargoyle of Korgum...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Zeff had never met Field Marshal Sanko before, but he knew the woman as soon as he saw her. She had that inexpressible something about her, a kind of invisible aura that every servant who stood at the top of the world seemed to possess. He’d felt the same thing when he met each of Sermung, Jackson, and Lamont. The Crystal Titan, the Star of the West, and Iceheart.

And now, the Gargoyle, too.

Axiolis had explained it to him once. These were people who had acquired such immense synchronization with their reapers that it made their passive soul defenses begin to feel oppressive to the less powerful people around them. It was a kind of gravitational pull created by the sheer strength of their souls."

"920

--donation bonus day (Page 1/3)--

Zeff didn't know very much about Sanko, but that wasn't especially surprising. Promotions within the Vanguard tended to work that way. As servants moved up through the ranks, their identities became increasingly concealed so as to protect any uninvolved family members or friends from Abolish. Naturally, the promotion from captain general to field marshal was the most dramatic, which was why none of the field marshals had last names. Sanko was undoubtedly not the woman's birth name, either, and given her age--likely pushing two hundred years, if not more--there would not be many people left alive who knew what her original name was.

But it was easy enough to see why she was called the Gargoyle. She wore a gray mask with a grotesque devil's face on it, bearing stubby horns at the top and long fangs around the open mouth. It hid everything but her pale lips and large eyes, which were so darkly blue that they almost looked purple.

If she had hair, it was concealed beneath the hood of her uniquely black overcoat, which she chose to drape over her shoulders like a cape rather than wear properly. Beyond that, however, her uniform was no different than the average member of the Vanguard's ground forces--simple brown-on-white camo.

All-in-all, one could be forgiven for assuming she was a man. Only the subtle curves in her uniform offered any real visual clues.

"Octavia Redwater," the woman said in two voices.

And her audience of Rainlords shifted uncomfortably as they realized that she was already using pan-rozum.

Octavia kept composure well enough. "How've you been, you old crone?"

Sanko responded with quite a long pause, perhaps not appreciating the Red Lady's attempt at affection. But she did answer the question eventually. "We have been fine."

'Why are you using pan-rozum already?' said Wendy, apparently unafraid of asking the question everyone was thinking.

"Merely a precaution," said Sanko. "For the unlikely case in which you intended to ambush us upon arrival. Do not take offense." It sounded more like an order than an apology.

Wendy wasn't through asking questions. 'Why have you come alone? Shouldn't you have a security escort with you?'

"We did not come to fight. And we will not be staying long. We must return to Korgum as soon as matters here are settled." She started walking for the airfield office's exit, and the Rainlords made way for her, soon falling in behind."

"921

--donation bonus day (Page 2/3)--

"Ah," said Octavia, "we were hoping to conduct a quick meeting before going to the Keep."

"Nonsense," said Sanko. "We understand the situation well enough."

"Yes, but--"

"Explain what you will on the way."

Zeff certainly had no complaints about the woman's attitude. After being told to wait all day long, the sudden forward momentum was most welcome.

They led Sanko to one of the two limousines waiting to carry them to their next destination, which was apparently going to be the Keep now. Octavia, Rayen, and Zeff joined her. Evangelina Stroud, Socorro Garza, and Santos Zabat took the other limo, but their three reapers stayed to listen in.

Octavia and Rayen began offering a quick outline of all the forces they currently had in Rheinhal, but Sanko didn't seem very interested.

Instead, Sanko's gaze lingered on Zeff. "You have a familiar face."

Zeff raised an eyebrow. "Do I?"

"Would you happen to be this Zeff I've heard of?"

'How did you know?' said Axiolis.

"Elroy family resemblance. But we are confused. It was our understanding that you had been captured."

"I was released. For what reason, I don't know."

"Ah. That bodes well for negotiations, then."

Zeff wasn't so sure he agreed. He hadn't given it much thought before, but it certainly did seem strange that he had been let go.

"I knew a man named Agam Elroy rather well," said Sanko, and the sudden change in pronouns did not escape Zeff's notice. "Was he an uncle of yours, perhaps?"

The name was only vaguely familiar, but Axiolis had him covered.

'Agam was an uncle to Zeff's grandfather.'

That seemed to surprise her. "Really now? Oh my, how embarrassing. I suppose that is what I get for attempting to connect with the younger generations."

'Don't feel bad,' said Ax. 'I'm sure I knew Agam even before you did. He was a charming fellow.'

"That he was." Sanko's nostalgia and sentiment seemed to die there, however.

Fortunately, it made little difference, as they were nearly there. Their two vehicles pulled up in front of the closed gate and parked. Everyone exited.

Zeff looked up and saw that Xavier Lawrence was just then joining Parson Miles atop the gate. Doubtless, their reapers had sensed the Gargoyles' presence.

Zeff had to muster every modicum of restraint he had left. It probably would not go over very well if he immediately started attacking them in front of Sanko."

"922

--donation bonus day (Page 3/3)--

"Captain General Miles!" Sanko called out. "And General Lawrence! What manner of welcome is this?! Open the gate!"

Parson leaned over the wall with his arms folded. "I'd rather not do that! Sorry!"

"You know why we have come, do you not?!"

"Yes, indeed!"

"And yet you still test our patience! You have five seconds to start explaining yourselves before we arrest you for insubordination!"

"Now just hold on!" After a moment, Parson leapt off the gate. His legs vanished as he neared the pavement, letting the pants of his airman's uniform flap wildly while his descent slowed within a rising gust of wind. His socks and shoes popped off of his missing feet and flew up past his head, and when his freshly reappeared legs touched the ground, he was barefoot. One of the falling shoes smacked his shoulder as Overra melted out of his body.

However, there was a reason Parson had chosen to vanish his legs instead of his arms. The man carried a box with him. "Before you go getting all intimidating and whatnot," said Parson, "I hope we can have an honest conversation."

"Honest?" Zeff growled. He could feel his fist shaking involuntarily and had to consciously relax it.

"Ah, Zeff!" said Parson. "It is good to see you again, my old friend, though the circumstances are disappointing. As are you." The man's expression turned suddenly grave. "In your youth, you demonstrated such potential. I'd hoped to foster greatness in you, but since I've been away, it seems you've grown content with being the willful stooge of more conniving men."

Zeff was almost as confused as he was angry. "What the hell are you talking about?"

‘And Axiolis, too,’ added Overra. ‘Such complacency in the face of wrongdoing is very unbecoming of someone as old as you.’

‘I see the two of you haven’t lost your gift for spouting complete nonsense,’ said Ax.

Sanko intervened. “Make your point, Miles. Before we make ours.”

“Okay, well, first of all, the attempt to apprehend the Elroys was motivated by a suspicion that they were harboring a fugitive.”

“Gema Elroy,” said Sanko. “We are aware. That is far from sufficient cause for the unlawful capture of this man’s other children.”

Parson began rifling through his box. “Of course. I won’t do you the disrespect of assuming you don’t already know the details of what transpired after Zeff was questioned by General Lawrence up there.” He retrieved a string-bound folder and offered it to Sanko. “But I don’t think you know the whole story.””

"923

Sanko took the folder, and Zeff watched her silently flip through its contents.

“Project Blacksong,” said Parson.

And the Gargoyle stopped flipping briefly, then continued.

“Those reports all confirm it. Gema Elroy sabotaged Blacksong. I’m sure you understand what that means, ma’am.”

‘Sabotage?’ said Ax. ‘Lawrence told us that Gema had killed an Intarian diplomat, so what are you saying now?’

‘I am afraid that information is classified,’ said Overra.

Sanko started handing papers off to Zeff. “And now it isn’t.”

Parson almost jumped. “Ah--! Um! Ma’am--those documents! They’re not really meant for other--!”

“Oops,” Sanko said flatly.

Parson just stared with wide eyes.

Overra remained calm, however. 'I suppose that's one way to negotiate. Fine, then. An Intarian diplomat WAS killed, but we have not confirmed who was responsible. Gema Elroy is a suspect, but she and her reaper are primarily wanted because they are traitors.'

Zeff was busy skimming through the report in his hands. It referenced some kind of information leak. The word 'Blacksong' was indeed mentioned multiple times. The text didn't go into detail, but Zeff had seen reports such as this before. The vague language. An overabundance of codenames. These reports were from the Covert Intelligence Division.

Spies. Ramira would have been excited. Zeff, however, was not. There were few things worse than having to deal with people who lied for a living.

'What is this Project Blacksong?' said Axiolis.

"It does not matter," said Sanko, eyeing Parson and Overra. "The point is moot. Even if Gema Elroy were attempting to destroy the whole of Intar, that would still not give you the right to detain her family members for more than a single day of questioning. And as we understand, you held Zeff for much longer than that and are in fact still holding his son."

"Well, yes, but--"

"Unless you have further evidence that proves the other Elroys were conspiring with Gema in her sabotage, then you are obligated to release Zeff's son now and stand down."

'Well, you see--'

"And as we do not currently have the time to conduct an investigation into your unit ourselves, you and all of your men will leave for Jesbol immediately and report to Field Marshal Jackson for a mandatory evaluation. If you do not comply with these orders--"

"Wait!" Parson nearly dropped his box. "You can't just--!"

"Do not test us, Miles. Patience and mercy have never been our strongest points. If you have conclusive evidence, then present it now.""

Parson rifled through his box another time while Overra picked up the conversation for him.

‘Believe it or not, we aren’t trying to annoy you,’ she said. ‘We DO have the evidence you’re looking for, but we also wanted to establish a more precise sense of what is at stake here. Hopefully, you understand that much now, yes?’

The Gargoyle might as well have been made of actual stone, for all the response she gave.

‘And... well, the evidence involves some photographs... which I’m sure Parson will find... any second now.’ She tossed a few glances at her servant. ‘They depict the Elroys in various places, you see. And I’m sure you’ll understand once--’

“Got ‘em!” Parson pulled out another folder. “Sorry about that. It seems it was misfiled.” He threw a look up at the General still atop the gate. “Lawrence can be such a dolt, sometimes.” He offered the folder to Sanko, but she didn’t take it just yet.

“If these photographs are so damning, then why were we not informed of their existence earlier? Over the telephone, for instance. Did you not think to save us the trip here?”

“Ah, well, I apologize for that. It was an unfortunate miscommunication. And you know how these things are. With so much going on--so many moving parts. Sometimes the right hand forgets to tell the left hand that it has been conducting covert surveillance on suspected traitors.” He gave the woman a big smile.

It didn’t seem to do much for her. She snatched the folder away from him, though, and started thumbing through the pictures.

Parson pointed one out to her. “This here--we suspect this is Gema Elroy crossing the border into Sair. A mere twelve hours after the information leak took place, I might add.”

“This photo does not even show her face,” Sanko observed. “It could be anyone. You call this conclusive evi--?” The sentence was cut short as she stopped on a different photo. She flipped it over, perhaps to inspect the timestamp.

'Is something wrong?' asked Axiolis.

Sanko held the photo up for Zeff to see.

It was a shot of Juliana Salazar leaving the Elroy's home. Zeff and Mariana were standing on the porch, watching the woman go.

"Explain your relationship with this person," said Sanko.

'She was the commanding officer of Zeff's wife, Mariana, before they got married. Why?'

"Because this woman is a known traitor.'"

"925

Zeff exchanged looks with Ax and the other Rainlords. After everything that had happened, Salazar's visit had been the furthest thing from his mind.

"This is your home in this picture?" Sanko asked.

"It was," Zeff said through gritted teeth. "Until the Vanguard attacked it without warning or cause. I have yet to return there to see if it is still standing."

'I'm sure someone told you,' said Axiolis. 'That was the attack that resulted in the death of Zeff's wife.'

Parson blinked. "What? Mariana is dead?"

"Yes," Zeff said lowly. "Did you not know the extent of your crime?"

"I'm very sorry to hear that, Zeff. I had no idea."

"You're not sorry, Parson. Not yet."

"Zeff, I swear to you, the orders were always to take your family alive."

Zeff glowered. "You say that like it makes a difference."

"Doesn't it? No one was supposed to die, Zeff. I would never have ordered--"

"Keep talking, Parson. That seems to be all you are good for anymore.”

Oddly enough, that seemed to shut him up, which was perhaps why Overra decided to chime in.

‘You’re being unreasonable,’ she said. ‘If Mariana had simply followed her orders, then we could have avoided this whole mess. And she would still be alive, I’m sure.’

Axiolis responded with a hoarse laugh. ‘Don’t try to goad us, you stupid bitch.’

‘I wasn’t trying to goad anyone. But it sounds like it wouldn’t be very difficult. Have you all inherited Mariana’s paranoia now that she’s gone?’

That very nearly broke Zeff’s composure.

But Octavia stepped forward first, tapping her cane against the pavement. “Have some respect for the deceased, lest you find yourself joining them shortly.”

‘Ah, the bloodthirsty Redwater clan. Tell me, are those old stories about how you got your name true?’

“Enough,” said Sanko, and the ground trembled beneath everyone’s feet. “No one says another word unless it is in answer to my questions.” She pointed at Overra. “You. Back inside the Keep. Now.”

‘Why? I’ve done noth--’

The ground shot up around the reaper, encasing her in a cage molded from pavement before anyone could even blink. And then the whole cage moved, speeding away like a shark’s fin atop water. It smashed a hole through the gate and kept going, undeterred until it was out of sight.

Sanko looked to Parson next. “I suggest you join her. And advise her not to return.””

"926

Parson smacked his lips as he observed the gaping hole in the gate. Then he just looked at Sanko, bobbed his head a little, and proceeded to do as he was told without another word.

Once he was gone, Sanko turned her attention up toward Lawrence, who was still watching from atop the gate. "Bring me the officers who took these photographs!" she yelled.

Lawrence nodded and disappeared from view.

She turned her attention back to Zeff and Axiolis. "Now. Explain why Salazar was visiting you."

Zeff folded his arms. "She said she was abandoning the Vanguard. She wanted us to join her. We did not appreciate the offer very much and instructed her to leave."

"And you simply let her go?"

'Rather than fight a Vanguardian general in our own home?' said Ax. 'Yes. You'll have to forgive us for prioritizing the safety of our children.'

"I see," said Sanko. "However, a mere day before this photo was taken, Juliana Salazar and several of her subordinates stopped reporting for duty. A large number of important items disappeared along with them, including weapons and classified documents. Their actions have jeopardized many sensitive operations all over the world. So I am sure you can understand my reluctance to trust your word alone."

'If we'd taken Salazar up on her offer, then we would have disappeared with her,' said Ax.

"They would have also avoided a lot of trouble," said Rayen Merlo. "Instead, they chose to stay--for the good of your organization. And look how their loyalty has been rewarded." And when Sanko offered no response, Rayen only seemed to grow angrier. "How do you plan on rectifying this situation?"

Sanko glared at her. "Be silent. Circumstances here are more complicated than you seem to appreciate, and I did not ask for your opinion."

The Lady Merlo scowled. "I do not answer to you, Gargoyle."

"You do today."

Octavia pressed a tiny hand against Rayen's arm. "Calm your blood."

But she also spared a look for Sanko. "And you can bark orders all you like, but remember that we are not Vanguard."

"You may not be, but the Elroys are."

'No, we aren't,' said Axiolis. 'Not anymore.'

Sanko stared at him now. "You claim you are not traitors, yet now you tell me you have abandoned your duty?"

"You cannot honestly expect them to stay with you!" said Rayen.

"They are Rainlords first and foremost," said Octavia."

"927

Zeff could feel his brethren crowding in around him, as if preparing to shield him with their very bodies. Rayen and Octavia stood in front, Evangelina and Santos in back, while Socorro circled around to the right.

And they weren't alone, either. Farther away, servants from the five presiding families had gathered to observe. They squatted inside blown-out buildings or stood upon nearby rooftops or hunkered behind manmade barricades, and there was no doubt in Zeff's mind that they would all jump in to lend a hand if the need arose. Not necessarily to protect Zeff, of course, but certainly to protect the respective head of their household.

"Ha..." The sight of their collective body language seemed to make an impression on Sanko. "You Rainlords... you certainly are a curious lot. You asked me to save you from this mess, and yet now you believe you can defeat me?"

"We didn't ask you to save us," said Rayen. "We asked you to do your job. Out of respect for the Vanguard's jurisdiction, though that respect is diminishing rather quickly at the moment. And, perhaps, we also hoped that corruption had not spread to your core."

"Ah."

"Do you not consider yourself responsible for the actions of your men?" asked Octavia.

Sanko fell briefly silent as she looked over her audience another time. "Honorable Rainlords," she said, almost laughing. Whether it was amusement or awe, Zeff could not rightly tell. "Nearly to the point of madness, but honorable nonetheless. Very well. Let us speak terms. What would it take to placate your anger here?"

The six ruling Rainlords exchanged looks with one another.

Octavia was the first to speak up. "This is why we wanted to have a meeting earlier. We have three conditions. First, you must return Francisco Elroy and the reaper Dennex to us. Second, you must also give us Xavier Lawrence and the reaper Dergoz, so that we may ensure they are given a proper trial for their crimes." And perhaps Octavia expected to be interrupted there, because she paused.

But all Sanko said was, "And the third condition?"

"The Vanguard must leave our territory. That means all of Sair west of the Wares Mountains, including Rhein's Keep here."

"Quite demanding, that last one."

Octavia returned a thin smile. "In another age, we would have simply executed all of your men without consulting you."

"928

Sanko breathed a laugh. "Simpler times, to be sure."

Then came silence as the Rainlords responded no further, deciding only to wait as Sanko deliberated. In the intervening period, the watchmen that she ordered out earlier arrived through the hole in the gate. She spoke to them in turns, quietly enough that the Rainlords could not hear what she was saying. She showed them the photographs they had taken, presumably attempting to corroborate as much of Parson's information as she could.

At length, she concluded with the watchmen, took one more opportunity to mull things over on her own, and then returned to speak with the Rainlords.

"I find your demands agreeable," she said. "I am willing to grant you all three of them."

Rayen was the one to say it. "But?"

"But I have one condition of my own," said Sanko. "This matter of potential treason is not something that can simply be overlooked. If not properly addressed, the ripple effects could result in the loss of hundreds, if not thousands, of good Vanguardian soldiers--and by extension, the countless civilian lives that they protect."

"State your condition," said Rayen.

Sanko gave her a look. "You must submit yourselves to a formal investigation by the Vanguard so that these allegations against you may be put to rest."

Zeff saw the shifting postures around him. Already, he could tell that they were going to reject her.

"Once your innocence is confirmed," Sanko went on, "you have my word that all of your conditions will be met."

Rayen shook her head. "After everything your people have put us through, why would we ever believe that such an investigation would be fairly conducted?"

"Because I give you my word that it will be," said Sanko.

"Of course you do," said Octavia. "But even if we presume that you are trustworthy, your people have already proven that they are not."

"Your condition is unacceptable," said Rayen.

Sanko tilted her head. "Can the two of you merely decide that by yourselves? And so quickly? Should you not at least discuss the matter among you? What do the other four say?"

"This is not something which requires debating," said Evangelina Stroud. "You may consider this our resignation as well."

"Indeed," said Socorro Garza. "We have already told you to leave, and you have responded by offering to invade our privacy more than ever before."

"The Ladies have the truth of it," said Santos Zabat. "I stand with them."

And when Zeff didn't add anything, Sanko took notice, indigo eyes lingering on him.

“...Do not ask my opinion,” said Zeff. “You would like it even less than theirs.”

Sanko exhaled a heavy breath and stiffened. “Well, then,” she said, still with two voices. “It appears there is nothing more to say.”

Octavia Redwater placed both hands upon her cane. “So it does.””
"929 -- CVI.

Chapter One Hundred Six: ‘When the waters run red...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It seemed like no one wanted to make the first move. Even the gentle wind had gone, leaving the air so still that Zeff could feel his own heartbeat. And perhaps that wasn't a coincidence. Zeff had heard that a strong enough soul could affect the atmosphere physically.

Indeed, the pressure of the Gargoyle's presence was palpable. Zeff had felt it as soon as he met her, but now it was on another level. Everything seemed heavier. Even breathing felt somehow more difficult. Was this really just the field density of her soul? Filling the air with pure willpower?

It was a warning, he knew. His own body was telling him. This person standing before him was not someone he should fight. This person was a monster. And he was nothing. Thirty years as a servant? A child, by comparison. Helpless.

But no. That wouldn't work on Zeff. He wouldn't succumb to mere dread. The old well wouldn't let him. His pit of boiling hatred. It wouldn't let him forget everything that had brought him here.

Gargoyle or not, this woman was standing between him and his son, between him and the people responsible for Mariana's death. So he maintained his concentration and tried to assess the situation.

The first point was hyper-states. None of the Rainlords were using them yet, but Sanko was already wielding pan-rozum. If any of their reapers moved to merge with them, she would undoubtedly attack. But she probably didn't know who had which abilities, so she wouldn't know whom she should target first. What they needed was a distraction so that Octavia and Rayen could safely merge with Wendy and Lonogren. Perhaps he could provide that for them.

At least, that was what Zeff was thinking until Octavia Redwater surprised everyone by stepping forward.

"Everyone, wait a moment," the little old lady said. "I have something I need to show you." She ripped the top of her cane off, revealing a white inner piece, which she grasped with one hand.

And immediately, Zeff could sense it, as could everyone else, he was sure.

Octavia pulled the rest free. A white blade, thin like a rapier but so much more deadly than that. Because it was made from bone.

Zeff didn't need to look any closer. The foul aura leaking from it told him everything he needed to know."

"929 -- CVI.

Chapter One Hundred Six: 'When the waters run red...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It seemed like no one wanted to make the first move. Even the gentle wind had gone, leaving the air so still that Zeff could feel his own heartbeat. And perhaps that wasn't a coincidence. Zeff had heard that a strong enough soul could affect the atmosphere physically.

Indeed, the pressure of the Gargoyle's presence was palpable. Zeff had felt it as soon as he met her, but now it was on another level. Everything seemed heavier. Even breathing felt somehow more difficult. Was this really just the field density of her soul? Filling the air with pure willpower?

It was a warning, he knew. His own body was telling him. This person standing before him was not someone he should fight. This person was a monster. And he was nothing. Thirty years as a servant? A child, by comparison. Helpless.

But no. That wouldn't work on Zeff. He wouldn't succumb to mere dread. The old well wouldn't let him. His pit of boiling hatred. It wouldn't let him forget everything that had brought him here.

Gargoyle or not, this woman was standing between him and his son, between him and the people responsible for Mariana's death. So he maintained his concentration and tried to assess the situation.

The first point was hyper-states. None of the Rainlords were using them yet, but Sanko was already wielding pan-rozum. If any of their reapers moved to merge with them, she would undoubtedly attack. But she probably didn't know who had which abilities, so she wouldn't know whom she should target first. What they needed was a distraction so that Octavia and Rayen could safely merge with Wendy and Lonogren. Perhaps he could provide that for them.

At least, that was what Zeff was thinking until Octavia Redwater surprised everyone by stepping forward.

"Everyone, wait a moment," the little old lady said. "I have something I need to show you." She ripped the top of her cane off, revealing a white inner piece, which she grasped with one hand.

And immediately, Zeff could sense it, as could everyone else, he was sure.

Octavia pulled the rest free. A white blade, thin like a rapier but so much more deadly than that. Because it was made from bone.

Zeff didn't need to look any closer. The foul aura leaking from it told him everything he needed to know."

"930

Sanko's eyes filled the holes in her mask. "Where did you get that?"

"My grandson, Diego," said Octavia. "Said he nearly killed himself trying to use it, so he thought I would like it as a birthday present. He is now my favorite grandson."

"You fool," said Sanko. "Do you know whose bones those are?"

"Sure do."

"You'll kill half your allies. Or all of them."

“Oh, don’t worry about that. I’ve been practicing. It is pretty terrifying, though, isn’t it? Are you sure you still want to fight us? I promise we won’t think any less of you if you decide to back down now.”

“Quaint. But your trinket won’t stop me. I faced the monster it belonged to, you may recall.”

Octavia frowned. “Did you really? Y’know, I was kind of hoping that was just a rumor.”

“You are an amusing person,” said Sanko. “I only wish I were better at holding back.”

“Oh, I know the feeling. It’s quite frustrating, isn’t it?”

But Sanko was through talking, it seemed.

The Gargoyle took a single step, and a series of ripples ran across the pavement as if it were a pond, unsettling the Rainlords' footing for a moment before the ground came shooting up all around them in a dozen geysers of living stone.

Octavia responded with a flash of her blade, and shadow gushed forth, pure blackness, enveloping the six of them in a brief cage that exploded outward, knocking the rocks down and letting the Rainlords free.

By this point, they were already merging with their reapers.

Zeff could feel his mind shifting. Ax's mind was there now, too. He could feel every emotion that Ax felt, share every thought as if it were his own. And the memories. They were an ocean. A thousand lifetimes, and hardly a thing forgotten. Names and faces, histories and places, firsthand knowledge and endless information.

The pan-forma merge completed itself. The normal enhancements paled in comparison to this feeling. This was beyond adrenaline. This was fire with all of the heat and none of the agony. Burning in glory, flirting with death, certain in the strength of their two minds.

When the moment passed, and Zeff and Axiolis returned to the present, they were already mid-stride, running adjacent Rayen and Evangelina. Santos and Socorro were running with Octavia in the opposite direction."

"931

Everyone was moving now. The dozens of other Rainlords all around them were already either opening fire from a distance or rushing in to provide upfront support. Rayen Merlo's flesh was in turns vanishing and reappearing, but always with a faintly violet glow. And Zeff, of course, was launching a storm of frozen spikes toward Sanko.

But it was Octavia who got to the woman first. The white blade shuddered visibly, and Zeff saw light bend around Sanko's torso, distorting like a bubble in space itself. It was similar to the destruction type abilities, but this was a single point, not a path, and the sound was different. This was the rushing of wind past his ears. He felt the violent shift in gravity, as well, pulling him and everyone else suddenly forward.

In an instant, he watched as Sanko's body imploded, sucked into the bubble and spaghettified.

And just like that, the bubble was gone again, disappeared into thin air, leaving a small crater in the ground along with the dusty remains of Sanko's body.

But there was no blood--no bits of flesh, even though a few busted stones lay where Sanko's feet should have been.

She was not dead, rather obviously. The Rainlords needed no assurances on that point. Even if they had believed that the Gargoyle could be defeated so easily, there was still the matter of that oppressive presence having not diminished whatsoever.

It was common enough knowledge that the Gargoyle's power involved earth in some way, but if not for Axiolis' memories, Zeff would have lacked any genuine details. Instead, he was able to recall tales from half a century ago about Sanko's fearsome control of integration.

Hers was an ability type most often relegated to the supporting role, but she had lived long enough to become an exception. She'd used pan-rozum to do more than simply fuse elements together. She'd learned to fuse herself into them, to become an entity of dirt and rock and stone. Integration may not have allowed her to create her own elements, even with pan-rozum, but that was a small price to pay when she could wield almost every element of every type of ground in the world as an extension of her body.

Everything beneath the Rainlords' feet belonged to the Gargoyle now. Axiolis didn't know what her maximum range was, but anything less than a kilometer was just wishful thinking, Zeff knew.

And it was no surprise when the ground began to tremble."

"932

The six retreated to the air--Rayen's group on a platform of ice, Octavia's group on one of platinum, courtesy of the Lady Socorro.

Rather than pursue them, however, Sanko went after their support. A tidal wave of rock and dirt launched up and swallowed a building full of Rainlords some thirty meters away. One moment, the structure and all the people were there, and the next, there lay only flat land and a few sinking chunks of broken roof tiles.

There had hardly been time to react. More Rainlords were rushing up the hill to the Keep's entrance, but if the six heads didn't hold the Gargoyle back, then those new Rainlords were practically dead already.

Rayen went full tilt. Pan-rozum brought out the full strength of her alteration ability, transforming herself into a being of ultraviolet light. To the naked eye, her flesh was almost invisible, save only for the dimmest of purple outlines around her body, making her clothes appear to float in space. Zeff, however, could at least see the woman's soul now--a kind of translucently blue whirlpool that completely filled the space where her body should have been.

And in a blink, she was gone, launching her assault at the speed of ultraviolet light. She carved a swath into the ground so fast that it left a second wave of exploding rock in her wake. She zigzagged faster than any human eye could follow, and then focused her efforts into a concentrated burst of high invisible light, creating a shock wave that left a massive crater behind and a fresh hole in the Keep's front wall.

That seemed to grab Sanko's attention.

The other five heads attacked as well--Octavia with another singularity that sucked up one of the Keep's towers, Zeff with a pair of building-sized spears of ice dropped from the heavens, Socorro with a gigantic slab of platinum dropped above the Keep, Santos with a series of earth-shattering explosions, and Evangelina with a splash of fuming acid that melted half the Keep's gate.

Parson Miles burst up above the castle and knocked Socorro's slab away with an arching tornado. Lawrence and his men would not be far behind, Zeff knew.

But of course, they were not the real threat.

The sundered earth convulsed and bloated skyward, and from it, a gargantuan figure began to rise."

"933

It became a giant, born of rock and clay and dirt and grass, carrying whole trees and sidewalks up its body. Its head and shoulders alone were enough to dwarf the crumbling castle by its side.

The Rainlords wasted no time attacking. In unison, explosions and materials and gunfire and beams of nearly invisible light all bombarded the earthy titan with a furious maelstrom, carving out chunks of its body and causing it to shower chipped rocks across the battlefield.

But it wasn't enough. The giant's body repaired itself as quickly as they could damage it. Even a pair of rapid singularities from Octavia did little more than make the golem shiver before refilling the gaping caverns in its stone flesh.

The ground all but vanished beneath the beast's clawed feet, sunken in so greatly that it flattened the hill that they had all been standing on. Rhein's Keep shifted as its foundation did, losing many of its broken pieces to a sudden landslide but otherwise remaining intact.

The beast grew to its full height, a living skyscraper for Rheinhal, complete with the same devil's face as Sanko's mask, this time bearing a devil's body to go along with it. It had the hunched posture of a gorilla with its short legs and long, powerful arms; and from its huge back jutted two enormous wings, crooked and grotesque and almost certainly incapable of flight, if that mattered. It probably didn't, Zeff felt.

From his position of momentary safety atop an icy platform, Zeff reached for everything he could muster from his mind. Pan-forma burned inside him, granting three important increases: soul defenses, physical regeneration, and connectivity of his creations. The latter bonus was often overlooked somewhat, but it meant that Zeff could create complex structures more easily, treat multiple creations as one in his mind, and even have his materialized mass regenerate on its own, if he wanted it to.

And he called on each of those material enhancements now as he created something that had been in his mind for years but that he had never quite been able to manage without forma to help him.

The body of it was a long tube of soul-strengthened ice, thick enough to withstand cannon fire--because that was exactly what this was going to be: an enormous cannon. Only without the fire."

It required an explosion, which was the difficulty of the trick. If the explosion were too weak, the cannon would be useless. If it were too strong, the cannon itself would burst apart. He and Axiolis had to strike the correct balance between power and structural integrity.

Zepp plugged up the cannon and filled it with warm, swirling water. The time was ticking now, because the surrounding ice would freeze the water if he took too long, but Zepp knew the timing. From there, two things needed to happen in near succession. First, he had to create a vein of superheated steam inside the sloshing water. The heat would cause the water to boil in a violent flash, resulting in the explosion he needed. Second, he needed to materialize the soul-strengthened cannonball with his maximized velocity. This way, the explosive velocity of the steam would increase the already moving cannonball, granting it much greater punch than Zepp could give it otherwise. And it all had to be done in an instant, with immense precision.

With full concentration, Zepp wrenched one open palm upward and created the vein of superheated steam, and with the other hand, this one a closed fist, he threw a backhanded punch, creating the cannonball of solid ice while simultaneously unplugging the cannon.

The cannon jumped from the force of the explosion, and the cannonball rocketed into the sky and barreled into the Gargoyle's stomach, shattering on impact.

And Sanko hardly even seemed to notice.

Zepp scowled inside his own mind and just kept firing. He'd hardly expected it to end the fight, but still, this was more than a little frustrating. His ice became all but lost in the huge flurry of other attacks that the Rainlords were launching. Multiple paths of destruction, little more than splinters against the Gargoyle's skin. Octavia's singularities managed to poke bigger holes into her, but they didn't seem to be doing very much.

Then the Gargoyle finally launched an attack of her own.

Earthen spires shot out of the giant's body in every direction--thousands of car-sized arrows looking for Rainlord blood. And finding it, too, because Sanko also chose that moment to send an earthquake tearing through the ground, throwing everyone off balance.

Zeff tried to avoid them by leaping off his platform, but one spire took his head clean off, along with his arms and chest."

"935

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

Even without his brain, however, the Lord Elroy remained conscious, still able to sense the relative positions of other souls. Pan-forma allowed his mind to reside with Axiolis', and reapers, of course, did not require a physical brain for their own consciousness. So instead of regenerating from his splattered brain matter, Zeff's body regenerated from his legs as they tumbled to the ground. Pan-forma would always regrow the body from the largest surviving section of their merged souls, regardless of whether it was the head or the little toe or only the soul without any flesh whatsoever.

In mere seconds, Zeff had a skull again, and after that, his gray eyes returned as well, allowing him to witness the result of Sanko's attack. Spears of jagged rock littered the uneven earth, having created a sloped field of stone spires, almost like a maze. Aftershocks were still making the ground quiver.

And the blood. Pools of it were everywhere, growing with each moment as dozens of Rainlords lay dead or nearly so, smashed beneath piles of stone.

Octavia and Rayen were still attacking Sanko, Zeff saw. Evangelina, Socorro, and Santos looked like they would be on their feet momentarily, but he also spotted Parson and Lawrence descending from the broken cliff that the Keep now stood upon.

Zeff didn't even think. His body just started moving on its own as he felt the old well boil to the utmost brink, ready to explode now that he finally had those two men in sight. No doubt, they were hoping to finish Zeff's brethren off while they were down.

He was absolutely not going to let that happen.

The old well loosed an explosion of burning water. Not steam. That wasn't the kind of water that could hold his hatred. Only lakefire could fulfill that purpose. Flaming water, eternally burning and boiling, never extinguishing or evaporating.

This was the old well's purpose. To preserve the ingredient he needed for when the moment presented itself, the moment that demanded explosive refusal. And it worked. Almost too easily. It had been many years, but Zeff felt the response. Emergence found him once again.

A mountain of ice blinked into existence, already hurtling toward Parson and Lawrence. The two men noticed it rather immediately and diverted courses--Parson zooming up and away, while Lawrence launched himself down toward the three Rainlords via a radium projectile.

Unfortunately for Lawrence, however, there was a second mountain of ice, and it clobbered him into the cliffside."

"936

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

Before Zeff could press his attack any further, however, a tornado swirled down from the sky and whipped him and the other Rainlords into the air. Zeff coated himself in ice, but the oncoming blades of wind chiseled through it in rapid succession and slashed his flailing body from a hundred different angles.

Then he was free again, left to fall back down to the ground in peace. It was Rayen's doing, he saw. She and Parson were both practically invisible, but their souls could be seen in direct conflict. A beam of ultraviolet light had gored a swirling vortex through its center, but somehow, the vortex was preventing that same light from escaping. A series of booms rang out as they struggled there in the sky, but Zeff had already turned away from their fight in order to focus on his own.

Evangelina and Santos had gone off to support Octavia, and so it was only Zeff and Socorro now, perched on a field of half-broken spires as they readied to face Xavier Lawrence.

After going up against Sanko and Parson, Lawrence almost seemed like an easy fight. But that was wrong, Zeff knew, and he reminded himself that this was not a man to be underestimated.

A radium dome arrived first, trying to bathe the two Rainlords in soul-enhanced radiation, but Zeff was ready with four enormous pillars of ice--more enormous than he had even intended them to be, in fact--and they knocked the dome away before it could do any damage.

Then came a bed of radium, instead, and Socorro and Zeff both platformed themselves away. Zeff's platform, however, didn't let up. It grew upward and sideways and then back down toward Lawrence with increasing speed. It was almost too fast, like flying on a rocket made of ice, and Zeff barely managed to maintain control.

But his reliance on only ice was limiting him, he realized. The decreased temperature made it more difficult to produce. So this time, he reached for water, as much of it as he could create.

And a tsunami appeared.

It reached nearly as high as the Gargoyle's head and came crashing down on Lawrence, who merely shielded himself with a radium shelter. The water hissed angrily against the white metal, making it jostle from the sheer force of the wave, but the radium held strong nonetheless.

But Zeff already knew what he wanted to do next."

"937

--Monday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

Spikes of radium jumped out of Lawrence's shell, and Zeff met them with a pair of pressurized water drills. Previously, he'd only been able to make them the size of his thumb, but now, the drills were bigger than each hand. So when Zeff pushed them into the spikes, they carved the radium down and left cracking holes in the wall, allowing the Rainlord to do the rest of the work with brute strength alone.

He punched through, and Lawrence was there, right in his face, having caught Zeff's fist with his own radium-coated palm.

With both men wielding super strength, a brief hand-to-hand struggle occurred, and for a moment, they were able to look each other in the eye.

"I'm sorry for what I am about to do, Zeff."

"Don't apologize for dying, Lawrence."

Zeff coated himself in spikes of his own, aiming to skewer the old man with them, but Lawrence released him and used a sudden block of radium to knock Zeff and his spikes back.

Zeff toppled back, bouncing atop a row of spires. A hail of platinum shards bought him time to find his footing again.

But the General did not press his attack yet, Zeff saw. Instead, Lawrence's body flashed pristinely white as pan-rozum transformed him into pure radium. And his body did not tarnish with air exposure like normal radium did. Rather, it began to glow fiercely blue, even in this bright daylight.

And Zeff knew what that meant. Lawrence was pushing the radiation to absurd levels with the power of his soul. Already, Zeff could feel its debilitating effects, attacking his flesh on a cellular level, weakening muscles and hindering regeneration. This skill was the reason Lawrence was called the Blue Bear.

But Zeff was not in the mood to be intimidated. He lobbed another tsunami and followed in its wake, preparing to materialize another drill. A rapid series of platinum javelins came flying to his aid as well, providing extra support.

Lawrence's glowing body pressed through the water, hissing inside a billowing cloud of steam, and the man launched a wall of radium spikes toward Zeff, each one glowing blue as well.

Zeff propelled himself out of their path with a vertical platform and pulled out his two-finger hand guns. Icy bullets burst forth as Zeff sailed through the air."

"938

A glowing cage materialized around Zeff in midair. He immediately felt the radiation degrading his body, slowing his movement, and he knew that it would spell the end for him if he stayed inside it for more than a few seconds. His water drill punched through, and Zeff fell toward the ground again.

Jaws of radium leapt up to meet him, and Zeff responded by filling the open maw with a sudden geyser. The water shot up with enough force to carry Zeff with it, removing him from danger. He caught himself with a twisting slope of ice, allowing him to create a path that brought him right back down to both feet again.

But Lawrence was there now--a figure of blue heat, looming directly in front of Zeff--and the radiation was at its most potent, destroying the Rainlord's muscles and numbing each of his physical senses.

A platinum wrecking ball slammed into the General, but not before he grabbed Zeff's arm. Rather than be taken along with Lawrence, however, the limb tore free, spewing blood and melted flesh from the gaping wound.

Even with pan-forma, Zeff needed a few extra moments to recover. The effects of soul-empowered radiation lingered still, and he could see his own skin forming a puddle of slop around his hands and knees. Lawrence, on the other hand, would be requiring no such time.

The Lady Socorro Garza picked up the slack. She hadn't stopped attacking once, materializing boulder after boulder, pinballing the Vanguardian General around in an effort to keep him off balance. He seemed to have had enough of that, however, and punted the next boulder right back at her. It dematerialized before reaching her, and she started creating multiple boulders at once, all gunning for Lawrence from different directions. Lawrence met each of them with soaring blue lances, sparing one for Socorro as well. She barely managed to sidestep it, but a horizontal blade jumped out of its shaft at the last moment and slashed her neck and arm, very nearly decapitating her.

Then an earthquake interrupted, halting both attackers as they had to stop and steady themselves.

To Zeff's amazement, the Madame Redwater had not yet fallen. She'd been holding off the Gargoyle for a solid minute without assistance, keeping the endless streams of rock at bay before they could smother and crush her."

"939

--Wednesday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

The black shadow swirled around Octavia in a mad frenzy, dicing up the rocks it could get to; and the ones it couldn't, it left to Octavia's magnesium transfiguration. With pan-rozum, the little old woman was no more, replaced with a white hot flame that burned with such intensity as to render Zeff hardly capable of looking at it. Rocks soared into that bright core and were rendered to ash. And intermittently, a singularity would pop up as well and devour a chunk of the Gargoyle's body.

She was a whirlwind of light and darkness now, exuding more power than Zeff had ever witnessed in a single Rainlord. He couldn't tell what had become of Evangelina and Santos, but if they had gotten caught up in the middle of that chaos, then they were probably not faring so well right about now.

The ground beneath their fight sunk lower and lower as the Gargoyle continued consuming it, requiring more for her giant form as Octavia kept destroying it. But more and more, the Gargoyle was getting closer to that white hot flame, swarming it with increasing mass. And soon, the heart of the fire was no longer visible, engulfed too greatly in earth.

Then, in a blink, Rayen's swirling form was there in front of Zeff, wrapping her plump arms around him. And in another blink, Zeff was suddenly standing on a bridge somewhere, confused. Until the acceleration sickness caught up to him. He bent over to retch, and for a moment, every muscle in his body felt like it had disintegrated. Pan-forma struggled to heal him, and Rayen said something, but Zeff didn't catch it. When he looked up, she was gone, replaced with the half-smashed corpse of Evangelina Stroud.

After a beat, Rayen reappeared with Socorro Garza, who fell to her knees and heaved all over the pavement.

Rayen said something again, and this time, Zeff could actually hear it.

"We are going back for the others," she said in two voices. "If we are gone longer than twenty seconds, run and do not look back."

And before he could so much as protest, the woman was gone again, leaving only a trail of faintly visible light to indicate the direction she'd gone. It led toward a cityscape in the distance.

A cityscape. At the foot of an enormous mountain range.

Rheinhal, Zeff finally realized. The hilltop that appeared to be moving must have been Sanko. Rayen had carried the three of them to safety."

"940

--Wednesday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

At the speeds that Rayen's body moved, a normal human would have been rent to dust. If it weren't for Zeff's passive soul defenses, he knew that he and Axiolis would not have survived, either.

Such were the limits of Rayen's ability. She could move within one of two speed ranges: that of an unaided human, or that of pure light. Everything in between those two extremes was impossible. And unfortunately, this also meant that Rayen could not bring any of the weaker servants here without maiming or killing them. Even carrying reapers by themselves would not work because it was impossible for her to maintain a strong enough grip on them. If she tried, her soul would simply tear through the reaper, instead.

Moreover, the speed was a danger to Rayen herself, Axiolis knew, on top of being difficult to control. If she went too far with a single leap, her own body would break down, taking the merged souls with it. It was the same for every "light-wielder" who dared to use pan-rozum.

For now, Zeff would have to stifle his anger at Rayen for forcing him to retreat. He understood why she had done it, of course, but still. His and Axiolis' collective pride wanted to rush back to the battlefield at that very moment.

But he didn't. Reason won out as he helped the regenerating Evangelina to her feet and then did the same for Socorro. He tried to explain the abrupt change in circumstances.

And he remembered Rayen's words. Twenty seconds, she had said. That didn't seem like nearly enough time to wait before deciding on a full retreat. Zeff wasn't even done talking to Socorro and Evangelina before time expired.

Nonetheless, they waited, and it very quickly became clear that Rayen was not going to return.

They had a decision to make.

"We must not delay," said Socorro. "Rayen gave us the opportunity to run. We should trust her judgment and go."

Zeff wanted to argue, and so did Evangelina, by the look on her face. But neither did. Difficult as it was to admit, Socorro was probably correct. Even if it meant abandoning all of their forces. Abandoning Francisco...

Socorro started walking, and after a fashion, the Lady Stroud and the Lord Elroy followed.

They had taken too long, however.

Zeff and Axiolis sensed someone approaching from the sky, moving at jet speed. Captain General Parson Miles was not going to let them flee so easily, it would seem."

"941 -- CVII.

--Wednesday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

Chapter One Hundred Seven: 'Thy strangling breath...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The fight came quickly. And ended nearly as fast.

The objective wasn't to win. With only the three of them, a battle against Parson Miles was unfavorable, to say the least. And so, if defeat was all but guaranteed, then the most important task at hand was to ensure someone was able to escape to Luzo and warn everyone else. With that goal in mind, the trio of Rainlords stopped using pan-forma all at once and let their reapers flee underground in separate directions.

This was a mistake, they soon realized.

Rather than attacking them, Parson whipped his own body into a tornadic fury, becoming a veritable blade of gale force winds that carried the strength of his and Overra's soul. And with that blade, he barreled straight into the ground, kicking up a cloud of swirling dust that became a whirlwind unto itself.

No more than a minute later, Parson returned to surface with all three reapers in his clutches.

Parson descended slowly, accumulating into the form of a man once more and watching the Rainlords carefully as he landed on the bridge with them. Perhaps he was waiting to see if they would force him to kill their reapers right then and there. They didn't.

"Have you all calmed down?" Parson asked.

None answered.

"Mm. Really, though, you should have known better. Lady Garza, sure, you have the excuse of never having been Vanguard, but Zeff and Angie? We spent years together. And yet even now, you underestimate us?"

Zeff could feel the old well boiling again.

"But then again," Parson went on, "Rainlords never do make very good tacticians. All that honor and bloodlust mixed together. Small wonder why you always seem to make the wrong decisions."

Evangelina Stroud kept her voice level. "If you are going to take us prisoner, then please get on with it. I know how much you love to talk, but I would honestly rather be stuck in a holding cell for the next twenty years than listen to you yammer on for another five minutes."

Parson chuckled with two voices. "Oh, Angie. Silly girl. Now that the Gargoyle isn't watching, we can do as we please. Naturally, we're not going to take you prisoner."

Socorro's reaper burst apart in a sudden gust of wind and evaporated into nothing."

"941 -- CVII.

--Wednesday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

Chapter One Hundred Seven: 'Thy strangling breath...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The fight came quickly. And ended nearly as fast.

The objective wasn't to win. With only the three of them, a battle against Parson Miles was unfavorable, to say the least. And so, if defeat was all but guaranteed, then the most important task at hand was to ensure someone was able to escape to Luzo and warn everyone else. With that goal in mind, the trio of Rainlords stopped using pan-forma all at once and let their reapers flee underground in separate directions.

This was a mistake, they soon realized.

Rather than attacking them, Parson whipped his own body into a tornadic fury, becoming a veritable blade of gale force winds that carried the strength of his and Overra's soul. And with that blade, he barreled straight into the ground, kicking up a cloud of swirling dust that became a whirlwind unto itself.

No more than a minute later, Parson returned to surface with all three reapers in his clutches.

Parson descended slowly, accumulating into the form of a man once more and watching the Rainlords carefully as he landed on the bridge with them. Perhaps he was waiting to see if they would force him to kill their reapers right then and there. They didn't.

"Have you all calmed down?" Parson asked.

None answered.

"Mm. Really, though, you should have known better. Lady Garza, sure, you have the excuse of never having been Vanguard, but Zeff and Angie? We spent years together. And yet even now, you underestimate us?"

Zeff could feel the old well boiling again.

"But then again," Parson went on, "Rainlords never do make very good tacticians. All that honor and bloodlust mixed together. Small wonder why you always seem to make the wrong decisions."

Evangelina Stroud kept her voice level. "If you are going to take us prisoner, then please get on with it. I know how much you love to talk, but I would honestly rather be stuck in a holding cell for the next twenty years than listen to you yammer on for another five minutes."

Parson chuckled with two voices. "Oh, Angie. Silly girl. Now that the Gargoyle isn't watching, we can do as we please. Naturally, we're not going to take you prisoner."

Socorro's reaper burst apart in a sudden gust of wind and evaporated into nothing."

"942

Socorro doubled over onto the pavement, hands spread wide as her breathing turned irregular and the muscles in her body began to twitch. Then a blade of wind split her head down the middle, and a gale picked her body up and sent it flying over the side of the bridge, leaving her to fall into the empty gorge below.

The old well erupted once more, and Zeff felt the response another time. He clenched both fists at once, and a boiling tidal wave fell upon Parson, converting to steam in midair as it tried to melt the man alive.

A whirlwind blew it all away.

And Parson smiled. "There's that devil's blood in your veins! A second emergence!"

Spikes of ice now. Hundreds all at once, shooting at Parson from every conceivable direction as if fired from hundreds of invisible guns. A whirlwind took them, too, and then came for Zeff and Evangelina, propelling them both skyward and holding them there with pressurized air currents.

"Too bad it's still not enough," said Parson, rising to look him in the eye. "Story of your life, eh? Always a step behind. Always needing someone to hold your hand and protect you, despite acting like you're the one doing the protecting. And Angie--oh, you're even worse than him!"

Hardly able to move, Zeff clenched his teeth and finally just yelled, "Why are you doing this?! Parson! What possible reason could you--?!" But the sentence went unfinished as oxygen flew directly into his lungs and filled his chest nearly to the point of bursting.

And Parson gave a snort. "Reason? Singular? Dear boy, you really did learn nothing from me, didn't you? Never run with any plan in which there is only one desirable outcome. Fundamentals, Zeff. There's no substitute for a good grasp of the fundamentals."

Zeff and Evangelina both struggled there in vain. The soul-strengthened air currents might as well have been concrete.

But of course, Parson wasn't done talking. "Ah, well. It doesn't really matter, anyway. Because it's not about the plan. It's never about the plan. It's about what you do when the plan blows up in your face--how you react to unexpected problems. Because plans fail all the time, especially the complicated ones. That's why it's so important to leave yourself some wiggle room--so that you can improvise later. You understand?"

"943

As he writhed there, Zeff could not understand why the bastard was taking so long to kill them. Parson had always been an absurd motormouth, but Zeff had never known the man to gloat. This was pure cruelty and stupidity. Ridiculous. All it did was make the old well boil another time.

"I know it's a bit late for a lecture," Parson was still saying, "but I hope some of this is sinking in. Oh, but I should commend you for one thing, at least. In spite of all the other mistakes you've made, you were correct to not allow Sanko to investigate you. That would not have gone your way. I assure you. For many reasons. One of which is named Blackburn. But I suppose that's neither here nor there. Let's see, what else did I want to talk about? Umm... hmm..."

Evangelina's whole body began to sizzle and burn at once. She might have been immobilized and weakened, but the explosive potential of sulfur transfiguration was not to be ignored, even by Parson. If she empowered the blast with her soul, he would die along with the rest of them. And of course, if Parson was going to kill them anyway, then the Rainlords didn't have much to lose.

And by the sudden look in the Cpt. General's eyes, Parson understood these facts instantly. A surge of wind propelled the woman away at the very last moment, and the explosion detonated in a searing flash, ripping through one of the bridge's center columns. Dozens of cables snapped free at once and whipped around like giant snakes as Parson and all of his captives went soaring across the crumbling structure, pursued by a trail of smoke.

But captives, they still were. Parson retained his grip on Zeff, Axiolis, and even Evangelina's reaper.

"Whew!" said Parson. "So impatient! Always was her problem! And what a temper!" He'd regained control and started flying with Zeff stuck in front of him. "Not like you, Zeff. In fact, you had too much patience, didn't you? Never did learn how to strike while the iron was hot. Always needed that extra push."

Still, Zeff tried to attack with ice. And still, it was fruitless.

“Well, it’s okay,” said Parson. “Because Gema isn’t like you. She’s better than you ever were.”

And Zeff stopped attacking and just stared with hard, wide eyes at the man’s deceptively young face.

“That’s right, Zeff. Gema works for me. I know exactly where she is. I’ve known all along.”

"944

Thankfully, Axiolis was there to ask the question that Zeff couldn’t. ‘Parson, what are you saying?’

Parson abruptly stopped flying. “I’m saying... well, I’m sure you’ve been wondering, right? Why all of this suddenly happened to you and your family? Why it seemed like the Vanguard just betrayed you out of nowhere? What I’m saying is... it was me. I fabricated the entire incident with Gema’s apparent treason and subsequent disappearance. I mean, she’s good, but there’s no way she could’ve avoided the Vanguard this whole time without a bit of help from someone with clout, right?”

Zeff shut his eyes. He focused on the old well as he listened. Focused on his anger and hatred and everything wrong with the world. Focused on what he needed.

“Well, Zeff? Do you understand what I’m saying? I set this all in motion. Oh, but perhaps you’re still wondering why? Like I said earlier, there are multiple reasons, really, but the primary reason is because you have wicked blood in you. And even though I don’t have a problem letting you live--because I know you’re a good guy--I still can’t really take that same risk with your children. They could become real problems when they get older, see? So I have to make sure they die before that happens--preferably without being labeled a child killer, myself. For the greater good, you--”

But by now, Zeff had stopped hearing him. And for the third time that day, he felt it. The response. Fiercer, perhaps, than ever in his life. The old well was gone. It had exploded, and now a volcano of steam and water resided there in its place.

A wave of power and clarity coursed through him, urging him onward, telling him to do something impossible.

The air currents held him fast, even more so than before, preventing the slightest movements of his arms and legs and neck and back, preventing even his lungs from contracting.

But he could still move his face. He could still blink. So that's where he poured his concentration.

A huge volume of water materialized. But it was all packed into a single point. He didn't press his soul into it, but he did press as much velocity into it as he could possibly muster. And for the direction in which the water would move, Zeff chose all of them. Three hundred and sixty degrees.

The result, just as he'd imagined, was an explosion."

"945

The burst of water seemed to catch Parson off guard and ripped into the man's air currents, including the ones composing his own body. The water didn't touch Zeff, but the shock wave that it created did, and the Rainlord found himself suddenly falling.

But he was free. Finally. And he could see the two reapers, as well. Parson had lost his grip on them, since they had not been affected by the purely physical blast. Zeff had bought them precious few moments. The reapers could try to flee, of course, but as Parson had proved earlier, they did not possess the speed to escape this enemy.

Zeff, however, could. Or at least, his instincts told him that he could. Fighting Parson and actually winning? Certainly not. The difference in soul power was too great. But escaping? With the power of emergence coursing through him and with a head start of a few seconds, that seemed abruptly possible.

He raised an upward-moving platform of ice beneath himself. And kept raising. "To me!" he called out, and both reapers rushed to meet him. He grabbed one with each hand as he shot past them on his growing platform, bending it horizontally.

By now, he had more speed, but it still wasn't enough for him. He could do more. He knew he could. And when he pressed his mind harder, the jump in acceleration was so violent that he felt a dozen bones snap at once.

And then he was flying. On an icy rocket that arched across the sky, he was flying.

Still, he knew that he could do more.

He removed the cooling aspect from the ice so that he could focus everything on velocity. Water exploded forth on a sideways geyser, growing perpetually forward so as to never lose any of its initial power or momentum.

Then, he finished merging with Axiolis. The added control that pan-forma afforded him was the final push. The speed jumped another time, and Zeff felt the punch of the sonic boom as he rocketed toward the rain clouds in the distance.

--++--++--

Wide-eyed and grinning, Parson watched Zeff zoom away. He didn't bother giving chase and instead chose to land. Overra melted out of his body, and Parson let out a weary breath, wiping the sweat from his brow. He started the long walk back toward Rheinhal as Overra kept pace behind him."

"946

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

'Wow,' the reaper said privately. 'That went even better than planned!'

'I know, right?! I thought for sure we'd have to let him escape!'

'Dang. When was the last time ANYTHING went better than planned?'

'Hmm, not sure. Lac'Vayce went really well... until everyone died.'

'Yeah, but that one wasn't even our plan,' said Overra.

'I know, but I still feel kinda responsible.'

'Mm. But anyway! How about that triple emergence from Zeff, eh?! I know he hates us, but I'm so proud of him!'

‘Oh, I know! I really didn’t think he had it in him! Frankly, I was happy with just the double. I only kept pushing him ‘cuz we had so much extra time on our hands, and then he went and did THAT. Just--agh! Beautiful.’

‘And he was even smart enough to flee instead of trying to fight us! That was one of my biggest concerns!’

‘Oh yeah! It would’ve been so annoying if he’d just decided to throw his life away!’

Overra laughed. ‘Ah, Zeff, you darling boy. Now I feel kinda bad for all those mean things we said to him.’

‘Yeah. But nobody ever got stronger by listening to comforting lies.’

‘Indeed.’

They arrived at the crumbling bridge that the Rainlords had been using to escape. Parson had been taking Zeff away from Rheinhal, rather than toward it. It would have been annoying if Sanko interrupted them, after all. Now that the bridge was out, however, he had to briefly merge with Overra again in order to fly over it. They resumed walking afterwards, knowing that they would tire themselves out if they used pan-rozum for too much longer. Parson stuffed his hands in the pockets of his ragged white overcoat and began whistling the tune to Turkey in the Straw.

‘By the way,’ he said, ‘why did we decide to kill Socorro? I can’t remember.’ Now that he wasn’t sharing his mind with Overra, all knowledge that had been acquired during the hyper state had been split between the two of them.

‘Oh, that was mainly to rile Zeff and Angie up--but also, because platinum materialization is way too risky to leave unattended. That woman could’ve crashed the Continental Market by herself if she’d wanted to.’

‘Ah, right. Good call.’

‘With everything else going on right now, we really didn’t need that as an extra variable. And with their backs to the corner, who knows what the Rainlords would’ve done?’”

"947 -- CVIII.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

'I remember the last time some jerkhead crashed it,' said Parson. 'Agh! That was such a pain in the butt to fix!'

'Exactly,' said Overra. 'I mean, sure, we have other folks safeguarding that sort of thing nowadays, but eh. Whatever. Two birds, one stone.'

'I gotcha. Though, the Garzas certainly won't be happy when Zeff tells them what we did.'

'Yeah, well. Greater good 'n all that.'

'So how upset do you think Sanko will be with us?'

'What do you mean? We didn't do anything wrong. Socorro wanted to surrender, but Zeff and Angie went crazy and killed her for betraying them.'

'Ooh.'

'In fact, they went SO crazy that they achieved emergence multiple times, which is what allowed them to wound us and escape.'

'Hmm. You really think she'll buy that?'

'Almost definitely not. But she won't be able to prove anything. And that woman is all about the proof. At the very least, we should be able to avoid a court martial. And if not, well, Lamont'll help us out.'

'He'd probably be even angrier than Sanko.'

'Probably.'

Chapter One Hundred Eight: 'Thy ancient likeness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had taken a while for the hostilities to finally end. Informing everyone of the ceasefire had been proven quite the undertaking. Without any working phones or coms, they had to search Marshrock for their allies and inform them in person, and they encountered a few Blackburns along the way who had definitely not gotten the news yet. Not that it was too big a problem. Hector and Emiliana didn't have to do anything other than carry their unconscious friends, while Asad participated in a series of civilized discussions that definitely didn't end with anyone being splattered against the ceiling like a bag full of chicken bones and a very old curry.

In time, they found a platoon of Sebolts with working coms, and from there, word of the ceasefire began to spread much more quickly.

Not long into their venture, however, Chergoa realized that one of the unconscious reapers in Hector's grasp was her brother. But Hector's thoughts had been so preoccupied with the new aberration he'd seen that he'd nearly forgotten about Garovel's sister, and when she started bombarding him with questions, the young Lord Goffe found himself settling into old habits and falling painfully silent.

She didn't seem to appreciate that much.

Thankfully, though, after only three hours of awkwardness, Garovel began to stir."

"947 -- CVIII.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

'I remember the last time some jerkhead crashed it,' said Parson. 'Agh! That was such a pain in the butt to fix!'

'Exactly,' said Overra. 'I mean, sure, we have other folks safeguarding that sort of thing nowadays, but eh. Whatever. Two birds, one stone.'

'I gotcha. Though, the Garzas certainly won't be happy when Zeff tells them what we did.'

'Yeah, well. Greater good 'n all that.'

'So how upset do you think Sanko will be with us?'

'What do you mean? We didn't do anything wrong. Socorro wanted to surrender, but Zeff and Angie went crazy and killed her for betraying them.'

'Ooh.'

'In fact, they went SO crazy that they achieved emergence multiple times, which is what allowed them to wound us and escape.'

'Hmm. You really think she'll buy that?'

'Almost definitely not. But she won't be able to prove anything. And that woman is all about the proof. At the very least, we should be able to avoid a court martial. And if not, well, Lamont'll help us out.'

'He'd probably be even angrier than Sanko.'

'Probably.'

Chapter One Hundred Eight: 'Thy ancient likeness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had taken a while for the hostilities to finally end. Informing everyone of the ceasefire had been proven quite the undertaking. Without any working phones or coms, they had to search Marshrock for their allies and inform them in person, and they encountered a few Blackburns along the way who had definitely not gotten the news yet. Not that it was too big a problem. Hector and Emiliana didn't have to do anything other than carry their unconscious friends, while Asad participated in a series of civilized discussions that definitely didn't end with anyone being splattered against the ceiling like a bag full of chicken bones and a very old curry.

In time, they found a platoon of Sebolts with working coms, and from there, word of the ceasefire began to spread much more quickly.

Not long into their venture, however, Chergoa realized that one of the unconscious reapers in Hector's grasp was her brother. But Hector's thoughts had been so preoccupied with the new aberration he'd seen that he'd nearly forgotten about Garovel's sister, and when she started bombarding him with questions, the young Lord Goffe found himself settling into old habits and falling painfully silent.

She didn't seem to appreciate that much.

Thankfully, though, after only three hours of awkwardness, Garovel began to stir."

"948

--Monday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

'Hey!' Chergoa yelled. 'Are you finally awake, you big doofus?!'

Garovel gave a weak laugh, still sounding exhausted. 'Good to see you, baby sister.'

Chergoa snorted and nodded to Hector and Emiliana. 'Told you, didn't I?'

'What did you tell them?' said Garovel.

'That the first thing you'd do would be reassert your status as the older sibling.'

'Agh. Gimme a break. I'm tired, and I was expressing how pleased I am to finally see you again. And you ARE my little sister, aren't you?'

'Yeah, by like one year! One out of--' She hesitated. 'How old are we again?'

'Three thousand something, I think.'

'See? You don't even know.'

'Don't need to. Even if you were infinity years old, I'd still be infinity plus one.'

'What the hell are you doing here, anyway?'

'Did Hector not tell you?'

'No, he didn't. Great servant you got here, by the way. Can't even answer a simple question.'

'Hey. Don't make fun of Hector. I didn't make fun of your freaky-lookin' mutant girl.'

'Whoa! Take that back, you asshole!'

'Or what?'

"Garovel," said Hector, realizing he should intervene before this escalated into another four hundred years of them not seeing each other. "Apologize."

Garovel required a moment of reluctance before granting an admmissive nod and turning to Emiliana. 'Ah... I'm sorry, young lady. You aren't a freaky-looking mutant. In fact, you actually look kind of badass with that mask on. I was just upset because your reaper is a terrible person who eats babies and steals from the poor.'

'Alright, that's enough,' said Chergoa. 'Tell me what you're doing here, already.'

'We're here for YOU, you dingus. We ran into Axiolis in Kuros, and he informed us of the monumental shitstorm you've gotten yourself involved in. And naturally, being the wonderful, selfless people we are, we decided to--'

'Okay, okay. Hector, thank you for all your help. Garovel, go fuck yourself.'

'Wow, watch your language. There are young people present, you know.'

'You literally just said "shitstorm."'

'Yeah, but when I swear, it's funny and endearing. When you do it, it's inappropriate and childish.'

She glanced at Emiliana. 'See this? See what I have to put up with?'

But Emiliana seemed more interested in something else Garovel had said. "You met with Axiolis? Do you know where he is?"

"949

'We parted ways with Axiolis at Rheinhal,' said Garovel. 'He said he wanted to be there when your father and brother were freed. But Asad and Qorvass could've told you that much. You should've asked them.'

Emiliana gave a muffled sigh. "If only I'd thought to."

Chergoa looked around. 'Where'd those two go, anyway?'

'Don't ask me,' said Garovel. 'You're the ones who've been awake this whole time.'

Hector knew the answer to that one and knew that he should probably make more of an effort to contribute after the less-than-stellar first impression he'd made. "Er--uh... Asad said he was going to, ah... t-to see about retrieving the other hostages."

'Oh,' said Chergoa. 'Let's go find him again, then.'

They started moving through the Sebolt encampment as a small group, which meant leaving the hotel lobby they'd been waiting in. As ever, it was raining outside, and the thunder had returned as well, but before they even made it five steps, a familiar man descended from the heavens with folded arms.

"...Why are you leaving the hotel?" asked the Lord Dimas Sebolt.

'Dimas, that was way too imposing,' said Izio, clinging to the man's back. 'You have to sound friendlier, or they'll get the wrong idea about us.'

"...I am here to ensure the young Lady Elroy's safety. If there is something you require, I will send someone to fetch it for you."

'Okay, that was a little better, but, eh...'

Chergoa decided to chime in. 'We were just wondering when we would be able to see Marcos, Ramira, and Shenado again. Do you know? It's been a couple hours since the ceasefire began, and Ismael said he would release them.'

"They will be brought to you as soon as we have them," said Dimas.

'Eh, let's just go with them,' said Izio. 'We might be able to see Diego sooner, too. Besides, with Melchor down for the count, there's no one here who can really threaten you.'

'Lord Asad might argue that point,' said Garovel.

Izio returned a laugh. 'Thankfully, he's on our side. But you know, if it came down to it, I bet Dimas could take him.'

'Well, I admire your confidence,' said Garovel.

That made Izio laugh again, and with the two added members, their party of six proceeded onward together. Emiliana tried to share her umbrella with Dimas, but he was so much taller than her that she almost poked his eye out. The man chose to hold the umbrella for the both of them, instead."

Luzo had a strange charm to it, Hector felt. When he'd first arrived, the place had seemed kind of ominous and horrible to him, perhaps because the thunder had been so loud before, but now that it had mellowed out into a series of faint rumblings, he was beginning to enjoy himself. Combined with the constant drumming of rain and the moderate temperature, Hector found this place actually quite relaxing. Though, the ceasefire had surely contributed to that feeling as well.

Still, he was beginning to understand why people might choose to live here, despite the threat of floods and lightning. At least a third of the buildings on this street had been crowned with huge metal spires, and the road didn't seem to have any trouble draining all the water. Hector could only imagine how insanely efficient a Rainlord sewage system needed to be.

'So why were you in Kuros?' Chergoa asked. 'And how in the world did you end up crossing paths with Axiolis?'

'We were escorting Atreyan royalty,' said Garovel.

Chergoa paused. 'Are you joking?'

'Nope. Prince Meriwether of House Lumenbel. We're on pretty good terms with his sister, the Queen, so she asked us for a favor.'

'Huh.' Chergoa allowed a beat to pass. 'There must not be very many servants in Atreya.'

'Rude. You don't know how strong Hector is.' Garovel also allowed a beat to pass. 'You're right, though. I only know of like three others.'

'Ha. So this prince didn't mind you just abandoning your duty to come help us?'

'He had another bodyguard to rely on, and we were only doing it as a favor, anyway. Also, I don't think he was particularly worried for his safety once he made it inside the Golden Fort. He's married to one of the Saqqaf women, after all.'

'Ah,' said Chergoa. 'Woulda been nice to have those folks on our side. Are the Saqqafs as impressive as their reputation suggests?'

‘We didn’t meet any of them personally. The Lord Abbas Saqqaf, though--we saw him speak during a meeting, and his soul was strong enough that Hector could actually feel his presence a little bit, which suggests to me that he’s even older than Melchor and Xuan. So just from that, I would have to say, yes, Hahl Saqqaf was quite impressive.’”

"951

Hector’s memory of that meeting was foggy at best. Garovel had translated it for him, since they had been speaking in Valgan, but Hector did recall that odd feeling Garovel was talking about now, like the air was slightly thicker. It wasn’t until later that Garovel had explained how very powerful souls could affect the physical atmosphere. And while he was certainly grateful that Lord Abbas had permanently soul-strengthened Haqq’s shield, Hector was not in any hurry to encounter someone like that a second time--especially now, after witnessing what Xuan and Melchor could do.

Chergoa and Garovel continued speaking, but Garovel spared a private moment for Hector. ‘You should express your gratitude to Dimas for saving our asses.’

Much as he would have liked to remain silent, Hector knew the reaper was right, so after taking a moment to gather his courage, he went for it. “Uh, um, Lord Dimas, uh... thank you for your help earlier. Darktide would’ve definitely, er... I mean, if you hadn’t... uh... Y-you and Lord Salvador saved us. So... er...”

The man’s expression was as unreadable as ever. “...Think nothing of it. Rather, I should be thanking you for protecting Duvoss and my idiot uncle.”

“Ah, uh... heh...” Hector thought better of wading into that territory and instead chose to change the subject. “Are you, um... aren’t you tired? From using pan-forma, I mean?”

“I use pan-moc,” Dimas corrected.

“Oh. Right.”

“...But yes, I am exhausted.”

"You... uh... you don't really look like it."

"I will not be sleeping until Xuan is awake."

'I will, though,' said Iziol. 'In fact, I think I'll do that right now. Pardon my snoring.'

Hector exchanged looks with Dimas. "Can reapers actually snore?"

"No. Iziol was attempting to tell a joke. He is not very good at them."

'Hey. I... I'm... I'm mediocre at them, at least.'

Dimas met Hector's gaze and just shook his head with silent honesty.

'Here, let me tell a real joke,' said Iziol.

And for the first time, Hector saw Dimas lose composure as a haggard expression flashed across his face.

'Two clowns walk into a bar. The bartender says to them, "Hey, none of your funny business in here!"'

Then there was dead silence. Even Chergoa and Garovel had stopped bickering.

'Well?' said Iziol. 'What did you think?'

Hector had still been waiting for the punchline. "Uh--er, that was... um. Wow."

Dimas was less kind. "That was possibly the worst joke I've ever heard in my life."

"952

'Bah,' said Iziol. 'Dimas just doesn't know anything about comedy. He and I have been together for more than twenty years, and I've only heard him laugh four times. Four! Can you believe that?!'

Hector could.

Dimas made no retort.

Chergoa spoke up for the man, though. 'He's not wrong, Iziol. That joke was horrendous. In fact, if comedy were a human being, you would have just committed murder.'

Iziol hesitated a moment. 'Darn it... Ah! I'm sorry. Please excuse my language. I'm just frustrated.'

Hector saw the other two reapers exchange looks.

'Don't feel bad,' said Garovel. 'Chergoa and I will share our secrets with you.'

'Better just leave it to me,' said Chergoa. 'Garovel will only teach you how to insult people.'

'That's not even remotely true. Hector, tell her how hilarious I am.'

Hector opened his mouth but no words came out.

'Buddy, c'mon!'

"G-Garovel is... very funny..."

Chergoa busted into a laugh. 'What an endorsement! Clearly, you've awed him with your comedic genius!'

'That's just Hector's personality! You already know he has trouble speaking!'

'Oh, sure, blame it on Hector.'

'Alright, fine. Hey, Emiliana, how funny is Chergoa?'

'Oh god no. Em, you know that I--'

"She is quite awful."

'Agh! How could you?!'

'Thank you for your honesty,' said Garovel.

'I just haven't had enough time to win her over!' said Chergoa. 'She'll appreciate my humor eventually!'

'I'm sure that's it,' said Garovel.

'Em, we are gonna have a long talk about this later.'

"I will look forward to it."

As they walked, Chergoa and Garovel soon returned to their bickering, and Garovel had to privately remind Hector to be sociable again. 'Talk to Emiliana.'

Hector racked his brain in search of a topic. When nothing immediately sprung forth, he tried taking a step back and thinking about everything that had happened, and then the most pressing question in the world smacked him in the face. "Emiliana," said Hector, abruptly sterner, "please tell me more about this... aberration that you were with."

That grabbed Garovel's attention. 'Wait a minute, what? You were with an aberration?'

'Oh yeah,' said Chergoa. But she didn't elaborate, perhaps wanting to let Emiliana participate more.

"Yes," the young woman said. "Lord Ibai Blackburn. He is... quite different."

"Go on," urged Hector."

"953

"Ah... perhaps I am not the best person to consult," said Emiliana. "I have never met any other aberrations."

"But you know of them," said Hector.

"Yes... I know they are supposed to be vicious creatures without humanity. And I have hardly spent any time with him, so I cannot claim to know him very well. But Lord Ibai--he had an opportunity to kill several reapers and consume their souls, yet he chose to spare them. He even had assurances that no one would ever find out. His own men were encouraging him to eat them so that he would grow more powerful. But he did not do it."

'It's true,' Chergoa confirmed. 'If I hadn't seen it myself, I probably wouldn't believe it.'

Hector's brow lowered. "Could it have been a trick?"

Emiliana bobbed her head to the side. "I suppose so... but to my mind, that was a genuine display of mercy. And if aberrations are truly all inhuman monsters, then I cannot imagine one of them doing what Lord Ibai did.”

‘He had the opportunity to kill me as well,’ said Chergoa.

‘What?!’ said Garovel.

‘I had nowhere to run or hide. I was completely at his mercy. But he didn’t hurt me. And when his father asked him to, he let me go.’

For a time, no one said anything further, perhaps needing a moment to digest that information.

Hector didn’t know what to think. He’d been told that all aberrations were violent and dangerous, but maybe that was wrong. He’d only met one other aberration before, so how could he presume to know what the rest of them were like?

But it wasn’t that simple, either. As much as Hector tried to separate his own feelings from the subject at hand, his memories wouldn’t be ignored. Memories of Geoffrey Rofal. So much had happened since Hector killed that son of a bitch, but not much actual time had passed. Only a few months. Those old wounds, they hadn’t healed. They’d barely begun to feel like scars in his mind.

Still, it wasn’t up to Hector to decide what to do with Ibai, and for that, he was glad; but he also wondered how the Rainlords would handle the situation. When it came to aberrations, he doubted he was the only one who’d had bad experiences.”

"954

After a fashion, the chatter among their group began to return, but something else cut through it before long.

‘Oh.’ Chergoa abruptly stopped moving, which made everyone else do the same. Her skeletal grin widened, and she looked to Emiliana, then nodded down an adjacent side street.

They all turned in time to see a little girl rush up to Emiliana and hug her.

Hector recognized Ramira Elroy from her photograph, along with Marcos Elroy following not far behind. Asad and Qorvass were there, too, as was an unfamiliar reaper.

Chergoa handled introductions. 'Garovel, Shenado. Shenado, Garovel.'

'The brother?' said Shenado. 'What an unexpected pleasure.'

'It is very nice to meet you,' said Garovel. 'I was sorry to hear about everything your family has had to endure. Axiolis told me all about it.'

'I see, thank you,' said Shenado. 'Ah, and this is Marcos Elroy. Say hello, Marcos.'

The boy looked exhausted. "H-hello..."

'Hello there,' said Garovel. 'This is Hector Goffe.'

Hector offered him a handshake, and Marcos took it. "It's, ah... nice to meet you," said Hector.

Marcos just returned a polite nod. When Dimas offered him a handshake, however, the boy dove in for a hug, instead. "You came back for us," he mumbled into Dimas' torso. "You kept your promise..."

Dimas was slow to return the hug, but after a moment, Hector saw the man's face soften.

Next up for introduction was Ramira, and Hector stiltedly made his way through it. But soon afterward, the adults and the reapers began conversing, and Hector and Ramira were left standing there with nothing to do. He didn't mind being excluded himself, but he felt a bit bad for Ramira. She didn't appear to have a reaper of her own, which meant she couldn't even hear half of what was being said.

After a period of deliberation and brainstorming, Hector knelt down next to her and with effort, forced himself to ask, "...What's your favorite animal?"

She stared at him with big gray eyes, perhaps wondering what he was getting at. But then she smirked and said, "A trapdoor spider!"

Hector's expression faltered. "Uh... really? Not, like, a giraffe or something?"

"Psh. Can a giraffe camouflage itself to take its prey by surprise, and then eat them by liquefying their body with its venom? Because a trapdoor spider can."

"Ah..." Hector had to laugh a little. "Okay, then, tell me what a trapdoor spider looks like..." He materialized a generic spider figurine in the palm of his hand."

"955

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

"That's way too skinny," said Ramira. "The abdomen has to be fatter."

"Abdomen?" said Hector.

"You don't know what an abdomen is? It's the butt!"

"Ah, okay..." He annihilated his work and tried again. "Is this closer?"

"Better. But the legs are too long. And there aren't enough eyes. And can you add some hair?"

He gave it another shot. "How about now?"

"Agh, here, just give me your phone. I'll find you a picture on the internet."

Hector did as he was told.

The group continued on together, and Hector just kind of followed mindlessly along as he and Ramira became absorbed with creating the perfect spider for her. She found multiple pictures for him to work from, but they were all different species and so bore variations that kept tripping him up. At length, though, he came up with something quite realistic-looking, even down to the fine hairs on its back like Ramira had asked for.

"Wow, there you go!" she said. "You're really good at this! It's perfect!"

He handed it to her. "You sure? It's not too heavy? I can make it smaller, if you want."

"No, no, it's cooler this way! I can beat people with it!"

"Ah..."

"Just kidding." She prodded him in the stomach, pretending the spider was biting him. "Bragh! I like it a lot! Thank you!"

"Ha... you're welcome."

She turned it over in her hands. "You know, it's kind of like a Melchor action figure."

Hector blinked at that. "You've seen him fight?"

"Yep. It was really scary."

"Oh. I'm sorry..."

"It was really cool, too." She frowned, though. "But I don't think I want to see it again..." She made the spider bite him on the arm this time.

Hector wondered how many terrible things she'd seen already. She didn't look traumatized, but who could say what effect everything actually had upon her?

What an unfair world it was. He'd known that all along, of course, but it seemed different now, maybe because he felt so powerless again. For a long time now, he'd felt strong, like he at least stood a chance against the problems he saw before him. If someone was in danger, he could just save them. Simple enough. But this little girl here was caught up in a conflict so far out of his reach that he couldn't even imagine how he might genuinely help her. She and Marcos and Emiliana--they needed more than some stupid lump of iron."

"956 -- CIX.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

In time, they arrived at their destination. It was a modest building overlooking a muddy river with Marshrock standing in the distance. And since he hadn't been paying attention to what everyone had been saying, Hector wasn't sure why they were here.

Once they were inside, Asad stopped to address everyone.

"Before we go any farther," the Sandlord said, "there is something I must tell you all."

His audience gave him their attention.

“Earlier, I received word that the siege in Rheinhal has failed.” Asad let the murmurs pass before continuing. “I’m afraid the details are still unclear, but at the moment, everyone there is being presumed captured or killed. I’m very sorry. I felt you should know now, because I’m sure it will come up during negotiations.”

‘None escaped?’ said Shenado.

‘We don’t know,’ said Qorvass. ‘It’s possible, but unlikely. There were a handful of messages that came in at once, all saying that Sanko was attacking the Rainlords. And since then, we’ve received no further contact from anyone.’

There were no other questions after that. Everyone seemed to need time to process what they’d just heard. Hector was tempted to ask what they planned to do now, but then he realized that was why they had come here. He saw the Lord Ismael in the front lobby with an entourage of Blackburns around him. Ibai was there, as well.

Chapter One Hundred Nine: ‘O, stalwart deluge...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The negotiations were taking a while, but Hector wasn’t complaining. He still just felt privileged for being allowed to observe.

Abel Sebolt and Salvador Delaguna headed up their side of proceedings, though for Salvador’s part, it was his reaper Mevox who did most of the talking. Various others voiced their opinions as well, including Asad and Amaya Sebolt. Naturally, though, Chergoa and Emiliana’s testimonies proved the most crucial.

That was the heart of the issue--how to handle the presence of this aberration. Even now, the Blackburns gave very little ground. They offered testimony from a variety of people, all claiming that Ibai could be trusted, which of course just made everyone on the other side of the table skeptical. At a few different points, Hector grew worried that another fight might break out. And when the arguably more pressing subject of Rheinhal came up, a resolution to the problem of Ibai had still not been reached."

"956 -- CIX.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

In time, they arrived at their destination. It was a modest building overlooking a muddy river with Marshrock standing in the distance. And since he hadn't been paying attention to what everyone had been saying, Hector wasn't sure why they were here.

Once they were inside, Asad stopped to address everyone.

"Before we go any farther," the Sandlord said, "there is something I must tell you all."

His audience gave him their attention.

"Earlier, I received word that the siege in Rheinhal has failed." Asad let the murmurs pass before continuing. "I'm afraid the details are still unclear, but at the moment, everyone there is being presumed captured or killed. I'm very sorry. I felt you should know now, because I'm sure it will come up during negotiations."

'None escaped?' said Shenado.

'We don't know,' said Qorvass. 'It's possible, but unlikely. There were a handful of messages that came in at once, all saying that Sanko was attacking the Rainlords. And since then, we've received no further contact from anyone.'

There were no other questions after that. Everyone seemed to need time to process what they'd just heard. Hector was tempted to ask what they planned to do now, but then he realized that was why they had come here. He saw the Lord Ismael in the front lobby with an entourage of Blackburns around him. Ibai was there, as well.

Chapter One Hundred Nine: 'O, stalwart deluge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The negotiations were taking a while, but Hector wasn't complaining. He still just felt privileged for being allowed to observe.

Abel Sebolt and Salvador Delaguna headed up their side of proceedings, though for Salvador's part, it was his reaper Mevox who did most of the talking. Various others voiced their opinions as well, including Asad and Amaya Sebolt. Naturally, though, Chergoa and Emiliana's testimonies proved the most crucial.

That was the heart of the issue--how to handle the presence of this aberration. Even now, the Blackburns gave very little ground. They offered testimony from a variety of people, all claiming that Ibai could be trusted, which of course just made everyone on the other side of the table skeptical. At a few different points, Hector grew worried that another fight might break out. And when the arguably more pressing subject of Rheinhal came up, a resolution to the problem of Ibai had still not been reached."

"957

--Monday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

Ismael Blackburn stood. "Before moving forward on that subject, I must tell you all about Parson Miles of the Vanguard. I am sure most of you are familiar with him, but I do not think any of you know him the way I do."

'I know he's one of the more powerful assbags we're up against,' said Mevox. His nonexistent bones had a darker glow than any other reaper Hector had seen so far. It made him easier to pick out of a crowd.

"Zeff, Evangelina, and I trained under him for several years," said Abel Sebolt. "As did Santos, though only for the few months before Lawrence took Parson's place."

"Let me guess," said Ismael. "You think Parson is a fool?"

Abel tilted his head. "He is a fool. But I was never able to determine if that made him bad at his job."

"Then I give you credit for seeing that much," said Ismael. "But Parson Miles is more than a fool. I am convinced that he intends to destroy each of our houses. He knows of Ibai's existence, and he used that knowledge to coerce us into kidnapping the Elroy children."

'How convenient,' said Mevox. 'Someone to take the blame for you.'

Horatio stood up with Ismael. "We do not pretend to be blameless, but please try to understand our reasoning. Ask yourselves: what did we have to gain by abducting the children? If we wanted them for our own nefarious purposes, then why would we keep them in Marshrock, where we knew you would come looking for them?"

‘Maybe that’s where you keep your freaky torture devices,’ said Mevox.

Horatio’s expression slackened. “This is hardly the time for jokes. The children will confirm that we did not harm them.”

Mevox shrugged. ‘Fine, then, what was your reason?’

“Because the whole point was to draw you away from Rheinhal and keep you occupied,” said Horatio.

“He speaks the truth,” said Ismael. “Parson wanted to divide your forces so that he could deal with you more easily. And given the recent news of Rheinhal, it appears his plan is working. He promised that he would come to Luzo after Rheinhal was secured and rescue us from your siege. Our task was merely to hold out. His only miscalculation seems to have been Lord Asad over there, whose presence allowed you to push your siege more quickly than anticipated.”

The whole room looked to Asad, who just kind of flattened his mouth and scratched his cheek as he observed all the stares.”

"958

Lord Abel spoke next. “What do you hope to gain by telling us this information? I presume you intend to propose some new course of action for us to take.”

“Now that you know about my son, Parson holds no leverage over us,” said Ismael. “I have no reason to lie. And yes. I propose we leave Luzo immediately.”

“You would come with us?” said Abel.

Ismael nodded. “If you allow it, yes. I do not know what Parson would do if he arrived to find only my family here.”

“We cannot simply flee,” said Salvador. “If our kin are held captive, we must retrieve them. Vanguard or not.”

“I understand that,” said Ismael. “Perhaps you do not believe me when I say this, but I do feel similarly. If we had strength, I would agree with you. But you must realize that our forces need time to rest. Melchor and Xuan are both unconscious, and without them, we stand very little chance against Parson--assuming it is he who arrives and not Sanko.”

The Lady Amaya Sebolt nodded. "For all we know, Parson could arrive within the day. I believe the Blackburns speak the truth. Surely, they would not wish to accompany us otherwise."

'Hmm,' mused Mevox. 'I suppose Ammie has a point. I can't imagine you Blackburns would abandon Marshrock just to convince us.'

"Exactly," said Ismael. "The only problem is where do we go? I do not think retreating to Intar would be wise, given how strong the Vanguard's presence is there."

'Not to mention the Intarian Rainlords,' said Mevox. 'Those dickholes haven't lifted a finger to help us. They might turn on us if we show up on their doorstep.'

"To be fair," said Abel, "would we have gone to their aid?"

'Of course not. They're dickholes.'

Abel returned a calm stare, as if waiting for the reaper to realize the hypocrisy there, but it didn't seem to have much effect on Mevox. Hector was fairly certain that Mevox understood what he'd said perfectly well and just didn't give a shit.

And then, it occurred to Hector that if these people needed a place to lay low for a while, he could provide exactly that. But it could also be a terrible idea, another thought argued. He didn't actually know the Rainlords very well, and offering them refuge might well steer an angry Vanguard toward Atreya. What would the Queen think?

Before he could give the matter any more consideration, however, Asad beat him to the punch.

"I invite you all to Moaban," the Sandlord said."

"959

The Rainlords were briefly silent until Mevox piped up.

'Why Moaban?' the reaper asked.

Qorvass chimed in now. 'We have a summer home there which can accommodate you all comfortably. It is a lovely place. Asad and Imas grew up there. We would invite you to Kuros, but we are not sure how our kin would react to your presence.'

"If you stay in your own territory, the Vanguard will be more likely to find you," said Asad. "But my involvement in your affairs is still a secret, no? Therefore, I think it would be best if you relied on me in this case."

"What are we supposed to do once in Moaban?" said Salvador. "Wait around and hope the Vanguard has a sudden change of heart? They have our kin!"

"It is a bad situation," said Lord Abel, "but our priority now should be to regroup. We can determine our next move later. I believe we should accept Lord Asad's hospitality and leave Luzo immediately."

"Agreed," said Amaya. "In fact, I believe we have already wasted too much time here arguing. The sooner we leave, the better."

Lord Salvador grumbled but conceded a nod.

'Alright, fine,' said Mevox. 'But what about--?'

The reaper stopped talking when the east door opened and a young attendant rushed up to Lord Abel and whispered something to him.

Abel stood up instantly. "I have just been told that the Lord Zeff Elroy has arrived in Luzo."

Hector heard a chorus of gasps, but for his part, he was mainly just confused.

--++--++--

The group gathered beneath the wide overhang of the modest building's front entrance. Zeff and Axiolis lay unconscious in the back of a parked limousine while the reaper Ezura recounted the tale of what had happened to them and her servant, the Lady Evangelina Stroud.

Asad was still having trouble believing that was really Zeff lying there. A part of him had thought he would never see his old friend again, and these were strange circumstances in which to be proven wrong. But after listening to Ezura, it was difficult to feel very relieved.

The ruling Rainlords stood there alongside him, as did the Elroys and Hector. Everyone else who'd been present for negotiations had since dispersed, given instructions to prepare for an immediate departure.

Once Ezura was done talking, Lord Salvador eyed the Blackburns. "It seems you were not lying about Parson Miles."

Lord Ismael merely returned a grim look."
"960

"Do we have any of the Garzas with us?" asked Abel.

"A few, yes," said Amaya. "Cousin Carlos is quite close with Socorro's daughters."

"So is Lorenzo," said Salvador. "I remember wondering if he was going to ask one of them to marry him."

Amaya smiled weakly. "Those two boys. I would not be surprised if they intended to have a double wedding."

And for a time, no one seemed able to find anything else to say.

Asad hadn't known Socorro very well at all, but it was enough just witnessing the impact that the news of her death was having. These people were well-acquainted with death, of course, but Socorro was one of their peers, someone they had grown up with--not just kin, but an old friend as well.

And this was the second time. Perhaps the Vanguard could claim Mariana's death as incidental, but not so here. Parson Miles had killed Socorro in cold blood.

Asad wished he could do more for these people. Most of all, he wished his own kin could see them the way he did. Maybe things wouldn't have turned out this way.

At length, the conversation resumed as they remembered the sense of urgency. Amaya spoke of finding Socorro's daughters to deliver the news personally. Abel spoke of finding a private place for Ezura to regenerate Evangelina. And they gradually began to disperse.

It was Mevox who stopped everyone. 'Ismael. We never settled the matter of your son.'

"I suppose we will have to discuss it further in Moaban," said Ismael.

'Not sure that's good enough,' said Mevox. 'What if your son hurts someone during the journey?'

"He won't."

'If only it were that simple,' said Mevox. 'I'd like to believe you; I really would. You probably think I'm just a cynical jackass trying to cause problems for you, but we have to keep your boy under guard. You must be able to understand that much, right?'

"I do," said Ismael. "That is why House Blackburn will be the one doing so."

'That's not good enough, and you know it. How can we trust your people to do what is necessary to stop him?'

"How can I trust that your people will not harm him?"

Qorvass floated forward. 'Might I propose an apparent compromise?'

They waited for him to explain."

"961

--Friday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

'Four servants will remain with Ibai at all times,' said Qorvass. 'Two will be chosen by House Blackburn, and two will be chosen by us. This way, if anyone steps out of line, be it Ibai or one of his guards, someone else will be there to help keep things in order.'

'Or to help escalate things,' amended Mevox.

'That is why I advise everyone to pick your guards wisely,' said Qorvass. 'But I believe this may well be the only fair solution, and since we are pressed for time, I ask that you decide quickly.'

"Very well," said Ismael. "I can agree to those terms."

"As can I," said Abel.

Salvador nodded, and Mevox gave a relenting sigh.

“Go and bring Ibai here,” said Abel. “We will have our two guards chosen by the time you return.”

The Blackburns departed immediately, and shortly thereafter, so did Lady Amaya along with a few of the other Sebolts.

Mevox sighed another time. ‘Agh. Why do I always end up being the asshole?’

Salvador smirked. “Perhaps it is just your natural state of being.”

‘So you’re saying I should embrace it? Alright. Salvador, you have a tiny head.’

“Hey...”

‘You look like a little dude piloting a big dude’s body.’

That earned a chuckle from Asad.

“Don’t just do it to me!” said Salvador. “Asad is standing right there!”

‘Asad, you’re bald, and your tattoos look like doo-doo.’

‘Okay,’ said Qorvass, ‘Perhaps we should go now. Always a pleasure, Mevox.’

‘Same to you, Qorvass, you pile of cancerous dog balls. You son-of-a-bitch-baby’s shit-filled diaper. You stupid-name-having motherfucker. You--’

Everyone was staring.

‘...I’m really sorry. I got too excited.’

A beat passed, and then Qorvass said, ‘I don’t think we should allow Mevox anywhere near the aberration. Agreed?’

“Agreed.”

“Yeah.”

“Indeed.”

‘I hate you all.’

“So who should we choose?” asked Salvador. “I would volunteer myself, if not for this guy.”

‘Oh, whatever! I can control myself, if I want!’

‘Asad can take a later shift, if need be,’ said Qorvass, ‘but he needs to rest first.’

Dimas stepped forward. “I volunteer, at least until Xuan is awake.”

Asad blinked at the man. “That could be days.”

“I will be fine.”

“Dimas has chronic insomnia,” said Lord Abel, eyeing his son. “That does not stop him from becoming tired, however. I will allow you the first shift.”

Dimas nodded.

‘Well, that’s one,’ said Mevox. ‘Who else? How about Lorenzo?’

Hector stepped up. “I, uh... I volunteer, as well.”

"962

--Friday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

Asad eyed the young Lord Goffe. “Are you sure?”

Hector’s expression suggested he was. “I just... I would like to know more about this aberration.”

“I see no problem with that,” said Salvador, slapping a huge hand against Hector’s shoulder. “He held his own against Darktide, didn’t he? And myself, of course. I’d say he qualifies.”

The lone Sandlord frowned. Salvador and the others didn’t know about the shield, but Asad recognized his brother’s work well enough. Hector and Garovel hadn’t explained the details--which was their right, of course--but it still left Asad slightly concerned for them.

He held his tongue, though. He certainly understood the desire to keep one’s true strength a secret. He’d been able to do something similar in his youth, thanks to his tattoos. Without a doubt, they were the greatest gift his mother had ever given him, though he certainly hadn't thought so while receiving them.

And while Asad reminisced to himself and watched the Elroy children hovering around their sleeping father, his hands drifted into the pockets of his still-tattered robe.

Something metallic was there, he realized. Small and round. A ring.

He pulled it out and stared at it with wide eyes. It was simple enough in design--featureless tungsten carbide on the outside, concealing a row of tiny black spikes on the inside. They would tear into his skin if he put it on, Asad knew, but it was indeed meant to be worn on either one of his middle fingers.

Qorvass noticed the item. 'A new ring?' he said privately and in Valgan. 'When did you get that?'

'...Before we left Kuros,' Asad said, also in Valgan.

'And what does this one do?'

'It enhances the effects of my tattoos.'

The reaper paused. 'Enhances how, exactly?'

'It allows them... to absorb more damage and reflect it back at my opponent.'

'What?! You had something that useful on you this whole time?! Why didn't you ever use it?'

'...I forgot about it.'

'Asad! Are you kidding?! Do you know how helpful that would have been?!'

'I... yes.'

'Why didn't you just show it to me when you first got it?! I would've remembered it for you!'

'...I'd already forgotten by then.'

'That quickly?! Asad!'

'I'm sorry! I remembered it later, on the plane to Rheinhal, but then I forgot again!"

"963 -- CX.

--Friday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

'Agh, holy oasis!' said Qorvass. 'I knew your memory wasn't the best, but wow! Even for you, this is a new low. You're only forty-five years old, man. Are you already going senile? Should I stop you from aging any further?'

'I... I'm sure I would've remembered it if things had ever become too desperate.'

'Oh, you mean like when we were fighting off three people at once? Or when Darktide was stomping the hell out of all of our comrades?'

'Hey, everything worked out in the end, didn't it?'

'Yes, and if things had gone differently, you would have let us both die like idiots.'

'You're partly to blame, too. We were sharing memories for quite a while there, and you didn't remember, either.'

'How was I supposed to know that you had forgotten something so important?!'

'You should have checked. You just said that you knew I had a bad memory.'

'I cannot believe you, right now... Agh. If it is that powerful, then you should have just put it on and never taken it off.'

'I was afraid it might blow up.'

'It's a ring. Why would it blow up?'

'Because Haqq made it.'

The reaper hesitated. 'Okay, fair point. But why did you not test it, then?'

'There wasn't time! He gave it to me as I was leaving!'

‘Agh...’

‘Would you stop saying that? I apologized!’

‘AGH.’

Asad pursed his lips and looked over the Rainlords and Hector another time. ‘...Let’s never tell anyone about this.’

‘...Agreed.’

Chapter One Hundred Ten: ‘O, curious devil...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector didn’t let Garovel anywhere near Ibai. Lord Dimas kept the unconscious Izio on his back the whole time, but Hector didn’t have that much confidence. He had Garovel stay with Chergoa and the Elroys, instead.

The reason he’d volunteered was to see for himself whether or not this aberration could be trusted, but so far, there was little clarity to be found. Ibai didn’t do or say anything particularly volatile or dangerous, but perhaps that was only because they were all stuck in a limousine together as their host of Rainlords embarked on the long trip to Moaban.

The Blackburns had chosen Horatio and Silvia for their two bodyguards, and Ibai seemed to enjoy their company greatly, talking about all manner of subjects with them, asking their opinions about what would be fun to do together. Ibai acted like they were all going on a pleasant trip to an amusement park or something."

"963 -- CX.

--Friday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

‘Agh, holy oasis!’ said Qorvass. ‘I knew your memory wasn’t the best, but wow! Even for you, this is a new low. You’re only forty-five years old, man. Are you already going senile? Should I stop you from aging any further?’

‘I... I’m sure I would’ve remembered it if things had ever become too desperate.’

‘Oh, you mean like when we were fighting off three people at once? Or when Darktide was stomping the hell out of all of our comrades?’

‘Hey, everything worked out in the end, didn’t it?’

‘Yes, and if things had gone differently, you would have let us both die like idiots.’

‘You’re partly to blame, too. We were sharing memories for quite a while there, and you didn’t remember, either.’

‘How was I supposed to know that you had forgotten something so important?!’

‘You should have checked. You just said that you knew I had a bad memory.’

‘I cannot believe you, right now... Agh. If it is that powerful, then you should have just put it on and never taken it off.’

‘I was afraid it might blow up.’

‘It’s a ring. Why would it blow up?’

‘Because Haqq made it.’

The reaper hesitated. ‘Okay, fair point. But why did you not test it, then?’

‘There wasn’t time! He gave it to me as I was leaving!’

‘Agh...’

‘Would you stop saying that? I apologized!’

‘AGH.’

Asad pursed his lips and looked over the Rainlords and Hector another time. ‘...Let’s never tell anyone about this.’

‘...Agreed.’

Chapter One Hundred Ten: ‘O, curious devil...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector didn't let Garovel anywhere near Ibai. Lord Dimas kept the unconscious Izio on his back the whole time, but Hector didn't have that much confidence. He had Garovel stay with Chergoa and the Elroys, instead.

The reason he'd volunteered was to see for himself whether or not this aberration could be trusted, but so far, there was little clarity to be found. Ibai didn't do or say anything particularly volatile or dangerous, but perhaps that was only because they were all stuck in a limousine together as their host of Rainlords embarked on the long trip to Moaban.

The Blackburns had chosen Horatio and Silvia for their two bodyguards, and Ibai seemed to enjoy their company greatly, talking about all manner of subjects with them, asking their opinions about what would be fun to do together. Ibai acted like they were all going on a pleasant trip to an amusement park or something."

"964

Hector didn't much care for the aberration's enthusiasm. Even if it wasn't carrying malicious intent, it still reminded him of Geoffrey.

Eventually, Ibai rounded on Hector and Dimas.

"So what are your names?" he asked. "You never did tell me. Mine's Ibai, but I bet you knew that, eh?"

Hector didn't feel like answering, and apparently, neither did Dimas.

Ibai's smile lessened somewhat. "Mm. You don't like me. I get it. Some of my own family members don't like me very much, either. Fidel, for instance. I always beat him when we thumb wrestle. He hates that."

Was that supposed to be a joke? Or did he actually think that way? Hector honestly couldn't tell. Maybe it was a bit of both.

At their continued silence, Ibai shrugged. "You two don't like to talk much, do you? I understand. And I don't want you to worry, either! I thought this might happen, so I came prepared!" The man reached behind his seat and began pulling out several long, flat boxes.

They were all board games, Hector realized.

Hector didn't need to refuse to talk anymore. He was genuinely speechless. This fucking guy had brought board games to play with the two people who would kill him if he did anything wrong.

"See?" said Ibai. "This way, you don't have to talk. You can let the game speak for you!"

Hector couldn't decide if this was one of the stupidest ideas he'd ever seen or one of the most brilliant.

"What should we play? Hmm, maybe not Monopoly. Probably shouldn't have brought that one..."

What followed was, without a doubt in Hector's mind, the most uncomfortable game of Snakes and Ladders that had ever been played on the face of Eleg.

The second game was slightly less tense. For the third, they switched to Parcheesi; and for the fourth, they played a game called Waterwall, which Hector had never even heard of. The objective was to trap all of one's opponents by building dams and rerouting water, which moved every turn and was represented by a cluster of squiggly-lined pieces.

Ibai won every single game. It didn't seem to matter whether the game was skill- or luck-based. Horatio almost beat him once, but every other time was a complete trouncing.

Hector kept Garovel apprised of everything that was happening--or not happening, rather--and by the time Hector and Dimas' shift ended, Hector was even more confused than when they had started."

"965

The Rainlords had stopped on one of the larger bridges Hector had seen for a brief refueling break. The two gas stations on either side of the road looked a bit overwhelmed by the dozen vehicles that had suddenly arrived. Hector and Dimas walked together as they made their way back to the head of the entourage.

Now that they were away from the aberration, Hector was more interested in talking. "Well, that was... different than I expected."

"Indeed," said Dimas.

"What do you think?" asked Hector.

Dimas nodded lightly. "I think he seems genuine. You?"

"I don't know..." Hector frowned at being the cynical one. "Have you encountered many aberrations before?"

"Two," said Dimas. "I doubt that qualifies as many."

"What were they like?"

"They both tried to kill me within about ten seconds of meeting me."

"Ah..."

"What about you? You seem strangely interested in them."

"Me? Oh... I've only met one, but... but, ah..."

Dimas waited patiently.

A part of Hector still wasn't ready to talk about it. A part of him would never be ready. But a different part urged him to. It wanted him to tell this person. Dimas would understand, Hector thought. Just about any Rainlord would, probably.

So he tried. "The aberration I met... he, uh... he killed my dad. And... many of my friends."

Dimas was briefly quiet. "I am very sorry to hear that," was all he said.

Hector hadn't really been expecting anything more from the man. In fact, that was probably why he decided to tell him. He didn't want to be asked a dozen questions and end up reliving that nightmare.

He tried to think of something else to talk about, but nothing came to mind, and soon enough, they were back with the Elroys. Zeff was still asleep, and now, so was Asad. Asad's daughter Jada had since joined them as well, along with his sister Imas, and with Hector and Dimas added in, the limousine was nearly at maximum occupancy.

The conversation never reached higher than a low murmur. Most everyone seemed either too tired or just not in the mood to talk much, but through the relative quiet, it was clear enough to Hector that Jada knew the Elroys pretty well. She kept the topics light and infrequent, Hector noticed, bringing up things like pets and food and a bit about what Moaban would be like."

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

"I have been there several times," Jada was saying in that faint Valgan accent. "Raml'hahl is always very nice. Or--I think they call it Dunehall in Mohssian?" She looked to Atalim, her reaper. "Is that right?"

'It is, yes.'

'Dunehall?' said Garovel. 'Is it a fortress?'

'It used to be,' said Atalim. 'It weathered many assaults during its day, but now it serves as home to the local steward, who takes care of it for whenever Hahl Najir visits.' The reaper gave a laugh. 'I imagine he will not be very pleased to see us with so many unannounced guests.'

'Will that be a problem?' asked Chergoa.

'Oh, not at all. He would never disobey Asad. That would jeopardize his cushy job.'

Garovel threw a glance Hector's way. 'Speaking of fortresses,' he said publicly, 'Hector was given a really nice castle by the Queen of Atreya.'

Hector felt compelled to interject. "Nice might be the wrong word for it, Garovel..."

'Okay. We have a really interesting castle. You guys should come visit. And perhaps stay awhile.'

'Uh,' said Chergoa, 'we're kinda busy with things here in Sair, in case you haven't noticed.'

'Busy? Are you planning on getting kidnapped a second time?'

'Hilarious. We're not going anywhere without Emiliana's family.'

'Well, I didn't mean right this second. And they're all invited, too, of course. Warrenhold has plenty of room.'

'I wasn't questioning its spaciousness. Most castles are pretty big.'

'Ours is a little TOO big, actually. Enough so that we're not really sure what to do with it all. It's possibly the largest castle I've ever seen, now that I'm thinking about it.'

Chergoa cocked a skeletal eyebrow. 'Ever?'

'Maybe. I'm not sure. You definitely have to see it for yourself, someday. It would be a great place to lay low, if needed, and we would certainly welcome you, despite all of your horrendous character flaws.'

'Thank you,' Chergoa said flatly.

'Did you say Warrenhold?' asked Shenado. She'd been mostly quiet up to now, which seemed to make everyone more interested in hearing what she had to say.

'I did,' said Garovel. 'You know of it?'

'Not from personal experience, but I've heard Axiolis talk about how much he hates that place,' said Shenado.

Garovel let out a laugh. 'Really? Why? It wouldn't have anything to do with the Redwater Uprising, would it?'

'Ah, so you know about that.'"

"967

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

'A friend of ours was able to tell us some of Warrenhold's history,' said Garovel. 'It's our understanding that the castle caused trouble for some folks who were looking to kill a few kings, yes?'

'Yes,' said Shenado. 'Those kings needed to die in order for several of the Rainlords' allies to seize power and provide much needed aid during the Uprising. Many of the Rainlords themselves were dispatched to help take the castle, but instead of the swift victory that they were expecting, they encountered a struggle that lasted decades.'

'Ah, well, perhaps Axiolis will be pleased to know that Hector bears no relation to any of Warrenhold's previous occupants,' said Garovel.

Shenado tilted her skull to the side. 'He said if it weren't for Warrenhold, the Rainlords would have had all the support they needed in a dozen other key battles across the continent and wouldn't have suffered such heavy losses.'

'Mm. Then... hopefully, he'll be pleased to know that it is now occupied by a friendly face.'

'He also said that it was cursed.'

'Oh, well, that's not--'

'He said, even after it was taken, the castle drove people mad and caused all manner of political turmoil.'

'Axiolis is mistaken. I would be happy to--'

'You tryin' to invite us to some cursed pile of dog shit?' said Chergoa.
'The hell is wrong with you?'

'It's not cursed! It's just misunderstood!'

'Uh-huh, sure it is. I bet it's just teeming with ghosts 'n shit.'

'Ghosts aren't real,' said Garovel.

'You don't know that.'

'Actually, I do. And so do you.'

'If ghosts aren't real, then what do you call us?'

'Reapers aren't ghosts!'

'Aren't we, though? I mean, we're people who've died, right?'

'It's not the same!'

'It kinda is.'

Garovel sighed. 'Okay, so by that logic, you are therefore worried that Warrenhold is teeming with reapers.'

'Well, I was more worried about the dog shit part.'

'There's no dog shit!'

'So you say...'

'Ugh. Whatever. You'll see it for yourself when you visit.'

'I don't wanna visit a place filled with that much dog shit.'

'Chergoa, I will end you.'

She just laughed.

Hector would have kept listening, but Ramira poked him in the face with her iron spider. She'd insisted that he sit next to her, and he couldn't very well refuse. And besides, sitting next to a little girl was way less intimidating than sitting next to anyone else in this car. Except maybe Dimas, who was sitting on Hector's other side.

"What's the matter?" Hector asked.

"You never told me your name, you big lump."

She was right, he realized. The reapers had handled all the introductions, which she obviously hadn't been able to hear."

"968

--Monday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

"Ah... sorry. My name is Hector Goffe. I'm from a country called Atreya."

"Where is that?" Ramira asked.

"It's, uh... to the southwest of here."

"Why did you come to Sair, then? To help us?"

"Er... s-sorta..."

"And why are you helping us, huh?"

"Oh, um, because my reaper is the brother of Emiliana's reaper."

Ramira squinted at him. "So you're the servant... of the brother... of the reaper of my sister?"

"Y-yes... I think."

"That's really hard to remember."

"Y-yeah..."

Emiliana decided to pitch in. "Perhaps it would be easier to think of Lord Hector as a very distant cousin."

"Ah--" He raised a hand slightly. "Lord--um--you don't have to--I mean, I'm not really a... er..."

"Oh, I am sorry," she said. "Was I mistaken? I thought you were an Atreyan Lord."

"Well... I am, technically."

Emiliana tilted her masked head at him. "Then what is the problem?"

"Ah, uh, sorry." He could feel himself losing what little composure he had. He needed to concentrate and find his footing again. "I'm just, er-- I'm just not a--accustomed to it, I guess. Because I wasn't born into it, I mean. So, um, please, um. Please j-just call me Hector. Please." There were way too many pleases in there, he realized.

Emiliana just stared at him a moment. "Very well..."

Ramira eyed him another time. "Cousin Hector, huh? Mmkay."

And he was abruptly reminded of having that same thought when he first saw their pictures. Cousins. The memory made him blush, and he had to hide it by rubbing his face, as if out of exhaustion. Thankfully, he actually was exhausted, so that wasn't too much of a stretch.

He could hardly believe they'd said that. And agreed about it. Cousins. Family. When the thought had been his own, he'd chalked it up to wishful thinking and dismissed it, but now... now, it actually had a sense of legitimacy. Of reality.

But maybe he was overreacting. In fact, he definitely was, he decided. These were Rainlords. They probably had more distant relatives than they could keep track of. One more cousin wouldn't be a big deal to them, surely, so he shouldn't let it be a big deal to him, either.

But it was. In spite of himself, it was. And he had no idea what to do about it, because it embarrassed the living shit out of him."

"969

Ramira yawned and then prodded him with another question. "So how did you become a lord in your country if you weren't born into it?"

"Ah, uh... it's a recent thing. And kind of a long story."

Her big gray eyes seemed to be telling him that she was ready for a long story.

He hesitated, of course, but he gave it a go, beginning with how he met the Queen and giving the highlights from there. And before long, he could see the little girl slowly drifting off to sleep. He didn't really blame her, though. He wasn't so great at this storytelling thing, and in spite of all her energy, Ramira had looked pretty tired even since before leaving Luzo. And it actually made the story easier to tell, he found. There was less pressure to get it right when it felt like she was hardly even listening.

At length, Ramira was out cold. And the mask made it hard to tell, but judging from Emiliana's breathing and the fact that she hadn't moved her head at all in the last few minutes, she seemed to be out, too. Marcos, as well, had fallen asleep on Dimas' shoulder.

'We might as well get some rest, too,' said Garovel. He attached himself to Hector's shoulder, and Hector fell quickly into unconsciousness.

The warm darkness washed over him. Familiar and welcome and gone too soon.

He awoke to the realization that the limousine was no longer moving. Garovel was awake, too, but the Elroy children were still asleep.

And Ramira was leaning against his shoulder.

He tensed up, having to resist the impulse to jump out of his seat. If not for a very potent concern that he would accidentally hurt the poor girl, Hector was pretty sure that he would have ended up ripping one of the doors off the vehicle while trying to escape.

Garovel floated in front of him. 'You okay there, buddy?'

Hector just glared at the reaper with a clenched jaw.

'Just relax,' Garovel said privately, unable to hide his laughter completely. 'She's not going to hurt you.'

‘Garovel...’

‘Think of this as practice. Y’know, for when you have to touch someone who is actually conscious.’

‘You did this on purpose...’

‘Hey, I didn’t make her fall asleep on you. She did that on her own.’

‘You woke me up.’

‘Oh, did I? My hand must have slipped.’

‘Garovel!’

‘I do have hands, don’t I?’”

"970

Hector sighed through his nose. ‘Why do you have to torture me like this?’

‘Shits and giggles, primarily.’

‘Garovel...’

‘Oh, come on. This is adorable. Just try thinking about something else. Like why we’ve stopped or where Dimas went.’

Hector hesitated. He hadn’t even noticed that the man was gone. He couldn’t hear the rain anymore, either.

‘You’ve all been out for a while,’ Garovel went on. ‘We’ve already reached the Waress Mountains.’

‘...I’ve heard of those, I think.’

‘I should hope so. They divide the whole friggin’ continent.’

‘R-right...’

‘Also, we flew over them when we left Kuros.’

‘Oh.’

‘We’re gonna have to get you an atlas or something when we get back to Warrenhold. Oh, or you could craft a big iron globe! That could be a neat project. Make it big enough for people to walk into and look at from the inside. I saw a globe like that once. It got destroyed in a fire, though. Yeah, I should definitely have you recreate it. Could be good for tourism, too. Though, if it’s for tourism, then it might be best to put it above ground somewhere. Hmm. It’d look good underground, too, I’m sure. Maybe we could just have--’

‘Uh, Garovel?’

‘What?’

‘Where DID Dimas go?’

‘Oh, he’s scouting ahead to make sure the Tunnels are safe.’

‘Tunnels?’

‘Yup. That’s the other reason why I woke you up. You haven’t seen them before, have you? The Wares Tunnels?’

Hector tilted his head. ‘Uh...’

‘C’mon, then. Get out of the car.’

‘But I’ll wake up Ramira if I move...’

‘Eh, I think you can avoid waking her. C’mon.’

Slowly, Hector pulled himself away from the little girl. He tried not to jostle her too much.

She woke up, anyway.

Hector threw Garovel a look.

The reaper shrugged. ‘Well, maybe she’ll want to see them, too.’

Hector tried to apologize to Ramira, but she didn’t seem too concerned about it, and then Marcos and Emiliana began to stir as well. In the end, they just exited the vehicle together.

And finally, Hector could see what all the fuss was about.

A rocky cliff face towered before the entourage of limousines. It shot up at such a steep angle that, if not for its eroded ridges, Hector would have thought it was manmade. And yet, even with how tall it was and how much of his vision it consumed, the mountain peaks behind it were still more gigantic."

"971

The Tunnels themselves were rather difficult to miss. There were three of them, right in a row, and they were so massive that Hector wasn't sure they qualified as tunnels anymore, particularly because he could see buildings inside them. There were restaurants, gas stations, a few office buildings, and even what looked like residential housing. Sure, they were a bit crammed together--some being partially embedded into the walls or serving as a foundation to an immense support column--but Hector could still hardly believe his eyes.

Most of all, though, Hector admired the vast inlaid stonework. Perhaps it was because he'd recently been trying his own hand at construction back at Warrenhold. The sheer volume of individual bricks that lined the walls here astounded him.

The Elroys observed alongside him, though did not seem particularly surprised. No doubt, they had already known of this place or even been here before.

Garovel offered Hector some context in private. 'The Lyzakks made these tunnels. You remember them, right?'

'Your people,' said Hector.

'Yep. The Wares Mountains stood between them and the Armans. But instead of going over, they punched through.'

Hector scratched his head. 'So I guess these were servant-made?'

'Servants in conjunction with slave-labor.'

'Oh. That's... kind of horrible.'

'Yeah. It was a different time. A time full of shitheaded motherfuckers.'

'Mm...'

'Not that we have a shortage of those nowadays.'

‘A tunnel seems like a dangerous way for us to go,’ said Hector. ‘It’s, um... like, a pretty obvious funnel point, isn’t it? I mean, won’t the Vanguard be guarding it?’

Garovel shook his head. ‘The Wares Tunnels are more than just the three you see here. Just in Sair alone, they number in the hundreds. The Vanguard would have a hell of a time trying to block them all. But yes, in the off chance that the Vanguard picked one of these three, Dimas has taken a scouting party ahead.’

‘Ah...’

From their vantage point atop a southern bluff, Hector could see all the different roads converging in front of the Tunnels. It seemed like some kind of major intersection, what with all the directional signs about, but there wasn’t very much traffic to speak of. Only a handful of cars dotted the road. Hector wondered if it was always like this or if the Rainlords had evacuated the place while he’d slept."

"972

‘You should give Lynn a call,’ said Garovel, still privately.

Hector pressed his lips together flatly.

‘Don’t you want to know how things went in Kuros? And how she’s doing? And what she’s wearing?’

Hector just sighed and rubbed his brow with one hand.

‘Seriously, though, you should call her. She might be able to give us an idea of what’s going on with the Sandlords.’

‘She might’ve already returned to Atreya,’ said Hector.

‘Yup.’

Hector paused. ‘Uh... how are WE gonna get back to Atreya, by the way?’

Garovel shrugged. ‘Asad seems pretty rich. Maybe he has a jet we can borrow.’

‘Who the fuck would let anyone “borrow” a jet?’

‘Well, maybe a motorcycle, then.’

‘Agh...’

‘Come to think of it, you should probably call Amelia, too. Seems like we might not return to Warrenhold for a little while.’

That brought up a question that had been lingering in the back of Hector’s mind. ‘Ah... how long are we going to stay with these people, do you think?’

‘Not sure.’

‘It’s just... after we get to this Moaban place, uh--I mean, then what? We can’t just stay with the Rainlords indefinitely...’

Garovel made no response.

‘Er--I’m not saying I wanna abandon them or anything,’ Hector added. ‘It’s just, uh... ah--’

‘I know,’ said Garovel.

‘Do you have a plan?’ Hector asked, fishing into his pocket for his phone.

‘Well, I’d like Chergoa to return with us,’ the reaper said. He threw a look toward his sister, who was busy hovering around Emiliana. ‘But that seems unlikely, at the moment. I’m hoping I can find a way to convince her.’

‘...What if you can’t?’

Garovel gave an echoing sigh. ‘Then I guess we’ll just have to go our separate ways again. But at least she’ll know where to find me, if she needs to. I suppose that would be enough.’

Hector frowned. He hated feeling so helpless, but he didn’t see much point in pressing the issue. He found Lynn’s number and called her.

She answered after a few rings. <“Hector?”>

Predictably, he had trouble responding.

<“...Are you doing that thing you always do, or did the call actually drop?”>

“N-no, I’m here.”

<“Okay, good. What’s up?”>

Again, no words came out.

<“...Good goddess, Hector. Come on.”>

“Ah--sorry. I was just... uh, wondering, um... ah... I, er...”

<“...You were just wondering what?! Don’t say something like that and then leave out the important part!”>

"973

Hector just froze up again. He heard Lynn sigh.

<“Alright, well... can you at least tell me if you will be returning to Kuros anytime soon?”>

“Oh. Um. Er... are you still in Kuros?”

<“Yeah. After you left, Prince Meriwether decided to stay a while longer and spend some extra time with his children. I think he was worried about leaving you without a ride back to Atreya.”>

“Ah... o-okay. But I don’t, uh... I don’t think I’ll be back in Kuros very soon. You probably shouldn’t wait for me. I’ll try to bum a ride off the Rainlords or something.”

<“Okay. How are things going with them, anyway? I’ve been following the news, but it hasn’t been able to tell me much, other than the fact there’ve been a lot of evacuations.”>

“Ah, things have...” He cleared his throat and lowered his voice. “Er, things’ve gone fairly well, actually. I was kinda surprised, uh. I thought there’d be a lot of casualties, but I haven’t seen any whatsoever.”

<“Really?”>

“Yeah. The Rainlords are really nice, too. Very, um--very careful and respectful.” He paused. “Well, most of them, anyway...”

<“Huh. That’s good to hear.”>

Hector felt an awkward silence creeping in and snapped to the realization that it was his turn to pose a question. "W-what, um, what about you? How did the, uh... the thing go?"

Lynn breathed half a laugh. <"The thing?">

"The, ah... agh, the negotiation thing? Between the Prince and Lord Saqqaf?"

<"Oh, I'm not too sure. Lord Saqqaf agreed to provide us with some money, but I think Prince Meriwether had been hoping for a lot more.">

Hector scratched his cheek with his free hand. He felt like there was a more important question he should ask, but all he could think of was, "What was Lord Saqqaf like? I mean--er, did you meet him?"

<"Yeah, I met him. He asked me where I got my gauntlet.">

"Oh. What'd you tell him?"

<"That the Vanguard gave it to me.">

"Eesh... you sure that was wise?"

<"Not really, no. What would you have said?">

"Uh... hmm."

<"Exactly.">

"Maybe... an unnamed friend gave it to you."

<"Then he might've asked who.">

"Well, you could've said that you were protecting their identity or something."

<"Oh yeah, because that doesn't sound suspicious.">

"Hmm..."

Garovel decided to intervene. "This is a lovely chat 'n all, but you should ask about the Sandlords."

"974

Hector straightened. "Ah... Garovel wants to know about the Sandlords."

<"What about them?">

"What about them, Garovel?"

The reaper's bony brow twisted. 'Ask what they're up to. We heard they were having trouble with Abolish before, so have there been any notable developments with that? Or any other problems, maybe?'

It took him a bit longer, but Hector relayed the reaper's questions. More or less.

<"As far as I can tell, the Sandlords don't like to discuss that type of thing openly,"> said Lynn. <"But the news has been a little odd."> "Odd, how?"

<"Ah---um, I should preface this by saying that I had to ask someone to translate for me. The news is in Valgan, you know, so... just, don't get mad at me if I got something wrong here, alright?">

Hector blinked as he listened, feeling a sudden worry that his own awful speech patterns might be having some kind of negative effect on her. And without even thinking, he said, "I doubt I could ever get mad at you."

There came a very long pause.

His eyes widened as he realized what had just come out of his mouth. He wanted to take it back, but he was too afraid to say anything else. When he looked at Garovel, the reaper's hollow eye sockets had grown larger as well.

<"...Well, uh."> It was her turn to clear her throat. <"I just thought the news seemed odd because there are a lot of mysterious reports going around. Freak industrial accidents. Disappearing pets. Brushfires. Even a rise in burglaries and murders.">

Hector's brow lowered. "Where have these things been happening?"

<"Zebul, Guldamere, Shara, Egas--all over eastern Sair.">

"Hmm... Do they think it's Abolish?"

<“I assume so, but who knows? This place has been so busy. It seems like the Sandlords have had to dispatch people to investigate a new problem every few hours.”>

“Huh. That’s... unsettling.”

<“Yeah.”>

“Maybe you should head back to Atreya soon...”

<“Ha. That’s not up to me, Hector. Why? Are you worried about us?”>

“Uh... well, yeah. These Rainlords and Sandlords... they’re no joke, Lynn. I’ve seen them fight with my own eyes, and they scare the hell out of me--way more than anyone we fought back home. So... I mean, anyone who thinks they can go up against these guys is either really stupid or really dangerous.”

<“I see. Well, I’m sure Prince Meriwether knows that, too, but I’ll tell him what you said.”>

"975

Again, Hector wasn’t sure what to say, so he just said, “O-okay. Uh. Good.”

<“You’re being careful, too, aren’t you?”> said Lynn. <“Maybe I’m not the best person to give a lecture on not taking risks, but... um...”>

Hector felt like he was supposed to say something here, but jack shit came to mind, and he looked to Garovel another time.

‘Tell her you’re being careful, you idiot.’

‘But I’m not really--’

‘SHUT UP AND LIE TO HER. DO IT NOW.’

“Uh--y-y-yeah,” Hector blurted, “I’m being cautious. I mean, I have to protect Garovel ‘n all, so...”

<“...Right.”>

He couldn’t tell if that meant she’d bought it or not. After a few more moments of unbearable silence, however, he decided to try and end this before he said some other stupid thing. "Well, uh... I should probably go now..."

<"Ah--alright. Talk to you later, then.">

"Bye. Uh. Good to--er. Bye." His expression twisted as he hung up. He took a deep breath and shook his head.

'Hector.' Garovel's voice was perfectly flat. 'What in the holiest of fucks was all that about?'

'I don't know... I always fuck things up. Agh...'

'Hmm. You don't even realize it, do you?'

He sighed. 'Realize what?'

'How WELL you just did. I mean. For you. That was pretty incredible.'

'What? Garovel, I'm really not in the mood to be made fun of right now...'

Garovel just stared at him.

And Hector didn't understand the reaper's abrupt silence, but he was grateful for it, nonetheless. He sifted through his phone for Madame Carthrace's number, and his feet wandered closer to the edge of the small ridge, allowing a better view of the road directly below. It wasn't a long drop, and he noticed a few people with familiar faces standing at the base. One of those faces belonged to Ibai Blackburn.

As luck would have it, the aberration happened to be looking up at that same moment and so noticed Hector immediately. A swirl of brown shadow later, Ibai was standing right there next to him.

Hector decided to pocket his phone and call Amelia later.

Ibai was smiling, of course. "Hello again," he said as his four bodyguards bounded up from behind him. They landed with one quick thud after another, but he paid them no mind. "Ah, is this your reaper? We were never properly introduced. I'm Ibai."

'Charmed,' said Garovel."

Horatio was still among the bodyguards, Hector noticed. "Ibai, you have to stay with us," the man said with bags under his eyes. "You cannot just teleport away whenever you like."

"Eh, I'm pretty sure I can."

"No," Horatio growled. "What if you accidentally teleported inside of a person?"

"There's no risk of that," said Ibai. "I can see everyone's soul when I do it. Here, let me show you."

"Wait--"

Ibai grabbed his cousin's arm, and they blinked away together. Hector couldn't tell where they'd gone, but it didn't matter, because they returned to the same spot a moment later. Horatio looked like he was about to puke.

"Oh, whoops," said Ibai. "Sorry. I didn't even think about your motion sickness. Did that actually trigger it? You weren't really moving, you know."

Horatio just held up a hand and stared at the ground. Everyone waited for him to speak, but he said nothing further.

Ibai shrugged and turned back to Hector. "Well, anyway! Would you believe you're the first black person I've ever met?"

Hector did not respond.

"I've seen some of you on television and such, but I've never had the pleasure to speak with one personally. Isn't that something?"

Hector had to refrain from telling him that he still did not have the pleasure of speaking with one.

"I know there's a pretty profound age difference here," Ibai went on, "but would you like to be my first black friend? I've always wanted one."

Hector could only squint at the man. With the way Ibai spoke, it was somehow easy for Hector to forget that this person was quite clearly a middle-aged man.

“Or wait. Was that a racist thing to ask? If so, then I apologize. I’ve never had very many friends, you see. Well, I’ve had my family, of course. They’ve provided such fantastic companionship; I wouldn’t want to give the impression that they haven’t. I love them very much.” He slapped Horatio’s shoulder.

Horatio turned and barfed over the edge of the cliff.

“There you go, cousin,” said Ibai. “Feel better?”

Horatio just returned a deathly stare as he wiped his mouth.

“But yes,” Ibai continued to Hector, “they are my family. It’s a different sort of relationship. I feel there is something uniquely special about becoming friends with someone who is in no way obligated to you already. It’s a bit purer, in an odd way. Or perhaps I am just romanticizing it. What do you think?”

"977

Strangely, Hector knew exactly what Ibai was talking about. In his lonelier days, he’d often pondered the nature of companionship himself, and indeed, he’d reached a similar conclusion. There was something different about the approval of others, of strangers. It vindicated one’s existence, perhaps. That was what he’d come to believe, anyway.

But he certainly hadn’t expected to be reminded of that now of all times.

Hector still didn’t know how to respond, though. No one had ever been so direct about asking for his friendship before, but he wasn’t sure how he felt about becoming someone’s token black friend, let alone an aberration’s token black friend. His gut told him there wasn’t much harm in it, but even still...

Garovel spoke up in his stead. ‘We would love to be your friends.’

Hector gave the reaper a look.

Ibai’s eyes lit up. “Really?!”

‘Sure, why not?’ said Garovel. ‘You seem like a nice enough fellow-- and not a bloodthirsty psychopath. People who aren't bloodthirsty psychopaths are my favorite, you know.'

"Is that so?! Well, that's just wonderful!"

'Oh, and I'm sorry that my buddy here is so quiet,' said Garovel. 'It's nothing against you. He's like this with most people. He's super shy, you see.'

"Oh! Shy! That explains it! Aha!" He gave Hector an even bigger smile, somehow. "I was afraid that you hated me! Wow! That is such a relief, then. Whew."

Hector could only wonder where Garovel was going with this.

'We heard all about you from Chergoa. She's my sister, as it happens.'

"Wow, that's amazing! I'd love to talk to her and Emiliana again! They were so nice!"

'I'm sure they'd like that,' said Garovel. 'By the way, how old are you?'

"Oh, I'm thirty-five. Why?"

'Ah, no reason. I'm curious to know how long aberrations have been around. I wasn't familiar with your kind until very recently. It's just that the last aberration we met was only about twenty years old or so.'

"Ooh, what was he like?"

'Not nearly as pleasant as you, to be sure. He hurt a lot of innocent people.'

"Aww... I'm sorry to hear that. I suppose I should have guessed. What happened to him?"

'My buddy here killed him.'

Ibai looked to Hector again. "Did you, now? Hmm. Was that difficult?"

Now there was a question that Hector wanted to answer. "Not so much so that I wouldn't do it again."

Ibai's smile waned for a second, but then he broke into a laugh.

"You're kinda scary! I bet you'd get along with Uncle Mel!"

Hector wasn't surprised by that reaction in the slightest, but this "Uncle Mel" caught his attention.

Garovel inquired for the both of them. 'Uncle Mel? He wouldn't happen to be Darktide, would he?'

Ibai nodded. "Mmhhh. Technically, he's not my uncle. He's just a super old cousin, but he's always been like Papa's big brother."

'How is he doing, by the way?' Garovel asked. 'Still sleeping, I take it?'

"Yes," said Horatio, who seemed to have regained his composure. "And what of your Seadevil?"

'Oh, he's not OUR Seadevil,' said Garovel. 'We're not Rainlords, in case you hadn't already guessed.'

"Ah." Horatio tilted his head. "I thought your servant had perhaps married into one of the families."

'No, no. I'm Garovel, and this is Hector Goffe, the Lord of Warrenhold in Atreya. We only came to see my sister. Got a little more from this visit than we bargained for, you might say.'

"Oh, so you're not even from Sair!" said Ibai. "Is this your first time seeing the Tunnels, then?" He didn't wait for an answer this time. "Mine, too! Pictures really don't do them justice! Did you know that they've been used since ancient times in order to transport vital resources? Even when the Rainlords and Sandlords were at war! They traded valuable materials even while they were trying to stab each other in the back!"

'Really?' said Garovel, and Hector couldn't tell if the reaper was genuinely interested or just playing along. 'That seems kind of counterintuitive, doesn't it?'

"I know, right?!" said Ibai. "They used to poison each other's stuff! But the thing was, neither side trusted the other, and they would always expect it to be some kind of trap. So they'd test their imports really well, and decontaminate it and use it, if they could. If not, they'd try to find some sneaky way of sending it back. It was a really crazy time! Our ancestors were lunatics! I wish I could've met some of them!"

‘Some of your family’s reapers must have lived through those times, no?’

“Well, sure, but it’s not the same,” said Ibai. “And besides, Rholtam and Orric never share any of their stories, even though I’m sure they must have tons of juicy ones. What about you, Garovel? You must have some neat stories.”

‘Oh, of course,’ said Garovel. ‘But unfortunately, I sense Lord Dimas returning from his scouting mission. Story time will have to wait.’

“Aww...”

"979 -- CXI.

Chapter One Hundred Eleven: ‘Thy respite, embrace...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Wares Tunnels were longer than Hector could have imagined. Much of the journey was spent in darkness. The headlights of all the limousines in their party often weren’t enough to reach the walls or ceiling, which gave the illusion of a pitch black night all around them. Exceptions came via the brightly lit intersections where the Tunnels crossed paths with one another, usually accompanied by some kind of refueling station or resting point. They didn’t stop at any of them, but Hector wondered what it would be like to work in such a place. He didn’t think he’d be able to handle something this isolated. More than that, though, he wondered about any poor folks who’d had their vehicles break down in here. He supposed that problem was one of the main reasons for all the rest stops, but even still. That’d suck pretty hard, he figured.

At length, they finally made it out, and even the limousine’s tinted windows were not enough to stop everyone from having to shield their eyes from the daylight. It had only been a few hours, according to Hector’s phone, but it felt like an entire night had passed.

Chergoa and Garovel never seemed to run out of things to talk about. On and on and on, they spoke, exchanging information, talking about new and old friends, discussing politics and science and history and something about a dog smoking a cigar. Hector had kind of stopped listening by that point--and so had the Elroys, by the look of it.

After a while longer, Hector managed to get a bit more sleep. When he awoke, he saw that Dimas was still awake if the dark circles under his eyes were any indication.

“...You should really get some sleep,” said Hector.

Dimas’s gaze was even more potent than usual. “I did,” he said. “For about ten minutes.”

Hector just frowned at him.

“I am not staying awake because I want to,” Dimas added. “I cannot usually sleep unless Iziol knocks me unconscious.”

“Oh,” Hector said. “What about sleeping pills?”

“...I cannot swallow pills.”

“Ah... er, don’t they make stuff you can drink?”

“...It tastes funny.”

Hector opened his mouth and then closed it again.

‘Don’t bother,’ came Iziol’s groggy voice. He stirred on Dimas’ shoulder but didn’t detach himself. ‘I told him there are different flavors, but he never listens.’”

"979 -- CXI.

Chapter One Hundred Eleven: ‘Thy respite, embrace...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Wares Tunnels were longer than Hector could have imagined. Much of the journey was spent in darkness. The headlights of all the limousines in their party often weren’t enough to reach the walls or ceiling, which gave the illusion of a pitch black night all around them. Exceptions came via the brightly lit intersections where the Tunnels crossed paths with one another, usually accompanied by some kind of refueling station or resting point. They didn’t stop at any of them, but

Hector wondered what it would be like to work in such a place. He didn't think he'd be able to handle something this isolated. More than that, though, he wondered about any poor folks who'd had their vehicles break down in here. He supposed that problem was one of the main reasons for all the rest stops, but even still. That'd suck pretty hard, he figured.

At length, they finally made it out, and even the limousine's tinted windows were not enough to stop everyone from having to shield their eyes from the daylight. It had only been a few hours, according to Hector's phone, but it felt like an entire night had passed.

Chergoa and Garovel never seemed to run out of things to talk about. On and on and on, they spoke, exchanging information, talking about new and old friends, discussing politics and science and history and something about a dog smoking a cigar. Hector had kind of stopped listening by that point--and so had the Elroys, by the look of it.

After a while longer, Hector managed to get a bit more sleep. When he awoke, he saw that Dimas was still awake if the dark circles under his eyes were any indication.

"...You should really get some sleep," said Hector.

Dimas's gaze was even more potent than usual. "I did," he said. "For about ten minutes."

Hector just frowned at him.

"I am not staying awake because I want to," Dimas added. "I cannot usually sleep unless Iziol knocks me unconscious."

"Oh," Hector said. "What about sleeping pills?"

"...I cannot swallow pills."

"Ah... er, don't they make stuff you can drink?"

"...It tastes funny."

Hector opened his mouth and then closed it again.

'Don't bother,' came Iziol's groggy voice. He stirred on Dimas' shoulder but didn't detach himself. 'I told him there are different flavors, but he never listens.'

"It all tastes funny," said Dimas, sounding rather unlike a lord--or even an adult person, Hector thought.

Hector kept that opinion to himself, though.

'So unreasonable,' said Iziol. 'He was like this even before I became his reaper, you know. When he was a child, he would stay awake for days upon days and eventually just pass out from exhaustion. One time, he collapsed in the middle of a track race, and another child tripped over him and broke a tooth.'

"Uh, wow..." Hector checked Dimas' expression, but the man just looked out the window.

'It was quite bad,' said Iziol. 'At one point, Lady Amaya resorted to having his dinner laced with soporifics.'

Dimas turned back around. "...Is that true?"

'Oh indeed. You never talked, so people could not tell that, in actuality, you were a spoiled brat who rarely ever did as he was told.' Iziol gave a faint laugh. 'And that, I would say, has not changed very much.'

Dimas exhaled a short breath, and Hector saw him crack a tiny smile.

After that, Iziol offered to knock him out, but Dimas refused, citing the fact that Xuan and Duvoss were still unconscious. Iziol argued, but not very fervently, and soon drifted back to sleep himself.

And Hector just sat there in silent awe of this person next to him. He barely even knew the man, but his respect for Lord Dimas had already grown by leaps and bounds. He could imagine the weight that Dimas must have been feeling upon his shoulders after hearing the news of Rheinhal. This man was one of the strongest remaining Rainlords. So many people were relying on him to protect them.

Of course, Hector had felt that kind of pressure before, as well. A few times, in truth. And it had never stopped being terrifying, especially after seeing just how badly things could go wrong.

But that was also the point, he was realizing. Yes, of course, the worst could happen. Everyone could end up dead, and everything could be for naught. That was why people needed someone to protect them.

Things were not going to just be okay on their own. Someone had to make them okay.

And that was why he wanted to keep living. To be that someone.

He'd felt all of these things in the back of his mind for some time already, but it was somehow different here. Making them explicit. Asserting his own sense of purpose to himself."

"981

Hector rubbed his face, trying to clear his head again. He wasn't sure where all these thoughts were coming from. Maybe it was just the Rainlords' presence. He envied the bond they all shared. Even after nearly killing each other, they were still trying to work through everything together.

At length, Garovel rounded on him, wrapped in the echo of privacy. 'How ya doin', buddy? You've been staring out the window for a while now.'

'Oh, I'm fine,' he said. Ramira had ceded the window seat to him. Now she was sitting perpendicular to him, adjacent her sister against the side of the limousine. 'I was just, uh... er, lost in thought, I guess.'

'About what?' said Garovel. 'Ibai?'

That wasn't the correct answer, of course, but now that Garovel had brought it up, it seemed like a much more interesting subject for discussion. 'What do you think of him?' Hector asked.

'Oh, I have no fucking idea,' said Garovel.

'You were awfully friendly with him back there...'

'We're not here to make enemies, Hector.'

Hector's expression hardened. 'We are if they're going to kill innocent people.'

'Ha.' Garovel returned that hollow stare of his. 'Allow me to put it another way, then. If Ibai is our enemy, it's better that he believes he's our friend.'

Hector looked out the window again. 'Hmm...'

'And if he's NOT our enemy, then he could be a very valuable ally. A power like his? Can you imagine how helpful that could be?'

Hector could. 'A good aberration... I'd like to believe it.'

'I think most of us would.'

'The trouble is knowing so.'

'It's impossible to know. Even if he weren't an aberration, it would be impossible. Anyone could betray us, under the right circumstances.'

'Yeah, but you know what I mean. It's not the same.'

'Maybe it is the same. There are plenty of normal people out there who are complete lunatics, too, y'know. And all things considered, we really don't know very much about aberrations.'

'I realize that. And I realize that Ibai might help us learn more about them. But that doesn't mean I'm in a hurry to trust him.'

'Mm. Well, there's no use worrying about it right now. And you look gloomy as hell in your little corner here. Let's talk about something lighter.'

'Like what?'

'Like how much fun that fight against Darktide was!'

Hector gave the reaper a look. 'Fun?'

'Yeah. Y'know. Fun in a pants-shittingly-terrifying kind of way.'

"982

'I didn't realize that qualified as a kind of fun,' said Hector.

'Oh, sure. Like mountain climbing. Or skydiving. Or playing that version of rock-paper-scissors where the loser gets kicked in the testicles.'

'...I knew some guys in middle school who did that last one.'

'Really?'

‘...I did it, too, actually. I was part of their group.’

The reaper paused. ‘You’re fuckin’ with me.’

Hector flushed a little and covered his embarrassed smile with one hand. ‘Sadly, I’m not...’

‘Wow. I bet that was a learning experience.’

‘You could say that...’

‘These weren’t the kids from the carpentry club, were they?’

‘Oh, no. Carpentry club was high school. These guys were middle school.’

‘Right. And these idiots were your friends?’

‘I wasn’t... I mean, they weren’t... ah... Yeah, pretty much.’

‘What happened to them?’

‘Well, one moved away. One got expelled for punching a teacher. And the last one got sent to juvie for setting the school on fire.’

‘What the fuck?’

‘I don’t think he meant for it to get that big. And nobody got hurt. He was just kind of a pyro and...’

‘And a dumbass?’

‘Well... yeah.’

Garovel snorted a laugh. ‘I’m seeing you in a whole new light, Hector. Were you a troublemaker, too?’

‘I, uh... I tried to be, but I wasn’t very good at it.’

‘Oh, well, now I need details.’

‘Ah... okay.’ Hector took a breath and scratched his chin. ‘One time, I tried to steal a pack of cigarettes from a guy. I accidentally took his wallet, instead. I felt so bad that I just pretended he’d dropped it and gave it back to him.’

‘Wow.’

‘He gave me twenty troas.’

Garovel snorted again. ‘Smooth. What other terrible crimes have you committed?’

‘Uh... I put graffiti inside a public bathroom.’

‘Oh yeah?’

‘Yeah. It said, “Wait here if you wanna see some real shit go down” and had a picture of a dude pooping.’

The reaper laughed publicly this time and drew glances from the others in the car. ‘You didn’t really do that, did you?’

‘I thought it would get me in trouble! That was the whole point! Then I saw a fucking cop walk in. He asked if I was the one who did it. I said yes. He just laughed at me, took a really loud dump, and left.’

‘Knowing you, I one hundred percent believe that story.’

"983

‘Really?’ said Hector. ‘I figured you would think I’d never be able to do something like that.’

‘We were all young and stupid once,’ said Garovel. ‘Hell, you still are.’

‘Fuck you.’

The reaper snickered. ‘Actually, I’d say you’re strangely mature for your age. In fact, sometimes I forget how young you are.’

The sudden compliment made Hector hesitate. ‘...Really?’

‘Yep. But then again, it might just be your natural gloominess. Adults are all jaded fucks, y’know, so a kid can seem older by acting all dour and cynical. Little tip for ya.’

‘Mm. I kinda knew that already, I think...’

‘Not surprising. Were there any other bad things you tried to do?’

‘Well... uh... nah, I guess not.’

‘Seriously?’ said Garovel. ‘That’s it? Two things? That’s your terrible list of past misconduct?’

‘...I jaywalked a couple times.’

‘What a thug. I guess you were just fated to be on the side of righteousness and broken motorcycles.’

'I thought you didn't believe in fate.'

'Oh, I don't. It's just amusing to think about some cosmic, universal force thwarting a little preteen's bumbling efforts at being a badass.'

'...I could be a bad guy, if I wanted.'

'Uh-huh.'

'I could! I mean, it's not like I'm a saint. Technically, I've done all sorts of bad things. Stole drugs. Beat people up.'

'First of all, saints are overrated as hell. And secondly, none of that shit even counts.'

Hector frowned. 'I broke a cop's arm once...'

'Oh, you mean that thing you felt really bad about afterwards? That thing I'm sure you STILL feel really bad about?'

'I... uh... that's beside the point.'

'Pfft. Y'know, despite how keen you might have been to get arrested back then, it really shouldn't have been that difficult for you. All you had to do was throw a brick at a police car or something.'

'Eesh, I didn't wanna do anything THAT bad.'

Garovel just stared at him.

'...Alright, fine,' Hector relented. 'I'm a fuckin' goody-two-shoes. Are you happy?'

'Mhmm.'

'...By the way, if we ever make it back to Atreya, don't let me forget to visit Klein and find that cop again.'

'Ha. What do you mean to do for him?'

'I don't know, but there's gotta be something. I'm the Lord of Warrenhold, right?'

'Indeed, you are, my friend.'

--++--++--

Marcos Elroy hadn't slept this well in over a month. There'd always been something getting in the way. Something in his head. Something fueling the nightmares that he couldn't even remember after waking up. All he'd known was that they left him sweating and his heart racing in a panicked way.

It was only here and now that things had changed."

"984

Marcos wasn't sure what the reason was, but he suspected that finally being able to see his father again had something to do with it, even if the man was still unconscious. The presence of the other Rainlords might have helped, too. Dimas in particular.

The party of limousines didn't stop for another break until they reached Seisoro, and by then, it was nearly dark again. They'd been driving all day long, and yet Moaban was still a few hours away. Everyone needed to stretch their legs, use the restroom, and finally get a bite to eat. Marcos entered the gas station's little store with his sisters and a host of guardians, including Dimas and Hector.

Marcos didn't know what to make of the Atreyan lord. He looked to be about Cisco's age, but that didn't mean anything. The guy could be eighty years old for all they knew, and from the sound of it, perhaps he was, since he'd apparently gone up against Melchor Blackburn and not died in two seconds. Marcos had been hoping someone would ask Hector about that, but no one did, and Marcos wasn't comfortable asking himself, so he just let the matter drop.

It did make him think of Cisco, though. And Gema. He wondered where they were now. He wondered if he would ever see them again. But mostly, he wondered if they would hate him.

When Shenado had told him what his mother had done, he hadn't understood. It had taken a while. It was a difficult thing to grasp. That someone had actually sacrificed their life for his...? That it had been Ma...? That she was just gone now...?

It still didn't really make sense to him, if he was honest. How could she do a thing like that? How could she have loved him that much? He'd never done anything to deserve that kind of love. He'd caused her nothing but problems. How could...? It didn't...

‘Marcos,’ came Shenado’s echoing voice.

And abruptly, he realized that he was just standing there in front of a shelf full of chips. His nose was running, and his eyes were hot with tears. He wiped his face with his sleeve. ‘Sorry,’ he said.

‘There’s nothing to apologize for,’ said the eagle with burning black eyes. She wasn’t quite perched on the shelf, instead hovering just slightly above it.”

"985

Marcos looked over the assortment of junk food another time. He was starving, but somehow, he still didn’t have much of an appetite. He supposed it didn’t really matter. He grabbed something without even looking at what it was and then went to stand blankly behind Emiliana. It would be easiest to put his brain in autopilot and follow her around. She stuck out like a sore thumb with that black mask of hers.

His eyes glazed over as he let his mind wander. A question occurred to him. ‘When will my ability manifest?’ he asked.

‘It varies from person to person,’ said Shenado privately. ‘Give it time.’

‘It’s been a month. And Emi’s manifested after only a few days...’

‘Hers was stress-induced.’

‘So I should be more stressed?’

‘That is not what I am saying.’

‘Then what are you saying?’

‘I am saying be patient. We’ll worry about it after we reach Moaban.’

He took a long breath. Really, he was just trying to keep his mind busy. ‘What do you think my ability will be?’

‘It could be anything.’

‘...Could I get the same ability as Pa?’

‘It’s not very likely, but it is certainly possible. Servant abilities are determined by genetics.'

'They are? I thought it had to do with personality. Or just... brain... stuff.'

'Well, there's some debate about that, I suppose,' said Shenado. 'But "brain stuff" is genetic, too, you know. As are personalities, to an extent. So there might well be a link there, but it is probably a case of correlation rather than causation.'

'I'm not sure what that means...'

'It means that genetics might make it LOOK like servant abilities are determined by personality, even though they aren't necessarily.'

'That's confusing...'

'Most things are. As much as we might like the world to be simpler and easier to understand, it usually isn't. And that can be good. Sometimes, complexity is wonderful. Usually, though, it sucks big time.'

He spared her a cock-eyed glance. 'What do you mean?'

'Have you ever heard the old saying that the more complicated your plan is, the more opportunities it'll have to go wrong?'

'Uh, sure.'

'Well, it's the same for everything else in life. For example, the thing we were just talking about. Genetics. DNA is extremely complex. And rather predictably, all sorts of things can go wrong with it. People can be born with so many different kinds of genetic deformities or diseases. And they all suck. Apart from the very occasional one that is actually helpful, maybe offering the person an immunity to something terrible.'"

"986

Marcos bit the inside of his lip. 'You're not a very optimistic person, are you?'

'I consider myself a pragmatist,' said Shenado.

For some reason, that made him smile. And after a moment, he realized why. 'You... um...'

'Yes?'

'Ah... never mind.'

'Oh, come now. Tell me. There's no need for secrets or hesitation, Marcos. I know you're still getting accustomed to seeing me, but I've known you your whole life. I watched you grow up.'

'Right. It's just... er, this might sound weird.'

'I'm sure I've heard weirder.'

'It's just--you kind of... you kind of remind me of my mother.'

That gave the reaper pause.

'Sorry,' Marcos said hurriedly. 'I didn't mean to--'

'No, it's fine,' said Shenado. 'More than fine, actually. I don't mind being compared to Mariana. Although, you might have things a little backwards.'

'Backwards?'

'Not to toot my own horn, but Mariana probably took after me more than I took after her.'

'Oh...' Marcos blinked a few times. 'How old was she when you met her?'

'She was twenty.'

'That doesn't sound like a very impressionable age to me.'

'Yes, well, I was somewhere around fifteen hundred, so I think I was a little more set in my ways than she was by then.'

'Ah...' It was weird to think about, that this reaper he barely even knew had influenced his mother so much. He supposed she was practically his grandmother. Very weird.

But it also opened up an avenue of inquiry that he hadn't thought of before. 'How did the two of you meet?' he asked.

‘Mm. That is not an altogether pleasant story.’

Marcos had figured as much. ‘Please. I want to know.’

The eagle stared at him a moment. ‘Very well. I met her in a little town called Saloma, which is in Steccat, far to the east of here.’

‘What was she doing there?’

‘Ha. You might be surprised to hear this, but your mother was a Cocoran missionary when she was younger.’

Marcos’s brow receded. ‘As in the goddess, Cocora?’

‘The very same.’

‘But she hated religion.’

‘By the time you came along, yes. Even by the time I came along, she’d pretty much lost her faith already. But she told me that she was extremely devout in her youth--enough to embark on a journey to aid people across the world. While also trying to convert them, of course.’”
"987

‘I don’t really know much about Cocora,’ said Marcos. ‘Why did Ma stop believing in her?’

‘Oh, well, Cocora is supposed to be this benevolent and all-powerful being who is just the greatest thing ever in the history of the universe. And I think during her travels, your mother began to have trouble consolidating this idea of Cocora with the state of the world around her.’

‘Hmm...’

‘Mariana saw a lot of death, even before she met me. A lot of senseless brutality and suffering. And even the holiest, most convincing rhetoric in the world has a difficult time standing up against all of that.’

‘I get the impression you’re not very religious, either...’

‘Oh, me?’ Shenado laughed. ‘I’m even worse than Mariana was. In spite of everything, your mother still believed in SOME kind of ultimate creator. She just thought all religions were bullshit.' The reaper hesitated. 'Agh, sorry, I keep forgetting you're only twelve.'

'It's fine. I don't mind.' It was hard to take much offence to swear words after having seen Darktide literally squash several people into a bloody pulp.

'Mm. But yes, Mariana still possessed a tiny morsel of spirituality. I, on the other hand, do not.'

'Really? You don't think there's like a reaper god or something?

'Nah.'

'How can reapers exist without some kind of creator?'

'The same way that people can.'

'Uh... then how can people exist without a creator?'

'Ah. A very old question, that. One that has been used to justify all manner of deistic belief in the past. Nowadays, though, we know about something called "spontaneous quantum creation." It's a bit difficult to explain, but in very simple terms, it means that the natural forces that make up the universe are such that there is no reason why the universe could not have created ITSELF. No divine intervention necessary.'

'Uh...'

'There have been other ideas about godless creation throughout history, too, and perhaps there will be still more in the future, but spontaneous quantum creation is what currently seems to make the most scientific sense.'

'...But Ma didn't believe any of that, did she?'

'No. She could be quite stubborn.'

'Unlike you?'

Shenado laughed again. 'Excuse me?'

'I'm sorry. That was ruder than I meant it...'

'I can already tell that you're going to give me a lot of sass as you get older.' She didn't sound particularly upset about it, though."

"988

As Marcos deliberated over what his next question should be, he abruptly realized that he was outside again. And someone had put a cold sandwich and drink in his hands, along with his bag of chips-- which didn't contain chips at all, now that he was looking at it. It was actually a bag of dried seaweed. That sounded pretty gross to him, but he resolved to at least give it a try.

Everyone else was already eating, he saw, so he joined them. The sandwich's bread and meat were nearly frozen, making the task more difficult, but he didn't mind so terribly. A cool meal was quite welcome in this baking heat. Even with the sun going down, the temperature didn't seem to care. This was definitely Sandlord territory.

And that sunset--a mural of blazing streaks above the mountainous horizon, deep yellows and oranges and reds, even a few purples burning around the edges of an occasional cloud. They sure didn't get that back in Aguarey.

Before anyone could even finish eating, the refueling was done, and everyone returned to their respective limousine so that the entourage could get on the road again.

And as he polished off his sandwich, Marcos finally thought of another question for Shenado. 'Do a lot of reapers believe like you do?' he asked.

'You mean are a lot of us doubting, cynical bastards?' Shenado shrugged. 'Yes. In fact, I would say the majority of us are.'

Marcos glanced at Dimas. 'What about IzioI?'

'IzioI is a freak of nature. I have no idea what he believes, but it is probably something ridiculous.'

'That's a little mean...'

'Oh, IzioI is wonderful. Don't get me wrong. I adore him. Being half-crazy is part of his charm.'

'Ah...' That made him curious about something else, and he looked toward his unconscious father and the equally unconscious reaper attached to the man's arm. 'What is Axiolis like? I still haven't met him yet, but you and he are... uh...?'

'Axiolis is also wonderful,' Shenado said flatly.

Marcos just stared at her, waiting.

'...But don't listen to anything he tells you about Lhutwë.'

That almost made Marcos smile. 'He still believes in the old water god?'

'Yes,' sighed Shenado. 'He will probably try to teach you all about it, at some point. Preserving the old ways, he calls it.'

'Really? I wouldn't mind learning.'

'Ugh.'

That actually did make him smile. 'How much do YOU know about Lhutwë?'

"989 -- CXII.

'I know plenty about him,' said Shenado. 'Like the fact that he isn't real, for instance.'

'What else?' asked Marcos.

The reaper's beak twisted impossibly into a frown, and her burning eyes flared up a little. 'Why the sudden interest?'

'I was just thinking that it might be good to learn about religion from someone who isn't also trying to make me believe it.'

Shenado blinked at him. 'You want a more objective teacher.'

'Well, I don't know if I'd call you "objective," but--'

'Ha, fine, alright. I suppose you have a point. When Axiolis inevitably brings it up, I shall make sure that I sit in on all of your lessons.'

'...Will he be okay with that?'

‘Probably not.’

Chapter One Hundred Twelve: ‘The house of four flames...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As they continued north, Hector was surprised to find the vast stretch of barren and cracked flatlands gradually give rise to fields of grass and even the occasional tree. Considering that they were going to a place called Dunehall, he hadn’t been expecting to see much other than sand.

When they finally reached Moaban, it was the dead of night, but even through the darkness, Hector could see that the city wasn’t struggling for water. Rows of trees with arching canopies covered many of the roads, blocking out the night sky’s vibrant half-moon. The foliage was so thick that the first few areas they drove through made it feel like they’d suddenly entered a forest. After a time, however, there came a break in the trees, revealing an array of buildings buried in sand.

The change was so stark that it took Hector a while to understand what he was looking at.

Mountains of sand in the moonlight. In the middle of an otherwise lush, sand-free city. Hector could see four bulbous towers just barely peeking out from the centermost mound, each one topped off with a jagged spike pointed skyward.

As they pulled closer, the fortress before them became more obvious. Tall lamps illuminated the path into its heart, making the sand all around them glisten like still water. A tunnel guided their entourage up to an underground entrance, where the limousines finally eased to a stop. Everyone began exiting.

Hector marveled at the fine stonework around him. There seemed to be some wooden beams thrown in, along with some metal ones, but the whole area had a golden aura about it thanks to the lighting."
"989 -- CXII.

‘I know plenty about him,’ said Shenado. ‘Like the fact that he isn’t real,

for instance.'

'What else?' asked Marcos.

The reaper's beak twisted impossibly into a frown, and her burning eyes flared up a little. 'Why the sudden interest?'

'I was just thinking that it might be good to learn about religion from someone who isn't also trying to make me believe it.'

Shenado blinked at him. 'You want a more objective teacher.'

'Well, I don't know if I'd call you "objective," but--'

'Ha, fine, alright. I suppose you have a point. When Axiolis inevitably brings it up, I shall make sure that I sit in on all of your lessons.'

'...Will he be okay with that?'

'Probably not.'

Chapter One Hundred Twelve: 'The house of four flames...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As they continued north, Hector was surprised to find the vast stretch of barren and cracked flatlands gradually give rise to fields of grass and even the occasional tree. Considering that they were going to a place called Dunehall, he hadn't been expecting to see much other than sand.

When they finally reached Moaban, it was the dead of night, but even through the darkness, Hector could see that the city wasn't struggling for water. Rows of trees with arching canopies covered many of the roads, blocking out the night sky's vibrant half-moon. The foliage was so thick that the first few areas they drove through made it feel like they'd suddenly entered a forest. After a time, however, there came a break in the trees, revealing an array of buildings buried in sand.

The change was so stark that it took Hector a while to understand what he was looking at.

Mountains of sand in the moonlight. In the middle of an otherwise lush, sand-free city. Hector could see four bulbous towers just barely peeking out from the centermost mound, each one topped off with a jagged spike pointed skyward.

As they pulled closer, the fortress before them became more obvious. Tall lamps illuminated the path into its heart, making the sand all around them glisten like still water. A tunnel guided their entourage up to an underground entrance, where the limousines finally eased to a stop. Everyone began exiting.

Hector marveled at the fine stonework around him. There seemed to be some wooden beams thrown in, along with some metal ones, but the whole area had a golden aura about it thanks to the lighting."

"990

Asad appeared and led everyone inside. Hector moved to help carry Zeff, but a pair of much larger men were already there, so he just stuck close to the children.

The building's interior left him gawking again. Polished black tiles covered the floor of the entryway, matched by an obsidian lion that looked pretty much life-size, by Hector's estimation. A team of butlers were there to greet them as well, offering to take luggage that most of the Rainlords chose to hold onto. Hector did the same with his one bag.

'Wow,' Garovel said privately. 'We knew Asad was rich, but holy shit. This place is ridiculous.'

Hector had to stifle a laugh. 'Do you think he's richer than Roman?'

'Ha. Dunno. Now that I think about it, we seem to have a lot of rich friends, don't we?'

Hector gave a sideways nod. 'Yeah, I guess so. How the fuck did that happen?'

'Maybe it's because whenever you meet a poor person, you usually just save their life and leave, you classist prick.'

'What--?'

'You should take a good long look at yourself.'

He knew the reaper was joking, but he also knew that there was some truth to be found there as well. They'd discussed the topic at length back in Gray Rock and come to the conclusion that he should work on achieving a better relationship with the lower classes. Indeed, that had been the purpose of his visits to homeless shelters just prior to his trip to Sair. Thinking about it now reminded Hector of all the things that still needed doing at home.

It still felt a little strange to think of Warrenhold as home. Strange in a good way, though.

He glanced over and saw Emiliana lagging behind her siblings. Hector pulled back to ask her, "Are you okay?"

She looked at him, as if surprised, and adjusted her mask. "Ah. Yes. I apologize."

Chergoa floated up beside her. 'Something wrong?'

"No," said Emiliana. "It was only an odd shiver."

'A shiver?' said Chergoa.

"Goose pimples. They surprised me. But I am fine." She walked on ahead, not waiting for a response.

Hector exchanged looks with Chergoa before the reaper left to join her.

'Hmm,' hummed Garovel privately, who'd apparently been close enough to overhear. 'A shiver, huh? Is it cold in here?'

'Not really,' said Hector. 'Well, maybe compared to outside...'"

"991

Hector expected Garovel to ask another question, but the reaper said nothing further. They hurried to catch up with everyone.

Soon, the butlers began showing different people to different rooms. Hector's room shared a hallway with the Elroys. There were no windows, but to his eyes, the chamber would have been fit for a king. It was almost too nice, in fact. The giant rug at the foot of his bed had been woven with such a complex fractal design that he didn't even want to step on it.

As lovely as it was, however, he didn't linger in it for long. He was more interested in exploring the rest of Dunehall, and Garovel seemed to agree with him.

After only a short while of wandering, he and Garovel found themselves in a globular chamber full of paintings and artifacts on pedestals. There was one particular pedestal which caught Garovel's attention. It seemed to have been relegated to a position by the wall, enough so that Hector might not have noticed it if the reaper hadn't pointed it out. On its mantle lay a transparent case filled with four large slivers of crimson glass.

And before Hector could even ask a question, Qorvass arrived, flanked by Asad.

'Hello again,' said Garovel cheerily.

'Hello,' said Qorvass. 'I see you've found the gallery.'

'Indeed. It's lovely, as is everything here. But I am wondering--are these what I think they are?'

'I don't know,' said Qorvass. 'Do you think they are a bunch of shiny rocks? Because you would be right.'

Hector saw Garovel tilt his head.

'Actually, I was thinking they were the Quta Jaf'lah.'

'Mm,' hummed Qorvass. 'Well, they're not.'

'Oh?' Garovel paused. 'I see.'

Hector was lost, but he didn't want to interrupt.

'Supposing they were, though,' Garovel went on, 'why might you keep them here? This seems like an odd place for objects of such value. Hypothetically speaking.'

'Perhaps they are not as valuable as you are imagining,' said Qorvass. 'Or perhaps this place is more secure than you are imagining.'

Garovel laughed faintly. 'I suppose your suspicion is understandable, but I assure you that my interest is purely academic. And I am quite certain that these are indeed the Quta Jaf'lah.' He turned to Hector. 'The Shards of the Dry God.'

Hector was only slightly less lost now.

'I got quite a good look at them once,' said Garovel, facing Qorvass again. 'Ages ago.'

'Is that right?' said Qorvass."

"992

'It is,' said Garovel. 'However, I remember there being many more shards than this. I remember a mound of them. As big as a person, one might say.'

Qorvass' hollow eyes narrowed a moment. 'Where are you from, Garovel?'

'I was born a Lyzakk.'

'Ah. A most ancient brother.'

'You were born a Lyzakk as well?' Garovel asked.

'Of course,' said Qorvass. 'But you must have guessed that by now.'

'I try not to presume too much these days,' said Garovel. 'Rather, I find it more surprising that your loyalties haven't shifted in three thousand years.'

'Three thousand? I am not as old as that, but yes, it has been a while. My loyalty may not have wavered, but my curiosity has certainly led me to wander on more than a few occasions. But I am curious as to why you did not tell me of your heritage sooner? You must have realized it would have gone a long way with the Sandlords.'

'Well, I wasn't a Sandlord. And I don't exactly have a birth certificate to show you.'

'Even so,' said Qorvass, 'I would have liked to know that I was fighting alongside my kin this whole time.'

Garovel's skeletal face twisted somewhat. 'You are very kind. But I get the impression that your experience with the Lyzakks was more enjoyable than mine.'

‘Yes, I am getting that impression as well,’ said Qorvass. ‘Perhaps you would care to share your story with me.’

‘Perhaps I would. But for now, I am more interested in these jewels. I remember hearing about their creation, and I went to see them shortly thereafter. Why are there so few now? What happened to the rest of them?’

‘The War of the Three Sands happened to them,’ said Qorvass. ‘Strange that you are able to recognize the Shards but not know their history.’

‘Ah,’ said Garovel. ‘I was on the other side of the world when that was going on. So these were what that whole fuss was about, huh? I probably could have guessed as much.’

Hector just had to interject now. “There was a war fought over these things?”

‘Pretty much,’ said Garovel. ‘It was a war between the Sandlords themselves. That’s the trouble with a system built on divine right.’ He looked to Qorvass. ‘But you must know more about it than I do.’”
"993

‘That is largely correct,’ said Qorvass. ‘We have never had “kings,” per se, but we did believe that individuals with a certain power had been chosen to guide our people.’

Hector put two and two together and looked at Asad, who was busy yawning and hardly even seemed to be paying attention.

‘Such individuals are historically quite rare,’ Qorvass went on. ‘They usually appear only once in five generations. Oftentimes longer. There were several instances where we went without a clear leader for extended periods of time. But then the gods decided to play a cruel prank on us, and three children manifested the divine ability in the span of a single year.’

‘I suppose it would’ve been too much to ask for them to just rule together,’ said Garovel dryly.

‘The children themselves were not the real problem,’ said Qorvass.

‘They were children. They did as their Hahls told them. And each Hahl feared--perhaps quite correctly--that one of the other two Hahls would betray them for power. And precaution became escalation, and escalation became war.’

Hector still didn't understand something. “But, er... uh, how did the Shards factor in?”

‘The Shards are powerful catalysts for servant abilities,’ said Garovel. ‘And they work for anyone, divine power or no. They would even work for you, for instance. But there is a catch.’

Hector was not surprised.

‘They fall dormant when there remains no living person who wields the Sandlord’s divine ability with sufficient skill.’

“Uh... not sure I understand...”

‘It has to do with the way they were made,’ said Garovel. ‘The so-called “Dry God” was, in truth, just another person who happened to have the divine ability. Like our good friend Asad here.’

Asad matched Hector’s gaze evenly. His expression seemed somehow sad.

‘The Dry God’s real name was Rasalased, and he was one of the most powerful servants of his age,’ said Garovel. ‘The story goes that he was so powerful and so heavily relied upon by his people that he became terrified of what would happen to them if he were ever killed in battle. As was known to happen. So he created the Shards, hoping that they would help keep the Sandlords safe after he was gone. The only problem was that in order to create them, he had to fuse his soul with his ability so completely that he turned himself to crystal. Which killed both him and his reaper, ironically.’”

"994

‘You are more or less correct,’ said Qorvass, ‘but there was also more to it than just that.’

‘Oh?’ said Garovel.

‘It is an oft repeated tale that the Dry God was a fool who mistakenly ended his own life, but that is untrue. Rasalased knew exactly what he was doing. He had been searching for a way to die for some time, but as you said, he worried what would become of his people. He made the Shards for his successor, who by that point, was already powerful enough to use them.'

'I see. Did you know him personally?'

'Near the end of his life, yes. I took one of his grandchildren as my servant for a time.'

Hector wondered how that relationship had turned out, but it seemed an impolite thing to ask, and of course, if the servant wasn't here now, then Hector didn't imagine that it could have ended well.

Hector eyed the Shards again. He'd considered them beautiful before, but now that he knew the story behind them, that they were the remains of a person, he found them rather unsettling. Perhaps that deep red hue of theirs was no mere coincidence.

Garovel had another question, though. 'So how powerful does Asad have to become in order for the Shards to reactivate?'

Qorvass was silent a moment. 'Please do not be offended. I'm sure you can appreciate why I would not wish to share such information.'

'Ah. Well, I guess that's better than lying to me.'

--++--++--

Asad soon returned to his room on his own. He was glad to see Qorvass getting along with another reaper so quickly for a change, but there was nothing about their conversation that Asad didn't already know. He'd only accompanied Qorvass to the gallery in order to make sure their guests had no designs on stealing anything.

Qorvass always worried about the Shards. It didn't seem to matter that no one had been able to use them in more than seven hundred years or that hardly any non-Sandlords remembered their existence. Still, the reaper's concern was not without justification, of course. The Shards had indeed been stolen many times in the past, always from some kind of super vault or otherwise absurdly guarded chamber. That had apparently been a difficult lesson for Asad's predecessors to learn: if the wrong person came for them, it would not matter how many thick walls were in the way. It was better to hide them until they were forgotten.

Now that Garovel had demonstrated memory of the Shards, however, Qorvass would probably insist they be relocated again."

"995

Asad took a seat on the edge of his bed and rubbed his forehead, trying to think. If he was being completely honest with himself, he had no idea what he was doing, bringing the Rainlords to Dunehall. Sure, the Vanguard wouldn't find them here, but how was he supposed to explain this to Abbas and the others? It was only a matter of time before they found out.

And of course, there was still the matter of the Rainlords themselves. Hopefully, they would be able to reach a peaceful solution concerning Ibai, but if that didn't happen, then Dunehall might well become their new battleground. Asad just hoped he wasn't a fool for trusting them in this place.

He hadn't visited Dunehall in months, but it wasn't for lack of wanting to. Really, he would have liked to simply live here again, but his wife's family lived in Kuros, and for most women, that might have given them cause to leave, but not for her. Samira was very much a daddy's girl. Asad had tried bringing her here after their marriage, but it made her miserable, and her happiness was much more important than his nostalgia. And besides, Kuros wasn't so terrible. It just didn't really feel like home to him, even after twenty years--or at least, not like Moaban did.

It felt a shame to leave Dunehall without a Najir to watch over it, but he'd tried passing the reins over to Haqq or Imas, and to his surprise, both had refused him. Haqq cared only for the Golden Fort's research facilities and nothing for tradition; and Imas said she didn't wish to live so far away from her brothers--an argument Asad could hardly refute, given the sacrifice he was making for his wife.

Dunehall, therefore, had passed into the hands of the lesser lord Yasir Faheem, a blustery man who had been following Asad around for much of the evening and rambling about so many different things at such high speeds that Asad had only caught about half of them. Most of it had been assurances that the staff in Dunehall had been doing their jobs thoroughly and properly.

There came a knock at Asad's door, and he half expected it to be Faheem again. "Enter," he said in Mohssian.

Orjand phased through the door before Imas opened it and followed, closing it again behind her."

"996

"Relaxing already?" Imas said in Valgan. "Where is Qorvass?"

"With Hector and Garovel," said Asad.

'They seem to have become fast friends,' said Orjand. Her little scorpionfly wings buzzed silently as she hovered there in midair. 'Qorvass is usually the last of us to warm up to new people.'

She wasn't wrong, Asad knew. It had taken Qorvass years to finally accept his friendship with Zeff. "I think he senses an opportunity for an alliance," said Asad. "Or maybe he just wants me to stop calling him a surly bastard."

"An alliance?" said Imas. "With the young Atreyan lord? Why? Not to knock the boy, but his strength is not his own."

"So you noticed it, too," said Asad.

"Of course. And I am a little annoyed that Haqq did not give that shield to me. Or something like it, at least."

"Be sure to chew him out when we get back to Kuros."

"Oh, I will."

Orjand hovered closer. 'By the way, have you heard the news? We just heard about it downstairs.'

"Which news would that be?" Asad scratched his cheek absently.

'The war between Jesbol and Horsht. It's over.'

Asad blinked and sat up straighter. "What? Since when?"

'Since earlier today. Jesbol won. They're already talking about dissolving Horsht completely. It seems Jesbol will have territory on the mainland now.'

"So sudden," said Asad. "How long has that war been going? It's been so long, I've forgotten."

'Oh, it's been a collection of wars, really,' said Orjand. 'The one you're familiar with started about thirty years ago, but it's been on and off for more than a hundred now. I'm still not sure whether to believe it. If it were merely news of another "cease in hostilities," I wouldn't buy it for a moment, but this is the first time that one of them has been reported of conquering the other.'

"And there's more to it," said Imas. "The victory is being attributed to Field Marshal Jackson. They're saying he cut through Abolish like a knife and killed Gunther and Dunhouser both."

Asad's eyes widened. "By himself?"

She nodded. "And in order to pull something like that off, the smart money says he achieved emergence."

'If it's all true, then this means a major victory for the Vanguard.'"
"997 -- CXIII.

--Non-donation bonus in order to make up for pooppy February (Page 1 of 3)--

"Jackson might very well be second only to Sermung now," said Imas, unable to conceal her smile. "I know we are currently in conflict with the Vanguard, but I am so excited about this news."

"Why?" said Asad.

"Because! The Radiant Sentinel! The Star of the West! He's done it again! And this time, he probably saved millions of lives! Oh, a man like that--I wonder what he's really like."

Asad exchanged glances with Orjand. "I didn't realize she was such a fan of his."

'...I did.'

"Have you ever seen him?" said Imas. "He is so handsome. And I bet he's amazing in bed."

Asad was incredulous. "You're a lesbian!"

She shrugged. "Yeah, but I wouldn't say no. Not to him."

Asad just sighed and laughed at the same time.

"Everyone has their exceptions," said Imas. "I'm sure there's at least one man you'd make an exception for, right? There has to be."

Asad returned a flat stare.

"Just give it a little thought," she urged.

He shook his head.

"Whatever. Big tough Sandlord can't even admit when he wants to have sweaty, passionate sex with another man. It's not like I would tell anyone."

"...Is there a reason you're still in my room?"

Chapter One Hundred Thirteen: 'O, worldly warrior...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rezamaar wouldn't stop fidgeting.

'Would you relax?' said Dunstan. He wasn't exactly comfortable, either, crammed into the back of a plane with the rest of the Seventh Watcher's Unit. 'You're going to lose your grip on my arm.'

'Ugh. Fine.'

The concern wasn't that she would fall through the plane. The aircraft's hull had been soul-empowered to prevent that from happening. But unfortunately, that also made circumstances more dangerous for her. Save only for the planet itself, reapers were not affected by relative motion in physical reality. If she let go of Dunstan, she would become suddenly stationary relative to Eleg but not the aircraft. The result, therefore, would be her smashing into the side of the cabin at eight hundred kilometers per hour. And even a reaper would not be able to survive that.

This was why soul-empowering airplanes was generally never done, with the one exception being in the transportation of captives. Technically, they were being “reassigned,” but the Gargoyle clearly didn’t want any of their reapers escaping.”

"997 -- CXIII.

--Non-donation bonus in order to make up for poopy February (Page 1 of 3)--

“Jackson might very well be second only to Sermung now,” said Imas, unable to conceal her smile. “I know we are currently in conflict with the Vanguard, but I am so excited about this news.”

“Why?” said Asad.

“Because! The Radiant Sentinel! The Star of the West! He’s done it again! And this time, he probably saved millions of lives! Oh, a man like that--I wonder what he’s really like.”

Asad exchanged glances with Orjand. “I didn’t realize she was such a fan of his.”

‘...I did.’

“Have you ever seen him?” said Imas. “He is so handsome. And I bet he’s amazing in bed.”

Asad was incredulous. “You’re a lesbian!”

She shrugged. “Yeah, but I wouldn’t say no. Not to him.”

Asad just sighed and laughed at the same time.

“Everyone has their exceptions,” said Imas. “I’m sure there’s at least one man you’d make an exception for, right? There has to be.”

Asad returned a flat stare.

“Just give it a little thought,” she urged.

He shook his head.

“Whatever. Big tough Sandlord can’t even admit when he wants to have sweaty, passionate sex with another man. It’s not like I would tell anyone.”

“...Is there a reason you’re still in my room?”

Chapter One Hundred Thirteen: ‘O, worldly warrior...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rezamaar wouldn’t stop fidgeting.

‘Would you relax?’ said Dunstan. He wasn’t exactly comfortable, either, crammed into the back of a plane with the rest of the Seventh Watcher’s Unit. ‘You’re going to lose your grip on my arm.’

‘Ugh. Fine.’

The concern wasn’t that she would fall through the plane. The aircraft’s hull had been soul-empowered to prevent that from happening. But unfortunately, that also made circumstances more dangerous for her. Save only for the planet itself, reapers were not affected by relative motion in physical reality. If she let go of Dunstan, she would become suddenly stationary relative to Eleg but not the aircraft. The result, therefore, would be her smashing into the side of the cabin at eight hundred kilometers per hour. And even a reaper would not be able to survive that.

This was why soul-empowering airplanes was generally never done, with the one exception being in the transportation of captives. Technically, they were being “reassigned,” but the Gargoyle clearly didn’t want any of their reapers escaping.”

"998

--Non-donation bonus in order to make up for poopy February (Page 2 of 3)--

‘God-fucking-dammit,’ said Reza privately. ‘Why couldn’t she just let us go to Jesbol with that dickhole Miles?’

‘I don’t know.’

‘I don’t want to go to fucking Korgum!’

‘So you’ve told me. Several times now.’

‘Why are you so calm?! Do you even realize how much of a shitfest that place is right now?!’

He had an inkling. It would have been strange if he didn’t. ‘You did say that you didn’t want to fight the Rainlords anymore.’

‘Oh, yes, what a bright side. We’ve fixed a broken finger by chopping off the hand. Just wonderful.’

‘Why is Korgum so chaotic, anyway?’

‘You don’t already know?’

‘Not the details.’

‘Well, I’ve avoided that place like a syphilitic monkey cock, so I can’t claim to be an expert, but my understanding is that there are several locations in Korgum that are strategically important, and Dozer keeps trying to get at them like a horny dolphin at a nude beach.’

‘...I hate the way you explain things.’

‘Dolphins are fucked up animals, y’know. They’ll kill their own babies out of sheer boredom.’

‘...Is that true?’

‘It’s either boredom, or because the females become ready to mate again when they don’t have babies anymore. The males kill the kids so that they can have more sex.’

‘...Wow.’

‘And yet everyone loves them. Then you’ve got animals like vampire bats. Everyone thinks they’re creepy and gross because they drink blood, but they’re actually super fucking nice.’

‘I feel we’ve drifted away from my question about Korgum.’

‘It’s not my fault that you ask boring questions. Anyway, about vampire bats--they’re fucking harmless, and they’ll even adopt little bat babies that have been orphaned. That’s cool as shit! But because they’re not all cute and happy-looking, everyone thinks--’

‘Alright, I get it. Were you a zoologist when you were alive?’

‘Yes, Dunstan. Because I know two things about animals, that means I was a zoologist. Way to insult an entire profession, you fucking ignoramus.’

‘You’re right. I don’t know what I was thinking. I may never recover from the shame I’ve brought upon myself.’

‘Don’t give me your dry sarcasm. I’m still upset here.’

‘You say that like it’s somehow abnormal.’

Reza’s glowing red eyes glared at him a moment. ‘I wonder if I could get Sanko to give you latrine duty.’”

"999

--Non-donation bonus in order to make up for poopy February (Page 3 of 3)--

Dunstan made no response, and for a while, there was actual silence, much to his surprise. None of the other watchmen seemed especially talkative, perhaps busy conversing with their own unhappy reapers. Normally, a bit of peace and quiet was incredibly welcome, but here and now, it only felt uncomfortable. It made him think that Reza was genuinely worried and not just bitching and moaning like usual. At length, he grasped for a new subject of his own.

‘Why do you think she decided to bring us to Korgum with her?’

‘Probably because our unit did most of Lawrence and Miles’ dirty work, trying to capture the Elroys. She doesn’t want us carrying out any more secret orders from them, I’d wager.’

Dunstan could believe that. He and Reza had heard about how Sanko had basically given Overra a time out like some kind of kindergartener. He’d also been one of the officers that Sanko called out to talk to, so he ended up right there behind her when the Rainlords decided not to cooperate. He didn’t think he’d be forgetting that battle anytime soon. And frankly, after witnessing that level of combat, he felt more or less prepared for whatever Korgum would throw at him.

He tried to keep the conversation going. ‘...What do you think Sanko intends to do with the Elroy boy?’

Reza required a moment to acknowledge the question. ‘Oh. Who knows? I'm sure she just didn't want to leave Cisco and Dennex with Miles.'

'Mm. Maybe she means to protect them herself.'

'Or interrogate them. Or both. I'm more concerned about what she intends to do about the Rainlords she didn't capture. As things stand, there aren't even any Vanguardians left in Sair trying to hunt them down.'

'She'll probably just dispatch a new division, won't she?'

'Probably, but until she does, the Rainlords will be able to do whatever they like. PREPARE whatever they like. And they have a history of being complete motherfuckers when it comes to that sort of thing.'

'Are you speaking from experience?'

'As it happens, I am. I was killed by one of their fucking booby traps.'

That made Dunstan pause. 'Now I'm curious.'

'Oh, you want gory details? Because I have gory details. Literally details of the gore.'

"1000

'Well, I wasn't really--'

'Imagine stepping into a puddle,' said Reza, 'only to realize it was about a meter deeper than you expected. Imagine finding a bed of frozen spikes at the bottom, which then skewer your foot and dig up into your shin. Imagine writhing in agony, unable to move, as you watch a levee in front of you suddenly break and a tidal wave come crashing toward you. Then imagine being crushed nearly to death by the impact, only to slowly drown.'

'...I was more interested in knowing why you were there.'

'How about some fucking pity?!'

'I'm sorry your death was so horrible, Reza. I'm sure you remember how wonderful mine was.'

‘All things considered, I’d say getting ripped apart by a pack of Dantean wolves is a pretty radical way to go.’

‘I think I would’ve rather drowned. Or been set on fire, maybe.’

‘Oh, I doubt that. Burning alive is one of the most excruciating. I’d definitely take the wolves.’

‘Hmph.’

‘Alright, then, let’s up the ante. Which would you choose? Lasers slowly burn your eyes out of your head and pierce your brain, melting it? Or you have to keep eating your favorite food until your stomach ruptures and kills you?’

‘Why my favorite food?’

‘Because it would gradually turn into your most hated food as you ate it until you puked. But you’d have to keep eating it, anyway, and every time you vomited would just mean that you have to eat even more of this thing that you once loved but is now your worst nightmare.’

‘...You have a twisted imagination, you know that?’

‘Fine, I’ll give you a third option.’ She paused. ‘Uh... shit yourself in front of the person you love most until you die from embarrassment.’

‘Wow.’

‘And if you’re somehow not embarrassed, then you just keep shitting forever.’

‘Okay, I think we need some quiet time.’

She did not shut up, however. She pestered him with inane questions for the next hour and a half, and Dunstan regretted ever worrying about her.

Relief finally came when the aircraft hit a patch of turbulence. It lasted a while, then died down. Then a thunderous pop made the plane jerk violently upward and to the side, leaving half the watchmen in the room to dangle upside down from their crisscrossing seatbelts."

"1001

‘Can you tell what’s happening?’ Dunstan asked.

‘Call it a hunch, but I think someone is attacking us,’ said Reza.

‘Who?’

‘I don’t sense anyone flying near us.’ After a beat, however, she said, ‘Oh shit. Brace yourself.’

He did, but he didn’t get the chance to ask why. Another, much louder pop arrived, this time accompanied by the very unwelcome sound of metal breaking. A lot of metal. The cabin lurched again and began spinning much too fast to have been in anything other than freefall.

Then the airplane unfolded. Dunstan watched the walls distort and peel themselves apart. Cabin pressure dropped in an instant, and the escaping wind tunnel pulled the air right out of Dunstan’s lungs. For a moment, everyone dangled toward the hole in the cabin, but that didn’t last long, because the hole grew so quickly that, soon, it ceased to even be so. Rather, it was just the open sky, the sun dawning there over the horizon, beautiful and entirely unfitting as the punishing winds started tearing passengers directly out of their seatbelts, leaving them to be swallowed by storm clouds below.

The plane was not gone, however. The metal had twisted and reformed beneath them. And it was moving now. Up and down like wings on either side. Dunstan, struggling even to keep his eyes opened, saw a metal neck rear up in front of them, rising into the shape of a bird’s head.

It was Sanko, he realized. She had become the plane, integrating herself into it, making her body a bird of literal metal. And then he realized why.

A half dozen missiles were right there on the giant bird’s tail, twirling and drawing closer with each passing second, even as Sanko swooped down to pick up speed. They were heat-seekers, without a doubt--and probably soul-strengthened as well, since it seemed like Reza had been able to sense them at the last moment.

The metal bird shuddered and then rolled forward in midair. Its left wing distorted and then slapped all of the missiles away like flies. They staggered off course, and one detonated, which caused all of the others to explode in a chain that made the air tremble.

The Gargoyle's body swooped down into a dive again, and Dunstan had to soul-strengthen his own body before the wind and g-forces broke any more of his bones."

"1002

He could see what Sanko was gunning for below. The front chunk of the plane, which was carrying the pilots and most of the captive Rainlords. It vanished into the storm clouds, and Sanko pushed in after it. Wet and murky darkness washed over everything.

He tried to stay calm. He could only see gray. He could only hear howling winds. And at any moment, it felt like he might puke or pass out or both. Staying calm wasn't really an option.

But Reza's words were there in his head. 'I told you Korgum would suck!'

It took all his focus just to respond. 'Can you sense anything yet?!'

'Well, there are six fighter jets out there! At least! Happy you asked?!'

They finally made it through the clouds, and Dunstan could see that Sanko had nearly caught up to the missing half of the plane. She closed the gap by stretching her metal neck down and biting onto the hull. And that was all it took for the rest of the plane to become hers. The metal bulged and grew, adding to the Gargoyle's avian bulk.

Dunstan saw the jets Reza had mentioned. They broke through the stormy ceiling above, hardly more than specks to Dunstan's eyes at this distance, but the cloudy trails they left behind made their positions clear enough.

More missiles were already en route, but one of the jets had boldly decided to draw in close to Sanko in order to spray her with a hail of gunfire. It only lasted half a heartbeat as the jet sped by, but that was still enough time for the Gargoyle's wing to shoot out and snatch the jet out of the air. Her body wrenched to the side as she held on and devoured it whole, bulking up once again.

The next batch of missiles were there now, and Sanko bundled up around her passengers, wrapping them in a suddenly windless darkness. Dunstan heard a loud swiping sound, followed by the clang of metal on metal, and then a string of explosions. One of them, however, caught the Gargoyle's side. Fire and shrapnel shredded Dunstan's cabin.

And then he was falling through open sky without a parachute, his two seatbelts still attached to him but not the wall that used to be at his back.

His fellow watchmen were all around him, most of them in multiple pieces."

"1003

The fall took a while--a few minutes, in fact, which was long enough for it to become surprisingly boring. Dunstan had never been skydiving before, but it didn't strike him as particularly thrilling. Without being able to alter his trajectory very much at all, he was stuck watching as the vast forest slowly crept closer.

Reza's excitement level seemed to have dropped significantly as well. 'Hey, do you think you'll survive this? A hundred wingwangs says you don't.'

'I don't know what a wingwang is.'

'It's any unit of money. I'd pick a specific one, but we're in Korgum now, and I don't really keep up with that shit anyway. You know how many different currencies have come and gone during my lifetime?'

'Three?'

'A little more than that, smart guy.'

'So four, then?'

Reza snickered. 'Y'know, I kinda like it when you play dumb. It makes you seem more innocent and charming. In fact, from now on, just do that forever.'

Dunstan finally reached the forest and crashed through the canopy at terminal velocity. The net of leaves and branches tried to break his fall and only narrowly succeeded. Wood exploded into splinters and fell with him, and his right leg snapped and then tore clean off. The final impact into the underbrush still shattered almost every bone that he could feel, and as he regained his senses, he was fairly certain that at least a few of his organs had been liquefied, though he was mainly just surprised that his brain had not been one of them.

The regeneration was already in effect as he struggled to leverage himself onto one arm. The blood that came shooting out of his mouth, nose, and eyes informed him that it would be a little while longer before he would be able to stand again.

‘Hey, uh, Dunstan,’ said Reza, more nervously again, ‘I know you’re still having a rough time right now, but we’re not alone down here.’

He couldn’t quite formulate a response yet.

‘There are a bunch of servants around us,’ she said, ‘and most of them have fucked up souls. And I don’t wanna worry you, but I think they’re gonna be tryin’ to eat our faces here in a little bit.’

He rolled over and found the brunt of a thick tree for support. ‘Hide underground for now,’ Dunstan told her.

‘Yeah, about that, uh, I’m sensing some weird shit underground, too, so...’

‘Weird, how?’

‘I’m not really sure. But if you could stand up right now, that’d be awesome.’”

"1004

When his eyesight returned to him, it didn’t help very much. The forest around him was so dense that hardly any of the early morning sunlight made it through the treetops. But he could hear now, too, so he held his breath and listened.

Rustling leaves. All around him. And a low, faint rumble beneath his feet. The ground was trembling. It could have been the Gargoyle’s doing, but he was fairly sure that she was still in the sky.

‘Straight ahead of you,’ came Reza’s warning, and Dunstan braced himself just in time to see a howling blur leap out from behind the forward treeline.

Unable to stand, and with only half of his body responding to him, Dunstan knew he would have to make some hearty sacrifices to his krypton transfiguration if he were to have any hope of winning. And indeed, when the salivating human monster landed on him and started biting into his face and digging into his chest, Dunstan converted huge chunks of his flesh into superheated gas. Every point of physical contact between the two of them burned. Even Dunstan's own face melted into a bloody, smoldering mess.

With his one good hand, he found the mindless person's head, which immediately bit his fingers off with metal teeth.

Dunstan sacrificed the whole hand and shoved through their skull. Brain matter blew out the back of their head, and the flailing body on top of him went suddenly limp. He shoved the corpse off and tried to stand again, finding a bit more success now that most of his legs had regenerated. He'd given up much of his torso, arms, and head, but the trade was worth it so long as he was still conscious.

'Can you still see me?' Reza asked.

'Yeah.' To his eyes, she was still perfectly visible in the low light, despite being a pitch black wraith.

'Follow me, then.'

She flew off, staying low and with a slack enough pace for Dunstan's shambling footsteps to keep up.

No more than twenty steps later, burning bright light came piercing through the darkness, but Dunstan was far from relieved when he saw that the source was another broken servant who'd set himself ablaze. The forest was already catching, Dunstan saw--orange flames licking bark and climbing into the canopy or leaping across the undergrowth."

"1005

Dunstan bounded through the fire and barreled into the burning servant. He expected to have to wrestle with the creature, but instead, the impact made its melting head pop off its shoulders and bounce into a line of bushes, igniting them.

Still largely without the use of his arms, Dunstan rolled over and flipped himself back onto his feet so that he could keep running. He and Reza pushed through the growing flames without regard. His coat or his pants would occasionally catch, but it was easy to suffocate such small fires with his krypton.

Oddly enough, the wildfire actually made circumstances easier for him, clearing his path of more broken servants who, unlike him, were not fireproof. Not to mention, it bought him the time he needed in order to fully regenerate.

Reza came to a sudden stop, and Dunstan phased through her and nearly fell over. He looked around for more threats but didn't see any. 'What's wrong?' he asked.

Dennex flew through the wall of fire. Chunks of him were missing.

'You got free,' observed Reza.

'Hello there,' he said, quite calmly. 'Would you mind terribly if I tagged along?'

'Don't wanna try flyin' through this mess on your own, eh?'

'No, I do not. I am guessing that those are Abolish soldiers that I sense above us.'

'And below us? Do you know what that is?'

'No, I don't. I thought it was a soul net at first, but it's not, is it?'

'No. It's moving, whatever it is. Like it's alive.'

Dunstan wanted to speak aloud, but the crack and roar of burning wood was too loud, and there was almost as much smoke as there was breathable oxygen, anyway. 'We're wasting time,' he told Reza.

'Right,' she said publicly. 'Well, come on then.'

They proceeded on together, keeping within the relative safety of the fire, letting it make way for them. Dunstan kept hearing explosions go off in the sky above them. As trees fell over and opened up his line of sight, he began seeing people and low-flying aircraft there. It gave him little more than a glimpse of what was happening, but if Dennex didn't want to brave that airspace, then it must have been pretty bad up there, he figured.

And then the ground heaved up in front of him, very nearly knocking him off his feet."

"1006

Dunstan caught himself on one knee, and when he looked up, he saw multiple pillars shooting out of the ground. Each was as broad as a school bus, and when they stopped moving, Dunstan realized that they had heads.

Gigantic worms, they appeared to be. Their hulking bodies bristled with visible electricity, and their beady eyes looked straight at him and Reza.

Noticeably, however, they were not attacking. They just remained there, motionless and staring.

Then a voice rang out. "Aha! I knew you would survive! Good job, Dunstan!"

Dunstan squinted as he noticed a figure standing atop the centermost worm. He couldn't place the voice, but it sounded familiar. He found a full breath of air and called out, "Who are you?!"

"Why, it's me! It's your grandpa!" The figure waved a hand, and the worm beneath him knelt down low enough for Dunstan to get a good look.

And Dunstan could hardly believe his eyes. He hadn't seen that wrinkled face since he was a child, but it hadn't changed a bit. As little sense as it made to him, there was no doubt about it. This was certainly Damian Rofal before him. His grandfather.

Damian laughed. "Feromas thought my plan would get you killed for sure, but ha! Shows what he knows!"

Dunstan finally found the words. "Grandpa, why are you here?!"

"For you, obviously! I've come to get you, my boy! Everyone else was easy to find, but it took months to track you down. You shouldn't run away from home, you know. Not that I'm complaining. How often do you get to blow up a field marshal's plane, eh?"

"That was YOUR doing?!"

“Well, yes and no. Abolish might’ve been under the impression that certain precious artifacts were onboard. But anyway! The important thing is that we’re together now! Oh, and is this your reaper? Ah, no, but there are two with you. Which one do you belong to? Regardless, it is lovely to meet them both! I hope they’re nice!”

Dunstan had so many questions that he just reached for the first one he could hold onto. “What the hell are these giant worms?!”

“Oh, don’t worry about them! They’re my buddies! Don’t pet them, though. I know they look nice and squishy, but they’ll zap you.”

‘Mind hurrying this along?’ said Feromas. ‘We’re still in danger, you know.’

“Ah, right. Let’s get out of here, shall we? I’d rather not have to fight that Gargoyle you were with!”

"1007 -- CXIV.

Chapter One Hundred Fourteen: ‘Thy discerning nature...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rather than sleeping, Hector spent most of the night exploring Dunehall. And he wasn’t the only one. He saw other people wandering around wherever he went. It must have been a side effect of the long day trip, he figured. Everyone had slept on the way here, and now they were all restless.

He finally managed to give Madame Carthrace a call and inform her that he would be staying in Sair a while longer. She told him that the reconstruction was proceeding steadily, though at a slower pace than when he’d been there to assist. Apparently, the workmen kept asking about him. He hoped he’d be able to return soon. This elaborate sand fortress was a feast for his eyes, but it really just made him want to work on Warrenhold again. In particular, there was a windowless gallery that was giving Hector ideas. It overlooked Dunehall’s domed courtyard, offering a lovely view of sandstone monolith surrounded by humble greenery and a small stream. The whole thing reminded Hector of Warrenhold’s central plaza, that open space between those eight hulking towers. He wondered if there was any kind of plant that could grow in Warrenhold. Probably not, he supposed.

When he wasn't thinking about decorations and structural design, however, he was wondering about what the Rainlords were doing. The heads had all gone into another meeting not long after their arrival, no doubt still trying to reach a consensus about what their next course of action should be. Mostly, Hector wondered if they had reached a consensus concerning Ibai Blackburn yet, especially because he kept seeing Ibai pop up all over the place.

Though, that might've also been because Hector was slightly following Ibai around. Just a little.

The man seemed to be giving his guardians a hell of a time keeping up with him. Hector overheard Horatio chastising him a few times.

Upon the fifth sighting, Ibai spotted Hector and didn't hesitate to teleport over.

"Hello there!" said Ibai. "Can't sleep, huh? Me neither. Well, I don't sleep much in general, but still, it's pretty exciting, isn't it? This place is so neat! I hope we can stay here a while."

Frankly, Hector was surprised that Ibai had been allowed to roam freely, but he guessed there wasn't a whole lot they could do to stop him from going wherever he liked."

"1007 -- CXIV.

Chapter One Hundred Fourteen: 'Thy discerning nature...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rather than sleeping, Hector spent most of the night exploring Dunehall. And he wasn't the only one. He saw other people wandering around wherever he went. It must have been a side effect of the long day trip, he figured. Everyone had slept on the way here, and now they were all restless.

He finally managed to give Madame Carthrace a call and inform her that he would be staying in Sair a while longer. She told him that the reconstruction was proceeding steadily, though at a slower pace than when he'd been there to assist. Apparently, the workmen kept asking about him. He hoped he'd be able to return soon. This elaborate sand fortress was a feast for his eyes, but it really just made him want to work on Warrenhold again. In particular, there was a windowless gallery that was giving Hector ideas. It overlooked Dunehall's domed courtyard, offering a lovely view of sandstone monolith surrounded by humble greenery and a small stream. The whole thing reminded Hector of Warrenhold's central plaza, that open space between those eight hulking towers. He wondered if there was any kind of plant that could grow in Warrenhold. Probably not, he supposed.

When he wasn't thinking about decorations and structural design, however, he was wondering about what the Rainlords were doing. The heads had all gone into another meeting not long after their arrival, no doubt still trying to reach a consensus about what their next course of action should be. Mostly, Hector wondered if they had reached a consensus concerning Ibai Blackburn yet, especially because he kept seeing Ibai pop up all over the place.

Though, that might've also been because Hector was slightly following Ibai around. Just a little.

The man seemed to be giving his guardians a hell of a time keeping up with him. Hector overheard Horatio chastising him a few times.

Upon the fifth sighting, Ibai spotted Hector and didn't hesitate to teleport over.

"Hello there!" said Ibai. "Can't sleep, huh? Me neither. Well, I don't sleep much in general, but still, it's pretty exciting, isn't it? This place is so neat! I hope we can stay here a while."

Frankly, Hector was surprised that Ibai had been allowed to roam freely, but he guessed there wasn't a whole lot they could do to stop him from going wherever he liked."

"1008

'We're glad to see that you are enjoying yourself,' said Garovel.

Horatio and the other bodyguards caught up again, but they must have been growing accustomed to it by now, because none of them bothered to chastise Ibai. Horatio was looking even more haggard than the last time Hector had seen him.

“By the way, Garovel,” said Ibai, “the last time we spoke, I believe you promised me a story time.”

‘Ah, I suppose I did.’ The reaper began floating away, and Ibai walked with him.

Hector made sure to keep pace as well so that he would always be between them. He remembered what Garovel said about not antagonizing Ibai, but that didn’t mean he was going to leave Garovel wide open to a sudden attack.

‘What kind of story would you like?’ said Garovel.

“Something exciting!” said Ibai.

‘Hmm. Alright. Are you familiar with the story of the Dáinnbolg?’

“Of course,” said Ibai, “but I’d be more interested to hear a story of your own.”

‘It IS a story of my own,’ said Garovel.

That made the aberration blink. “What do you mean?”

Garovel spared a glance at Hector. ‘I mean I used to live there. Before all the devastation, that is.’

Hector had more than a few questions of his own now, but he decided to let their conversation play out.

Horatio Blackburn, however, chose to chime in. “You used to ‘live’ there? As in, before you were a reaper?” The man’s own reaper looked interested as well.

‘That’s right,’ said Garovel. ‘Chergoa and I grew up there.’

“Wow,” said Ibai. “What was it like? Was it fun?”

‘I suppose it depends on what you consider fun.’

“Were there birthday parties?”

‘No, I’m afraid there weren’t.’

“Pity. But there had to have been some parties, right? Seasonal celebrations and the like?”

‘Sure.’

“Then I think it could’ve been fun,” said Ibai. “But anyway, what was the story you wanted to tell me?”

‘Well, you see, when my sister and I were very young, we witnessed the slaughter of an entire village of people. It was quite bloody, and in the span of a single day, the village became a ghost town.’

Hector saw Horatio and the other guards shift uncomfortably, but it was Ibai who responded first.

“That’s horrible. I thought you said this story would be exciting.””
"1009

‘You don’t find it exciting?’ said Garovel.

Ibai’s smile waned as he looked at the reaper. “No, I’m afraid I don’t. And if you don’t mind, I’d rather not hear the rest.”

‘Really? But there’s a lot more to tell.’

“I’m sorry for confusing you, then. I prefer happier tales.” The aberration required a moment to find his cheer again. “Do you have anything with unicorns?”

“fraid not.’

“I see. Well, never mind, then. I’m suddenly in the mood for something sweet. Does anyone else want a snack?” He didn’t wait for anyone to answer. “I’ll be in the kitchen.” And he teleported away again.

Horatio gave a sigh, and Hector watched the man’s silent exchange with his reaper, no doubt asking where Ibai went. The reaper pointed, and the bodyguards all rushed off.

Hector decided to follow along. ‘What was that about?’ he asked Garovel as he ran. ‘Trying to test his bloodlust or something?’

‘Pretty much,’ the reaper said privately. ‘I just wanted to see how he would react, really. Didn’t expect him to run away, though. Not sure what to think now.’

'I can't imagine he would've confessed to enjoying that story.'

'Sure, but I thought he'd at least be curious. I mean, aren't you?'

Hector had to concede that point, at least. He hadn't heard the term Dáinnbolg before, but he had a fair idea what it referred to. If it was where Garovel came from, then it was probably on the other side of the world, where the Lyzakks originated; and if it had been 'devastated,' as Garovel said, then it was likely related to Exoltha, the dead continent. Or perhaps the Dáinnbolg was just another name for it.

Exoltha was a land torn asunder by ancient wars, but that was where common knowledge ended. Today, that land was considered beyond uninhabitable. From what Hector understood, few people ever dared to go there anymore, because none had done so and returned to tell the tale.

Or so the story went. Hector had experienced a passing fascination with the place a couple years ago, but now that he knew about reapers, he wasn't quite sure what to believe. He remembered scouring the internet for information on Exoltha and finding nothing scientific, save only satellite images of endlessly dark storm clouds." "1010 -- CXV.

Hector wondered what Garovel might know of Exoltha, but now wasn't really the time to ask, he supposed. He hoped he would remember to bring it up again later.

As they neared the kitchen, a familiar smell caught Hector's attention. Too familiar.

Blood. A lot of it.

He quickened his pace and reached the kitchen's wide entryway just as Ibai's four bodyguards did. And he was not prepared for what he saw.

Ibai was standing there with one foot stuck through the chest of someone on the ground. A corpse. It had been eviscerated.

When Ibai saw them, his eyes widened. "Aha! Um. This isn't what it looks like?"

Chapter One Hundred Fifteen: 'A devil's paradox...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For a long moment, no one seemed to know what to do. They all just stared at Ibai, too shocked to say anything.

And then Hector watched Horatio take a slow step forward.

"...Tell us what happened here," the man said very calmly. The second Blackburn bodyguard was right behind him.

Hector became keenly aware of the sudden division in the room. Those other two bodyguards belonged to the Delagunas. He recognized both their faces, but he only knew one of their names. Lorenzo. Lord Salvador's son. And right about now, they were both looking rather twitchy.

"Well, uh, I just--um..." Ibai was still trying to get his foot unstuck. "I'm not sure, actually. When I teleported, he was already--but I didn't--this wasn't supposed to--aha... ah... I'm so confused!"

"It's okay," said Horatio. "Calm yourself and think. And first, why don't you teleport yourself out of there?"

"I tried," said Ibai. "The body just teleports with me." He motioned behind. "We were originally over there."

And Hector noticed the blood stains on the other side of the kitchen. When he looked to the Delagunas again, he saw that their reapers were missing. Gone to tell someone, no doubt.

The situation would soon get extremely complicated, Hector felt. He decided to keep his eyes on the Blackburns.

Horatio was trying to help Ibai free himself. "You know I have to ask," Horatio said. "Did you kill this man?"

"No, I--" Ibai scratched his head. "No. He was already here. I just. I teleported and he was--I didn't. I wouldn't--" His foot came free, covered in a bloody brown shadow."

"1010 -- CXV.

Hector wondered what Garovel might know of Exoltha, but now wasn't really the time to ask, he supposed. He hoped he would remember to bring it up again later.

As they neared the kitchen, a familiar smell caught Hector's attention. Too familiar.

Blood. A lot of it.

He quickened his pace and reached the kitchen's wide entryway just as Ibai's four bodyguards did. And he was not prepared for what he saw.

Ibai was standing there with one foot stuck through the chest of someone on the ground. A corpse. It had been eviscerated.

When Ibai saw them, his eyes widened. "Aha! Um. This isn't what it looks like?"

Chapter One Hundred Fifteen: 'A devil's paradox...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For a long moment, no one seemed to know what to do. They all just stared at Ibai, too shocked to say anything.

And then Hector watched Horatio take a slow step forward.

"...Tell us what happened here," the man said very calmly. The second Blackburn bodyguard was right behind him.

Hector became keenly aware of the sudden division in the room. Those other two bodyguards belonged to the Delagunas. He recognized both their faces, but he only knew one of their names. Lorenzo. Lord Salvador's son. And right about now, they were both looking rather twitchy.

"Well, uh, I just--um..." Ibai was still trying to get his foot unstuck. "I'm not sure, actually. When I teleported, he was already--but I didn't--this wasn't supposed to--aha... ah... I'm so confused!"

"It's okay," said Horatio. "Calm yourself and think. And first, why don't you teleport yourself out of there?"

"I tried," said Ibai. "The body just teleports with me." He motioned behind. "We were originally over there."

And Hector noticed the blood stains on the other side of the kitchen. When he looked to the Delagunas again, he saw that their reapers were missing. Gone to tell someone, no doubt.

The situation would soon get extremely complicated, Hector felt. He decided to keep his eyes on the Blackburns.

Horatio was trying to help Ibai free himself. "You know I have to ask," Horatio said. "Did you kill this man?"

"No, I--" Ibai scratched his head. "No. He was already here. I just. I teleported and he was--I didn't. I wouldn't--" His foot came free, covered in a bloody brown shadow."

"1011

Hector just watched as Horatio kept questioning Ibai and receiving no further answers. The aberration was fumbling over his words now, repeating himself when not merely looking confused. Hector kept expecting Ibai to flee, but the man never did, and Hector wondered what was stopping him.

More Rainlords arrived--all Sebolts and Delagunas. And Hector was surprised yet again when a fight did not immediately break out. Instead, they simply escorted the Blackburns out of the room, leaving a group behind to secure the scene.

Hector noticed the group of Sebolts eyeing him and Garovel, and sure enough, it wasn't long before they ventured over. Hector braced himself for interrogation.

"Lord Goffe," said the foremost gentleman, "are you well? Might we ask you to assist us in our investigation?"

Hector's expression only flickered, but it required all of his composure in order to prevent his own mouth from just hanging open. And as usual, he let Garovel do the talking.

'It would be our honor,' the reaper said. 'But I'm surprised that you would ask outsiders like us for help.'

"In this instance, we believe an outsider's perspective might prove advantageous," said the same gentleman. By the look of him, he had to be at least twice Hector's age. "You were also among the first on scene. But you are correct. If you were total outsiders, we would not ask this of you. I think, however, we can all agree that you are not total outsiders." He offered Hector a handshake.

Hesitant, Hector took it.

"My name is Carlos Sebolt," the man said. "This is my reaper, Olijas."

'Call me Ollie.'

"H-hello," said Hector.

Carlos proceeded to introduce the rest of their group. Jesenia, Nico, and Perla Sebolt, along with Manuel and Lorenzo Delaguna. Those last two had been Ibai's bodyguards and therefore also witnesses, just like Hector. And of course, everyone had reapers of their own, but there was no way that Hector was going to keep all those weird names straight.

Carlos eventually got around to asking about what Hector and Garovel each saw, but then Asad and Qorvass arrived, and the conversation shifted over to them as explanations were demanded.

Garovel, however, did not seem interested in listening to what he already knew. Hector saw him drifting over the crime scene to inspect the body and the accompanying trail of blood.

Hector followed him."

"1012

The victim's body was so torn up that Hector couldn't even guess the gender. He was a bit surprised at how much sights like this still affected him. Part of him wished that he could just get used to it all, that he could be unflappable in the face of this sort of thing, but there was just something about seeing the aftermath of brutality. Seeing it actually unfold was horrible, too, but he could deal with that. It was only when he saw the outcome, the terrible end, that it really started getting to him, making his chest hurt and his stomach turn.

This poor person. Whoever they were, their death certainly did not look painless.

At length, Garovel stirred Hector out of his morbidity with a private question. 'So what're you thinking?'

Hector rubbed his chin with one hand. 'Probably the same thing as everyone else. Ibai lost control and killed someone.'

'That's it? Nothing else?'

Hector's mouth flattened.

'C'mon, Hector, we're investigators now. Doesn't any of this strike you as strange?'

'Well, there's a dead person here.'

'You know that's not what I'm talking about.'

'...I take it you don't think Ibai did this?'

'I don't know. I'm asking your opinion. Your REAL opinion. The one you've formed using your actual brain. I know you're a rational person, Hector.' A beat passed. 'Well, most of the time.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow at him.

'Agh, I'm asking for your help. Don't be an asshole about it. A fucking terrible thing happened here, and we need to figure out exactly what it was. Because if Ibai isn't responsible for it, then that means someone else is, possibly with the intention to kill again.'

Hector knew the reaper had a good point. He'd known all along, really. He'd just wanted to be stubborn this time. Unfortunately, that didn't seem to be an option. 'Alright,' said Hector. 'Well... I mean... this IS kinda weird. When I imagined Ibai losing it, I didn't think he'd be so... stupid about it.'

'Exactly. Only an idiot would kill someone this way. And with his powers? He could've easily hid the body before anyone discovered it.'

'Maybe, but he couldn't have hid the mess,' said Hector. 'All this blood--this doesn't strike me as something that was planned ahead of time.'

'Maybe that's what the killer wants us to think,' said Garovel."
"1013

Hector tilted his head. 'You think someone is trying to frame him?'

'Well, either he did it, or someone went to a lot of trouble to make it look that way. I don't imagine that Ibai "just happened" to stumble onto this dead body during the very brief window when none of his bodyguards had eyes on him. That would be one hell of a coincidence.'

'Hmm. But if someone framed him, then how could they have known where he would teleport to? Like you said, that window of opportunity was pretty damn small, and Ibai isn't exactly predictable.'

'Yeah, that's a good point. If someone did frame him, they did it quite well.'

A question occurred to Hector, and he realized that he probably should have asked it earlier. 'Where is the victim's soul?'

'I don't know,' said Garovel. 'It wasn't here when we arrived, but I did sense that it was in here with Ibai just beforehand.'

'Wait a minute, what?' Hector looked over the scene another time. 'So you know for a fact that the victim was alive and alone with Ibai just before we got here?'

'Not necessarily alive. Just that there was a second soul with him and that now it's gone.'

Hector gave the reaper a look.

'I know,' said Garovel. 'It's rather strong evidence that Ibai consumed the soul. I'm not disregarding that as a possibility.'

'It kinda seems like you are.'

'I'm just saying that we should be thorough about this. Whichever way this ends up going, we need to be certain. Or at least, as certain as possible.'

'Except, if Ibai and the victim were the only ones in the room at the time of the murder, then I don't really see how anyone else could've done it.'

'Hector. This building is full of servants. People with ridiculous powers. People who would also know to account for the reaper's ability to sense souls.'

'You're talking about the Rainlords. You really think one of them would kill one of their own just to frame Ibai?'

'We don't actually know that the victim was a Rainlord, yet. It could've been one of Asad's people. Maybe a staff member here. And the Blackburns seem unlikely to turn on Ibai now, after how far they went to protect him, but almost any of the Sebolts or Delagunas might've wanted negotiations between the families to break down.'

"1014

He supposed Garovel had a point, but Hector really didn't want to believe that could be true. The idea that some of the Rainlords might sabotage their own peace did not sit well with him. In the brief time he'd spent with these people, he'd seen nothing but reasons to respect them. Even their aberration--somehow, they'd made a monster seem honorable. The kind of people who could pull off a feat like that deserved the benefit of the doubt, didn't they?

Maybe they didn't. That was the question at hand, after all. When it came down to it, maybe Ibai really was nothing more than a monster.

Hector touched his forehead as he realized that he was just going around in circles and confusing himself.

'There's another option we haven't thought of,' said Garovel, still privately. 'Perhaps this whole thing is a fake out.'

'What do you mean?'

'The victim's wounds are obviously excessive. Unless, that is, they are meant to prevent us from identifying the body. In which case, this "victim" could actually be a servant, and the reason their soul isn't here is because their reaper took it and regenerated them somewhere else.'

'Oh... you mean like we had Colt do.'

‘Basically, yeah.’

Asad and Qorvass seemed to have finished their conversation with Carlos and ventured over to inspect the corpse.

Garovel posed the most pressing question. ‘Can either of you tell us who this is?’

The Lord Najir merely frowned, but Qorvass hovered closer to the victim’s feet.

The old skeletal Sandlord let out a heavy sigh. ‘This is Fuad,’ he said.

Hector saw Asad stiffen.

“How do you know?” Asad asked.

‘The shoes,’ said Qorvass. ‘They’re a little torn up, but you recognize them, don’t you?’

Asad just shrugged.

‘No one else around here wears that brand or color. It’s Fuad. I’m sure a DNA test will confirm it.’

‘Does Fuad have a reaper?’ asked Garovel.

‘No. He was just a normal kid. He was living here as part of an apprenticeship.’

Garovel spared one last word in private. ‘Shit.’

‘It was a good theory,’ said Hector. And then he saw something on Asad’s face that bothered him. Not sadness or anger, but worry. And a sudden question occurred to Hector. “What was Fuad’s last name?”

Asad returned a hard stare. “Saqqaf.””

"1015 -- CXVI.

Chapter One Hundred Sixteen: ‘Vision in the dark...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Elroys' shared room was quiet. The three children hung around their father's bed. Ramira was sleeping; Marcos looked like he was having a silent conversation with Shenado; and Emiliana--she was trying to read a book she'd grabbed off the shelf.

Trying and failing, unfortunately. She just couldn't seem to focus on the words anymore. Things kept distracting her, things she couldn't quite grasp. Fleeting sensations. A flicker in her eye. A twitch in one of her horns. And sweat--warm and then cold and then warm again. Even her own breathing was starting to play tricks on her. Easy and then erratic and then easy again. Over and over.

She didn't know what was happening. Some kind of panic attack? She'd never had one before. Was this what they were like?

But for some reason, she wasn't even concerned. Not about herself, at least. The only thing on her mind was to bottle it up. To not let anyone else find out. They'd just worry about her. Become scared for her. It made no sense, but right here and now, in the middle of whatever madness this was, not inconveniencing anyone seemed like the most important thing in the world.

At this point, the book in her hands was just a tool to help conceal herself. As long as she could look like she was reading it, everything could still be okay. The problem, whatever it was, could still pass. It could just go away. It could. It had to.

Then came Chergoa's echoing voice, ruining everything. 'Hey. Is that interesting?'

Interesting? What was she talking about? Oh, the book. Of course. Emiliana had to answer, though. What was this damn thing even about? She'd picked it off the shelf for a reason. She just had to remember.

Birds? No. Eyes. The book was about eyes. Bird vision was just one of the earlier parts. She'd picked it in hopes of learning more about ocular anatomy, but it wasn't particularly helpful, as she already knew everything that she'd managed to read.

'...Em? You awake?'

Emiliana's hands twitched as she realized she'd taken too long to respond. 'Y-yeah.' Oh no, that was stupid. She could have just pretended to be asleep.

‘You okay?’ Chergoa asked, hovering in front of her. ‘Hey. You’re shaking. What’s the matter?’”

"1015 -- CXVI.

Chapter One Hundred Sixteen: ‘Vision in the dark...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Elroys’ shared room was quiet. The three children hung around their father’s bed. Ramira was sleeping; Marcos looked like he was having a silent conversation with Shenado; and Emiliana--she was trying to read a book she’d grabbed off the shelf.

Trying and failing, unfortunately. She just couldn’t seem to focus on the words anymore. Things kept distracting her, things she couldn’t quite grasp. Fleeting sensations. A flicker in her eye. A twitch in one of her horns. And sweat--warm and then cold and then warm again. Even her own breathing was starting to play tricks on her. Easy and then erratic and then easy again. Over and over.

She didn’t know what was happening. Some kind of panic attack? She’d never had one before. Was this what they were like?

But for some reason, she wasn’t even concerned. Not about herself, at least. The only thing on her mind was to bottle it up. To not let anyone else find out. They’d just worry about her. Become scared for her. It made no sense, but right here and now, in the middle of whatever madness this was, not inconveniencing anyone seemed like the most important thing in the world.

At this point, the book in her hands was just a tool to help conceal herself. As long as she could look like she was reading it, everything could still be okay. The problem, whatever it was, could still pass. It could just go away. It could. It had to.

Then came Chergoa’s echoing voice, ruining everything. ‘Hey. Is that interesting?’

Interesting? What was she talking about? Oh, the book. Of course. Emiliana had to answer, though. What was this damn thing even about? She’d picked it off the shelf for a reason. She just had to remember.

Birds? No. Eyes. The book was about eyes. Bird vision was just one of the earlier parts. She'd picked it in hopes of learning more about ocular anatomy, but it wasn't particularly helpful, as she already knew everything that she'd managed to read.

'...Em? You awake?'

Emiliana's hands twitched as she realized she'd taken too long to respond. 'Y-yeah.' Oh no, that was stupid. She could have just pretended to be asleep.

'You okay?' Chergoa asked, hovering in front of her. 'Hey. You're shaking. What's the matter?'"

"1016

It seemed there was no hiding it now. Emiliana just tried to keep herself from sounding as panicked as she felt. 'I don't know,' she said. 'I'm--I... ah--' When she looked up from her book, she realized that there was something else wrong.

Spots. Distortions in her vision. It was like the light in the room was bending, somehow; and it made her blink involuntarily, but nothing changed. Those spots weren't going anywhere. She could feel her breathing becoming even more erratic.

Chergoa's voice cut through everything. 'Listen to me,' the reaper said, more urgently now, yet still carrying that same calmness that she always had. 'Emiliana, it's okay. I'm right here. Everything is fine. You're perfectly safe. Just listen to my voice. Now I want you to try and stand. Slowly. Don't rush yourself. There's no hurry.'

Emiliana latched onto those words as if she were lost at sea and they were the only thing that could keep her afloat. She gradually made it onto her feet while a whirlwind of muddled thoughts and twisting light threatened to knock her off balance.

'We're going to the bathroom,' said Chergoa, suddenly much more casual, presumably for the others in the room. 'Be right back.'

Emiliana saw the door ahead of her. She just had to make it there. To walk straight. If only the floor would stop moving.

‘Good,’ said Chergoa privately. ‘You’re almost there.’

It didn’t look like it, but after a moment, Emiliana realized that the reaper was correct. Her hand was touching the doorknob. She was leaving the room. And it almost felt like she wasn’t the one who’d done it.

All the way to the nearest bathroom, this strange sensation continued.

Then she was in front of a mirror, removing her mask in order to look at her face, at the stubby horns there.

‘Does anything hurt?’ asked Chergoa.

Emiliana had to think about it. ‘No.’

‘Good. That’s good.’

‘What’s happening?’

‘You can’t tell? Em, your power is growing.’

Emiliana’s expression twisted into a scowl. Clearly, Chergoa thought this was a good thing, and perhaps it was, but Emiliana would’ve been quite pleased to never have to deal with this again.

Chergoa had told her about this, though. One of the things that made the mutation type so volatile was that, eventually, it had to be used, whether the user wished it or not."

"1017

Chergoa floated in front of Emiliana’s face. ‘Open your eyes wide for me,’ the reaper said.

Emiliana tried and encountered resistance. Her eyes had been more sensitive to light ever since her power manifested, and now she had to struggle through the discomfort of forcing them open so wide. She could feel them twitching even more than earlier.

‘Yeah,’ said Chergoa. ‘Whether you want them to or not, your eyes are about to mutate. Try to guide the mutation.’

Emiliana grimaced. Impulsively, she wanted to ask how the hell she was supposed to do that, but she already knew. They'd gone over this already.

There was really only one trick to it. She needed to imagine the desired change clearly in her mind. Simple.

The catch, of course, was that if she imagined something too ambitious, her power would go crazy in an attempt to compensate and do something random, instead. Random--and probably horrific, she figured.

So she had to concentrate. On her eyes, apparently. She hadn't realized that such specific mutations could occur on their own, but now wasn't the time to be worrying about it. Her thoughts went to her studies. The book she'd been reading earlier.

The temptation was to imagine something like an avian eye, perhaps to enhance her ciliary muscles for more versatile lens movement, but she had to keep her limitations in mind. At the moment, her mutation power only allowed her to manipulate the protein known as keratin; and unfortunately, keratin didn't have much to do with vision, unless she intended to grow hair on her eyeballs.

And for a few terrible seconds, that's what she thought she might have to do. There was no stopping this change. She had to do something.

And then she recalled a structure in the eye which humans didn't have but that certain animals like cats and dogs did: the tapetum lucidum. It sat right behind the retina and reflected light back through it, which ultimately increased night vision and made it look like the animals had glowing eyes in low light conditions.

That, at least, seemed like a better plan than eyeball-fuzz. The only problem was whether or not she could construct a tapetum lucidum out of keratin alone. She had no idea how feasible that was.

She supposed she was about to find out."

"1018

She shut her eyes and poured all of her concentration into her work. A curved structure encapsulating the back of each eye. Right now, that was all she needed. All she wanted.

Searing pain arrived, as expected. Tearing tissue, she figured. Something had to be moved in order to make room for the keratin. She'd forgotten to ask Chergoa to numb her beforehand, but the reaper must have been able to tell from Emiliana's expression alone, because abruptly, the agony disappeared. Only a lingering shiver was left behind.

In her head, she completed the image of what she wanted half a dozen times before finally realizing that everything had settled. Her heartbeat, her breathing, even the panic, for the most part. She was still sweating, and her nerves were still putting her a little on edge, but at length, she decided that there was nothing left to do but open her eyes and see the results.

Slowly, her eyelids peeled back, letting light in again. And she was confused. And panic spiked through her chest another time when she saw how blurry everything was. Then a quick wash of relief as the world began to come back into focus. The mirror was still there in front of her.

There were, however, splotches. Great dark spots. Hovering in the middle of her vision. Quivering. And the light--it made her squint. It didn't quite hurt, if only because she was numb, but she found it difficult to keep her eyes open now.

But she supposed that only made sense. She'd been a bit sensitive to light before, and now she'd added a structure that only increased the amount of light on her photoreceptors.

'How's it look?' Chergoa asked. 'Can you still see me?'

Emiliana blinked very slowly. 'Yes... but I think I am going to need sunglasses from now on...'

Chergoa's laugh was full of relief. 'I'm sure we can manage that.'

Emiliana rubbed her face and washed it in the sink before putting her mask back on. It did dim the light in her eyes a little bit, but she would certainly be needing more than just this now.

They started back toward the Elroys' room together as Chergoa offered reassurances and Emiliana only half-listened. She still had holes in her vision. Everywhere she looked, murky pits of black and gray seemed to swallow light or distort it, and she wasn't sure if she should tell Chergoa. At length, though, she decided that she probably should."

'I see,' said Chergoa. 'Er, I mean--I understand.'

Emiliana just looked at her.

'Well, hey, you barely even need your eyes anyway. If it comes down to it, I'll just tell you where everything is.'

That reminded Emiliana that this was going to happen again. It was only a matter of time. Unless she did something about it, of course. She knew she only had herself to blame on this one. Chergoa had warned her previously that she needed to use her power in small, controlled ways, and Emiliana had been neglecting that. It might've been irrational, but a part of her had been hoping that she could just sit back and never have to worry about making things worse.

Foolishness, she knew. She was just grateful that Chergoa wasn't rubbing it in her face.

She didn't know how she was supposed to get used to this. Everything was so bright, despite all the gaps everywhere. The oddest thing, though, was that not all of the holes were the same. There seemed to be two types, actually. Some were just strange fluctuations in light, occasionally even moving to and fro, shrinking and growing, creating an illusion of distance from her. The others were just big dark spots, blurry and completely stationary, making it feel as if she were stuck looking through a pair of mucked up binoculars.

Before they made it back to the room, however, a commotion at the far end of the hall caught Emiliana's attention. A number of Rainlords had gathered there, and when she turned to Chergoa again, she saw that the reaper had stopped and seemed to be concentrating.

"Is something happening?" Em asked.

'I think so. There's a lot of movement a couple floors below us.'

"Do you want to investigate?"

Chergoa thought a moment. 'Nah. It doesn't seem like a fight's broken out. We should stay close to Zeff. I'm sure someone will find us if there's anything we should know.'

Emiliana had no problem with that. They finished returning to their room.

Something still felt odd, though. She couldn't quite tell what it was. A stray shiver ran down her spine, and she became abruptly conscious of the hairs on her arms and the back of her neck. And even after rejoining her family, the feeling didn't go away. It lingered, keeping her on edge and making her scan the room over and over again, trying to reassure herself that nothing was actually wrong.

If not for the holes in her vision, she might've had an easier time believing that."

"1020 -- CXVII.

Chapter One Hundred Seventeen: 'Riddle in the sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'So what do we know?' said Garovel, addressing the full audience of investigators, which now included the three Najirs and their accompanying reapers. 'We don't have the luxury of a DNA test to confirm whose blood this is or even if it all belongs to poor Fuad here, but we are all in agreement that these blood patterns seem strange, at least.'

'It's difficult to tell,' said Qorvass. 'Given the extent of mutilation, one would assume that there would be plenty of blood on the walls, counters, and ceiling, but it is only on the floor.'

'Which suggests that Fuad was not killed here in the south kitchen,' said Atalim.

'But that could also be consistent with Ibai's story,' said Qorvass. 'He said he teleported AFTER colliding with the body. We assumed he meant from one end of this room to the other, as described by the two separate blood stains, but he could have just as easily teleported twice. The first teleport would have been from wherever the murder took place.'

"Can any of you corroborate that?" asked Asad. He was staring at the group of reapers who'd been close enough to sense Ibai.

They each shook their head.

'He was too difficult to follow,' said the one bound to Lorenzo Delaguna. His name was Marosso, Hector was pretty sure.

Garovel decided to move on with the summation. 'Pretty much everything we've found points to Ibai. He was also the only one in here just prior to the disappearance of the soul that we can only presume to have been Fuad's. That's fairly strong evidence that he consumed Fuad's soul, even if we DO assume that he didn't actually murder him.'

"However, the position he was found in was also odd," said Carlos Sebolt. The thick lines of his middle-aged face deepened as he spoke. "His foot was stuck inside the body, as if he had decided to stomp the boy to death, but this is inconsistent with the extensive mutilation. He would've had to tear the body to shreds in a matter of seconds before suddenly resorting to stomping. Why would he have done that?"

"Because he's an aberration," said Lorenzo Delaguna. "It's no use trying to understand how they think."

Hector had a pretty good idea whose side that guy was on. Not that he completely disagreed with him."

"1020 -- CXVII.

Chapter One Hundred Seventeen: 'Riddle in the sand...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'So what do we know?' said Garovel, addressing the full audience of investigators, which now included the three Najirs and their accompanying reapers. 'We don't have the luxury of a DNA test to confirm whose blood this is or even if it all belongs to poor Fuad here, but we are all in agreement that these blood patterns seem strange, at least.'

'It's difficult to tell,' said Qorvass. 'Given the extent of mutilation, one would assume that there would be plenty of blood on the walls, counters, and ceiling, but it is only on the floor.'

'Which suggests that Fuad was not killed here in the south kitchen,' said Atalim.

'But that could also be consistent with Ibai's story,' said Qorvass. 'He said he teleported AFTER colliding with the body. We assumed he meant from one end of this room to the other, as described by the two separate blood stains, but he could have just as easily teleported twice. The first teleport would have been from wherever the murder took place.'

"Can any of you corroborate that?" asked Asad. He was staring at the group of reapers who'd been close enough to sense Ibai.

They each shook their head.

'He was too difficult to follow,' said the one bound to Lorenzo Delaguna. His name was Marosso, Hector was pretty sure.

Garovel decided to move on with the summation. 'Pretty much everything we've found points to Ibai. He was also the only one in here just prior to the disappearance of the soul that we can only presume to have been Fuad's. That's fairly strong evidence that he consumed Fuad's soul, even if we DO assume that he didn't actually murder him.'

"However, the position he was found in was also odd," said Carlos Sebolt. The thick lines of his middle-aged face deepened as he spoke. "His foot was stuck inside the body, as if he had decided to stomp the boy to death, but this is inconsistent with the extensive mutilation. He would've had to tear the body to shreds in a matter of seconds before suddenly resorting to stomping. Why would he have done that?"

"Because he's an aberration," said Lorenzo Delaguna. "It's no use trying to understand how they think."

Hector had a pretty good idea whose side that guy was on. Not that he completely disagreed with him."

"1021

'It's not inconceivable that someone could have framed him,' said Garovel. 'And according to Ibai's own account, Fuad was dead before he arrived.'

“He also sounded extremely confused,” said Lorenzo. “Could be that he didn’t realize what he’d done until it was too late, but that doesn’t change the fact that he did it.”

“That is not a fact until we confirm it as such,” said Carlos. “You are also not a part of this investigation. You’ve given us your witness statement. You may leave now.”

“And who put you in charge, exactly?” said Lorenzo. “This isn’t Roth.”

“You are correct,” said Carlos. “But this is not Deynos, either. This is Moaban. And as we are guests here, we should defer to the Lord Najir. Agreed?”

Lorenzo gave a slow nod before he and everyone else turned to Asad and Qorvass.

And despite having been put on the spot rather suddenly, the tattooed Sandlord lost none of his composure. “Lord Lorenzo. It is my understanding that you worked as a constable in Deynos for many years, no?”

“I did, yes.”

“And Lord Carlos, you served in the Vanguard’s OSI, did you not?”

“Yes.”

That caught Hector’s attention. ‘OSI?’

‘Office of Special Investigations,’ Garovel said privately.

“I would like the both of you to head up your own investigations, independent of one another,” said Asad. “Do not waste time sharing information. Simply return to me in six hours with whatever you have learned.”

Lorenzo shifted his feet and tilted his head. “Six hours isn’t much to work with.”

“You’ll keep investigating afterwards, but I need your preliminary reports by then. At most, I can buy us twelve hours before Hahl Saqqaf shows up and starts asking a lot of difficult questions--not the least of which will be why the hell I chose to give refuge to so many Rainlords without informing them.”

“Do you think they will kick us out?” said Carlos.

"No," said Asad. "This is my jurisdiction. But they will certainly not be pleased."

"All the same," said Lorenzo, "perhaps we should be ready to leave in a hurry."

"I won't discourage your people's caution," said Asad, "but just focus on the investigation right now. I will inform Abel and Salvador of what I am having you do."

'What about the Blackburns?' asked Garovel."

"1022

"For now, no one is to take action against House Blackburn without my approval," said Asad. "Speak to them if you feel it necessary, but if you do anything more than that, then regardless of the outcome, expect that your entire house will no longer be welcome here at Dunehall. This is not a matter for debate. Have I expressed myself clearly?"

"You have," said Lorenzo.

"Indeed," agreed Carlos.

"Very good, then. Now please hurry on with your work. I do not have time to assist you myself, but Imas, please accompany Lord Lorenzo, and Jada, please accompany Lord Carlos. I will see you all again soon." And with that, the Lord Najir departed, no doubt going to talk to the ruling Rainlords. Between them and the Saqqafs, Hector didn't envy Asad's position right about now.

"Never thought I'd be taking orders from a Sandlord," said Lorenzo.

'Never thought one would stick his neck out so far for us,' said his reaper. Marosso hadn't said much thus far--at least not aloud--but that particular statement earned some points with Hector and, by the looks of it, with the two Najir women and their reapers, as well.

After that, the group split up as Asad had dictated. And since Carlos had been the one to ask Hector and Garovel for assistance, they went with him.

Their first order of business was to talk to the Blackburns and get a second, and hopefully clearer recounting of events from Ibai. However, the only thing that became clear was that House Blackburn did not intend to let Ibai talk to any of the investigators again. Perhaps they were afraid that he would be ganged up on, or perhaps they were simply afraid of what he might say; either way, it didn't bode well for the family's position.

From there, the investigation was already at a bit of a loss for leads, so they decided to spread out and begin questioning people. And Hector and Garovel found themselves on their own again, going from corridor to corridor while searching for more clues.

'So what're you thinking now?' said Garovel.

'Uh... well, I guess I'm just trying to figure HOW someone could have possibly framed Ibai. Even a servant, I mean. It just doesn't seem very... easy.'

'You're wondering what ability they used?'

'Yeah.'

"1023

'I suppose that's as good a place to start as any,' said Garovel.

'Well, it WOULD be,' said Hector, 'if there was any sort of evidence to go on.'

'Actually, the lack of evidence might itself be a kind of clue.'

'How do you mean?'

'Just think about it. If someone framed Ibai, then they did it without leaving any real evidence behind. And which ability type has the easiest time not leaving any traces of their work?'

'Ah. Materialization.'

'Yup. Not that it proves anything, of course. I'm sure someone with one of the other types could've figured a way to be clever with their power. And moreover, absence of evidence is not evidence of absence. But it's something to think about as we investigate.'

Hector paused a moment. 'Isn't it also possible that Fuad Saqqaf is still alive? I mean, Qorvass only identified him by his shoes. Someone could've taken them off him and used them for the frame up, right?'

'Mm. Technically, yeah, that's possible. Not very likely, though. For such a plan to work, the culprit would've had to know that Qorvass could identify Fuad from those shoes. And if you'll recall, even Asad seemed surprised when Qorvass pulled off that bit of absurdity.'

'Absurdity? You don't think you could've done the same thing?'

'Sure, if I paid attention to the shoes of everyone we meet. But why the fuck would I do that?'

'For situations like this, apparently.'

'Apparently.'

Hector smirked. 'Oh well. I guess Qorvass is just better than you.'

'Oh, fuck you. I remember plenty of other seemingly worthless shit. Like your dumb birthday.'

'What does that have to do with anything?'

'It's in two weeks, you know.'

'Is it? I thought it was closer, actually. How long've we been in Sair?'

'Hardly even a week.'

'Seriously? That can't be right. It feels like ages already.'

'When we weren't waiting around for something to happen, we were busy trying not to be mashed into a meaty pudding, as Lord Xuan phrased it. And both of those things tend to make the time drag.'

'Hmm.'

'Anyway, my point was that I doubt the killer would've expected Qorvass to identify Fuad the way he did.'"

"1024

'Well... maybe the killer knows Qorvass really well.'

'Better than Asad, huh? Fine, I'm sure that's a possibility. But I'm hearing a whole lot of speculation and not very much actual investigating.'

'I'm just trying to narrow down our pool of suspects.'

'Ha. Did you watch a lot of cop shows when you were younger?'

'Uh. Maybe.'

'Was this before or after that little stint as a criminal mastermind you told me about?'

'L-let's just focus on the investigation.'

'Yes, let's.'

Hector stopped walking as he realized that he was staring at one of the building's exits. Dunehall was still practically a maze to him, so he'd just kinda been following Garovel around, but now he had to ask, "Where are we going?"

'Everyone else is questioning people around the castle, so I think they've got that covered. We're going to talk to people outside.'

"Uhh--" When he saw that Garovel had not stopped along with him, Hector jumped to a brisk walk in order to catch up again. "Why would anyone outside Dunehall know anything?"

'Not sure, actually. That's why I didn't ask anyone to come with us. I don't want to waste their time.'

"...But?"

'But what Lynn said is still bothering me.'

"Lynn?"

'Don't you remember? Those mysterious reports she told us about?'

"Oh." Frankly, he'd all but forgotten. Strange occurrences all across Sandlord territory, is what Lynn had said. And he supposed Garovel had a point. Fuad Saqqaf's apparent murder certainly qualified as a strange occurrence.

Soon, they were outside and venturing up the underground path into the fresh air of early morning. It felt a little strange, sneaking off like this. He'd already grown accustomed to following the lead of these more experienced and powerful lords. He hadn't realized how much he enjoyed this sense of independence. Though, he WAS still taking orders from Garovel, but that didn't really count, Hector felt.

Without any other method of transport, Hector resorted to running. He considered using iron platforms to launch himself over long distance--like he'd practiced in Gray Rock--but Moaban made that seem like a bad idea, what with so many trees everywhere. The deep forestation might have been pretty to look at, but it sure didn't make navigation any easier. After about five minutes, he'd already lost track of which direction Dunehall was in."

"1025

'So do you have an actual destination in mind?' Hector asked. 'Or are we just going to wander around and hope for the best?'

'What's wrong with wandering around and hoping for the best? Maybe the universe will do us a solid for being such nice people all the time.'

'So you believe in karma now?'

'Not even a little bit. If the universe rewarded people for being nice, there wouldn't be so many rich assholes in the world. Also, nature itself would be fundamentally different, and evolution as we know it would be dramatically altered. "Survival of the fittest" would be "survival of the friendliest." Which sounds pretty awesome, actually. If I ever visit an alternate reality, I hope it's one where that's somehow a rule.'

'...So we're really just wandering around right now, is what you're telling me?'

'No, I'm scanning the area for souls that are carrying the aura of death around them.'

'Oh yeah,' said Hector. 'I keep forgetting you can do that.'

'Well, it's not the most useful power when I'm just watching servants tear each other limb from limb. Which is something you seem pretty keen on taking part in.'

'Hey, you can't blame me for that shit. That first time when we went to meet the Queen--that was YOUR stupid plan.'

'Well, maybe you shouldn't be such an unthinking follower, then. Maybe you should come up with some amazingly clever plan of your own instead of relying on me all the time.'

'Maybe I will,' said Hector.

'Alright, then.'

'Good.'

'I'll be waiting with bated breath to hear what ingenious plan you formulate for us.'

'Of course. But, uh. In the meantime, are you sensing anything?'"
"1026

Garovel laughed. 'Not just yet, but give it a--' And that sentence's abrupt ending brought them both to a halt, though Hector was the only one left skidding across the sidewalk. Garovel tapped his shoulder, and Hector felt the familiar surge of vigor course through him. 'This way,' the reaper said, phasing through the stone wall next to them. 'And hurry.'

Hector bounded up and over and hit the ground rolling. It was a large yard, he discovered, leading up to a three-story house among a crowd of trees, but this didn't seem to be their final destination. Hector cut across the manicured lawn in pursuit of Garovel and leapt over the next wall at the other end. Another yard now, and another full sprint across it until they reached the next property over, where Garovel finally slowed.

'Armor,' the reaper told him, hovering up close to envelope himself around Hector's torso. 'Not sure what we're running into here.'

He crouched next to the small staircase that lead up to the house's rear patio. He reached for full iron plate with his mind, and it started clapping around his body in segments.

'It seems to be a family,' said Garovel. 'They're just sitting together, presumably at a table having breakfast. But they all have the aura. I don't sense any--'

‘...Garovel?’

‘What the--? It’s gone now.’

‘What’s gone? What do you mean?’

‘The aura. It went away. None of their souls are in danger anymore.’

‘Why? What changed?’

‘I... I don’t know. I’m scanning the house... but I don’t sense anyone else inside.’

Hector looked around the backyard another time. A bunch of trees, a swing set, an inflatable pool. It all seemed normal enough. ‘What do you want to do?’”

"1027

‘I’m thinking,’ said Garovel. ‘Hmm. Well, if this was going to be some kind of horrible accident, then the aura definitely would NOT have just vanished like that. An exploding gas main can’t just stop itself from killing someone. But a person can. The only thing that makes sense here is that the would-be murderer suddenly changed their mind.’

‘Or... someone else saved them, somehow?’ offered Hector. ‘We aren’t the only reaper and servant around here, y’know.’

‘Mm. That’s possible, too. Alright then, let’s just leave for now and check up on them later.’

Hector bolted across the yard and bounded over the wall. He hit the ground with a heavier thud this time, leaving a more noticeable indentation in the grass, thanks to all his armor.

‘Actually, wait,’ said Garovel, as Hector was about to start running again. ‘This is really strange. So let’s just... stick around for a little bit.’

‘Okay...’ The new yard they’d found themselves in looked a lot like the previous one. Hector hoped the owner wouldn’t be too upset about some armored weirdo messing up their grass. Mostly, though, he hoped they didn’t come outside and stare at him.

'Ah!' said Garovel. 'The aura's back! They're in danger again!'

And again, Hector flung himself over the wall. When he rushed back toward the house, however, Garovel stopped him.

'And now it's gone,' the reaper said. 'What the fuck is going on here?'

Hector caught a glimpse of the family through the window this time, but he didn't linger for a better look. He ducked behind their patio again.

The last thing he wanted to do was scare them for no reason.

'Garovel... this isn't some kind of terrible prank that you're playing on me, right?'

'Of course not. C'mon. If I were pranking you, it'd be way funnier than this shit.'

"1028

'Then what the hell?' said Hector. 'One minute, they're in danger; the next, they're not; and the one after that, they're in danger again?'

'I don't know. This shit never happened in Atreya.'

'Hmm.'

'Hold on,' said Garovel. 'I think I know what's happening. It's us.'

'What?'

'When we get close, the danger goes away. When we leave, it comes back. Why might that be?'

Hector's eyes widened inside his helm. 'The killer sees us.'

'But there's no one else within eyeshot,' said Garovel. 'So the killer is either spying on this family with cameras, or the killer has a reaper who senses our presence.'

'...Or both.'

'Yup.'

'Great. What now?'

'Well, we don't really have time to just wait for this to play out, but obviously, we also can't just leave these people to get murdered, either.'

Hector could tell where this was going. 'You want me to go in there and talk to the family? They'll flip.'

'Even so, that might be the best option here. The whole family had the aura of death. Even the kids. If we wait too long and let them split up, then you won't be able to protect all of them.'

'Agh...' And perhaps he was just grasping for excuses, but a question occurred to Hector. 'What I don't get is... if the murderer can see us but still intends to kill this family after we leave, then why does the aura of death go away? Shouldn't it stay?'

That made Garovel hesitate. 'You're absolutely right. So THAT'S what was bothering me so much about this. I knew it was something.'

'Maybe we're wrong, then. Maybe it's not us that's making the aura go away.'

'Agh, but I can't think of what else it would be. Dammit. Mysteries are supposed to be fun. I don't like it when they're weird and unsettling.'"
"1029 -- CXVIII.

'Well, we can't just sit here all day,' said Hector. 'Should I go talk to them or not?'

'Mgh. No. Not yet. This is too strange. My gut tells me this must be related to what happened with Ibai, somehow.'

'The same gut that you don't physically have, you mean?'

'That is a very corporeal thing to say, and I resent you for it.'

'Sorry.' Hector began annihilating his iron, but Garovel interjected.

'What are you doing?'

'Er... plate armor isn't exactly ideal for stealth. In fact, I'm a little surprised they haven't noticed me already.'

'I'd rather you left it on, at least until we know more about what's going on here.'

'But--I can't--I mean, it'll make me noisy... and just... super weird.'

'If anyone spots you, you can pretend to be a statue.'

'...No, Garovel. That's dumb.'

'C'mon, it'd be like a game.'

'Look, I'll still have the shield. Just conceal yourself behind that. It's probably the safest place for you, anyway.'

'Ugh, fine.'

Hector finished destroying his metal and felt Garovel shifting over to his arm, which was still both gloved and gauntleted.

'For the record, though, my idea was NOT dumb. You're dumb.'

'Duly noted,' said Hector.

Chapter One Hundred Eighteen: 'O, radiant Star...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been ages since Parson Miles last visited Jesbol. The capital city of Corpei looked nothing like he remembered. It was all cloud-grazing towers now, making the mountains they stood upon seem almost like an afterthought. Parson remembered when this place was little more than a hamlet, snuggled up to a lone salt mine and barely scraping by because of it.

He wondered if Jackson remembered that as well."

"1029 -- CXVIII.

'Well, we can't just sit here all day,' said Hector. 'Should I go talk to them or not?'

'Mgh. No. Not yet. This is too strange. My gut tells me this must be related to what happened with Ibai, somehow.'

'The same gut that you don't physically have, you mean?'

'That is a very corporeal thing to say, and I resent you for it.'

'Sorry.' Hector began annihilating his iron, but Garovel interjected.

'What are you doing?'

'Er... plate armor isn't exactly ideal for stealth. In fact, I'm a little surprised they haven't noticed me already.'

'I'd rather you left it on, at least until we know more about what's going on here.'

'But--I can't--I mean, it'll make me noisy... and just... super weird.'

'If anyone spots you, you can pretend to be a statue.'

'...No, Garovel. That's dumb.'

'C'mon, it'd be like a game.'

'Look, I'll still have the shield. Just conceal yourself behind that. It's probably the safest place for you, anyway.'

'Ugh, fine.'

Hector finished destroying his metal and felt Garovel shifting over to his arm, which was still both gloved and gauntleted.

'For the record, though, my idea was NOT dumb. You're dumb.'

'Duly noted,' said Hector.

Chapter One Hundred Eighteen: 'O, radiant Star...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been ages since Parson Miles last visited Jesbol. The capital city of Corpei looked nothing like he remembered. It was all cloud-grazing towers now, making the mountains they stood upon seem almost like an afterthought. Parson remembered when this place was little more than a hamlet, snuggled up to a lone salt mine and barely scraping by because of it.

He wondered if Jackson remembered that as well."

The Vanguard's central facility in Corpei was no impressive thing. It looked just as humble as every other building they owned in this country. Field Marshal Jackson was a firm believer in the old Vanguardian tactic of blending in, Parson knew. Leaders like that were becoming less and less common, it seemed, so that was a quality Parson could admire.

He walked right into the tiny headquarters, and a lone guardsman reading a newspaper with his apparent reaper just waved the captain general on. Parson proceeded farther in but soon noticed something amiss.

'What's that look on your face?' Overra asked him.

'There's an ashy smell in the air,' he informed her. To his eyes, she was a faceless angel, winged and glowing all over with a soft white light, save only for her halo, which emanated gold instead. 'Do you sense anything strange?'

'No,' she said, as ever devoid of any sort of expression. 'Jackson is ahead and to the right.'

When they turned the corner, the hallway became abruptly black. Charred, to be specific, and he could hear the floor crunching under his boots.

Odd.

He shrugged and kept going.

Jackson's small office was entirely burnt black as well, save only his desk and chair in the middle, both of which looked new. The room was also missing a ceiling. Instead, it was just open blue sky there, in spite of the fact that there should have been another two floors above them.

"Did we catch you in the middle of redecorating?" Parson asked. "I like it."

Jackson looked up from the document he was reading, but as soon as he took his eyes off the paper, it burst into flames and disintegrated in his hands. "Dagh!" The man stood up from his chair and took an exasperated breath."

"1031

It was only then that Parson was able to get a good look at Jackson's unique overcoat. The thing was a complex swirl of white and crimson, and it was supposed to be fireproof, Parson knew, but about half of it was missing, and now it looked more like some kind of torn and melted cloak.

Parson had heard about Jackson's recent victory here, but he'd been too pressed for time to find out any of the details. Frankly, the whole thing had been a surprise--perhaps even to Jackson, by the look of things.

By appearance alone, Jackson was actually quite short, but his face could have been chiseled from bronze, dark complexion and all, and his eyes were as brilliant a blue as Parson had ever seen.

"Best not get too close to me," the field marshal warned. "I accidentally incinerated Kane earlier."

Parson blinked at that. "Kane? As in, Field Marshal Kane?"

"Yes."

"And by 'incinerated,' you don't mean...?"

"Oh, no, of course not. He's fine now. Though, if you run into him, I wouldn't advise bringing it up. He seemed rather upset."

Parson decided to take a few steps backward. If he was being completely honest, Jackson's power was one of the ones he feared most in this world, if only because it held such an overwhelming advantage against him. So to then find out that the man was having difficulty controlling it--this was not the most comforting news.

"Where is Hyozen?" Parson asked.

"Resting," said Jackson.

Parson didn't want to let the conversation slacken. The longer he could dance around his reason for being here, the better. "So Abolish has really been run out of Horsht, huh?"

"It seems so."

"Congratulations."

"Thank you."

Parson didn't like the way the man was staring at him. "I know you're not one for celebrations, but I doubt anyone could argue that you don't deserve one. A big party. Wouldn't that be nice?"

"1032

"A celebration would be one of the most foolish things I could possibly do right now," said Jackson.

"You're much more uptight than I remember," said Parson. "Is that your wife's influence?"

"Are you trying to annoy me?" said Jackson. "I don't see why. You usually do it so effortlessly."

That pulled a barking laugh out of Overra. 'I'm glad to see that biting wit of yours hasn't changed. You'll have to forgive Parson. I think he's somehow getting stupider with age.'

Parson just frowned.

'One could argue that Abolish is at its most dangerous after taking a major loss like this,' she went on. 'I'm sure they'll be feeling the need to reciprocate. And soon, too. Else the balance of power will begin to shift in our favor. And Dozer can't very well let that happen.'

She was right, Parson knew. Morgunov was about as predictable as a lottery that used imaginary numbers, but Dozer, at least, would certainly not take this lying down. Gunther and Dunhouser had both belonged to him. Their deaths would undoubtedly leave a power vacuum that many of Dozer's other men would be looking to fill, and what better way to distinguish oneself in their master's eyes than through battle?

There was no need to voice his concerns, though. Overra had it covered, and besides, he was supposed to be the stupid one.

"The only question is where Dozer will strike," said Jackson.

'Certainly not here,' said Overra. 'Trying to retake Horsht from you would be messy, at best, and draw Sermung's attention, at worst. If I were him, I'd redouble my efforts to seize Korgum.'

Doubtful, Parson figured. While it was true that finally getting a hold of Korgum would certainly make up for losing Horsht, it would still be a long shot. At the moment, winning that territory meant courting Chaos itself."

"1033

"I don't think he would push any harder for Korgum," said Jackson. "He'd run the risk of overextending himself there, and Dozer isn't one for gambling."

Parson had to agree. That old bastard had built his empire upon calculated strikes and measured responses. He wasn't the type of opponent who could be expected to make any strategic mistakes. A most irritating enemy, to be sure. And against such a foe, even the most carefully laid plans were all but worthless. Parson Miles had spent many years learning that lesson the hard way.

"Perhaps we should accelerate Blacksong," Parson suggested.

Jackson scowled, and Parson's coat caught fire. "Oh!"

Parson hurriedly patted himself down, trying not to panic with the knowledge that if he used his own power right now, Jackson's flames would swallow him whole.

"Sorry," said Jackson. "But honestly, Blacksong? The project that your Gema Elroy might have leaked to Abolish?"

Parson was still patting. The flames weren't going out. "Did you soul-empower these?!"

"No."

"Well, could you put them out, please?!" Now they were spreading.

"Eh, I'm sure you'll be fine."

"Sir, please!" Parson dropped to the floor and started rolling. It made no difference whatsoever. He could feel the searing pain beginning to pierce his passive soul defense.

"Oh, very well."

And in a blink, the fire extinguished itself, leaving only his smote uniform and smoking flesh behind. No actual damage had been done, as far as Parson could tell, but it was more than enough of a glimpse at the power that this person now possessed. Perhaps that had been the marshal's intention.

"Project Blacksong has always been a fool's errand," Jackson went on. "Now, it has only become more so."

"1034

Flames aside, that was the reaction Parson had been expecting. Jackson's disapproval of Blacksong was only natural.

On the surface, Blacksong was a multinational operation with the expressed purpose of discovering and exploiting weaknesses in Abolish's territory. Specifically, it was an initiative which would mount a simultaneous offensive against twenty-nine Abolish strongholds spread all across the Eloan continent. It was going to be the largest coordinated assault carried out by the Vanguard in decades.

But that was not the part Jackson had a problem with, Parson knew. Jackson disliked one of Blacksong's many hidden objectives--albeit the primary one.

That was, to turn the Monster of the East away from Abolish. Or at the very least, away from Dozer.

Parson doubted anyone would ever be able to convince Jackson that this was a viable strategy. The Star of the West and the Monster of the East--these monikers were not coincidental. Even among non-servants, their rivalry was well-known.

Jackson saw Gohvis purely for the monster that he quite literally was, but Parson had seen shades of something else, something that still retained at least some semblance of humanity. He'd seen it thirty years ago, thanks entirely to the massacre of House Elroy, the one from which only two young teenagers and a single reaper survived.

The one Parson had helped orchestrate.

In truth, however, it had not been a plan of his or Overra's making. Rather, they had simply been following the orders of Air Marshal Artemis.

In all his years, Parson had never known a more ruthless and vengeful member of the Vanguard than Artemis. Save, perhaps, Lamont. But that was another matter. Ultimately, Artemis was the one who decided to exterminate the Elroys, and his motivation for doing so had been a largely primitive combination of fear and hatred. Because, as Artemis discovered, House Elroy was the bloodline which spawned the monster now known as Gohvis."

"1035

Naturally, the Vanguard could not simply go around massacring people. Which was why Abolish's involvement was necessary. Disgusting scum though they were, they still had their uses, and Parson knew how to handle them. That was why Artemis had promoted him in the first place, after all.

But Zeff, Joana, and Axiolis survived. Artemis considered that a problem, especially with the Rainlords on high alert. Worse still, the survivors were able to identify the Abolishers contracted for the job. That, in turn, meant that there was a chance--a very, very slim chance, but still a chance--that the Rainlords would've been able to discover who those Abolishers worked for. Parson had been careful, so the Rainlords still would've had a rather long and winding road to the truth ahead of them, but Artemis wasn't one for loose ends.

And hilariously, that very tendency proved to be Artemis' downfall. The air marshal went to extinguish the Abolishers they'd used, but the Monster was already there, killing them all and mounting their heads on spikes. And when the Monster sensed Artemis' presence in that place, that was it. A death sentence. Artemis escaped, sure, but it hardly mattered. Over the next three years, Gohvis hunted him down.

All the while, Parson was profoundly glad that he'd only ever used Artemis' name when dealing with Abolish. If he'd allowed himself to be identified even once, then the Monster probably would've hunted him down, too.

Now, there was no one else left who knew the truth of that story. Only Parson and Overra.

But it had been enough. A glimpse of the Monster's lingering humanity. Surely, that demanded further investigation. So over the next several years, that was exactly what Parson did. And during that time, Zeff Elroy resurfaced, wishing to rejoin the Vanguard.

Parson could not have been more pleased."

"1036

Zeff didn't know of his family's connection to Gohvis, and even Axiolis seemed unaware, though Parson could never be entirely sure how much the old reaper knew. Regardless, the best way to discover more about Gohvis was to groom Zeff. This much was obvious.

But there was a problem. The more Parson got to know Zeff, the more it became clear: this boy would never be able to pull it off. Parson needed someone who could infiltrate Abolish and get close to the Monster. An Elroy should have been perfect for the task, but Zeff simply did not have the temperament. The boy was not a spy. He could hardly tell a lie to save his own life. Most of these modern Rainlords were like that, it seemed. According to Overra, they used to be so much more skilled in sabotage and deception, but generations of governing, power, and self-congratulations had made them too proud for their own good. How could they claim "honor" was of such importance when their ancestors practically invented guerrilla warfare? Where was the logic in that?

Instead, the key went to waste, reduced to normal service like any other Vanguardian, and Parson was left to scrounge for scraps of intel wherever he could find them. Painfully slow and inefficient. Which was actually strange. Gohvis did not make a habit of showcasing his exploits like most of the other Abolishers. His deeds were few and far between.

After years of negligible progress, the mission was all but dead. The Covert Intelligence Division had given up on turning Gohvis and moved on to other, more appealing targets. It was a common enough tactic, and Gohvis had by no means been their first attempt.

But then Gema Elroy appeared. And Parson saw new life in that old string of failures."

"1037

Unfortunately, he could not simply tell his superiors of the girl's connection to Gohvis. Even if they did believe him, they could decide to simply kill her the way Artemis would have done--or worse, begin asking questions about his involvement in the Elroy massacre.

No, it had to be more discreet than any of that. So instead, he manufactured false leads in order to convince the marshals to revive the old intelligence-gathering mission on Gohvis. Which worked out better than expected. Project Blacksong was conceived around it--though by now, Blacksong had grown into an entirely new beast with many different objectives. Excepting Jackson here, all of the marshals had their own goals for Blacksong. Jackson seemed to be of the opinion that there were already far too many cooks in the kitchen, as it were.

As for Gema, her name was too famous for her to become a plant inside of Abolish, but at the same time, Parson needed Abolish to know her name, otherwise Gohvis might never even realize his connection to her. Therefore, the only viable recourse was to change her family's affiliations. If the Elroys became fugitives of the Vanguard, Gema's credibility with Abolish would improve tenfold. Whether that would be enough or not remained to be seen, but Parson had confidence in the girl.

And besides, even if she did fail, at least the resulting conflict in Sair would offer plenty of new angles from which to work. Like Zeff, for instance. Finally, that boy's potential had begun to surface. And then, of course, there were the Sandlords. Ideally, they would secede too, before any of the Vanguard's maladies began to infect their ranks. Parson just hoped they weren't too afraid of Abolish to let go of the Vanguard. He would've liked to take more steps to ensure their departure while he was in Sair, but the Gargoyle's intervening had rendered that impossible."

"1038

All things considered, Parson felt that Sair was on the right track now-- not the safest track, perhaps, but the correct one. That was something so few of these political types seemed to comprehend. Always worried about avoiding conflict, but sometimes, conflict was necessary. Sometimes, a little bloodletting now prevented future disaster.

And Jackson was not a stupid man. Or even an incompetent one. But that was the kind of hard truth that the Radiant Sentinel would never be able to accept. As much respect as Parson had for this man, as much as the Vanguard needed more people like him, there were still some things that Jackson needed to be kept in the dark about. For the good of all.

"The other marshals will never agree to stop Blacksong," said Parson. "Isn't it about time you got on board with everyone else? Even your wife has a horse in that race."

"That may be true," said Jackson, "but Sanko is free to do as she pleases." His expression hardened. "You, however, are not."

Parson realized where this was going and had to stop himself from wincing.

"I have a job for you," the Sentinel said, reaching down beneath his desk. He pulled out a box, and from it, he retrieved a pen and notebook and pushed them both toward Parson. "Actually, I have several jobs for you, but first, you will provide a full report of your activities in Sair. Spare no details."

Parson frowned. Of course it would have to be handwritten. If it was sloppy, Jackson would no doubt force him to rewrite it. Or perhaps the marshal would just "accidentally" light it on fire.

"Once that's done," Jackson went on, "you will be handling the local call-ins and write-ins. You will investigate every request thoroughly, no matter how trivial it might seem. The point of this, in case that is not already clear to you, is to remind you of who it is the Vanguard is protecting. I'm sure a bit of time at the bottom of the ladder will do you some good. And of course, I will be expecting full reports on each of your investigations. Additionally--"

Parson's frown only deepened as he listened. If he had one weakness that he'd never quite been able to overcome, it was paperwork. And boy, did Jackson love his paperwork."

Chapter One Hundred Nineteen: 'Shadows in space...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been nearly half an hour, and Hector was starting to feel rather uncomfortable about this whole waiting-outside-a-family's-house thing. Garovel had stopped talking as well, which indicated to Hector that the reaper wasn't feeling particularly comfortable in these strange circumstances, either.

'Are you sure they're still in there?' Hector asked, not for the first time.

'Yes. They're watching television.'

'You can sense that much detail?'

'The way their souls are positioned together, all looking the same way. That, and if you listen, you can hear it through the wall.'

So he could. Hector took a breath and tried to settle himself again. He scratched his neck. It had been itching like crazy in the same spot for a while now, and the added nuisance of it wasn't doing anything to calm him down. Really, though, it was all the unanswered questions that were bothering him.

The bushes along the side of the house rustled.

Hector and Garovel both looked.

There was nothing there.

He supposed it could've been an animal small enough to be completely concealed by the leaves. But Hector's gaze lingered, and his ears worked overtime, listening for any other noises.

And a noise indeed arrived, this time above. Deep creaks from the roof, slow and repeating.

'Footsteps?' Hector asked.

'I don't sense anyone there,' said Garovel.

Then came a hushed sound, too quiet to make out but distinct in its own way. A breath? A whisper? Or just the wind?

Hector placed his back to the wall and armored up. There was a very good chance he was just being paranoid, but there was no harm in playing it safe.

'Garovel, am I going crazy?'

'No, I don't think so... unless I'm going crazy along with you.'"

"1039 -- CXIX.

Chapter One Hundred Nineteen: 'Shadows in space...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been nearly half an hour, and Hector was starting to feel rather uncomfortable about this whole waiting-outside-a-family's-house thing. Garovel had stopped talking as well, which indicated to Hector that the reaper wasn't feeling particularly comfortable in these strange circumstances, either.

'Are you sure they're still in there?' Hector asked, not for the first time.

'Yes. They're watching television.'

'You can sense that much detail?'

'The way their souls are positioned together, all looking the same way. That, and if you listen, you can hear it through the wall.'

So he could. Hector took a breath and tried to settle himself again. He scratched his neck. It had been itching like crazy in the same spot for a while now, and the added nuisance of it wasn't doing anything to calm him down. Really, though, it was all the unanswered questions that were bothering him.

The bushes along the side of the house rustled.

Hector and Garovel both looked.

There was nothing there.

He supposed it could've been an animal small enough to be completely concealed by the leaves. But Hector's gaze lingered, and his ears worked overtime, listening for any other noises.

And a noise indeed arrived, this time above. Deep creaks from the roof, slow and repeating.

'Footsteps?' Hector asked.

'I don't sense anyone there,' said Garovel.

Then came a hushed sound, too quiet to make out but distinct in its own way. A breath? A whisper? Or just the wind?

Hector placed his back to the wall and armored up. There was a very good chance he was just being paranoid, but there was no harm in playing it safe.

‘Garovel, am I going crazy?’

‘No, I don’t think so... unless I’m going crazy along with you.’”

"1040

‘That wasn’t a rabbit or something in the bushes just now?’ Hector asked.

‘No, it wasn’t,’ said Garovel privately. ‘Not on the roof, either. Nor in the grass, right now.’

Hector hadn’t even noticed that last one yet, but sure enough, he turned just in time to see a patch of tall grass by the patio stop shaking.

‘The next house over,’ said Garovel. ‘Hurry. Now the people in that one have the aura, instead.’

Hector launched himself over the stone wall one more time, but before he even landed, Garovel was already amending his statement.

‘And now it’s gone...’

He kinda figured that might happen. ‘The hell is going on here, Garovel?’

‘I don’t know. Just be ready.’

“This is getting boring,” came an unfamiliar voice.

Hector looked around but saw no one. ‘Garovel?’

‘No, there’s no--’ The reaper cut himself short at the sound of muted whispering.

“No, just do something bigger,” said the same voice.

More whispers.

“Oh, what does it matter now? You’ve hardly been subtle. They clearly know something’s going on already. If you’re going to play with them, you might as well really play with them.”

“But we’re not supposed to,” came a new voice.

“Ha, look at him!” said still another. “He’s so confused!”

Hector’s eyes kept telling him that there was no one around, but he was beginning to get the picture. Garovel said it before he could, though.

‘They’re invisible. Even to me.’

‘How?’

‘I don’t know.’

“Don’t worry, metal kid!” came yet another voice. “We’re not real! We’re all in your head! You’re going crazy, see?!”

“Pfft, he’ll never buy that now. Use your brain, you bloody idiot.””

"1041

“We’re your collective subconsciousness! Arguing with itself! Pure madness, eh?!”

“C’mon, even if you convince him, there’s still his partner.”

“You’re all morons.”

Hector tensed up with each new voice that chimed in. Whoever they were, there were a lot of them. His mind raced as he considered his options. If they were really invisible, then his priority was surely locating them somehow. To that end, iron dust might serve. But it would almost certainly antagonize them as well, and he wasn’t sure that was necessary just yet. Certainly, if they wanted to harm him, they would’ve done so without alerting him, right?

“This better not mess up the mission,” one of them was saying.

“How could it? If anything, it’ll give us less to worry about later.”

Hector began slowly slipping one of his gauntlets off. Thankfully, he'd already been holding his shield, so he used it to conceal his work.

"Idiots. We don't even know who we're dealing with here."

"Yeah we do. Don't you remember?"

"What?"

"Looks like you're the idiot, idiot. Hey, Darksteel! Are you scared yet? Or are you just stupid?"

Hector pulled the rest of the gauntlet off and started on the glove beneath, going a little faster now.

"Oh, you're right," said another new voice. "It is him, huh?"

"How many of us do you think there are, eh? Why don't you have a nice guess. Go on."

Hector decided to take a pass on that.

"Hey, how much time do we have for this?"

"Plenty. Don't worry."

"Think he'll try to run?"

"Ooh, I hope so!"

"Go on, Darksteel! Make a run for it! You might be able to get away!"

"1042

If they wanted someone to be afraid of them, they'd come to the wrong place. By now, he was more than accustomed to being outmatched in a fight, and these assholes hadn't even proved themselves yet as anyone he should be afraid of. For the moment, however, it was probably better if they held onto that confidence of theirs, so Hector made his arms tremble.

One of them started laughing. "Look, he's shaking!"

Someone else joined in. "He's too scared to move! Aha! This is what happens when you get famous too early, little boy!"

“That’s right! You made an awfully big splash over in Bumblefuck, Nowhere. Mighta been fine if you’d killed all your enemies, but ya didn’t, did ya? And now it’s about to bite you on the ass, ‘cuz we all know how weak you are.”

“Life lessons for the dead boy.”

‘These dumb fuckers are in for a rude surprise,’ said Garovel. ‘Don’t hold back. They’re definitely Abolish.’

Hector had gotten that impression as well, though he hadn’t been as sure as Garovel sounded. In different circumstances, he might’ve asked what made Garovel so certain, but here and now, he was content to just trust his reaper’s word and concentrate on the matter at hand.

The only caveat was the presence of civilians. He certainly would’ve preferred not to fight where innocent people might get hurt, but at the same time, if he tried to lead his opponents away, there was no guarantee that some wouldn’t stay behind and slaughter these poor people anyway--which seemed especially likely, given that he was apparently dealing with multiple enemies.

He could try to call Asad, perhaps, but his phone was inside his armor, and if he moved to retrieve it, even these idiots would probably notice.

No, the best option was to simply fight and protect everyone as best he could."

"1043

All of these thoughts flashed through Hector’s mind in rapid succession, until he ultimately decided to just take the initiative while he still could. He created a thin cloud of dust over the area--tens of thousands of iron flakes, just big enough for his eyes to register specks in the air but also small enough that they would hover like tiny feathers instead of falling like raindrops.

“Hmm?”

“What’s this?”

“Oh!”

But they were too slow to realize. Hector had gotten his glimpse. There were many more gaps in the dust than he could count in a single look, some crouched on the adjacent roof, some on the wall between the houses, some sitting in the trees above, but none in the grass, presumably because it would've revealed their footsteps. Specific numbers weren't important, though. Right now, Hector only cared about general proximity, and by the time they'd begun voicing their surprise, Hector was already slamming an iron fist at the ground.

Clusters of iron pillars shot out at each area, their bladed tips extending forth at arrow-speed, all retaining physical contact with his fist so that he could empower them with his soul.

A few of the pillars struck true. Horizontal geysers of blood appeared among the dust, and a couple of the voices cut off mid-sentence, but the invisibility itself remained unchanged. The victims of Hector's attack were not suddenly revealed in full to him as he'd hoped they'd be.

He could, however, see new movement among the dust--all converging on him.

"He actually intends to fight!"

"Good!"

"Now we can have some real fun!"

And the first challenger must not have realized that Hector could see him coming, because the fool charged headlong into a gauntleted uppercut, which--from the sound of it--rocketed him right into one of his buddies in the trees."

"1044

His next opponents were a bit smarter. The abilities started coming out--strings of explosions, flanked by flames and acid and flaming acid.

It ripped into his armor, but that was the extent of the damage. His barehanded grip on Haqq's shield held firm as each attack leveled against him felt about as dangerous as a warm breeze. Even the force behind the explosions, detonating at point-blank range, broke against his body like they were nothing more than water balloons.

Through it all, Hector propelled himself upward on a metal platform, out of the smoke and materializing a fresh cloud of iron flakes to help him regain his bearings.

On the rooftop, right there next to him, were four invisible bodies just waiting. He could already see acid spewing out of one of their apparent mouths.

Instead of dodging, however, Hector dove straight into the acid, his free hand reaching for the spitter's apparent mouth. He found it, and immediately, an iron disc exploded out of the invisible servant's head, chopping it clean off. Blood gushed free, but the separated head and body both remained invisible. By the time Hector hit the roof, more ineffectual attacks were slamming into him, and he just concentrated on the iron disc he'd made, adding iron walls to it so that it became a coating for the severed head. He slid down toward his trophy and grabbed it before it rolled off the roof.

That was one less opponent that he had to worry about, but with the amount of shit they were flinging at him now, he figured that there had to be at least a dozen more of these assholes.

"What the fuck?! You said he was weak!"

"Idiots! Stop messing around and just kill him!"

And then he heard the deep piping noise of destruction users."
"1045

Without waiting to see where they were coming from, Hector launched himself away on an iron pillar.

Explosions chased him, and even though they did little more than tear his clothes, they were becoming a problem due to all the smoke they left behind. If he allowed his vision to become obscured, he really would be fighting blind, because he couldn't rely on Garovel to locate his opponents' souls.

The solution was a platform, he decided. A platform for everything--all around the houses, filling the backyard and rising past the rooftops and nearer the trees above. He aimed to raise himself up along with everyone he couldn't see. He even covered the roofs with iron and raised those sections as well, making sure to attach them to the greater platform horizontally so that they didn't put pressure on any of the houses and cause any cave-ins.

It was tricky work, because he had to do it whilst avoiding the scarcely visible distortions in the air from the multiple destruction users who were ganging up on him, but Hector kept his bearings, and soon enough, the fruits of his labor revealed themselves. A broad plateau of solid iron stretched out before him, pressing among the trees and indeed, crushing most of the branches in its way. He'd been far more concerned with maintaining precise construction around the civilian homes to bother himself with protecting all the damn trees, too.

Most importantly, however, he could hear the constant drum of footsteps rushing across the iron. He couldn't see any of the bastards, but they were definitely there, and they were already tearing into his work with theirs--explosions, acid, destruction, all cutting into what he'd done.

So he converted the plateau into a bed of spikes, save only where he was running. A half-dozen streams of blood revealed immediate results, and Hector prepared his next move."

"1046

A bladed disc was what Hector conceived. It began small in the grip of his free hand, but after one quick spin on his heels, the disc had grown as broad as a coffee table. And it kept growing even after it left his grasp, thrown with all his strength and then some, as he tried to add velocity to each new growth. By the time his invisible opponents began reacting to its approach, the disc was already as wide as a basketball court.

Paths of destruction cut into it, and acid melted down the rest, leaving behind huge trails of smoke. Ultimately, the disc did no damage. It did, however, succeed in pulling their attention away from the iron plateau. And that was all Hector really needed.

He slapped the iron floor, and spikes shot up all around him, each one becoming a tower unto itself. More blood informed him of the results, along with a handful of tree branches shattering on impact with seemingly nothing.

After a moment, he turned his field of spikes to iron dust and charged ahead again, still weathering an almost constant assault of explosions as he ran.

‘You okay, Garovel?’ he asked in the meantime.

‘Yeah. And you’re doing well, but you’re never going to get them all. We have to get back to Dunehall and warn everyone.’

‘What about the civilians here?’

‘Abolish will focus on us. Because they HAVE to. If we make it to Dunehall, then whatever they have planned is fucked.’

He grit his teeth but didn’t argue. ‘Alright.’ In an instant, he annihilated his plateau almost completely, save only an iron slide for himself, which then too disintegrated after he’d hit the ground running.

‘By the way,’ said Garovel, ‘I’m getting extremely tired, and I’m probably going to pass out soon, but don’t you let go of that shield until you’re sure we’re out of danger.’

Another reason not to drag this fight out, he supposed."

"1047 -- CXX.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty: ‘O, coveted children...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ibai Blackburn rubbed his mouth and chin as he stared at the floor. He applied enough pressure to distort his own face in turns--scrunched, elongated, then scrunched again.

He couldn’t figure it out. He’d been playing the scene back in his head over and over again. He was sure the body hadn’t been there when he’d teleported, but he had seen someone. A soul. One which simply disappeared as soon as he arrived. By now, he was at least certain of that much.

Beyond that, though, he couldn’t understand what had happened.

And of course, everyone thought he did it. Even his family, it seemed. He told them it was some kind of misunderstanding, but he saw the looks on their faces. They clearly feared the worst.

But they still intended to protect him. They'd kept him confined to his room, but his father hadn't left his side even once, continually reassuring him that everything would be fine, that they wouldn't let any harm come to him.

Ibai wasn't so sure about that.

If the other Rainlords found evidence against him, he honestly didn't know what his family would do. Sure, they'd tried to protect him before, but they hadn't believed he was a murderer then.

Or maybe they had? He wasn't too sure about that, either, now that he was thinking about it.

Regardless, he didn't much care for this sitting around and waiting for judgment. Though, to be fair, he didn't much care for sitting around period. He was supposed to be on an adventure, and this didn't feel very adventurous.

Naturally, Papa was trying to keep him distracted while they waited, but Ibai was wise to his tricks. Or maybe the man was just too exhausted to put his heart into it. Ibai could see the toll that everything had taken on him."

"1047 -- CXX.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty: 'O, coveted children...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ibai Blackburn rubbed his mouth and chin as he stared at the floor. He applied enough pressure to distort his own face in turns--scrunched, elongated, then scrunched again.

He couldn't figure it out. He'd been playing the scene back in his head over and over again. He was sure the body hadn't been there when he'd teleported, but he had seen someone. A soul. One which simply disappeared as soon as he arrived. By now, he was at least certain of that much.

Beyond that, though, he couldn't understand what had happened.

And of course, everyone thought he did it. Even his family, it seemed. He told them it was some kind of misunderstanding, but he saw the looks on their faces. They clearly feared the worst.

But they still intended to protect him. They'd kept him confined to his room, but his father hadn't left his side even once, continually reassuring him that everything would be fine, that they wouldn't let any harm come to him.

Ibai wasn't so sure about that.

If the other Rainlords found evidence against him, he honestly didn't know what his family would do. Sure, they'd tried to protect him before, but they hadn't believed he was a murderer then.

Or maybe they had? He wasn't too sure about that, either, now that he was thinking about it.

Regardless, he didn't much care for this sitting around and waiting for judgment. Though, to be fair, he didn't much care for sitting around period. He was supposed to be on an adventure, and this didn't feel very adventurous.

Naturally, Papa was trying to keep him distracted while they waited, but Ibai was wise to his tricks. Or maybe the man was just too exhausted to put his heart into it. Ibai could see the toll that everything had taken on him."

"1048

"Your turn," said Ismael.

Ibai looked up from the gameboard and smiled at his father. His wide eyes absorbed the other man's expression with eager interest. "We don't have to keep doing this," said Ibai. "You don't have to keep doing this."

The Lord Blackburn tilted his head and squinted faintly. However, it was his reaper who asked the question for him.

‘What are you talking about?’ said Rholtam.

Ibai poked the tallest figurine on his side of the table. Its colorful little body toppled over, and he picked it up to look at it. “I could just go,” he said. “It might be better if I did.”

“No. Don’t even talk like that.”

“I know you love me, Papa. I love you, too. But I’ve done nothing but cause problems for you ever since the day I was born. Maybe I should just--”

“No,” Ismael said again.

For some reason, that broadened Ibai’s smile. He glanced at his father another time before returning to the figurine in his hand. It wore a tiny gold crown. It was the most important piece on the board, the one that all the others were tasked with protecting. “Do you still worry that I’ll hurt innocent people?”

The question seemed to take Ismael by surprise.

Ibai nodded. “I suppose you would. Especially now. I’d have doubts, too.”

“There’s no need for you to worry about any of these things. Let’s just keep playing the game.”

“Life’s not a game, Papa. You taught me that.”

Ismael just blinked at him.

“But, if it WERE a game, then it’d be a really difficult one with way too many moving pieces and poorly defined rules. And hidden objectives, too. That would be the most unfair part, I think. Sometimes, the game would tell you to do one thing when you really needed to do something else.””

"1049

Ismael only returned a heavy-eyed stare.

Briefly, Ibai wondered if he could put the man to sleep by droning on long enough. If it weren’t for Rholtam’s presence, he might’ve tried.

"Papa. Let me be direct with you. I don't think anyone is going to prove my innocence for me. I think I will have to either do that myself or just run away and take all these problems with me."

"No, Ibai. I won't let you do that."

"Yeah, I didn't think you would. That's why I've always snuck out. That's why I never told you that I could sneak out anytime I wanted. And that's why I'm going to sneak out right now. Well, I guess it's not sneaking out anymore now that I'm telling you about it, huh?"

His father stood. "Ibai--!"

Ibai held up a hand. "Look, the point is, I'm not going to hurt anyone, and you're not going to hurt me, so you can't really stop me. But even if you were going to hurt me, you probably still couldn't stop me."

Ismael's brow depressed enough to make his eyes look like they might disappear beneath it. "Now you listen to me, mijoro. If you leave this place, the other Rainlords will hunt you down and kill you. Would you do that to your mother? To me? Don't you understand? You are our son. Everything we've done was to keep you safe from a world that hates you. You cannot simply throw all that away now."

Ibai placed the figurine back on the board and stood as well. "I understand, Papa. Protecting me is important to you." He moved around the table to give his father a hug. "But protecting you is important to me. And you've done more than enough already. So I'm going to go now. I intend to come back, but if I don't, then please don't worry about me. I will be fine." Then he let his father go. "Okay, bye."

"Ibai--" growled Ismael, but his voice was cut off as the aberration teleported away."

"1050

In a flash, Ibai was in an empty corridor. The cool sandstone beneath his toes reminded him that he'd left without putting shoes on. It was too late now, he supposed, but he regretted not wearing socks at least. Now he couldn't even pretend to be ice skating.

He knew his father and Rholtam would be hot on his heels, so he jumped again, this time two floors down, then once more into another hallway a couple rooms over.

"Oh, it's you!" came a sudden voice. "Careful where you pop in, man!"

Ibai looked around, but no one was there. Nor should there have been. He was certain that he hadn't seen any souls in this hallway when he teleported here.

"Running away, huh? Want some help?"

"Who's talking?" said Ibai. "Where are you?"

"Oh, right."

And abruptly, a ripple appeared in mid-air, distorting an area of Ibai's vision for a moment before a young man's face revealed itself. Then the neck, shoulders, and everything else followed. The clothes were clearly foreign--Steccati in origin, if Ibai wasn't mistaken. That country's attire was popular in movies, which was where this guy looked like he belonged. Ibai liked the sparkling jacket in particular.

"Sorry for the confusion," the guy said. "We're supposed to keep our presence hidden, but it's okay now, because someone else already screwed up. I won't get in trouble."

Ibai returned a big smile. "My name is Ibai. What's yours?"

"Reever," he said, smiling similarly.

And Ibai's gaze flickered as he realized. This man. Something about him. Already, Ibai was almost entirely certain that this person was an aberration. "You're like me," he said curiously.

"You can tell," said Reever. "Well, of course you can. You must be a monster by now, huh? I've never met one of us who was as old as you."

"1051

Rather than responding, Ibai merely broadened his smile.

"By the way," Reever said, "why have you been letting these people hold you captive? We've all been wondering what you were even doing here."

"We?" said Ibai. "There are more aberrations here?"

"Oh yeah. There are six of us. All with Invisibility like me. You wanna--?" Reeveer broke himself off to stare behind Ibai, then said, "Oh, come on. Those buttoholes out front already screwed up the mission for everyone. No way things'll stay quiet until the Saqqafs show up, so we might as well take this guy with us now."

"Who are you talking to?" said Ibai.

"Oh, right, here." Reeveer waved his left hand, and another figure was revealed, this time behind Ibai.

"No, you idiot, don't--!" the new person was saying as the invisible facade fell away, but as soon as he realized that Ibai was looking at him, he shut his mouth.

"Hello there," said Ibai. "And what's your name?"

The man frowned but still said, "Arnold. Nice to meet you."

After a second, Ibai noticed the toy figurine floating behind the man's back. A reaper. So Arnold was not an aberration, then. Ibai was getting the distinct impression that these folks were not supposed to be here. "So why have you come to Dunehall? And why were you hiding?"

"It's complicated," said Reeveer. "Anyway, how about I help you get out of here? With my power, even reapers won't be able to sense your presence."

Ibai bobbed his head. "You don't say. How many people can you conceal at one time?"

"Me? Only about fifty or so, still. But I'm working on it."

Arnold shifted his feet. "Why don't we talk about this somewhere else? It's not safe here."

"1052

Reeveer shrugged. "Don't be rude. He's just curious. It's in our nature. You can't expect an aberration to join you if you don't answer his questions first. That's simple diplomacy."

"Their reapers can still sense us," said Arnold.

Reever waved his hand again. "And now they can't."

At first, Ibai didn't realize that anything had changed, but then he noticed the faint glow around everything. And it became gradually more prominent, until the hallway around them was all but burning, as if an ethereal fire had descended upon the entire world, excepting only the four of them. Reever, Arnold, and the unnamed reaper all looked just as they did before.

However, when Ibai looked around another time, he saw that there were actually several more servants and reapers in the room than Reever had previously allowed him to see.

Ibai gave them all a wide grin. "Hello!"

The many new faces stared at him. But only briefly. Then they broke into smiles of their own.

"Heya, big man!"

"How the heck are ya, pal?!"

"You gotta tell us! How'd you end up here all by yourself?!"

"Didn't you hear? He was born into one of the families."

"What?! That can't be right, can it?!"

"Dunno, let's ask him."

Reever stepped next to Ibai and put up his hands. "Alright, alright. Don't smother the poor guy." He turned to Ibai. "We have been wondering, though. If you wouldn't mind answering. Were the Rainlords studying you?"

Ibai pursed his lips. "Pretty much, yeah. But speaking of burning questions. You never really answered me. What are you all doing here? Because--and correct me if I'm wrong--but it seems like you're planning some kind of attack." Reever's brief mention of Hahl Saqqaf had not escaped his notice."

"1053

“Well, of course we are,” said someone else. “It’s kind of what we do. We’re dicks.”

“That’s D-I-C,” added Reeve. “Deep Infiltration and Cover. That’s our sect. Everyone just calls us dicks, though.”

“As they should. We voted on the name.”

“Did we? I didn’t.”

“Yeah, because you’re new. Dumbass.”

“I just think we should have a name that’s more professional-sounding or something.”

“Like what, huh?”

“I dunno--like, well, the Vanguard has that watcher’s division, right? We’re basically like them, only cooler. So we should have a similar-but-cooler name, right? Like the Infilifilers.”

“That’s not a word.”

“Yeah, but it’s like a combination between infiltrators and defilers. Infilifilers. What do you guys think?”

“Y’know, I actually kinda like it.”

“Yeah, me too.”

“Sounds retarded.”

“Hey, fuck you, Ted.”

“Yeah, Ted, shut the fuck up.”

“Me shut the fuck up? No, you shut the fuck up!”

“You wanna dance, fat man?!”

“Bring it on, choads! I could kill you both with my left ass cheek!”

“Oh, I--!”

“Everyone,” interrupted a soft voice, “please be quiet. Remember that we are still in the middle of a mission.”

And they actually did. Perhaps they were more disciplined than they seemed, Ibai thought. Or perhaps they were simply afraid of that little voice. Ibai's attention shifted to the similarly little man that it belonged to. If not for the full mustache, Ibai might have mistaken him for a child.

The small man addressed Ibai now. "Greetings. My name is Caster Egmond, and while it is a pleasure to make your acquaintance, I must ask you to keep your voice down while we remain here." His smile was much fainter than everyone else's as he adjusted his gray tie.

With wide eyes, Ibai's curiosity had certainly been piqued by this person. By appearance alone, the man could have evoked a sense of harmlessness, but now that Ibai was observing more carefully, he could sense it. That vague pressure. The same thing he could feel from Uncle Mel."

"1054

"Very well," Ibai said, more quietly now. "What was that you said earlier about the mission being messed up? Is there already fighting going on somewhere nearby?"

"Ah," said Reeve, "itching to join, eh? Yeah, the guys out front revealed themselves to someone, and now they're scrambling to kill the guy before he makes it back here."

"You are not scrambling along with them?" Ibai asked.

"Orders from above," said Caster. "Besides, if we did that, we would lose many strategic positions. Even while invisible, it is quite time-consuming to move around this place without alerting anyone. If someone sees a door opening on its own or hears footsteps where there should be none, it could become problematic. And naturally, cameras only serve to complicate the issue."

Ibai tilted his head. "Who do you take your orders from? Any names I would recognize?"

"Certainly," said Caster. "Our sect answers directly to the Salesman. He is back at camp, if you would like to meet him."

By now, Ibai had more or less intuited that these people belonged to Abolish, but that name was more than enough confirmation. Ivan, the Salesman of Death. Widely regarded as one of Morgunov's strongest followers. "Back at camp?" Ibai asked. "He's not here at Dunehall?"

Reever shook his head. "Unfortunately, even aberrations wouldn't be able to hide his presence. But I'm sure he had other stuff to take care of, anyway."

"Hey, I heard the Monster was there, too," said Ted from earlier, not quite so loud this time.

"What? Why would the Monster be there?"

Ted gave a heaving shrug. "Heard he was looking for someone."

"Even if that is true, it is none of our concern," said Caster. And that was enough to shut them up again."

"1055

"Hmm," mused Ibai, stroking his bare chin.

"It seems you have a choice to make," said Caster. "Would you like to stay here with us and attack your captors? Or would you like to go meet Ivan?"

Indeed, there was a choice to be made, though it was not as Caster described. Unfortunately, however, Caster hadn't identified which of the reapers here was his own. The one nearest him could've just as easily belonged to Ted or Arnold, and if Ibai chose incorrectly, it would quite likely mean his death. And he didn't really feel like dying right now.

The preferred target, therefore, was perhaps Reever. Ibai gave him a friendly look as he thought about it, and then said, "Actually, at the moment, I'm most curious to meet these other aberrations you mentioned. Despite my age, I've not met many of our kind, you see."

"Oh, of course," said Reever. "I'll be sure to introduce you to all of them after the mission is over."

Ibai frowned. "You can't introduce me now? I'm a bit anxious. What if they die during the fight?"

"That is not possible," said Caster. "The mission takes precedence, and it would be imprudent to interrupt the others.”

“I see,” said Ibai. He nodded as he threw another look around the room. “Well, then...” His gaze landed back on Caster, who merely returned an unwavering stare.

The little man was still sizing him up, it seemed. Was he figuring it out? No, probably just being vigilant.

Regardless, Ibai only saw one course of action left to him. He wasn’t going to be able to kill Caster or Reeve by himself. But they didn’t know that.

Ibai teleported behind Reeve and wrapped an arm around him. “We’ll be back,” he lied as he blinked away with the other aberration in tow.”
"1056

With a fresh hallway all to themselves, Ibai kept his shadow out to swarm around Reeve. He didn’t use it to actually hold him down, knowing Reeve could probably tear right through it. Instead, he used it only for intimidation--a cluster of brown spears all pointed at Reeve’s head.

“I’m gonna need you to release your power now,” said Ibai. “Let only the two of us remain invisible.”

“Er--I’m really not supposed to do that.”

Ibai pushed the spears closer. “Please? I’d like to talk to you, but you need to do that first. Privacy, you see.”

“Aha. Okay. Fine.” Reeve waved a hand. “Done.”

Ibai used another teleport to check the man’s work. Indeed, he was able to see the souls of the Abolishers suspended in the ethereal void above them now. In a new room again, Ibai relaxed his shadow somewhat. “Thank you.”

Reeve shifted slightly, still held fast with Ibai’s arm, but didn’t struggle any more than that. “Would you mind letting me go now?”

“In a minute. Ask me a question.”

“What?”

“Ask me a question,” Ibai repeated. “I’m sure you have one in mind. A very pressing one, hmm? Go on. Ask away.”

Reever took a moment. “What’s your favorite color?”

Ibai brought the spears back, closer than ever before now, making Reever tense up. “Come on,” said Ibai. “That’s not the one.”

“Why are you doing this?” Reever asked.

“There you go. That’s the right question.” He pulled the spears back another time. “I’m doing this because your time in Abolish has clearly caused you to forget what being an aberration is all about. Assuming they even let you learn it in the first place.”

“What are you talking about?” said Reever.”

"1057

“I’m talking about fun,” said Ibai. “Being an aberration is all about enjoying yourself.”

Reever was indignant. “I know that! I am having fun!”

“No, you aren’t. Don’t you see? This is just some boring mission. Abolish has tricked you in order to take advantage of your power.”

“Nuh-uh! Sneaking around and surprising people is super fun!”

“Sneaking? Sure. Waiting around for orders? No. Which is exactly what you were doing just now. Waiting for Hahl Saqqaf to show up so you could ambush them, right? How dull!”

“Well... that’s true, but... it wasn’t so bad... And the pay off would’ve been--”

“Tch. You poor thing. They’ve really sunken their claws into you, haven’t they?” He let Reever go. “Let your Uncle Ibai teach you a few things.”

Reever turned to face him. “What things?”

“Well, for example, this mission: where’s the fun in slaughtering your opponents before they even realize what’s happened? We aberrations thrive on chaos. Literally, our power in a fight depends on our capacity to enjoy ourselves therein. So tell me, how are we meant to enjoy anything if the battle ends before it even begins?”

“Ah, well... I suppose you have a point.”

“Of course I do. That’s why we can’t just ambush the Rainlords like this. We have to reveal everyone’s presence and let the fight really get rolling.”

Reever pursed his lips and squinted. “Hmm. But what about our comrades?”

“Eh, they’ll be fine.”

“You think?”

“Sure! Caster will take care of them.”

“I don’t know. These Rainlords seem pretty dangerous.”

“That’s why it’ll be great! Who ever enjoyed a fight with a weak opponent, huh? No one, that’s who!”

“I’m still not sure...”

“Alright. Fair enough. Clearly, we require a third opinion here. We should ask one of our brothers.”

Reever nodded. “Good idea. One second. Let me see who’s closest.””
"1058

Ibai observed Reever carefully. He’d had a suspicion that the guy would be able to find the other Invisibility users for him. Presumably, they needed some means of maintaining communication, even during their deep cover operations.

But all Reever did was place his hand in front of his own eyes like a blindfold and then look around. “There. Over two rooms. You’ll want to appear next to the hearth so as to avoid bumping into anyone.”

“Alright,” said Ibai, preparing to jump again. “My favorite color is obviously brown by the way.”

--+-+--+--

Emiliana couldn't stop staring. The rifts in her vision were beginning to drive her mad. The stationary ones were no longer bothering her, though--or at least, not as much. Inconvenient as it might have been, she felt like she could get accustomed to having her vision uniformly obscured. But the rifts that moved. Those were another story.

Why were they moving? Were they the result of something that was moving inside of her eyes now? Not the most comforting question, she felt.

So she stared at them, determined to discern some kind of useful information for herself.

And gradually, she did.

They weren't the product of something living inside of her eyes, she decided, because if that were the case, then the rifts should have moved all over the place, up the walls and onto the ceiling and even across her family member's faces.

But they didn't.

They were a bit disorienting to look at, almost to the point of forcing her to turn away, but they didn't actually move that much. They stayed on the ground, hovered around the door, and generally kept their distance from everyone. Their movements were bound by the room, she realized, not her eyesight.

Which confused her even more. If they weren't caused by something inside her eyes, then what were they?"

"1059

Emiliana looked toward her family. Marcos and Ramira were sat on opposite sides of their unconscious father. Each child had a book in hand, though Shenado and Chergoa both floated behind Marcos, reading along with him and trading commentary. Apparently, they were in disagreement over the merits of its contents.

‘Agh, this book is even more idiotic than I expected,’ Shenado was saying.

‘That’s pretty harsh,’ said Chergoa. ‘The original was written a thousand years ago. It’s only natural that it’s become a bit dated.’

‘A bit? The author treats all these things as if they’re real.’

‘Maybe they were. Depends on who you ask.’

‘Ugh, you WOULD say that. You’re as bad as Axiolis, sometimes.’

‘You’re very closed-minded, you know that?’

‘Really? Okay, so you’re saying that you think this three-headed lion monster might have existed at some point?’

‘Well, maybe not THAT one...’

‘Of course not THAT one! Or ANY of them!’

“So if it never existed, then where did the idea come from?” asked Marcos.

Shenado hovered around him, her wispy blue flames crackling silently.

‘Wonderful question, darling. The three-headed lion is merely a symbolic representation of the War of the Three Sands that some group of idiots actually took seriously.’

“Oh. That’s a little disappointing...”

‘Perhaps so,’ said Shenado, ‘but it’s important to keep a clear picture of reality. It’s good that you’re thinking critically about the world around you. It’s best not to simply accept things like this at face value.’

‘That is very true,’ added Chergoa. ‘But I think it’s alright to leave ourselves a bit of wiggle room for the stuff of legends. Who doesn’t love a nice dose of mystery and wonder every now and again?’

‘You want mystery and wonder? The natural world is full of it. Ramira knows what I’m talking about. Marcos, ask her about arachnids.’

The boy frowned. “I’d rather not...”

"1060

‘Okay, so maybe not the three-headed lion monster,’ said Chergoa, ‘but what about the ONE-headed lion monster that it’s based on? The arasaba could have been real, I think. I remember reports of sightings in the olden days.’

‘Those reports were never substantiated,’ said Shenado. ‘And really? Reports of a lion-like monster? Gee. I wonder what could someone have possibly mistaken it for. Perhaps an ACTUAL lion?’

‘In the desert, though?’

‘Most of those reports didn’t come from the desert. They came from people returning to the desert after having spent time abroad. And the ones that were from the desert? Easily mirages. That would also explain why the arasaba seems to possess the convenient ability to turn itself into sand.’

Chergoa gave a glowing shrug. ‘Your cynicism saddens me. Don’t the Rainlords have their own monster like this, too?’

‘The lhugleoth, yes.’

‘You don’t think that could have existed, either?’

‘Of course not. It could breathe ice.’

‘So can Zeff.’

‘Ah--that’s different, and you know it.’

‘I know no such thing. Reapers aren’t the only ones who can bend the rules, y’know. Tell me, Marcos, have you ever heard of the Jaskadan Forest?’

He shook his head as he eyed the reaper curiously.

‘Oh, then--’ But Chergoa stopped herself. She held there a moment, hovering in silence, then looked to Shenado. ‘Did you sense that?’

‘Something is going on downstairs,’ the other reaper said.

‘But did you--? Those souls. Were they there before? Am I going crazy?’

‘I’m not sure,’ said Shenado. ‘I wasn’t really paying attention to things down there, but that did feel odd...’

Emiliana turned back to the rifts in the room. They were still moving around, but not by much. They hadn't strayed any closer."

"1061

'Do you sense anything else?' asked Chergoa.

'Like what?' said Shenado.

'I don't know. Where is my brother? I can't find him or Hector.'

'They probably just went to have a look around the city.'

The more she stared at the rifts and the more she listened, the more Emiliana began to feel a knot growing in her chest. 'Chergoa,' she finally said.

'What?' the reaper said privately.

'There's something in the room with us.'

The reaper paused. 'What do you mean?'

'I see something in here with us. I don't think I'm hallucinating. You don't sense anything?'

'No, I don't. What does it look like?'

'It's like... light is being bent. Distorted. They look like, just... weird lumps in empty space.'

'They? You see more than one?'

'I see four. And they're moving. Chergoa, they're moving like people move.'

The reapers didn't respond, and Emiliana didn't turn around to look at them again. She kept her eyes forward, staring through her mask at each of the rifts before her, waiting.

Then Ramira walked into her vision, headed for the door. "I want to see," she said.

Emiliana's one clawless hand shot out and grabbed her little sister by the arm. Ramira jumped at her touch, and Emiliana pulled her closer, realizing she'd scared her. "Sorry," she said. "Not just yet. Let's stay here."

Ramira seemed hesitant. "Why?"

Emiliana reached into the big front pocket of her gray hoodie. She felt for the compact firearm there and found it. She pulled it free, using Ramira's body to help keep it concealed, and pushed it hilt-first against the little girl's stomach. "Trust me," said Emiliana, looking past her sister's head. "Don't make a fuss, or there will be trouble. Understand?" She felt Ramira take the weapon.

"...I understand."

"1062 -- CXXI."

Emiliana noticed one of the rifts twitching. It began moving slowly closer, and the others followed. She supposed she could be jumping to conclusions about what these rifts were. She had no real evidence that they were hostile, but her mother's cynicism was telling her that if they were friendly, they would not be hiding themselves from everyone else. And after everything she'd been through, she was not about to take chances with the lives of her family.

Emiliana locked eyes with Ramira as she waited for the right moment, keeping the rifts in her peripheral vision. The distance had to be perfect. And when it was, Emiliana leapt out from behind her sister, claws-first.

And at the center of the nearest rift, she found blood.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-One: 'Thy boiling will...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Marcos hardly had time to understand what was going on. He'd noticed Shenado and Chergoa giving each other strange looks, and then Shenado gave him a private and incredibly vague warning that something was about to happen, but then Emiliana was suddenly slashing at thin air and apparently tearing bloody chunks out of it.

Shenado grabbed his shoulder, and he felt the undead vigor burn through him. This wasn't his first experience with it, as he'd been practicing periodically, but it was certainly the first time he'd had to actually use it.

He wasn't sure what to do. He merely watched as Chergoa bolted over to Emiliana, who was already spinning around to kick a second invisible opponent.

However, when he saw a spiked block of bluish-white metal crash into her and slam her against the far wall, Marcos didn't require any more information. His mother's training took hold, and he reached for the firearm that Emiliana had discreetly given him after Luzo."

"1062 -- CXXI.

Emiliana noticed one of the rifts twitching. It began moving slowly closer, and the others followed. She supposed she could be jumping to conclusions about what these rifts were. She had no real evidence that they were hostile, but her mother's cynicism was telling her that if they were friendly, they would not be hiding themselves from everyone else. And after everything she'd been through, she was not about to take chances with the lives of her family.

Emiliana locked eyes with Ramira as she waited for the right moment, keeping the rifts in her peripheral vision. The distance had to be perfect. And when it was, Emiliana leapt out from behind her sister, claws-first.

And at the center of the nearest rift, she found blood.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-One: 'Thy boiling will...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Marcos hardly had time to understand what was going on. He'd noticed Shenado and Chergoa giving each other strange looks, and then Shenado gave him a private and incredibly vague warning that something was about to happen, but then Emiliana was suddenly slashing at thin air and apparently tearing bloody chunks out of it.

Shenado grabbed his shoulder, and he felt the undead vigor burn through him. This wasn't his first experience with it, as he'd been practicing periodically, but it was certainly the first time he'd had to actually use it.

He wasn't sure what to do. He merely watched as Chergoa bolted over to Emiliana, who was already spinning around to kick a second invisible opponent.

However, when he saw a spiked block of bluish-white metal crash into her and slam her against the far wall, Marcos didn't require any more information. His mother's training took hold, and he reached for the firearm that Emiliana had discreetly given him after Luzo."

"1063

Marcos fired at thin air, aiming where Emiliana's targets had been. spurts of blood guided his aiming as he moved toward Ramira, who'd started shooting even before he did. The little girl was on the move as well, trying to avoid the cluster of metal spikes that were shooting up from the floor.

One of them found her. It skewered her shoe, and she screamed as she fell to the floor. In the next moment, Marcos was there, scooping her up with one arm and pulling her out of the next spike's path. But there were still more to evade, and one of them caught his left leg, which it then began coating with newly materializing metal, trying to slow him down.

Marcos dropped to the floor with his sister still in his grasp, scrambling to shield her with his body.

That was when the room heaved, throwing everything into confusion, and briefly, Marcos thought there'd been some kind of explosion or earthquake.

And then he saw the crystalline spears. The area by the door was completely filled. Glassy pillars, so numerous and densely packed that they almost looked like a wall. The only anomaly among their brilliantly clear bodies was the blood, long streaks of crimson, splattered and dripping and pooling on the floor.

He looked around for Lord Asad, thinking it must've been the Sandlord's doing, but instead, he saw his father, standing at the foot of the bed he'd been using only moments ago. It hadn't been glass. It had been ice.

"Pa!" said Marcos. He wanted to rush over and hug him, but he was still mindful of Ramira's injury. By the time he made it to his feet again, he realized that something was off.

His lord father was just standing there, silent, face drawn downward. Axiolis was still attached to his back and also saying nothing."

"1064

Emiliana was closest and approached him first. "Papa?"

No response.

Shenado floated over to Zeff now. 'Unbelievable,' she said as she inspected his face. 'He's still asleep.'

Marcos didn't understand. "What?"

'Your father protected you unconsciously,' said Shenado. 'I've heard about things like this happening, but I've never seen it myself... Wow.'

'Instinctive knowledge and awareness,' said Chergoa, hovering up behind Emiliana. 'You don't need to be a servant to possess those things. Still, I am quite--'

Ramira's muffled cries interrupted her.

"She needs help!" said Marcos.

'Bring her over to the bed and take her shoe off,' said Shenado. 'Emiliana?'

The older sister was already rifling through the far cupboards for supplies. Chergoa told her to try under the bed, where she found a first aid kit. Emiliana took over for Marcos in sterilizing and dressing the wound.

Of all the things their mother taught them, Marcos had always thought this would be the least valuable. He'd figured that once they became servants, they would have no need of such skills, but now he saw how wrong he'd been.

As Emiliana finished her work, Chergoa picked up the conversation again.

‘What do you think? Should we leave or stay put?’

‘We seem to be safe for the moment, but we don’t know enough about the situation to be sure. Asad and Dimas are both relatively close. We should meet up with one of them.’

‘Agreed,’ said Chergoa. ‘Em, how’s about you help Big Papa Elroy here walk with us?’

Marcos watched Emiliana place a hesitant hand on the man’s back. She had to take the lead, but just as Chergoa had said, Zeff began to keep pace with her.

Marcos picked Ramira up again and then stopped. “Uh. There’s still a wall of ice in the way...”

"1065

“Papa?” was all Emiliana had to say, and the ice dematerialized. The bodies of Zeff’s victims were still not visible, Marcos noticed, but there was so much blood that it dripped from the ceiling and splashed against a dozen red puddles on the floor.

With her arm around one of Zeff’s, Emiliana led everyone out of the room, and together, the Elroys left blood-soaked footprints as they made their way down the hall.

-+--+--+-

Dunehall was finally in sight again. The constant assault from every direction made it feel like he was running underwater. He’d tried launching himself on platforms, only to be knocked off course and forced back to the ground. He couldn’t remotely make out what was hitting him. In the low light, it was just an indistinguishable flurry of shit, but he had little doubt that it had all been materialized.

The shield did its job, though, and he pushed onward, recreating his full plate armor each time it was destroyed. On that front, he was also seeing progress. At first, the armor had only lasted a few seconds before being melted away or exploded apart, leaving his shield-strengthened flesh to weather the brunt of the force; but now, the armor was lasting longer, and while Hector had a vague idea why that was, he didn't have time to stop and question right now. He only knew that he wanted his armor to be stronger and that his soul power was making it happen.

'Garovel,' Hector thought in the middle of a fully armored sprint, 'can you sense Asad yet?'

He waited, but there was no answer.

'Garovel!'

A pair of deep piping noises demanded his attention, and Hector rolled through a picket fence to his right, out of the way of two destructive paths that dug up the sidewalk and sent chunks of dirt and concrete and splintered wood flying past him."

"1066

Hector pushed on through the debris. If he couldn't rely on Garovel, then he would just have to find Lord Asad himself. He materialized a cloud of iron dust ahead of him in order to scout out for any more invisible opponents in his path.

There were at least a dozen.

Hector summoned a field of spikes over the whole area but didn't stop moving for a moment. With a flourish of his free hand, he annihilated a path for himself. His opponents were already doing similarly for themselves.

'...Agh, Hector...'

'Garovel?!'

'Go to... shards...'

'Shards?'

Another string of explosions stole his attention, nearly knocking him off his feet. He stumbled through a wall of smoke and fire but found his balance again and kept stomping onward. He'd nearly reached the underground entrance.

‘Garovel?’

The reaper did not respond.

Hector racked his brain as he ran. Shards? What shards? Was that supposed to help him locate Asad? How would--?

And it hit him. He knew exactly where to go now.

The doors on the underground entrance flew from their hinges as Hector bulldozed through and stormed up the nearest staircase. It was time for another cloud of iron dust, he decided, and sure enough, there were plenty more hostiles waiting for him down the next hallway.

There was nothing for it, he supposed. He just had to push through. He leaned even farther into his run and prepared to weather still more shit.

Something changed, however. In an instant, all of his opponents were suddenly visible. It happened so suddenly that he lost focus and nearly stumbled.

A path of destruction caught his shield, which took the attack admirably, but the impact still put him through a wall. He brought down a line of bathroom stalls and landed on his back."

"1067 -- CXXII.

Hector knew he didn't have time to stay down. He rolled off the pile of lavatorial debris he'd made and sprinted for the door, but a string of explosions sent him through another wall instead. He could hardly tell what was happening, but he could hear acid hissing against his armor and feel the fumes burning his nostrils. He found himself in a darker room this time, perhaps some kind of storage closet, but he didn't get the opportunity to check, instead hearing that deep piping sound closing in again.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Two: 'Diversion of Fire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The evening fete was finally underway. There had to be hundreds of people here, most with very recognizable faces. Unfortunately, he needed to find a face that he didn't recognize. At the moment, all he had to go on was a name.

"Jimmy, don't walk so fast!" came that agonizing voice.

The last twenty-four hours had been an exercise in patience, thanks to that voice--or rather, thanks to the person it belonged to.

He had to resist the urge to break out into a run. "Yes, Miss Reach," he said instead.

"What're you in such a hurry for, anyway?" She held her hand out for her purse, and he gave it to her. She retrieved a compact mirror from it, checked her face for half a second, and then promptly returned it to him. "Excited to see someone?"

"Something like that."

"Mm," she mused. Even among all the fanciful dress around, her attire stuck out. The strings of feathers in her blond hair and the huge sleeves on her long dress gave it a faintly tribal look, even if the colors on it were probably too varied and bright. "Well, if you're nice to me, maybe I'll go talk to whoever it is you're interested in."

"Impossible," he said."

"1067 -- CXXII.

Hector knew he didn't have time to stay down. He rolled off the pile of lavatorial debris he'd made and sprinted for the door, but a string of explosions sent him through another wall instead. He could hardly tell what was happening, but he could hear acid hissing against his armor and feel the fumes burning his nostrils. He found himself in a darker room this time, perhaps some kind of storage closet, but he didn't get the opportunity to check, instead hearing that deep piping sound closing in again.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Two: 'Diversion of Fire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The evening fete was finally underway. There had to be hundreds of people here, most with very recognizable faces. Unfortunately, he needed to find a face that he didn't recognize. At the moment, all he had to go on was a name.

"Jimmy, don't walk so fast!" came that agonizing voice.

The last twenty-four hours had been an exercise in patience, thanks to that voice--or rather, thanks to the person it belonged to.

He had to resist the urge to break out into a run. "Yes, Miss Reach," he said instead.

"What're you in such a hurry for, anyway?" She held her hand out for her purse, and he gave it to her. She retrieved a compact mirror from it, checked her face for half a second, and then promptly returned it to him. "Excited to see someone?"

"Something like that."

"Mm," she mused. Even among all the fanciful dress around, her attire stuck out. The strings of feathers in her blond hair and the huge sleeves on her long dress gave it a faintly tribal look, even if the colors on it were probably too varied and bright. "Well, if you're nice to me, maybe I'll go talk to whoever it is you're interested in."

"Impossible," he said."

"1068

Her face scrunched up. "What's impossible? I could talk to anyone here tonight! Why do you think they invited me, huh? I am a goddess in this country! They love my movies!"

"No, I was talking about being nice to you. No way I'm doin' that."

"Ugh! Again with this?! Why did my agent even hire you?!"

"Because you fired your last ten assistants over stupid shit, and now no one else wants this job?"

"What?! How dare you talk to me like that!"

"I'm sorry, Miss Reach."

“Oh, you’re sorry?! You’re sorry?!”

“Nah, I was just being polite.”

“WHAT?! I will can your ass so quickly--”

“Hey, isn’t that your ex-boyfriend?”

She stopped cold and looked where he was pointing. As soon as she spotted the other man, she spun back around. “Oh my god!” she whispered “What is he doing here?!”

“I imagine he was invited.”

She pressed her lips together a moment. “Is he with someone?”

“Looks like it.”

“Is she pretty?”

“Oh yeah.”

“Shit!”

“Why don’t you go talk to him?”

“Are you kidding?! No!”

“Well, I think he noticed you.”

“What?!”

“Yeah, he’s coming this way.”

“Shit shit shit! I didn’t bring a date! Jimmy, you have to distract him--”

“Too late.”

Miss Reach spun around, all smiles. “Darius! Sweetie! Great to see you!”

Darius returned a smile of his own. “You look well, Madison. Ah, and this is Amanda, of course. I’m sure you know of her.”

“Of course!” said Madison. “You were amazing in Elementary Love! Really knocked it out of the park! Y’know, I’m surprised we haven’t met before, actually! We should definitely do lunch sometime!”

The other woman gave a nod and a placid smile. "And who is this?"

"1069

"Oh, this is my date," said Madison, pulling him closer. "Jimmy. James, I mean. He's--" She hesitated as she glanced at Darius. "He's not from around here."

"Interesting." Darius offered a hand. "You seem a bit underdressed, friend. Not that I'm one to judge people on that sort of thing."

After a beat, he took Darius' handshake with a confident laugh. "Oh yeah, the outfit. Don't tell anyone, but I'm actually a billionaire in disguise. This is all a very delicate undercover operation."

And to the man's credit, Darius returned a laugh of his own, though it seemed more polite and uncertain than actually amused. Darius turned his attention back to Madison.

Their conversation meandered between pleasantries and probably a few veiled jabs at one another, but he wasn't interested enough to keep listening. Instead, he scanned the crowd and tried to focus on the other conversations going on around him. Though, really, his search would be dramatically simplified if he could just spot one of those ethereal crows.

Then came the interruption that he'd been expecting for the last hour.

'So how's it going?'

'Fine,' he said.

'You sure? 'Cuz I can still book it on over there, if you need me.'

'I don't.' Having a reaper following him around would just give his position away to any other servants here. But she knew that already and was probably just bored.

'You find your lead yet?' she asked.

'Still looking.'

'I really hope this one pans out. Why isn't there just like a number we can call, huh? A hotline or something. You'd think someone called the Peacemaker would be easier to make contact with.'

'You should tell her that after we find her.'

'I know you're being sarcastic, but fuck you, maybe I will.'"

"1070

As he surveyed the crowd for the tenth time, trying to put a bit more distance between himself and Miss Reach, his ears finally caught whiff of a promising conversation.

"--oh, the Hammer?" an elderly man's voice was saying. "You mean that old lummoX has finally returned?"

"Oh yes," said the voice of an elderly woman. "Hadn't you heard?"

"What prompted--? Oh, the war! Of course! Wow. So does that mean he's back for good, now that it's done?"

"Who knows? I can't imagine the Peacemaker's people will be too pleased about it, though."

"Mm. They have gotten comfortable here, haven't they? They'll probably worry that he's come to stir up trouble."

"You know, I hope he has. It's been so dreadfully dull around here, and I can think of a few folks who deserve a right good thrashing."

"Oh, you terrible woman! Not that I disagree, though!"

They shared a laugh, which devolved into hacking coughs on both sides.

As he listened to them slowly recovering, he couldn't help glancing in their direction. Unless his eyes deceived him, that old man used to be Steecat's Chief Treasurer, while the old woman had been the Chief of Defense. He might not have recognized them if he hadn't done his homework on all of the attendees tonight.

As soon as their phlegm-filled intermission ended, the old woman spoke up again. "Honestly, young people today have gotten too full of themselves. And why? Because of a few movies?"

"We've become a nation of entertainers, it seems."

"Don't I know it! All the glitz and glamour has gone to their heads--and this, in spite of the fact that they're clearly this country's softest generation since the Hammer left."

"Mm. Steccati aristocracy--it's become synonymous with 'high art.' Whatever that means."

"1071

"As far as I see it, the Hammer can do nothing but good things for this nation."

"Maybe our young folk'll finally have a real role model to look up to for a change."

"Wouldn't that be nice. Assuming they even know who he is!"

"Oh, don't even joke! They must, surely? The man is practically a founding father, for goddess' sake."

"I don't know. I wouldn't be surprised if they claim to have never heard the name Kane before in their lives. If it's not a musician or a movie star, they probably--"

He wasn't sure he wanted to keep eavesdropping, but after another moment, it didn't matter, because Miss Reach was pulling him away, having apparently concluded her conversation with Darius.

"Ugh, that was a nightmare," she said, already looking like she was ready to leave. But then she rounded on him. "And you! What the hell was that, huh, Jimmy?! There's no way he believed you! I've never seen anyone so bad at lying!"

"I'm sorry, Miss Reach."

"Agh, whatever. I guess I can't really blame you. Dressed like that, there's not much you could've done, anyway."

Indeed, his generic coachman's hat and coat probably hadn't impressed Darius very much. He noticed, however, Miss Reach had not let go of his arm yet. And it seemed she was not going to, now that he was supposed to be making Darius jealous.

This was far from ideal. He wasn't sure how much actual scouting he would be able to get done if he had to be anchored to this woman for the rest of the night.

After a while of superficial mingling and no progress, he was beginning to grow restless and was actually relieved at the soundless interruption for a change.

'Hey, Roman, why is your plan so boring?'

'It's not... that boring,' he said.

'It's pretty boring,' said Voreese."

"1072

Another look around the fete had Roman agreeing with her. 'Yeah, it is... But I'm trying to not get us killed. That's important, you know.'

'Yeah, whatever.'

'I did find out that the Hammer of Steccat has returned from Jesbol, though. That's something, right?'

'No,' she said flatly. 'You're not there to learn about the Vanguard, you shit burger.'

'Yeah, I know that, you ass crack. But I don't even have a face to go on here.'

'Well, that sounds like your problem.'

'Well, it's not. If I don't find this 'Andalero' person, then all of this has been for nothing.'

'Have you asked Madison about the name? She probably knows lots of people.'

'Egh. I'd rather not get involved with her any more than I already am, but...'

'Use all resources at your disposal,' said Voreese.

‘Yeah, alright.’

Between all of the introductions and agonizingly light conversation, it was actually quite difficult to find the opportunity to ask Miss Reach anything, but after they sat down for a meal together, he finally managed it. “Do you know anyone named Andalero?”

Madison paused mid-bite, a chunk of her leafy salad dangling from her mouth. She stared at him as she finished chewing. “Is that supposed to be a joke?” she eventually asked. “If it is, it’s not funny.”

Roman returned a confused look. “Did I say something wrong? I wasn’t trying to upset you. And believe me, I’d tell you if I was.”

She pursed her lips at him, but then said, “Andalero isn’t someone’s name. It’s a club. A clique, really. One that Darius belongs to.”

“Oh. Sorry, I didn’t know.”

She just shook her head and went back to eating. There were other people at the table, but they’d given up trying to converse with her. Roman hadn’t really been paying attention to what she’d been doing, so he didn’t know what had put her in such a bad mood. Probably something to do with Darius, he figured.”

"1073

Regardless, he had something to go on now. If nothing else tonight panned out, he could at least resort to following Darius around in order to find out more about this Andalero group.

He considered asking Madison for more information, but he didn’t think he could manage it without arousing her suspicion. Instead, he stood up from the table. “Bathroom,” he said. “Back in a bit.”

Miss Reach barely even acknowledged him.

Roman ventured off, navigating his way through the crowd as he searched for Darius’ face again. All he needed to do was plant a tracker on the man, and then he would be set. Any more intel he could gather after that point would just be a bonus, as far as he was concerned.

Unfortunately, Roman couldn’t find the damn guy. After a good ten minutes of looking, he was about to give up when something entirely different caught his attention.

A ghostly crow. Finally, a reaper. It was hovering next to a woman with rainbow-colored hair.

Roman averted his gaze just enough to keep the pair of them in his peripheral vision and moved closer until he could make out what the woman was saying.

--ha, that's very kind of you to say, but please, don't do anything dramatic on my account. I won't be staying long. I doubt anyone who's looking for me will bother you, but if they do, just cooperate and tell them everything. I can protect myself, I assure you. I'd feel much worse if something happened to you just for helping me."

"Ah. I do not like it, but as you wish."

"I'm glad you see things my way. Anyhow, I wanted to ask: is there any chance that we might see the Peacemaker here sometime tonight?"

Roman blinked as he kept listening."

"1074

"Oh, no, madame, I'm afraid there isn't," said the other voice. "From what I hear, she is quite busy abroad and won't be visiting us for another few months."

"Is that so? What a shame. I've been hoping to meet with her for a while now. Not an easy person to find, that one."

"Indeed, indeed, I know that problem well. Both the president and the prime minister have been attempting to coordinate a meeting with her for more than a year now. They haven't been very pleased by how little regard she seems to have for them."

"Mm, I'm sure to her, a five-year presidency feels like little more than a fad, at this point."

"They fear she sees them as children. I only worry that she would be justified in doing so. Some of their suggestions to me about how I might get her attention... they strike me as no better than tantrums."

The rainbow-haired woman laughed. "I do sympathize." She paused, perhaps for a drink. "But that's also why I come to you, Enrico, and not them. Middle management is always more reliable when push comes to shove, I've found."

"Upper middle, thank you."

"Of course."

Enrico cleared his throat. "Mm, but now you've made me curious. What business does the Vaghrakaanas have with Sai-hee, exactly?"

"I'm sorry, but I can't really give details."

"Oh, come on. You have to give me something. That's how we're able to maintain this lovely little give-and-take, you and I."

"Of course, but you never know who could be listening."

Roman scratched his nose and turned toward the banquet of hors-d'oeuvres behind him. They had crab puffs, he noticed. No sense in letting those go to waste just because he was working."

"1075

Enrico wasn't giving up, though. "Does that mean I can expect a nice bit of intel, later tonight?"

"Oh, you can expect much more than that, my bad little doggie."

Roman immediately began choking. Then he horked up the crab puff, which sailed right into the wine glass of the Steccati President, who was already staring right at him. Roman frowned and bit his lip at the same time.

They shared a moment of silent contemplation from different sides of the snack table, and then the other man slowly set his wine glass down. Roman fled into the crowd behind him.

He made his way back toward Madison, traumatized and determined to keep his head down for the remainder of the evening. His only solace was the fact that Voreese hadn't been here to see that.

His bath of hot shame was interrupted, however, when he spotted Madison's table from a distance, but saw someone leaning over his chair. Judging from the familiar suit, it was Darius. The man seemed to be whispering into Madison's ear as he eyed the crowd around them.

Suitably suspicious, Roman decided. Fortunately, he was still far enough away for Darius not to notice him, so he decided to resort to a new trick that he'd been working on.

He turned his body perpendicular to Darius and Madison, then rubbed his ear with one hand. A funnel of controlled particle vibrations extended out from his hand, completely invisible to the naked eye as it searched for the words coming out of Darius' mouth.

It required quite the delicate touch, this technique, and he still hadn't really mastered it yet, but after a few moments of careful tuning, Roman found what he was looking for.

"--never seen anything so pathetic," came Darius' voice. It was muddled but still clearly him. "It's incredible that you still think you belong here. It's incredible that you thought you ever could belong here."

Roman cocked an eyebrow and squinted as he listened."
"1076

"You think a few movies and a bit of fame have changed you?" Darius went on. "I suppose I can't blame you. I thought so, too, at one point. That's the only reason I ever bothered dating you. But I learned, so why can't you? You have no value, Madison. Those gaudy clothes are worth more than you are. You can play dress up all you like, but we both know the truth. You'll always be a junkie. And the only reason these people let you near them is because you amuse them. Their drug-addled little monkey."

Roman could hardly even process what he was hearing. Mostly, though, he didn't understand why Madison was just sitting there, listening to this. Granted, he didn't really know her very well, but he would've expected her to tear Darius' head off by this point. It made no sense.

Or wait--was she actually listening to him? Maybe she'd fallen asleep or something. Roman's view of her was obscured by Darius' head, so he couldn't be sure. He refocused his hearing another time, trying to find Madison's voice. There was something there, behind Darius' rambling. Breathing? Uneven, maybe. Erratic. And slight hiccups, perhaps? Faint, but-- Roman's expression went completely blank as he realized.

She was crying.

And Darius was still going. "But hey, it's not your fault that you came from trash. Both parents addicts? You had no chance. Don't you see? No one understands you the way I do. You'll never find--" He cut himself off when he saw Roman pushing through the crowd toward him and stood up straight. "Ah, Jimmy. Is something--?"

Roman punched him hard enough to break his own fist.

The man dropped like a sack of bricks, but he wasn't dead. Probably. Roman had deliberately not used his ability or soul power."

"1077

"Jimmy!" Madison shrieked, leaping out of her seat while still trying to brush the tears from her eyes.

Roman spared her a look as he nursed his hand. Admittedly, he'd never been very good at normal fighting. He'd been full of fiery confidence a second ago, but now that he was thinking about it more clearly, he might be in trouble if Darius decided to get back up.

Which he did. And then a few apparent buddies emerged from the crowd to join him.

"Gentlemen," Roman tried, "I'm sure you're all very reasonable. Your friend here had it coming. Just look at the young lady there. He was clearly upsetting her."

None of them so much as glanced at Miss Reach. "How dare you lay a hand on one of us, peasant," someone said.

Roman scratched his brow. "Did you just call me a peasant? I'm sorry, did we travel five hundred years into the past, or are you just an idiot?"

Surprisingly, that didn't seem to placate their anger.

And Roman sighed, knowing what was about to happen. In order to maintain his cover, he was gonna have to get his ass beat, at least until security got here. Assuming they would even bother to come help him.

‘Agh, I’m so bored,’ came Voreese’s unhelpful interruption. ‘This plan of yours is really unfair, you know. At least you get to enjoy all that ritzy, high society bullshit. Meanwhile, I’m stuck here with someone who can’t even see me.’

Roman watched them close in around him. ‘Well, it’s not the most enjoyable party I’ve ever been to.’

‘Oh, why? Do they not have those crab shits you like so much?’

He avoided the first punch, as well as the second, but the third caught him right on the jaw and sent him stumbling into the grip of a much larger man. ‘They’re not crab shits.’

‘Man, I wonder what Hector and Garovel are doing. Whatever it is, I bet it’s way better than this monotonous fuckery.’

‘Voreese. Gonna need you to shut up right now.’”
"1078 -- CXXIII.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Three: ‘O, rending union...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The ground rumbled again, this time with enough force that Emiliana had to stop moving so she didn’t trip. How her unconscious father managed to keep his footing with so little help from her, she had no idea.

‘Almost there,’ Chergoa assured her.

They’d descended a staircase already and fought their way through more invisible assailants, along with a few not-so-invisible ones. Emiliana didn’t know what prompted the change, but she wasn’t about to complain. It hardly seemed to make a difference to Zeff, either way.

It was enough to make Emiliana wonder just how far these “instincts” or whatever extended.

Finally, they found Asad. The Sandlord was holed up in the middle of a large chamber--the remains of a gallery, perhaps. The globular design with balconies all above them didn't exactly seem ideal. Emiliana felt like enemies could pour in from almost any direction, and perhaps Asad felt similarly, because it took him a moment to recognize them.

“Zeff?” Asad said, coming closer. He had a bag tied around his waist.

“He's not--” Emiliana wasn't sure how to explain. “He's not quite awake.”

Asad put a hand on the Lord Elroy's shoulder as he searched his sleeping face. “I'm glad you're all safe,” he said after a moment. “This is not the best place for you, however. You should--”

‘Incoming!’ Qorvass warned.

Fire and explosions rained down from the ceiling, and in an instant, a blanket of sand and water extinguished them before vanishing into thin air.

Emiliana expected more attackers to fall through the smoke, but none did. Instead, another big tremor shook the gallery, followed by silence.

‘Looks like Dimas got them,’ Chergoa informed her privately. ‘Not sure why he isn't joining us.’

"1078 -- CXXIII.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Three: ‘O, rending union...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The ground rumbled again, this time with enough force that Emiliana had to stop moving so she didn't trip. How her unconscious father managed to keep his footing with so little help from her, she had no idea.

‘Almost there,’ Chergoa assured her.

They'd descended a staircase already and fought their way through more invisible assailants, along with a few not-so-invisible ones. Emiliana didn't know what prompted the change, but she wasn't about to complain. It hardly seemed to make a difference to Zeff, either way. It was enough to make Emiliana wonder just how far these "instincts" or whatever extended.

Finally, they found Asad. The Sandlord was holed up in the middle of a large chamber--the remains of a gallery, perhaps. The globular design with balconies all above them didn't exactly seem ideal. Emiliana felt like enemies could pour in from almost any direction, and perhaps Asad felt similarly, because it took him a moment to recognize them.

"Zeff?" Asad said, coming closer. He had a bag tied around his waist.

"He's not--" Emiliana wasn't sure how to explain. "He's not quite awake."

Asad put a hand on the Lord Elroy's shoulder as he searched his sleeping face. "I'm glad you're all safe," he said after a moment. "This is not the best place for you, however. You should--"

'Incoming!' Qorvass warned.

Fire and explosions rained down from the ceiling, and in an instant, a blanket of sand and water extinguished them before vanishing into thin air.

Emiliana expected more attackers to fall through the smoke, but none did. Instead, another big tremor shook the gallery, followed by silence.

'Looks like Dimas got them,' Chergoa informed her privately. 'Not sure why he isn't joining us.'

"1079

'More on the right,' said Qorvass. 'No, wait, that's Hector and Garovel.'

Sure enough, the Atreyan lord came barreling through the door, clattering and sliding against the stony floor in battered armor. He chucked an iron boulder behind him, which smashed the hallway he'd come from.

The boulder shifted and crumbled, so Asad helped him out, and quartz spikes filled the corridor.

“Th-thank you,” said Hector between panting breaths. He shifted his shield from one hand to the other. “I was coming to warn you about them, but, uh...”

‘Glad to see you’re alright,’ said Chergoa.

Hector returned a nod as his armor destroyed and reshaped itself. “Do we know what they’re after?” he asked.

“No,” said Asad. He lifted the bag on his waist a moment, and Emiliana heard a glassy clinking from therein. “Might be these, though.”

Shenado interrupted. ‘No time to figure it out, I’m afraid. North entrance.’

Emiliana felt her father shift away from her grasp, and she looked up. “Papa?”

The man stepped in front of her. “Stand back,” said Zeff.

And she wanted to say something else, but she couldn’t find any words. It felt like ages since she’d heard his voice.

Marcos looked like he was about to shout something, but the north doors opened before he got the chance.

A small man strolled in and stopped on the far side of the room. “Greetings,” he called out in a soft voice. He had a reaper with him. “If it’s not too much trouble, would you mind answering a question for me?”

No one responded.

“Where did Darktide and the Seadevil go?”

Still no answer.

“They were in their rooms a minute ago,” he said, “but now, they’ve mysteriously vanished. You wouldn’t happen to know anything about that, would you?”

“1080

“Who are you?” Asad asked.

“Caster Egmond. Are you going to answer my question or continue to ignore me? I dislike impolite people, you know.”

“Uninvited guests are extremely impolite,” said Asad.

“Ha.” Caster bobbed his head. “I suppose you’ve got me there. But you know how it is. Orders being orders.”

Asad took a step forward. “What are you doing here, Marauder?”

“Ah, you know of me. How nice. And I know of you, Lion.”

“Of course you do.”

That made Caster laugh. “Cocky, for one so young.”

Zeff stepped silently next to Asad.

And Emiliana observed the ensuing staredown, able to feel the oppressive tension filling the whole chamber. The pressure of this Caster’s soul power was enough to tell her that he was no normal foe.

And yet, the sight of her father and Asad there, standing together before her--it was enough to make her feel, for a fleeting moment, as if no one in the world could possibly harm her.

--++--++--

If he was honest, Zeff didn’t entirely understand what was happening. Or where he was. Or why Asad was here. Or who the guy in the armor even was.

But he understood enough. Somehow, when he’d woken up, he already knew what he needed to. Or, more likely, that was why he’d woken up. Because of that person’s presence. That dangerous aura.

He’d heard of the Marauder of Calthos before. A man responsible for the destruction of dozens of towns over the last decade. A rising star among the Abolish elite. Abolish didn’t really have formal “ranks,” as far as Zeff was aware, but from all he knew, this man before them was probably near Parson’s level of strength.

Because of course he was.

Zepp might have been disappointed otherwise. He was growing accustomed to being perpetually overmatched."

"1081

'Ax?' Zepp tried, able to feel the reaper's presence there on his back.

There was no answer.

Zepp pushed him with his soul. 'Ax, wake up.'

'Ah--mm? What's happening? Zepp?'

'We're about to fight the Marauder of Calthos.'

'What? How the--?' The reaper gave an inaudible groan.

'Do you know what his ability is?' Zepp asked.

'No.'

On the other side of the room, Caster shifted. His reaper twitched, and Zepp and Asad both responded. A storm of ice and glass materialized in an instant and crashed down on Caster. Or looked like it did, at least. White shards flew in all directions, creating a cloud of sparkling dust, but it quickly cleared and revealed the expected: Caster was entirely unharmed.

The man's hands, however, had changed. They were scarcely visible, having become vague distortions in the air, pulsating in place.

Zepp grit his teeth, immediately recognizing the enormous problem before him.

'Oh god,' said Ax, horrified. 'Destruction with pan-rozum. Zepp, we can't win this.'

Zepp's mind went to his children. 'We can't lose it, either.' He concentrated, pushing himself, searching for the limit of his power. He hadn't had the opportunity to properly test himself since achieving emergence against Parson so many times.

One might consider that a problem, being ignorant of one's own capabilities, but Zeff also felt somehow strangely empowered by it, because at the moment, anything seemed possible. Even against an opponent with such an overwhelming soul as this, victory felt achievable.

Because it had to be.

Zeff's hand trembled as he made all the muscles in his arm go taut, pouring his focus into it. He wanted a pressurized drill. What he got was a hovering maelstrom of freezing water, larger than his whole body."

"1082

It swirled with quivering force, dozens of jet streams constantly creating and then annihilating themselves before they could fly out of Zeff's control. Over and over and over again. The result was a kind of drilling bomb, so fierce that it whipped up a whirlwind as it waited to tear into something.

He didn't know if he could even contain this thing. And he didn't have time to worry about it, either. He pressed his soul into it, strengthening it further still.

'Holy hell, Zeff.' Axiolis pressed himself into his servant's soul, and Zeff could feel the pan-forma merge beginning. 'Let me help before you kill us all, hmm?'

Of the three enhancements that forma afforded him, the heightened connectivity was the most immediately useful. It granted him a clearer picture of what he wanted in his mind and tighter control over the materialized particles. Most importantly, though, it allowed his creations to maintain themselves, once created. And as a result, within seconds of the merge, Zeff's bomb reshaped itself and stabilized.

Such was the nature of pan-forma. It aided in the maintenance of the body--not just for the wielder, but for that of their work, as well.

And it was fortunate timing, too, because the Marauder was already barreling toward them--a living path of destruction.

Asad acted before Zeff could, having apparently prepared something of his own, because his tattoos were already burning gold, even through his robes. But it was more than that. Everything happened so quickly that Zeff could hardly interpret what he was looking at, but he could've sworn that he saw Asad's tattoos moving, growing out of the man's body like golden snakes.

Asad took the Marauder's attack with freshly materialized, crystalline armor. The glass exploded against the impact, and Asad went flying back, straight over the children and into the wall behind them, leaving a vertical crater and a half-dozen fissures in Dunehall's stone.

But Caster had been made to stop. Or pause, at least. And Zeff saw his opening."

"1083

Zeff relied on pan-forma in order to tie the position states of every little piece of his creation to that of his left hand, allowing him to move the whole, chaotic mass at once with a flick of his wrist.

With all his strength, body and mind together, he slammed the bomb into Caster.

And indeed, the result was akin to an explosion. The flurry of water drills engulfed Caster all at once, and the Abolisher's destructive body tore into them, which made them tear into one another, setting all of that highly pressurized water off in a chain reaction. This, together with the already hectic air currents whirling around it, created a burst of wind and water that didn't just punch, but also shred.

The impact force was sustained for several seconds, as well, and Zeff had to hold his ground in front of everyone, annihilating every deadly dagger of soul-strengthened water that would have surely found them otherwise. A triangular safe zone with him at the tip. And even still, he earned himself several tears in his clothes and cuts on his face and arms. His flesh healed immediately, of course, and he annihilated the rest of the lingering mist so that he could see the Marauder.

The man had been blown back across the room, clothes in tatters and even some apparent distortions in his nearly invisible form. He seemed to be on one knee, translucent fingers having dug into the floor and left streaking claw marks therein.

A deep piping noise arrived, but it was different, sustained and reverberating and masking an alternate pitch inside it. After a moment, Zeff realized it wasn't an attack. It was the Marauder laughing.

"Interesting," Caster said in two voices, altered through the bassy filter of destruction. "We did not realize that we were facing the new Water Dragon, too. Tell us your name, won't you?"

Zeff and Axiolis saw no reason to do that."
"1084

"Mm," Caster mused. "How curious that we would not have heard of you until now. The Vanguard's doing, no? Pity you've decided to burn that bridge."

Zeff was hardly even listening. Asad took the opportunity to rejoin him, and indeed, it was as Zeff had thought. Those tattoos were moving. He noticed Asad fiddling with his left hand, where the golden glow seemed the most prominent.

"Perhaps you would like our assistance, instead," Caster was saying. "Abolish is renowned for its generosity. Tell us where Darktide and the Seadevil are, and we shall go discuss the matter with them."

"We are the lord of this place," said Asad, also in two voices. "If you would speak terms, then do so now."

"Adorable. But we grow impatient. This is your last chance. Be good lads and tell us. Where are the grown ups?"

There was little doubt in Zeff's mind that he could not have withstood Caster's attack himself. If not for whatever Asad's tattoos were doing right now, this fight might've very well been over already. And all they'd managed to accomplish was briefly inconveniencing Caster. They needed to approach this differently, before the Marauder overwhelmed them.

Escaping was obviously the best option here, but how to go about it? Ramira couldn't even walk on her own, and Axiolis could sense dozens of unfamiliar souls moving all throughout Dunehall.

"Shenado," Zeff and Axiolis said.

'Yes?'

“Be ready to run. Guide everyone out, but don’t stray too far.”

‘Okay.’

Zeff would have liked to elaborate further, but the Marauder was through waiting for his answer, it seemed. A destructive path came right for Zeff, and he dodged right, circling behind Asad as the Marauder himself rushed head on another time.

Zeff prepared the next strategy: temperature warfare."

"1085

Freezing mist was a difficult trick. Water vapor would simply desublimite into ice crystals if he tried to materialize it at zero degrees Celsius. The key, therefore, was knowing the triple point of water: that was, the combined measurement of temperature and pressure at which water could exist in any of its solid, liquid, or gas phases.

Pinpointing the temperature was simple enough, but Zeff had always struggled with manipulating the pressure just so. The problem was always atmospheric conditions. The pressure that Zeff applied to his water had to cancel out that which was already being applied by the environment.

But now, his control had moved forward by leaps and bounds, and he was certain that he could manage it, especially in the familiar environmental conditions of Dunehall. He must’ve spent a good third of his youth in this place with Asad.

Zeff manifested his water, and white fog shot across the chamber in billowing chunks. He pressed his soul into it, but he knew it wouldn’t obscure Asad and Caster’s vision. So long as they could see souls, the clouds would only conceal Zeff himself. But that was not the point. He was merely laying the groundwork. Already, Zeff could feel the temperature in the room beginning to plummet.

The rest of his freezing efforts had to be poured onto the Marauder directly. If he acted too carelessly, it would be Asad who was slowed, not Caster. And so Zeff concentrated on creating an endless stream of icy water, locked onto Caster’s soul as it moved through the fog. For extra measure, he threw in a few dozens of flying daggers of genuine ice. Of course they shattered against Caster's body, but that was just as helpful. So long as Zeff was standing, the cold would follow Caster wherever he went. Even when the Marauder drew close to Asad, Zeff didn't stop. He merely altered the angle from which the cold struck."

"1086

It would take time for the freezing effects to really take hold, even with soul-enhancement, but Zeff was certain that it was still their best chance. And in the meantime, Caster wouldn't be able to pin him down in the fog.

Unfortunately, that also left Asad to deal with Caster almost entirely on his own. And the Sandlord was not faring very well on that front. The Marauder flung him around like a chew toy, bulldozing through all of his materialized defenses as if they'd never been there to begin with and then smashing Asad face-first against the floor or wall or ceiling, even. If not for those tattoos, the first attack would have certainly ended it.

Zeff wanted to help, but there wasn't much to be done. The Marauder's movements had changed, having become decidedly more difficult to predict than they were before Caster's encounter with Zeff's drill bomb. The man was more cautious now, seemingly. It didn't seem like the same trick was going to work twice.

But the children were moving, at least. He could sense them escaping down the rear hallway. Just as he'd wanted, Shenado was seizing the opportunity.

And even as he pummeled Caster with icy water, Zeff made sure to keep moving in the same direction as the children, albeit more slowly. He aimed for a difficult balance. More distance between the kids and Caster was undoubtedly good, but that wouldn't mean much if they ran right into the clutches of some other bastard while Zeff was busy.

So many moving parts. So many things to keep track of. Far too much for one mind. Fortunately, he had two.

Down the hall, spears of ice launched out of the rolling fog and skewered the group of abolishers that would have stood in Emiliana's path."

"1087 -- CXXIV.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Four: 'Bind ye, in confidence...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was all Hector could do to keep track of what was happening. First there was fog, then there wasn't, then there was again. Then there was water flying everywhere, then glass, then ice--and all the while, a half-invisible man barreled through everything. So much of it blended together that he wasn't even sure how to approach any of it, let alone if he could make any sort of difference. His instinct was no.

But he'd felt this way against Darktide, too. So he tried to think. If Garovel were conscious, what would he tell him to do? The same as before, probably. Be patient and watch for an opportunity. Be ready to act as soon as an opening presented itself.

But that was assuming that one would present itself. The pessimist in him was beginning to win out. It was apparent enough that this Caster Egmond guy was using destruction with pan-rozum--the familiar sound was a dead giveaway--and against that, Hector didn't see very many options other than running.

Which was what they were doing. He stuck close to the Elroy kids, mainly just trying not to lose sight of them. At least they seemed to know where they were going.

But then something heavy flew up from behind them and sailed over all their heads, dispersing the fog in its wake, and Hector heard it crash against the wall ahead of them. A bit more running, and they saw what it was.

Lord Asad. Battered half to death. Broken bones stuck out of his flesh, twitching and adjusting themselves, struggling to regenerate as the man tried to stand. His tattoos burned with golden light, snaking off of his body like flames as his neck cracked back into place.

"Move!" Asad yelled, and a sudden glass wall shoved Hector and the children out of the way of the oncoming Marauder."

"1087 -- CXXIV.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Four: 'Bind ye, in confidence...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was all Hector could do to keep track of what was happening. First there was fog, then there wasn't, then there was again. Then there was water flying everywhere, then glass, then ice--and all the while, a half-invisible man barreled through everything. So much of it blended together that he wasn't even sure how to approach any of it, let alone if he could make any sort of difference. His instinct was no.

But he'd felt this way against Darktide, too. So he tried to think. If Garovel were conscious, what would he tell him to do? The same as before, probably. Be patient and watch for an opportunity. Be ready to act as soon as an opening presented itself.

But that was assuming that one would present itself. The pessimist in him was beginning to win out. It was apparent enough that this Caster Egmond guy was using destruction with pan-rozum--the familiar sound was a dead giveaway--and against that, Hector didn't see very many options other than running.

Which was what they were doing. He stuck close to the Elroy kids, mainly just trying not to lose sight of them. At least they seemed to know where they were going.

But then something heavy flew up from behind them and sailed over all their heads, dispersing the fog in its wake, and Hector heard it crash against the wall ahead of them. A bit more running, and they saw what it was.

Lord Asad. Battered half to death. Broken bones stuck out of his flesh, twitching and adjusting themselves, struggling to regenerate as the man tried to stand. His tattoos burned with golden light, snaking off of his body like flames as his neck cracked back into place.

"Move!" Asad yelled, and a sudden glass wall shoved Hector and the children out of the way of the oncoming Marauder."

Caster plowed through the quartz and put Asad through the wall. Glass shattered in all directions, but among it, a crimson glint caught Hector's eye.

There was a bag on the floor by Caster's feet. The one that had been on Asad's waist a moment ago. A couple of the red shards had spilled from it, but the half-invisible man didn't seem to have noticed them yet and chased after Asad, instead. The Lord Elroy came following quickly after, bringing the endless fog and icy fire hose with him.

At once, Hector knew his task. He sprinted for the bag and slid into it, hurriedly pushing the errant shards back in as he tried to scoop the bag up.

A tremor interrupted him, violent enough that Hector lost his grip for a second, and three shards flew away from him. They clattered toward the Elroys as Hector scrambled back to his feet, but again, he was interrupted.

Lord Dimas came crashing through the ceiling and hit the ground so hard, it made the walls crumble. Hector flew from the impact, toppling over in midair and earning himself a broken leg from the debris. He found himself up against some other wall now as he struggled onto one knee and tried to get his bearings.

There was a shard by his foot, he realized. He bagged it and ran stiltedly over to the gaping fissure in the wall ahead of him. He could see Dimas through it, facing off against two apparent abolishers. The Elroys were there as well, though at a safe distance off to the side. They hadn't gotten the same taste of Dimas' arrival as Hector had, it seemed. Emiliana was holding one of the shards, as well.

Good enough, Hector felt. But there was still one more. Where was it?"
"1089

The red shimmer caught his eye, and Hector saw the shard by the ruined doorway that led back in the direction they'd come from. A pair of unfamiliar men came running through it, only to get clobbered by a gravity pulse that brought down the whole door frame and a chunk of the ceiling.

The shard would have to wait, Hector decided. An iron javelin materialized in his already-throwing free hand. It launched from his grip, having hardly been there in the first place, and flew true, catching one of Dimas' opponents in the side.

The abolisher didn't seem too bothered by the presence of a spear in his gut, perhaps being more concerned with Dimas. Hector was fine with that. He used the spear as a growth point and added iron to it in all directions, ballooning out and stretching around the man's torso and down his legs.

That was enough for him to take notice. He grimaced and tore through the iron like cardboard, then looked in Hector's direction.

Hector prepared to wield his shield barehanded again, but a visible gravity pulse intervened, knocking the guy off his feet and juggling him into a sudden wall of icy skewers.

Hector might've taken a second to feel relieved if Caster hadn't come charging back into the room, chased by a flurry of ice and fog. The Marauder went straight for Dimas, and the gravity wielder only just managed to slip out of the way, losing half a leg to destruction.

But of course, Dimas didn't need the leg and caught himself in midair, hovering. Hector watched him clap both hands together, and instantly, the space around Caster distorted visibly, bending toward him.

Zeff's fog flashed and turned to ice, and for a fleeting moment, the half-invisible abolisher became a snowman.

Caster pushed through it, of course, but he wasn't nearly as fast as he was before. At first, Hector couldn't tell what was happening. It was like watching a man running underwater."

"1090

The combination of crushing gravity and freezing temperatures seemed to be taking a toll--and not just on the Marauder. Even at this distance, Hector could feel the effects himself--wave after wave of debilitating pressure, weighing him down, stiffening his muscles. If he dared go any closer, he was sure that he wouldn't be able to move at all.

Caster, however, was still going. Slow as molasses, but going. And the snow and gravity stayed on him. Caster launched path after path, but even those were stunted. He seemed like he was trying to hit Dimas, but the young Lord Sebolt had no trouble avoiding them.

The Elroy children took the opportunity to flee, and Hector considered following. But that last crystal remained. Certainly, it wasn't more valuable than his and Garovel's lives, but all he needed was an opening. And it looked like there was going to be one. The Marauder was moving away from the shard, heading toward the room at the end of the hall.

Hector waited briefly longer, letting the distance from Caster draw out, and then sprinted for the red crystal.

He reached it just as he heard the sandstone above his head shift and crack. A path of destruction tore sluggishly through the ceiling and bent down over him into the floor and adjoining wall. It wouldn't have hit him, but Hector moved away from it instinctively.

He had the shard, though. He didn't even remember picking it up, but there it was in the grip of his bare hand.

The corridor rumbled another time, and Hector had to avoid a cluster of falling debris. But the rumbling didn't stop. It sustained itself, and he could hear the walls moaning under stress."

"1091

Hector saw more paths of destruction whipping slowly around him. Caster had stopped aiming for Dimas entirely. And Hector understood why. The Marauder wanted to give Dimas and Zeff something else to do, even if that meant bringing down all of Dunehall on top of them.

He knew he had to keep moving. He sprinted after the Elroys, but before he even managed five steps, the wall next to him shifted, then exploded, showering him with debris. The shield ate most of it, allowing Hector to hold his ground this time. But that was not a good thing, he saw.

The Marauder was right there, already coming this way. And neither was he looking particularly slow anymore.

Hector's brain reacted on reflex, and an iron platform shoved him out of Caster's path. But the man had noticed. Before Hector could even hit the floor again, he saw the immense path of destruction that Caster left for him. A rending wave. Practically a wall. Too wide and tall to avoid in midair like this.

No choice.

He raised his shield to take it. The thing buckled and disintegrated. The path connected with his body, and the impact made every nerve in his body pulse and twitch at once.

The world bent in half. Everything around him distorted and shattered and melted--white, then gray, then black, then entirely without color altogether. Indescribably so. Hector wasn't even sure if he was still seeing, if he even had eyes or a brain to perceive anything with.

Was this a feeling? Was this pain? Familiar, but he couldn't tell.

There was something else, though. No. Not something. Someone. He could sense them there. Their presence. Two--no, three. Three souls suspended there along beside him. Or--no. Not beside him. Just, there. Somewhere. Distant. But also close. With him, somehow."

"1092

One of the souls was Garovel. That much, Hector could sense straight away. It was friendly, he knew, as if that were somehow a physical characteristic, no different from shape or temperature or weight.

'Well, this is terrifying,' came another voice. It belonged to Chergoa, Hector realized.

If one of those souls was Chergoa, then the other was almost certainly Emiliana.

Hector tried to speak but found no voice for himself--or mouth, for that matter. So he tried merely thinking, instead. 'What's happening?'

'I believe we're experiencing a hyper anomaly,' said Chergoa.

'What does that mean?' Hector asked.

'I dunno. I just made it up.'

Hector would have shaken his head if he'd had one. He was beginning to notice a family resemblance.

'It's okay, though,' Chergoa went on. 'I've seen this kind of thing before.'

'You have?' Emiliana said.

'No,' Chergoa said.

They all allowed a beat to pass, and Hector heard an inaudible sigh from Emiliana.

'Do you have anything useful to tell us?' the young Lady Elroy asked.

'Jokes are useful. It's important to keep the mood light whenever possible, y'know.'

'I wouldn't call those jokes.'

'Ouch.'

'Chergoa.'

'Alright, well, if you want my best guess, then I'd say we've been sucked into a pocket dimension.'

'What?' said Hector. 'You mean like an alternate reality?'

'Not really, no. But kinda. A little.'

'What do you mean?' said Hector.

'I dunno. Look, I said it was a guess.'

'Agh...'

'Sometimes, servant abilities clash in dramatic ways and end up creating really weird shit. Kinda like what we're seeing. Maybe. And between Dimas and that Marauder asshole, it's possible that the resulting spatial distortions caused a pocket dimension to be created. I mean, that is basically what the destruction type is. Sort of.'

"1093

‘I think I get what you’re saying,’ said Hector.

‘You do?’ said Chergoa. ‘Could you explain it back to me, then? Because I’m pretty sure half of that was bullshit.’

Hector could only return a faint laugh. He appreciated her efforts to keep them from panicking, but he wasn’t sure it was helping much.

Emiliana had the important question. ‘Are we stuck here?’

‘Uh...’ And Chergoa took quite a long time before finally saying, ‘Yeah, probably.’

Hector and Emiliana groaned in unison.

With that, however, something else occurred to him. ‘Why is it just us four?’

‘Uh--’

A different voice interrupted. ‘The shards,’ said Garovel. ‘You were both holding one.’

‘Garovel!’ said Hector.

‘Hello...’ He sounded rather groggy, now that Hector was listening.

‘How are you even awake?’ Hector asked.

‘Mm... dunno.’

Hector thought a moment. ‘And how did you know that Emiliana and I were holding shards?’

‘...Dunno that either.’

‘Garovel, c’mon. You’re supposed to have all the answers.’

‘Hey, I’ve been unconscious. What’s your excuse?’

‘I, uh. Well, for one thing, I’m not thousands of years old.’

‘Maybe you shouldn’t have been born so late, then.’

‘Wow, Garovel.’

‘Anyway, Hector, I’m glad we’re not dead, but shut up for a second.

What was that about a pocket dimension earlier?’

‘You were listening?’ said Chergoa.

‘To you? Never. I must’ve thought someone else was talking.’

‘Mm. Speaking of assholes, why were you sleeping on the job, anyway? I mean, laziness and idiocy are the clear answers, I know, but I was wondering if you wanted to make any excuses for yourself.’

‘It’s a side effect of Hector’s shield. Whenever he wields it barehanded, it heightens his soul defenses at the expense of exhausting me.’

‘I see. Where’d you come by something like that?’

‘A Sandlord named Haqq Najir. He wasn’t very cooperative at first, but then I told him all about my sister, and he offered the shield to us in exchange for a promise that we would never introduce her to him. It was very curious.’

That one actually earned a laugh from Chergoa."

"1094

Garovel brought the conversation back on track. ‘So you think we’re in a pocket dimension. Is that right?’

‘Pretty much,’ said Chergoa. ‘You got a better theory?’

‘Well. “Better” is a strong word. A strong, accurate word.’

‘Uh-huh. Go on then, genius.’

‘I think you’re right. I think this is a pocket dimension. And I think we’re inside the shards, right now.’

‘Yeah, I already put that together,’ said Chergoa.

‘Shame you didn’t mention it, then. Now the credit’s all mine.’

‘No one cares.’

‘Hector cares. Don’t you, Hector?’

‘...I’m not involved in this conversation.’

Expectedly, the discussion derailed for quite a while. The reapers went on and on, back and forth, and Hector was about to just stop listening entirely until Emiliana intervened.

‘This is all very interesting,’ she said, ‘but how do we leave this place?’

And both reapers shut up for a moment.

‘Well,’ said Garovel. ‘There’s good news and bad news with that.’

‘More like okay news and weapons-grade-terrible news,’ said Chergoa.

‘Wonderful,’ said Emiliana. ‘Bad news first, then.’

Both reapers hesitated again, perhaps waiting for each other to take the liberty of explaining.

‘Come on,’ said Hector. ‘Tell us.’

‘Okay,’ said Garovel. ‘When we say that we’re stuck here, we mean it. There’s literally nothing we can do besides wait for the pocket dimension to degrade on its own and let us out.’

‘Yep,’ Chergoa added. ‘And the wait could be very long.’

‘HOW long?’ said Emiliana.

‘Dunno,’ said Chergoa. ‘A few hours, if we’re lucky. A few decades, if we’re not.’

‘DECADES?!’ Hector and Emiliana both said.

‘We’d have to be stupidly unlucky, though,’ said Garovel.

‘We ARE stupidly unlucky!’ said Hector.

‘Eh, I’m sure it won’t be that long,’ said Garovel. ‘Though, even if it were, that could be a good thing.’”

"1095

‘Why in the world would that be a good thing?’ Emiliana asked.

‘Soul-synchronization,’ Chergoa answered. ‘Obviously, it’d be boring as hell, but it would allow us to safely increase our soul power in a relatively short amount of time.'

'Short amount of time?' Emiliana sounded confused. 'You just said it would be decades!'

'Yes, in here it would be,' said Chergoa. 'But out there? Not so much.'

'I don't understand.'

'Time and space are like butter and toast,' said Chergoa. 'When there's a lot of toast, the butter gets spread out really thin. When there's only a little toast, you end up having to cram a ton of butter on it.'

'...Wouldn't you just use less butter?' said Hector.

'No, see, the amount of butter is fixed.'

'...Why would it be fixed?'

'Look, I never said it was a perfect metaphor. The point is, time passes more quickly here.'

'I thought time slowed down near black holes,' said Emiliana.

'This isn't a black hole,' said Garovel. 'Black holes are created by condensed matter. I don't think there's any matter here. Only space.'

'Oh.'

'Also, if this were a black hole, we'd probably be dead.'

'We ARE dead,' said Chergoa.

'Super extra dead, then.'

'Eloquently put.'

'H-hold on,' said Hector. 'Didn't you say there was "okay" news, too?'

'Yeah, that was it,' said Garovel. 'In theory, you and Emiliana could grow significantly more powerful in this place. Assuming we don't go insane, that is.'

'Eh, we won't go insane,' said Chergoa. 'Not with four of us here. It'd be different if any of us were alone or unable to communicate with each other. Then we'd be fucked--I mean, er, screwed. Emiliana, plug your ears. You, too, Hector.'" "

"1096

Garovel laughed. 'You don't need to worry about Hector's ears. I know he doesn't seem like it, but he's a total potty mouth.'

'Is he really?'

'Oh yeah. Drops f-bombs all the time.'

'Hector!' said Chergoa. 'How very dare you! That is no way for a lord to behave, y'know.'

Hector decided to ignore that avenue of discussion. Something else was bothering him, anyway, and the reapers had yet to address it. In fact, he had a feeling that they didn't even realize it yet. '...Aren't you guys forgetting to explain something?' he asked.

'What do you mean?' said Garovel.

Rather than answering, Hector waited for Chergoa. And when she didn't say anything, he instead heard Emiliana snickering faintly.

'They did forget,' said Emiliana.

'Ah--you realized it, too?' said Hector.

'Indeed.'

'Realized what?' said Chergoa. 'What are we forgetting?'

Now Hector had to laugh a little, as well. 'This is pretty fun.'

'Isn't it, though? Is Garovel always as smug with you as Chergoa is with me?'

'Yeah. He's always bragging about how much he knows.'

'Ha.'

Both reapers spoke up in unison. 'Alright, you two.'

'Out with it,' continued Garovel.

'Seriously,' said Chergoa.

'Hmm,' Emiliana hummed, still half-giggling. 'Should we tell them?'

'I guess so,' said Hector. 'We'd probably... be here forever if we waited for them to figure it out on their own.'

That pulled a bigger laugh out of Emiliana.

'I'm glad you're enjoying yourselves,' said Garovel. 'Are you done?'

'Couple of real jerks, our servants.'

'It makes sense, though,' said Hector. 'That they wouldn't think of it, I mean. This is how they always talk.'

'Oh, that is true,' said Emiliana.

'Would you just spit it out already?' said Garovel. 'This is getting ridiculous.'"

"1097

'Okay, okay,' said Hector. 'I understand everything else you said, more or less. Pocket dimension or whatever. No bodies here, no matter. Only our minds. Right?'

'Yeah?' said Garovel.

'And uh, I get that we can hear your guys' thoughts. You're reapers. You can, er, communicate with souls directly or whatever. That makes sense.'

'Uh-huh?' said Chergoa.

'But then... why can Emiliana and I hear each other?'

'Oh, well, that's...' And Garovel just stopped.

Hector waited, but the reaper didn't finish. '...Garovel?'

'Uh... hmm.' Garovel paused another time. 'Actually, that's a really good question.'

Chergoa had to chime in now. 'Er... yeah. Huh. You two shouldn't be able to hear each other. Your souls aren't bound together. You should both be able to hear me and Garovel, but you definitely shouldn't be able to hear one another. That's... really weird.' And she waited a second before giving them another, 'Huh.'

'I can't tell if they really don't know,' said Hector, 'or if they're just messing with us again.'

'I think they are being serious,' said Emiliana. 'They would not purposely make themselves look ignorant.'

'Ah, you're probably right.'

'Hmm,' said Garovel. 'I don't like how well these two are getting along all of a sudden.'

'Me neither,' said Chergoa. 'It was a mistake to allow our servants to mingle. We should release them and start over.'

'Good idea.'

'So basically,' said Hector, 'you two have no idea what's happening here at all.'

'Agh, it must be the shards,' said Garovel.

'You're just gonna blame everything on the shards, aren't you?' said Hector.

'It's the only explanation, really. Stupid soul-catalyst bullcrap. I wonder if even Qorvass understands how they work. I bet he just pretends like he does.'

'Because that's what you would do?' said Hector.

'Hell yeah. Bullshitting is a very valuable skill, my friend.'"
"1098 -- CXXV.

'So you guys don't even have a theory?' Hector asked.

'Not really,' said Chergoa. 'Why? Are you saying that you two whelps do?'

‘Oh, uh, no,’ said Hector. ‘Or at least, I don’t.’

‘We were only teasing you about forgetting to explain something,’ said Emiliana. ‘We didn’t think there WASN’T an explanation.’

‘Hmm,’ said Garovel. ‘Well, anyway, it looks like we’re going to be here a while. We should try to keep ourselves entertained. How have you been, baby sister?’

‘Oh, I’ve been good. Apart from the whole almost-dying-thing, today’s been lovely.’

‘Mm. And Emiliana, how are you?’

‘Ah... confused.’

‘Wonderful. Anyone up for a game? I’m thinking of a number between one and six hundred billion. Take your time answering. No rush.’

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Five: ‘Diligent souls, abide...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ultimately, the conversation kept going back and forth between serious contemplation of their circumstances and fanciful distraction when no great revelations were uncovered.

At length, even Garovel and Chergoa began struggling to keep talking. Hector had kind of stopped listening a while ago, and without anything to pay attention to, time began to blur into itself. Strangely, it was the realization that no one was talking anymore that brought him back around. Somehow, the silence had become odd.

‘I guess I’ll just meditate,’ he threw out there.

And it took a second, but then Emiliana said, ‘Good idea. I will, too.’

‘Alright,’ said Garovel.

‘We’ll try not to leave without you,’ said Chergoa.

Hector tried to focus. Instinctively, he wanted to take a deep breath, but he couldn’t. He wanted to close his eyes, but he didn’t have any. It hadn’t occurred to him how much of a role his own body played in meditating before. This was different. And not altogether comfortable, either. It was almost too easy. He felt like he might lose himself here, like he was falling asleep on the edge of a cliff."

"1098 -- CXXV.

'So you guys don't even have a theory?' Hector asked.

'Not really,' said Chergoa. 'Why? Are you saying that you two whelps do?'

'Oh, uh, no,' said Hector. 'Or at least, I don't.'

'We were only teasing you about forgetting to explain something,' said Emiliana. 'We didn't think there WASN'T an explanation.'

'Hmm,' said Garovel. 'Well, anyway, it looks like we're going to be here a while. We should try to keep ourselves entertained. How have you been, baby sister?'

'Oh, I've been good. Apart from the whole almost-dying-thing, today's been lovely.'

'Mm. And Emiliana, how are you?'

'Ah... confused.'

'Wonderful. Anyone up for a game? I'm thinking of a number between one and six hundred billion. Take your time answering. No rush.'

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Five: 'Diligent souls, abide...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ultimately, the conversation kept going back and forth between serious contemplation of their circumstances and fanciful distraction when no great revelations were uncovered.

At length, even Garovel and Chergoa began struggling to keep talking. Hector had kind of stopped listening a while ago, and without anything to pay attention to, time began to blur into itself. Strangely, it was the realization that no one was talking anymore that brought him back around. Somehow, the silence had become odd.

'I guess I'll just meditate,' he threw out there.

And it took a second, but then Emiliana said, 'Good idea. I will, too.'

'Alright,' said Garovel.

'We'll try not to leave without you,' said Chergoa.

Hector tried to focus. Instinctively, he wanted to take a deep breath, but he couldn't. He wanted to close his eyes, but he didn't have any. It hadn't occurred to him how much of a role his own body played in meditating before. This was different. And not altogether comfortable, either. It was almost too easy. He felt like he might lose himself here, like he was falling asleep on the edge of a cliff."

"1099

As he focused his mind, Hector could feel something different. Something he'd never felt from meditating before. Slowly, hesitantly, he concentrated harder, allowing his thoughts to be consumed by this world of empty space.

In a way, it was absolutely terrifying. Floating. Forever. Nothing to hold onto. No destination. Neverending darkness. And the more time he spent focusing, the more of it he could sense. A vast ocean of nothingness. This was a pocket dimension? Wasn't it supposed to be tiny? It felt gigantic beyond reckoning. Or was his mind simply playing tricks on him? Maybe this one remaining sense of his was wrong, somehow. It wasn't like his normal senses were infallible, either.

If it weren't for those three other souls there, Hector was sure he would have begun panicking a long time ago. They were his only anchors, the only things keeping him from being completely overcome by this unfathomable place.

Yet still, he lost time. And he could sense himself losing it, too. The strange, disjointed progression of his own nebulous thoughts was how he could tell. Sluggish, fast, sluggish again, then even slower. On and on in varying patterns and speeds.

At length, however, he sensed something else. A glimmer. A crack. In the distance. So far away. Farther than normal sight could have told him, surely.

Then, another one. Another crack. This time in the opposite direction and just as far away.

Then another. And another. And still another. Then five more. Then ten. Dozens. Hundreds? All cracks but all different, too. Each one rippled, pulsed, echoed. Thousands. Maybe even millions. Far too many to count, at least. And they were everywhere around him. Closer than seemed possible. On top of him. Phasing through him.

Where had they come from? Had they been there the whole time? Something told him they had, something in his one sense. Like he'd been looking through a window this whole time without realizing there was glass there. But now he could see the glass. Now he could tell.

This wasn't emptiness. This wasn't just space."

"1100

Hector's concentration shattered. He had to talk to Garovel. His mind yanked itself out of meditation with an intangible shudder. 'Ah! Garovel!'

'Hector, holy shit!,' the reaper said. 'You came back!'

Hector needed a second to gather his thoughts again. The sudden disorientation felt like he'd just been torn out of a dead sleep. Which confused him. Was that what that had been? Had he been sleeping? Dreaming?

He tried to shake it off. '...How long was I gone?'

'It's been fifty years! We thought we'd lost you forever!'

'W-what? I don't--'

'Only joking. It's been about a day and a half.'

Hector sighed mentally. 'You asshole... I was really about to freak the fuck out.'

'See? Didn't I tell you he had a potty mouth?'

‘You sure did,’ said Chergoa. ‘How scandalous. And in front of a young lady, no less.’

Somehow, he’d forgotten that Chergoa and Emiliana were there as well. ‘Uh--I... I didn’t mean to--I’m s-sorry, I just... agh...’

‘Don’t listen to them,’ said Emiliana. ‘You do not need to censor yourself for my sake.’

‘I wasn’t talking about you, you narcissist,’ said Chergoa. ‘I was talking about me. I know I seem like a stoic monster, but I have the heart of a delicate maiden, and I can’t bear listening to such uncouth language.’

‘Right,’ said Emiliana. ‘Garovel, please tell your sister to fuck off. Oh, nevermind, it seems I managed it on my own.’

‘Mm, I’d like to volunteer my services, anyway,’ said Garovel. ‘Chergoa, fuck off.’

‘To you as well, dearest brother.’

‘Er, uh, Garovel?’ said Hector, realizing he would have to be the one to push the conversation in a relevant direction again. But he wasn’t yet sure how to phrase his biggest question, so instead, he asked, ‘How do you know it’s been a day and a half? I mean, it’s not like we have a clock to go by, so, uh...’

"1101

‘A clock would be nice,’ said Garovel, ‘but it’s not strictly necessary. I’ve just been counting, instead.’

‘Counting?’ said Hector. ‘Counting what?’

‘The seconds. Ever since we got here, that is.’

Hector paused. ‘You can do that? That sounds impossible.’

‘Only needs to be a rough estimate. It’s not as hard as it seems. Plus, I’ve had practice.’

Chergoa barked a laugh. ‘Sounds like a story. Why don’t you tell us about that? Seems we’ve got plenty of time for all your long, boring tangents.’

‘Excuse me,’ said Garovel, ‘but as it so happens, it’s not boring at all. It’s actually--’

‘Uh--er, before you get into that,’ said Hector, ‘there’s something else. Er, I think.’

‘We’re listening,’ said Garovel.

‘Well, um...’ Really, he still wasn’t sure how to begin. ‘When I was meditating, uh... there was, uh... agh. It felt like this place... wasn’t... empty. I don’t know how to explain it, but I sensed something here. I think.’

‘...Can you elaborate?’ said Garovel.

‘Uh... it was like, space wasn’t... space. Does that make sense?’

‘Not really.’

‘Agh... I just, er--it felt like there was something else here. Or maybe that “here” was something else. I mean, I don’t know how else to... argh. Emiliana, did you sense anything?’

‘Oh. Um. Well, now that you mention it... perhaps I did. I thought I had just fallen asleep, but...’

‘So you both sensed something really weird while you were neck deep in meditation?’ said Garovel. ‘That doesn’t necessarily mean anything. Sometimes, the mind just makes its own...’

‘...Garovel?’

‘No. Wait a minute. Did you--? Would that even be--? Hmm. Do either of you sense it now?’

‘W-well, no,’ said Hector.

‘Me neither,’ said Emiliana.

‘What are you thinking?’ said Chergoa.

‘...I think they sensed the dormant soul of the Dry God.’”

Hector needed a few seconds to process what Garovel had just said.

‘Are you sure “soul” is the right word for it?’ said Chergoa. ‘It’s not like the guy’s just sleeping. You and I would be able to sense him if that were the case.’

‘You might be right,’ said Garovel, ‘but I think he’s definitely still alive. In some form. And if he is, then maybe we can talk to him.’

‘I suppose it’s possible,’ said Chergoa. ‘But if he hasn’t noticed us by now, then how do we get him to?’

‘Hmm.’ Garovel paused. ‘Jaf’lah! Ai! Jaf’lah!’

‘Truly ingenious.’

‘Ai! Jaf’lah! Rasalased!’ Garovel kept going, but Hector couldn’t really follow what else he said.

It was a bit strange, hearing Garovel speak in Valgan. The reaper spoke Mohssian so fluently that Hector had never really imagined him speaking anything else. He’d known, of course, that Garovel knew a ton of different languages, but it was different, actually hearing it firsthand.

After a short time, though, Garovel stopped. ‘I don’t think it’s working,’ he said.

‘Color me surprised,’ said Chergoa.

‘Yeah, well, it was worth a shot,’ said Garovel. ‘Looks like meditation is our best bet, then. Hector?’

‘Oh, uh. O-okay.’

‘Em?’ said Chergoa.

‘Very well.’

Hector focused. He settled his thoughts and concentrated on his one sense again.

It was faster this time. He felt his mind plunge down and down and down, felt it become enveloped in that familiar darkness, so thick it felt somehow physical. And soon enough, he was there again, feeling it all again, cracks echoing in space, breathing all around him.

Only then did he realize that he had no idea what he was doing. Was he supposed to ask this bodiless mass a question? He probably should have asked Garovel about that before diving back in. It was difficult even to think. Part of maintaining the meditation meant keeping his mind clear and just soaking in everything, but now his mind wanted to think while meditating. And he wasn't sure that was even possible."

"1103

Even so, he still tried. Maybe it was impossible to think in this state, but there was no harm in trying. Probably. He wasn't sure of that, either, now that he was thinking about it.

Hold on. He WAS thinking now. And it felt strange. Like he'd wrapped a blanket around his mind, every thought cradled in an intangible headspace. It was strangely easy. But he still wasn't solidifying each thought yet like he had to do when talking to Garovel privately. Maybe that would be the difference.

'...Hmm,' he tried.

And the whole world resounded with that one syllable. He sensed it--felt it. Each crack reverberated against his soundless voice, stirring all at once for a moment. But only for a moment.

'...Is anyone there?' said Hector.

And the world lit up again, trembling, echoing.

'Please,' Hector went on, 'if you're there, say something. Please.'

The echo hardened and sustained itself. It grew. And grew. And grew still more. And Hector began to feel like he'd been caught in an earthquake.

'On second thought, if you'd rather not be bothered--'

The cracks exploded, and a wave hit him, punching him clean out of his meditation.

Hector struggled to regather himself. '...Garovel?'

'Back already?' the reaper said. 'That didn't take very long.'

‘...Did I fuck that up?’ said Hector.

‘What?’

As his sense returned to him, he realized that nothing was different. It was just the four of them there, still.

And then it wasn't.

An ocean converged on them. From seemingly nowhere, Hector sensed its arrival. Soul power. Endless, as far as he could tell. Crushing strong, pressuring him from every conceivable direction.

'Oh shit,' said Garovel."

"1104

There came an unfamiliar voice from the abyss, but Hector couldn't understand anything it was saying. It had to be speaking Valgan, he figured, but it didn't sound much like when he'd heard Asad speak it.

Garovel answered the voice, also in Valgan, probably.

Chergoa was kind enough to keep them informed. 'Yeah, that's definitely the Dry God,' she said. 'Garovel is attempting to explain our circumstances, along with who we are.'

Hector had about a thousand questions, but he certainly wasn't going to interrupt.

'Now he's explaining what is presumably still going on outside. I'm not sure that's wise, though. It might be better to take it slower and just--'

'Mohssian?' came the unfamiliar voice. 'You speak Mohssian?'

'YOU speak Mohssian?' returned Garovel, sounding truly shocked.

'Yes.'

'When did you learn it?' asked Chergoa.

'When is when?'

'...What?'

'As a child, I learned. An inelegant language. Lazily structured. Full of hard noises.' His accent was incredibly strong, but Hector had no trouble understanding him. Every word sounded quite deliberately chosen.

Emiliana decided to speak up. 'How old are you now?'

'I do not understand the question.'

'Er...' She took a second before trying again. 'You just said that you have memories of your childhood. So do you know how much time has passed since then?'

'No,' he said flatly.

'Oh,' said Emiliana.

'Time is not time,' said the Dry God.

'What does that mean?' said Chergoa.

'Everything. It means everything.'

No one had a response for that, apparently.

Garovel chose to change the subject. 'Rasalased. That is your name, yes? Rasalased?'

'Yes. No. It was. Once. Is it still? It should be. Yes. Time is not time.'

Hector was beginning to get the picture."

"1105

'Do you remember the last person you talked to?' asked Garovel.

'I remember everything,' said Rasalased. 'Al'raml yatahmmaluh.'

'Ah,' said Garovel. "The sand endures." Indeed, it does.'

'A petulant whelp, the last one was. Believed the blessing alone made him worthy. But I learned my lesson after the three. I looked into his soul and saw him truly. Saw his dreams. His intentions. His secrets. Just like I am doing to all of you now.'

'Oh,' said Garovel. 'Is that so? Well, then. I would say that such a thing is impossible, but... aha, for you, it probably isn't, is it?'

‘My spiritual kin,’ said Rasalased. ‘Both of you. Very old, indeed.’

‘Mm, you can sense that, huh?’ said Garovel. ‘Chergoa and I were born Lyzakks, yes.’

‘Very troubled, as well,’ said Rasalased. ‘Very concerned. Very earnest. Selfless, in many ways. Ambitious, in others. Deceptive, too. Hungry for power. As all reapers are.’

‘Hey--’

‘I’m--’

‘And the two young ones, let me see. Emiliana Eirwen Elroy. How anachronistic. Ha! A Rainlord! All is explained, then.’

‘How do you know my--?’

‘You, too, have a troubled spirit. Aching in all aspects. But also still being forged. Burning away remnants of selfishness. Of naivete, too. And there is deep worry. For yourself. For your kin. A terrible homesickness. You, child, have my sympathy.’

‘Ah, um--’

‘And the last one...’

And Hector couldn’t stop himself. ‘Aw, shit,’ he thought aloud.

‘Hector Alexander Goffe,’ said Rasalased. ‘The mixed heritage of a common mongrel.’

‘What the fuck do--?’ tried Garovel.

‘And such an incredibly weak soul. Troubled even by its own existence. Twice broken, now mending. Desperately reforging itself. And angry at its own workmanship. In dire search of purpose and fortitude.’

Well, that hurt even more than he’d expected.

‘However,’ said Rasalased, ‘therein dwells supreme selflessness. And a curious strength in weakness. Almost indescribable. How strange, you are.’”

‘Are you done?’ said Garovel. ‘We didn’t come here to have our worthiness measured.’

‘Yes,’ said Rasalased, ‘you found yourselves here by chance and are now trapped. And you wish me to do something about that, I assume?’

‘Would that even be possible?’ said Garovel.

‘Of course. I will free you all once your souls have finished tempering.’

That left a brief silence in its wake.

‘...Excuse me?’ said Chergoa. ‘What do you mean “tempering”?’

‘Did you not notice? Garovel, for instance. He was exhausted and unconscious upon his arrival here, and yet now, he is perfectly well.’

‘Wait,’ said Garovel. ‘Your soul was dormant when we arrived. How could you know that I was--?’

‘Time is not time,’ said the Dry God.

‘Right,’ said Garovel. ‘If that’s true, then why are we “waiting” for this tempering of yours to finish?’

‘We are not waiting. We are talking. The tempering will finish after we are done.’

‘But then--’ said Garovel. ‘Wouldn’t that mean--? What? Does that mean you’re controlling when the tempering finishes?’

‘Am I? Perhaps I am. It matters little. Time is not time.’

‘Uh-huh...’

Chergoa tried to intervene. ‘I’d like to know more about what this tempering--’

‘Young Hector,’ said Rasalased. ‘What is this that you have brought me? I sense its residue in your soul, so it must be yours.’

Hector was confused. ‘Uh...?’

‘An offering? Very kind of you. But then, you ARE very kind, aren’t you? I see that, too. A deserving young soul, yours is. In need of help.

But I have no use for gifts. I have no use for anything.'

'Please don't ignore me,' said Chergoa. 'Tell us what you mean when you say our souls are tempering.'

'Recovering,' said Rasalased. 'Simple. You were exhausted. Now you are not. But for the young ones there, it means more.'

'...Go on.'

'You will see.'

'Ugh.'

'You may be angry with me at first. But hold true, and you will see.'

'I'm sorry,' said Garovel. 'You're not being cryptic enough for my tastes. Could you add in something about believing in ourselves when the time is right?'

'Time is not--'

'Not time, yeah, I got it, thanks.'"

"1107

'Brother dear,' said Chergoa, 'let's try not to anger the ancient warrior god who's able to manipulate our souls, shall we?'

'That's a fair point,' said Garovel. 'But I don't think there's much point in tiptoeing around him. Not when he's already staring into our souls and passing judgment on us.'

'Yeah, well, even so--'

'You need not fear me,' said Rasalased. 'I will not harm you.'

'See? What a nice guy. Aside from all the interrupting, he's actually quite--'

'Young Rainlord.'

'Um--yes?' said Emiliana.

'What is this shadow on your soul?' said Rasalased.

It was her turn to sound confused. 'Uh. I don't know what you mean.'

'A dark thread,' said the Dry God. 'Something watches you from afar.'

'What? What's watching me?'

'A demon.' There came a pause. 'Powerful. He senses me, as I sense him. He blocks my sight. He does not wish me to know his soul. But he comes for you. That much, I could see.'

'...Does he have a name?' Emiliana asked. But she didn't sound especially surprised, Hector noticed.

'He hid it from me,' said Rasalased.

'Well, that sounds wonderful,' said Chergoa. 'Anything else you can tell us?'

'You are all caught in a storm,' said Rasalased. 'Strength of arms will not avail you.'

'You don't say,' said Chergoa. 'I don't suppose you could help us with that somehow, hmm?'

'I cannot. But hold true, and you will see my blessing.'

'Great.'

'I advise you: do not fight. Resist, but do not fight. Hold true and see.'

Hector just heard Garovel sigh.

A long silence followed--so long that Hector thought that might be the end of it. There was still more he wanted to know, but he wasn't sure if he should--

'Ask your question, Young Hector.'

That one was really fucking creepy, Hector felt."

"1108

'Er, uh,' Hector tried, 'you, um... you mentioned someone earlier. Someone you thought was unworthy of your help?'

‘I remember.’

‘W—who was that?’

Rasalased took a moment to answer. ‘Ease your mind. It was not the Lion you know. It was his predecessor.’

Hector couldn’t deny that he’d been thinking about that. He’d only known Asad for a few days, but in those few days, Hector didn’t think he’d seen anyone show more strength, compassion, and integrity than that man. Remembering it all made Hector worry for him now. Asad hadn’t been doing too well the last time he saw him.

‘I would like to meet the new Lion,’ said Rasalased. ‘I hope you will help him live long enough.’

‘Uh--I’d like to, but I’m not sure, uh... I mean, how can I help him?’

‘Hold true, see, and understand.’

‘Uh...’ Hector wasn’t too big a fan of these vague instructions, either. It was funny when Garovel was the victim of them, but not so much now. ‘Are you, um... are you really able to see the future?’

‘Do you believe I am?’ said Rasalased.

The question caught him a bit off guard. ‘Uh. I don’t know. Er. I mean, that’s why I asked...’

And the Dry God chortled. ‘So it is.’

Hector didn’t know what was funny, but he was more surprised that Rasalased could even laugh in the first place. Everything the Dry God said sounded so serious. Apart, perhaps, from that moment when he’d realized that Emiliana was a Rainlord, but even that hadn’t been laughter.

‘In truth,’ Rasalased went on, ‘no, I do not see the future. I see only the present. But I see it clearly and thoroughly. And the present knows the past. Combined, this knowledge may predict the direction of the world, if only briefly.’

‘...I don’t understand,’ said Hector.

‘Unsurprising. It is not for the young to perceive.’

‘...Does that mean I’ll be able to see the future when I’m older?’

‘It is not seeing the future.’

‘...It kind of is, though, isn’t it?’

Rasalased laughed again."

"1109

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

Emiliana decided to speak up. ‘Do you know what is happening outside right now?’

‘Yes.’

‘The fighting, I mean. You can sense it? My father and everyone?’

‘Of course.’

She hesitated. ‘Do you know who is going to win?’

Rasalased fell quiet a moment. ‘No. There are too many choices. But without all of you there, I predict the Marauder will be victorious. He will have much help.’

‘Without us?’ said Emiliana. ‘What difference can we make?’

‘What, indeed.’

Hector saw that one coming, though he was surprised there was no mention of holding true or whatever.

‘I have another question,’ said Emiliana.

‘The answer is no,’ said Rasalased.

‘What? But--’

‘You cannot stay here,’ he elaborated. ‘That was your question, no? You wish to stay and meditate. To grow. And return stronger. This is a reasonable desire. But you must not.’

‘Why?’ said Emiliana. ‘If we’re stronger, we can help. And time is slower in here, so--'

'Time is not time. If you remain with me, my soul will consume yours. You will all disappear.'

'Oh,' said Garovel. 'Well, that's unfortunate.'

'Thank you for telling us,' said Chergoa, 'rather than letting us find out the hard way.'

'I suppose that explains why you can read our thoughts,' said Garovel. 'Because they're slowly becoming YOUR thoughts, hmm?'

'Yes,' said Rasalased. 'I must release you now. I wish you well. Each of you.'

'Anything else to tell us before we go?' asked Garovel.

'You will be weakened.'

'What?'

'Resist, but do not fight. Hold true and see.'

'Great.'

The world shuddered, blackness and perception trembling together.

And Hector tried to brace himself."

"1110 -- CXXVI.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Six: 'O, burning Sea...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector felt at once as if he were waking from a dream while also sliding off a cliff. Lethargic and rushing. Fleeting sensations of up and down movement. Both pleasant and uncomfortable.

Then reality came bleeding back in. Sight and smell. Taste and touch. Balance and sound and motion and pressure. Everything was there.

He had a body again. Or some of one, at least. A huge chunk of his torso was gone, as if some giant had taken a bite out of him, leaving a cavernous and bloody hole where his left arm, leg, and most of his rib cage should have been.

That wasn't quite how he remembered leaving it.

But he was still regenerating. He'd become little more than a crumpled heap on the floor, but the vigor hadn't worn off just yet.

The sound of fighting echoed distantly, shaking the floor, loosening dusty debris from the ceiling.

"Garovel?" he tried. It came out coughing, but he was still mildly surprised by his own voice. It sounded almost foreign to him. And he was pretty sure one of his lungs was missing.

'I'm here,' the reaper said. 'You don't look so good, friend.'

He felt a shard in his one hand. It made him smile briefly as he wondered how the hell he'd managed to keep hold of it. He rolled over, trying to look around while he waited for his stomach to grow back.

He'd ended up in a cubbyhole of sorts. Whatever this room was before, it was so annihilated now that its walls were just piles of rubble. Maybe it wasn't even a room. It could've been a hallway, for all he knew.

"Alright," he said, tasting blood in his mouth. "Tell me what to do, Garovel."

'Uhh--'

He was interrupted by Asad flying through a wall of debris."
"1110 -- CXXVI.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Six: 'O, burning Sea...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector felt at once as if he were waking from a dream while also sliding off a cliff. Lethargic and rushing. Fleeting sensations of up and down movement. Both pleasant and uncomfortable.

Then reality came bleeding back in. Sight and smell. Taste and touch. Balance and sound and motion and pressure. Everything was there.

He had a body again. Or some of one, at least. A huge chunk of his torso was gone, as if some giant had taken a bite out of him, leaving a cavernous and bloody hole where his left arm, leg, and most of his rib cage should have been.

That wasn't quite how he remembered leaving it.

But he was still regenerating. He'd become little more than a crumpled heap on the floor, but the vigor hadn't worn off just yet.

The sound of fighting echoed distantly, shaking the floor, loosening dusty debris from the ceiling.

"Garovel?" he tried. It came out coughing, but he was still mildly surprised by his own voice. It sounded almost foreign to him. And he was pretty sure one of his lungs was missing.

'I'm here,' the reaper said. 'You don't look so good, friend.'

He felt a shard in his one hand. It made him smile briefly as he wondered how the hell he'd managed to keep hold of it. He rolled over, trying to look around while he waited for his stomach to grow back.

He'd ended up in a cubbyhole of sorts. Whatever this room was before, it was so annihilated now that its walls were just piles of rubble. Maybe it wasn't even a room. It could've been a hallway, for all he knew.

"Alright," he said, tasting blood in his mouth. "Tell me what to do, Garovel."

'Uhh--'

He was interrupted by Asad flying through a wall of debris."
"1111

Hector started crawling toward Asad through the shower of shattered stone, but the Lord Najir was already standing up again, visibly broken bones shifting back into place with the heightened speed of pan-forma.

The man's tattoos, however, were flickering. The golden glow had been constant before, so long as Asad was sustaining damage, but now it seemed to be lagging. Fewer of them were leaping from his body, as well, and the look on Asad's face spoke of disorientation.

And through the fresh hole in the debris, Hector could see the distant Marauder's translucent form moving toward them.

Hector already knew he wouldn't be able to do anything, but impulse told him to try anyway. He let go of the shard in order to thrust his hand out and concentrate on a barricade of iron walls. However, even his low expectations were not met, because no wall materialized. With a confused blink, he tried again, and this time, he managed to create a faint spray of dust.

His eyes widened as he realized. This was what Rasalased had meant by being weakened.

'Garovel, you need to run,' Hector thought.

'Don't worry about me,' the reaper said.

And Hector was about to wonder where Garovel even was right now, but something else stole his attention.

Between Asad and the oncoming Marauder, a flash of brown swirled into existence, then promptly vanished, leaving three figures behind. Hector recognized them immediately.

Ibai Blackburn, Darktide, and the Seadevil.

Hector could only stare, but the two Rainlord juggernauts wasted no time. Billowing smoke and liquid metal charged headlong toward Caster.

Hector braced himself for another explosion, but Ibai was suddenly in front of him, grabbing him by the shoulder, and teleporting him away. Hector barely remembered to scoop the shard back up in time.

The brown shadow dispersed as quickly as it had come, but they were in a new room now. And the explosion did indeed arrive a moment later, shaking perhaps the entirety of Dunehall, but for once, Hector didn't find himself getting caught in the blast radius."

"1112

"Hello again, my one black friend," said Ibai. "You seem to be having a hard time."

Hector grunted as Ibai set him down. His freshly regenerated lung squished against the stone floor, not yet having a rib cage to protect it.

"I'm sorry it took us so long to come help," the aberration went on. "I've been a bit busy, what with all the sabotage and so forth. But now we've got a moment to rest."

It made sense, Hector realized. "You're the reason the Marauder couldn't find Darktide and the Seadevil."

"The Marauder?"

"That Caster guy."

"Oh, him. Yes. I figured Abolish would go for them first. They are our strongest combatants, but they were also unconscious and vulnerable. If I didn't hide them and wake them up, this battle would have been a foregone conclusion, I think."

Hector understood. He wondered if Ibai's sabotage hadn't also had something to do with their assailants no longer being invisible.

"Where is your reaper?" Ibai asked.

'Here.' Garovel's skull peeked up through the floor.

"Please come with me," said Ibai.

'Where to?'

"To gather the non-combatants. I would like to take as many as I can to safety, and your help would be appreciated."

'Hector?'

He'd just about finished regenerating and was trying to find his footing again. In truth, he still felt a little woozy. His thoughts were largely clear, but there was a certain light-headedness that was throwing him off. "Sure," he said.

"...Are you okay?" said Ibai.

Hector closed his eyes, concentrating. "Yes," he said. When he opened them again, Ibai had no pants on.

The aberration stood there in his underwear, offering his belted trousers to Hector. "You should have these."

Hector's own pants had been shredded, of course, along with his shirt. The left leg was completely gone, and Hector didn't need to look down in order to tell that half his junk was hanging out."

"1113

He decided to accept Ibai's offer. He had a bit of trouble with the left leg. The whole left side of his body still felt a little sluggish and weird, but he powered through.

Ibai didn't seem too concerned about having to run around in his underwear. If anything, he looked happier.

Before Hector even realized it, they'd teleported again, and he saw a group of vaguely familiar faces huddled in the corner. Non-servant Rainlords, they were. Sebolts, he was pretty sure.

"By the way," said Ibai, "I wanted to ask. You seem fairly experienced. Have you been on many adventures?"

The question might as well have been in another language for all the sense it made to Hector at the moment. He just concentrated on gathering the Rainlords around Ibai.

--+-+--+--

Xuan Sebolt could not have been more disappointed.

When he'd heard Ibai talk about how Caster Egmond was in the building, he'd immediately gotten his hopes up. The famed Marauder of Calthos? Opportunities like that didn't come along every day. This could have been his most satisfying fight in a dozen years, especially since he wasn't even fully recovered from Marshrock yet. The desperate and exhausting battles were always the best.

If only the Marauder hadn't turned out to be a destruction user.

Xuan almost pitied the man. It wasn't like destruction was a categorically inferior ability or anything. Obviously, it was very potent and deadly, and most servants were right to fear pan-rozum users who had it. But none of that applied to the Seadevil.

Caster hadn't even seemed to realize it yet. But then, that wasn't so surprising. There weren't very many servants in the world who could wield a gas the way Xuan could."

"1114

The continuous streams of destruction were certainly impressive as far as demonstrations of skill went, but the thing was, they couldn't actually destroy smoke. The concussive force of the destruction type was certainly powerful, but it was also slow by comparison to, say, a soul-empowered explosion, which could disperse Xuan's smoke very rapidly in all directions and thereby shred his soul.

Essentially, the only thing a destruction user could do to Xuan was push his smoke around. The molecular structure of gaseous matter made it a perfect counter to everything the Marauder wanted to do.

And that wasn't very exhilarating.

The only obstacle to victory here was reaching the Marauder's mind. Since he'd more or less become a being of living destruction, his one weak point in pan-rozum was going to be well protected.

But that wouldn't make much difference, either, so long as Xuan kept him smothered.

And so the fight unfolded. Xuan and Duvoss' two minds sat there in the phosphorus fumes, examining Caster's body, searching for the weak point. Caster could send waves of destruction through the smoke, which certainly still threatened Zeff, Asad, and Melchor, but Duvoss had them covered. A blatant, arrow-shaped smoke signal would shoot out and warn their comrades whenever an attack from Caster was imminent.

And soon enough, Xuan found the weak point. A speck in the Marauder's soul. Xuan could attack himself, but Darktide could hit harder, so he created an opening in his smoke and pointed the old bastard to it. Sure enough, soul-empowered javelins of frozen mercury flew into the opening and smashed against the Marauder's body.

But even with Darktide's help, this would be slow going. Caster had been declawed, but it would be a while before his defenses crumbled.

Which was why Xuan grew bored so quickly. This wasn't a fight so much as an exercise in tedium. It was enough to make his mind wander in the midst of it. Duvoss was still there anyway, and he'd always had more patience for these kinds of things."

"1115

The fight with Darktide had been much more satisfying. Now there was a well-rounded opponent. And that name. A bit superfluous, really. "Melchor" was intimidating enough already.

As Xuan recalled, Melchor had gotten that name after going on a number of vengeful killing sprees many years past. For his fallen brethren. That was the kind of man Melchor was, the kind he'd always been. Even as a child. Xuan had only met him a few times in those early days, but he remembered that same severity, the same humorless demeanor.

But now that he was thinking about it, Xuan had been that way, too. They all had, really. Back then, the life of a young male Rainlord was even harder than it was now. None of this waiting until adolescence to become a servant. If you could walk, you could fight. And all the rituals. All the trials. Drowning, studying, fighting, training--all while maintaining the appearance of a sophisticated gentleman, of someone with high moral fiber.

And of course, they had to watch their elders fall in battle. One after another. Year in and year out. Death upon death. Some sacrificed themselves, trying to secure the next generation. Some died honorably in glorious battle. Others were simply murdered in cold blood.

Melchor hadn't changed. He was a product of his time--perhaps made a bit pricklier by his kin frowning upon homosexuals during his formative years, but still a product of his time nonetheless.

No, it was Xuan who'd changed. And he wasn't sure when that had happened, exactly. Or why.

Oh, but he was getting lost in thought. He checked back in on Caster.

Eh, it was the same as before. Duvoss was doing a fine job.

Maybe it was just all the loss, Xuan wondered. It certainly made life easier to just embrace the chaos and the blood, rather than letting it bring him down again and again. And again. And still again.

So many friends, he'd had. A hundred years' worth."

"1116

This was why he was unfit for leadership, Xuan knew. He didn't have the temperament. Or rather, he didn't want it. He could keep calm well enough. Think clearly well enough. But the fight was all he really cared about. Because that was what it always came down to. In the end, the fight was what mattered most. Diplomacy might win the day, but there was always tomorrow. The fight was inevitable.

And that was why, he realized. That was why he'd changed. He remembered that lesson well. Field Marshal Kane had tried to teach it to him. It took Abolish for him to truly understand, though.

Quite possibly the greatest diplomatic victory of his life. Working directly under Kane. A very delicate mission in Hoss, Vantalay, and the recently-emerged state of Steccat. All three countries had been flirting with war for a good five years or so, and Abolish had been doing its damndest to help them make the final push.

Kane's task force grew by leaps and bounds during that time, learning new tactics, relearning old ones, refitting itself to become one of the most flexible paramilitary units in the world. By the time all was said and done, Xuan had fought Abolish in almost every conceivable manner--as a counter-terrorist, as an ambassador, as a bodyguard, as a propaganda officer, as a spy, as a negotiator, as a mediator, even as a mailman and a deli shop employee.

It was some of the hardest, strangest, and most rewarding work he'd ever been a part of. Without a doubt, Kane and his men saved tens of thousands of lives, if not more.

And the very next week, after returning home to Waterbreak in Roth for the first time in over four years, Xuan heard the news.

Lac'Vayce. A million dead in less than three days of fighting."
"1117

Xuan had known people there, of course. He'd visited Melmoore several times in his youth. He'd been fond of Lac'Vayce in particular for its combination of lush tropical vistas and ancient cultural heritage. Sure, it had been something of a tourist trap, but that was probably why the locals were so absurdly welcoming and friendly.

He visited the battleground afterward. The Vanguard had walled the whole island off, but Xuan managed to get inside for a look.

Only a smoldering wasteland remained. Where once had been dozens of skyscraping hotels and office buildings, only a few piles of rubble stood. The very ground itself was mushy under his feet, even smoking and oozing in places. And the stench.

Indescribably awful.

He didn't know why he was thinking about all this now.

No. On second thought, he did know. This was exactly why he hated being bored. It made him introspective; it brought out the old man in him. And all in all, there just weren't enough good memories--not when compared with all the bad ones.

What a sour old fart, he'd become.

But wait.

Wait a minute.

This wasn't supposed to be happening.

His mind was joined with Duvoss'.

Pan-rozum.

It was perfectly fine to multitask.

Concentrate on two things at once.

But drifting like this.

These thoughts shouldn't have felt so far removed.

This wasn't right.

No.

Where were Duvoss' thoughts?

At this very moment, what was the reaper thinking?

No.

NO.

Xuan seized control again. Smoke gathered, swirled, and his hand formed. It found his point of control, his merged mind, and pulled.

Duvoss came free, exhausted and unconscious.

The smoke shuddered and dispersed, giving way to Xuan's small frame. He hit the floor with his reaper in hand and struggled there as his body refused to listen to him."

"1118

Xuan tried to concentrate, to understand what was happening, but it was a challenge even to stay conscious. Every muscle felt numb and sluggish, and his vision kept blurring in and out.

They'd pushed themselves too hard, his brain finally realized. He and Duvoss had known this might happen. Of course they had.

But that was how hyper state exhaustion worked, subtle and creeping and numbing. A quiet crevice between the two minds would form, and it was only too common for neither one to realize what was happening until it was too late.

And because he'd drifted, he didn't know how much time had passed since the fight began, either. It could have been one minute; it could have been twenty.

It couldn't have been that long, though, because he was still himself. Mostly. He hadn't totally lost it and started attacking his own comrades, at least. That was something.

But that was definitely where his mind had been headed. He could still feel the lingering weight that had been growing in his soul a moment ago. A twisted mixture of despair and rage. If it had progressed to hunger, too, then...

He didn't think about it. He needed to focus. What was happening?

He looked around. Everything was a mess. The room was unfamiliar. Had they moved? Of course they had. Where were they now? Too difficult to tell. Who was still fighting?

Asad and Qorvass were down, Xuan saw. The reaper was bleeding out of the Sandlord's torso.

Zeff and Axiolis were on one knee--still alive and covered in thin trails of fog and ice. But they were struggling to hold it together. Their merge was probably going to end soon, if it wasn't already happening.

Dimas? Xuan couldn't see--no. There he was. Him and Iziol. On the ground behind Darktide.

Darktide was still standing? Still fighting? Of course he was. That ridiculous bastard."

"1119

Xuan writhed on the floor, gritting his teeth as he tried and failed to stand. He hated this. More than anything. Only being able to watch? No. He had to get up. He had to fight.

Liquid metal splashed across his vision as Darktide clashed with Caster. But it wasn't just Caster, he realized. More Abolish trash had arrived. A half dozen unfamiliar souls were in the room with them now, all behind the Marauder. Xuan hadn't even sensed them. What a failure, he'd become. Useless.

Four of them attacked alongside Caster, flanking Melchor. The lone Rainlord grabbed two and tore them both to pieces, but Caster barreled through the mercury like a bull.

Then came a flash of light. An explosion. Xuan couldn't hear it, but he could feel it. The ground lifted out from under him, and a vague sense of movement enveloped him. He hit something. Probably the ground again. And when he looked out another time, he saw smaller figures.

Children.

His vision focused.

The Elroy kids. They hadn't gotten out? No, there was a wall of debris in their way. The older girl was trying to punch and claw through it, but she looked unsteady. The younger girl was injured, and the boy was trying to set her down, probably to help the older one.

They needed help. But Xuan couldn't provide it. He could only lay there, watching.

Darktide came splattering into view. Splotches of mercury hit the broken floor and puddled together, struggling to make their way back to the main body mass.

Zeff, Asad, Dimas, and all of their reapers oozed out of Darktide's liquid form. Xuan had no idea how Melchor had managed to keep them safe. All but Zeff were unconscious.

The Lord Elroy punched the ground, trying to stand. He'd separated from his reaper, who now sat on his shoulder, apparently out cold like the others."

"1120 -- CXXVII.

Darktide was having trouble getting back up as well, now. His mercury bristled like fur, trying to retain its shape.

The Abolishers arrived through the cavernous hole in the far wall, even more numerous than before. They moved to engage again.

But then everyone stopped. All at once. And Xuan saw why.

A new figure was standing there in the middle of the chamber. Pitch black and tall. Too tall. Taller than any person should be. And bearing a tail. Along with eyes that glowed deeply crimson.

Primarily, though, it was this pressure that had halted everything. This presence. How had Xuan not sensed it sooner? He should have been able to sense a soul this powerful from a mile off.

Caster was the first to break the silence. "What are you doing?" he asked with two voices. He sounded as confused as anyone.

The figure didn't respond.

But he didn't really need to. The Seadevil knew who this was. Practically anyone would. That inhuman physique. This imposing pressure. Those black scales. There could be no doubt.

This was the Monster of the East. This was Gohvis.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Seven: 'O, dire Scourge...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"Please do not ignore me," said Caster. "I asked you a question. You are not supposed to--"

A huge black fist cut him off, and suddenly the Marauder was gone, sent flying diagonally through the ceiling. The hole he left behind didn't stop on the next floor, either. Xuan could see blue sky through the rubble and sand.

"Wha--?"

The Monster moved so quickly that Xuan didn't even see what happened to the next two Abolishers. They simply vanished into two more holes on either side of the ceiling.

The Seadevil's eyes did, however, manage to catch the next three strikes. Two punches and a tail swipe. Two of the receiving Abolishers exploded into a cloud of blood and guts on impact, and the third joined the others through yet another hole in the ceiling."

"1120 -- CXXVII.

Darktide was having trouble getting back up as well, now. His mercury bristled like fur, trying to retain its shape.

The Abolishers arrived through the cavernous hole in the far wall, even more numerous than before. They moved to engage again.

But then everyone stopped. All at once. And Xuan saw why.

A new figure was standing there in the middle of the chamber. Pitch black and tall. Too tall. Taller than any person should be. And bearing a tail. Along with eyes that glowed deeply crimson.

Primarily, though, it was this pressure that had halted everything. This presence. How had Xuan not sensed it sooner? He should have been able to sense a soul this powerful from a mile off.

Caster was the first to break the silence. "What are you doing?" he asked with two voices. He sounded as confused as anyone.

The figure didn't respond.

But he didn't really need to. The Seadevil knew who this was. Practically anyone would. That inhuman physique. This imposing pressure. Those black scales. There could be no doubt.

This was the Monster of the East. This was Gohvis.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Seven: 'O, dire Scourge...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"Please do not ignore me," said Caster. "I asked you a question. You are not supposed to--"

A huge black fist cut him off, and suddenly the Marauder was gone, sent flying diagonally through the ceiling. The hole he left behind didn't stop on the next floor, either. Xuan could see blue sky through the rubble and sand.

"Wha--?"

The Monster moved so quickly that Xuan didn't even see what happened to the next two Abolishers. They simply vanished into two more holes on either side of the ceiling.

The Seadevil's eyes did, however, manage to catch the next three strikes. Two punches and a tail swipe. Two of the receiving Abolishers exploded into a cloud of blood and guts on impact, and the third joined the others through yet another hole in the ceiling."

Four Abolishers remained, but Gohvis stopped mid-punch in front of the next one. The guy blinked at the Monster's torso in his face and staggered back, falling on his ass and trying to crawl away.

Gohvis didn't move any more than that, as far as Xuan could tell, but a blue glow had gathered around his whole body. And after seeing what had become of Caster, no one in the room seemed brave enough to ask the Monster what he was doing another time. Instead, Xuan heard the ceiling groan and shift as Dunehall settled.

Xuan noticed that the sound of battle had ceased elsewhere as well. Previously, he'd been able to hear muffled gunfire or explosions, but no longer. That might well have been Gohvis' doing, too. Even if they didn't know who it belonged to, every reaper and servant in the building should have been able to feel this soul's presence.

There came a loud crash from the next room over, and everyone but the Monster turned to look at the half-broken door leading there.

And Xuan blinked, sensing it again. A second one. There was another soul with that same oppressive aura in the building. Had it only just arrived? Or had he simply been too distracted by Gohvis' soul to realize? Perhaps a bit of both.

The door opened, and a man stepped through. The door snapped from its hinges and fell on the floor. The man spared it a look of mild surprise. "Well, this sure has gotten messy," he said.

He wore so much yellow that he looked like a banana. His hat, suit, and briefcase were all so bright that they bled into one another. Only his shoes, his thin tie, and the slim band around his hat broke the trend, all by being jet black."

"1122

There was little doubt in Xuan's mind that the man in yellow was Ivan, the Salesman of Death.

Gohvis, the right hand of Dozer. And Ivan, the right hand of Morgunov.

What they were both doing here, Xuan had no idea, but he could feel the whole room change, somehow. Possibly the whole castle. It was like there was some sort of wall all around them, encompassing everyone. Trapping them. Judging from the soul, it was the Salesman's doing.

It didn't matter for Xuan so much. He and Duvoss weren't about to get up and run away. The children, though...

Xuan had to do something. He pressed his palm against the floor, but he still didn't have the strength to even push himself onto his knees.

Ivan stepped closer to Gohvis. "I believe I asked you not to interfere," he said. "And yet, here I find you, punching my men--quite literally--into a different time zone. Do you know how annoying that is? Being lied to by your friend?"

The Monster returned a low-toned growl, and for the first time, his lipless, nearly invisible mouth opened. "Release me. Before I release myself." He spoke with two voices, though they sounded a bit strange, perhaps because one was so inhumanly deep.

"Why? Are you afraid the blowback will harm these nice people here? I presume that is why you--"

"No." And the Monster disappeared into thin air, only to reappear a few steps over with his huge hand wrapped around the yellow man's throat.

"Ha." A blue glow engulfed the Salesman's neck and loosened the Monster's grip, allowing Ivan to step back. "One day, you will have to explain to me how you do that."

"Stay out of my way," the Monster said.

"Stay out of mine," the Salesman said."

"1123

There came a tense period of silence as the two giants of Abolish stared at each other.

Xuan wondered what the others were thinking. Darktide was still maintaining pan-rozum somehow, but he and Zeff were only observing. It did seem like the Monster had come to their aid. Even if it didn't make any sense, they were probably hoping they wouldn't have to fight him.

The air shuddered around Gohvis. "You think you can stop me?" Something about the way he said it made it feel like the whole room was shaking.

Ivan seemed nonplussed, however. "Of course I can stop you," he said plainly. "But that is beside the point. We both know that I do not need to do anything. Unless, of course, you want to make that old man of yours very angry with you."

"Why would he be angry? I am here on his order."

Ivan broke for a laugh. "Who do you think you are talking to? Beyond doubt, I know that to be a lie."

"Is that so?"

"It is. But there's no need for this dance. Attack me and prove me wrong."

The Monster made no response.

"As I thought," said Ivan, looking quite pleased with himself. "Now, why don't you explain why you apparently care so much about the fate of these people?"

Gohvis did no such thing.

"I'm not unreasonable," Ivan went on. "If it's a good explanation, I might let you have them."

Still, he remained silent.

Ivan nodded and stepped toward Darktide, whose vague mass rose to face him, launching a flurry of frozen javelins.

The Salesman waved his hand, and a translucent wave of blue knocked them aside, along with Darktide himself. Mercury splattered against the wall, and Melchor and Orric melted out separately, finally down for the count."

"1124

Only the barely-standing Lord Elroy remained. And without warning, a surge of water appeared, jetting toward the Salesman, only to break upon a faintly blue wall. The waves swished back and slammed against another nigh-invisible barricade, becoming suddenly boxed in. The crashing waves were abruptly silenced as no sound was able to escape the Salesman's box.

"Stop," said Gohvis.

Ivan tilted his head as he eyed his new aquarium. "Water? Ha. Look, Monster. It's the new Water Dragon. This one's name is Zeff Elroy, as I recall."

Zeff was pinned to the floor now beneath a blanket of blue energy. Xuan hadn't even seen when the Salesman managed to do that.

Gohvis took a step closer, but that was it. With reptilian eyes and no visible mouth, his expression was unreadable.

"But perhaps you already knew that," said Ivan. "Is this why you are here? You have some affection for these rare abilities? I know the feeling. It is a bit of a shame to just snuff it out like this, but on the bright side, there will probably be another one in a few generations, right?"

"Stop," said Gohvis again. "...Please."

That gave Ivan pause, along with everyone else in the room. "Excuse me?" said Ivan, sounding genuinely stunned. "Did you just say please?"

Xuan saw a new expression on the Salesman's face. Confused thinking. Gears turning.

"Wait a minute," said Ivan. "Don't tell me... oh, Monster, don't tell me. Oh my, oh no. Ha. Aha. Monster, are these people your kin?"

"NO." That one word made the room tremble, sand and dust trickling from the perforated ceiling again. Gohvis didn't wait for a response this time, however. He melted out of sight and reappeared behind Zeff. "Take them all. I don't care. But the girl in the mask is mine."

"1125

“Girl in the mask?” Ivan scanned over their audience before settling on Emiliana Elroy. “Interesting. What makes her so special? Tell me, and I’ll give you all the rest of them, too.”

“No, you won’t,” said Gohvis.

“Ha. Fine. So if I give her to you, what will you give me in ex--?”

“You are not giving her to me,” said Gohvis. “She is mine. Try to take her, and I will kill you.”

“Ah...” The yellow man’s gaze returned to Gohvis and lingered there. “I actually believe you this time. You really would fight me for this girl, wouldn’t you?”

Gohvis just stared at him.

“Hold on. Is she--?” Ivan broke for a look of genuine excitement. “Is she your kid? Can you have kids? Is she your lizard baby?!”

For some reason, the Monster chose not to respond to that.

“Does she have a lizard face?! Gohvis, please! I’ll let you have them all if you just show me her lizard face!”

“She is not my child.” The Monster was beginning to sound exasperated.

“Really?”

“Yes.”

“...So no lizard face?”

“No.”

“Well, forget it, then. Anyway, I’d enjoy fighting you, but not over something so trivial. You can have her if she means that much to you.”

A muddy brown swirl chose that moment to arrive.

-+-+-+-

Hector had felt it like everyone else. Even the non-servants they’d gathered outside the castle were talking about it. This ominous pressure. Most of them were Rainlords, though, so they seemed to have a better idea of what it was. Hector needed Garovel to remind him.

True giants were here. Two of them, according to Garovel. And the Elroys were caught in their path, naturally.

Hector didn't know what to do. More so than usual, even, because Garovel didn't know what to do, either. That, and he was still feeling a little woozy from whatever Rasalased had done to him.

Ibai, on the other hand, was a different story."

"1126

From the moment they'd sensed the two big souls, Ibai hadn't stopped blabbering--mostly to himself and with such speed that Hector couldn't even follow what he was saying. It sounded like Ibai was trying to formulate a plan or something, and kept looking at Hector as if looking for approval, only to continue talking anyway.

And now, Hector found himself here, in another decimated room, staring at the back of some giant, black dragon-man-thing. He looked around and saw a host of downed servants that he recognized. Zeff, Dimas, Melchor, Xuan, Asad.

"Why, hello there," Ibai was already saying. "You gentlemen are from Abolish, am I right? Wait don't tell me! The Black Scourge and the Salesman of Death! Yeah? My name is Ibai. I'm an aberration, if you couldn't already tell. It's a pleasure to make your acquaintance."

"Well, aren't you friendly?" said the yellow man. "How did you get in here?"

"Oh, are you asking because you sealed this room off?" Ibai asked. "How did you do that, by the way? A force field? Are you a force field guy? I've never met a force field guy! How does your power work? Or is that a rude thing to ask? If so, I apologize. I'm just naturally curious. Always have been. You know how it is."

Ivan was stepping closer. "It's been a while since I met someone who likes to talk as much as I do. I'd rather you answer my questions first, though." He raised a hand to encase Ibai in a blue field, but the aberration was already gone by then, ported to the other side of the room and leaving Hector standing next to Gohvis.

Ibai and the Salesman kept talking, and Hector was a bit too concerned with those glowing red eyes to look anywhere else. And so he and the Monster of the East just kind of stared at each other as they listened.

Hector was surprised at how calm he felt--at how he wasn't immediately shitting his pants, anyway. He couldn't seem to change the massive frown on his face, though. Or his wide-eyed stare. Or the way that his whole body was leaning backward, as if preparing to be stepped on."

"1127

"Boy," said Gohvis, "tell me your name."

It took a second for Hector to realize that the question had been addressed to him. "Ah--uh. Hector Goffe." That was dumb. He should've just made up some bullshit.

"How are you still alive, Hector Goffe?"

"Er... good question. Dumb luck, I think."

"No such thing exists," said Gohvis. "Destiny controls all."

"...I disagree. There's way too much pointless shit in the world for that to be true." What the hell was he saying?! Who did his brain think it was talking to?! His body knew to be terrified, but his brain--

"Why are you here?" the Monster asked.

The question went unanswered, however, as Ibai teleported behind them and promptly vanished with Chergoa, Shenado, and all of the Elroy children.

Gohvis growled, and then he too was gone, just like that.

Hector was left standing there on his own, feeling like some kind of asshole. Precisely what kind, he wasn't sure.

It was then that he realized Garovel wasn't in the room with him, either.

‘Garovel, where are you?’

‘Very far underground,’ the reaper said. ‘How’s it going up there?’

Hector saw the man in yellow looking over this way now. ‘Terribly.’

‘How terribly?’

That question went unanswered as well, as Hector’s attention was consumed by the Salesman’s tilting head and curious expression.

“I’ve never seen a black Rainlord before.”

“Ah--I’m not a Rainlord,” said Hector.

“No? Unfortunate to find yourself here, then. Don’t tell them I said anything, but I think the Rainlords might be a little racist.”

“They seem pretty nice to me,” said Hector. Maybe his brain wasn’t paying attention to what was happening. Or maybe it just wanted to get him killed.”

"1128

The Salesman tilted his head the other way. “Are you not afraid of me?”

“...I guess not,” said Hector.

“And why might that be?”

“I don’t know. You are very frightening.”

“Ha, I know, thank you. I’ve been this way for a long time--long enough, in fact, that it gives me pause when I meet someone unfazed by my presence.”

Hector understood. This guy was wondering if Hector was powerful enough to not be bothered by his ridiculous soul pressure--powerful enough to oppose him, in other words.

“I don’t sense much from you,” said Ivan. “I don’t sense anything, actually. Quite strange. Are you that weak? You’d have to be less than a year old as a servant in order to have a soul that pathetic. And yet, from the way you speak to me... You have lipid proteinosis, don't you?"

"What?"

"The inability to feel fear. It's a genetic disorder. You have it."

"...I don't think so," said Hector.

"No? Tell the truth, now."

Hector felt the air grow heavier. The field density of the Salesman's soul had increased, he was pretty sure. But what was the point? Judging from the man's last sentence, was it supposed to make Hector tell the truth? Was that even possible? It did feel a bit oppressive, but Hector still felt perfectly capable of saying whatever he wanted. And so, after mulling it over for a few seconds, he decided to respond with, "I am telling the truth." He hadn't been lying anyway.

But the realization gave him an idea.

"Huh," said Ivan. "You're a curious one. How old are you, then?"

"...How old are you?"

Irritation flashed across the Salesman's face, and his field density increased again. "Answer me."

"1129

Hector considered what to say. He could just lie. But would that actually help? Would that put this guy off or just make him more excited to fight? The fact that Ivan was asking at all suggested that he was trying to be cautious, which further suggested that it would put him off. Maybe.

"I'm a little over three hundred years old," said Hector. He had to keep his focus. Slow, measured responses. At his own pace. He'd done this sort of thing before--maybe not on this level, but he'd done it before. "I've... I've grown so accustomed to keeping my soul's field density suppressed... that I do it without even meaning to now."

Ivan's mouth twisted slowly into a manic smile. "Ha! Excellent!"

Well, that backfired.

“If not for my big lizard friend, I would have left this operation to my men. What with the Rainlords being exhausted and none of the Sandlords but the Lion present, I was sure there wouldn’t be anyone here who could show me a good time. I do love a nice surprise.”

Hector recognized the mad expression on the Salesman’s face. Perhaps it was some kind of prerequisite for becoming one of Morgunov’s followers.

He’d guessed wrong. Now the Salesman was going to stomp him into the dust. Unless he did something about it. He already knew fighting wasn’t an option. This guy could probably kill him with a sneeze.

That only left talking. Not his strong suit, to say the least. In fact, he’d already cocked it up pretty badly. But he did know what he wanted to say next.

“Agh,” Ivan said first, “all these interruptions. Pardon me a moment.”

Hector didn’t know what he was talking about, until the right wall exploded as a floating blue cage came crashing through it.

Hector shielded his eyes from the ensuing cloud of dust and sidestepped a chunk of debris the size of a horse. Briefly, he was quite pleased with himself for being able to see that coming. And then a smaller one pegged him right in the face.”

"1130

Nothing felt broken, at least. Hector couldn’t tell if his regeneration was still active or not. With everything that had transpired, he’d completely lost track of time. It could have been thirty minutes since Garovel started the regen. It could’ve been five.

As the dust cleared, Hector saw the blue cage again, more clearly this time. Inside of it was a man, hanging upside down.

“Ismael Blackburn,” said Ivan. “What are you doing, sneaking around?”

Indeed, it was him. Hector hadn’t registered the face at first, having only seen the man a couple times before.

Lord Ismael chose to remain silent.

Ivan kept talking anyway. "That aberration. Ibai. Tell me about him." And when Ismael still did not respond, Ivan said, "He is your son, I hear. Is that true?"

"...Y-yes," said Ismael. "It is."

"Funny, I'd always heard you couldn't have children. Do you know how aberrations are made?"

A groan passed Ismael's lips, as if the words were being torn from his lungs. "No... I... I do not."

"Ha. Where is that wife of yours? I should like to speak to her, too."

Ismael's face twitched, his mouth fighting to remain closed. And this time, it did.

"Oho. Resilient."

Hector could only look on in horror. He wanted to help. Of course he did. But he knew better. He had to keep his focus. No matter what happened here, he had to keep it. Because Rasalased had been absolutely right.

"Tell me about your son," said Ivan.

"...N-no."

"Don't be difficult. I am a patient man, but not that patient."

"I won't tell you anything more."

The Salesman frowned, then turned to the unconscious Darktide. "Tell me, or he dies."

"...You will kill him anyway," said Ismael.

"Ha."

Hector felt he had to intervene. "Our conversation isn't over. Leave them alone."

"1131 -- CXXVIII.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

Ivan seemed amused at Hector. "You're still trying to talk? These people are your comrades, no? The fact that you haven't attacked me yet is proof enough that you aren't as powerful as you claim."

Hector's jaw clenched.

"Don't get me wrong," said Ivan. "I admire your moxie. Trying to play me for a fool? Do you know how rarely people try to do that? To me?! It's been ages!"

"You're wrong," said Hector, not yet sure how he was going to back that statement up.

"Am I? Oh, then please explain. I would love to hear this."

It couldn't end here. He had to keep this up somehow. He hated talking. He hated how much he sucked at it. But this was something else. This was bullshitting. And he could do that. Probably.

True, the stakes were a tiny bit higher than usual. But strangely, that only made things clearer to him. He had to bullshit like he'd never bullshitted before. And his mind was calm. Maybe it was Rasalased's doing. Maybe he'd lost his goddamn mind. He couldn't worry about that right now. Whatever the reason, in this moment, it was helping him. There was no panic. No anxiety. No distractions.

Only the knowledge that if he lost control or simply gave up, then everyone here would die.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Eight: 'Hold true...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There was only one thing that Hector knew Ivan wanted. One thing that Hector could hold hostage.

"If you kill them... then I won't fight you," said Hector.

Ivan let out a laugh. "What?"

Hector knew he couldn't let up. "Listen. My power. It's too volatile right now. If I use it here... then... everyone will die, anyway. It would be... ah, it would be the same as just letting you kill them. That's why I haven't intervened. That's why... I didn't kill your Marauder, even though I could have. Obviously."

The Salesman just kind of blinked at him."
"1131 -- CXXVIII.

--Monday donation bonus (Page 1/3)--

Ivan seemed amused at Hector. "You're still trying to talk? These people are your comrades, no? The fact that you haven't attacked me yet is proof enough that you aren't as powerful as you claim."

Hector's jaw clenched.

"Don't get me wrong," said Ivan. "I admire your moxie. Trying to play me for a fool? Do you know how rarely people try to do that? To me?! It's been ages!"

"You're wrong," said Hector, not yet sure how he was going to back that statement up.

"Am I? Oh, then please explain. I would love to hear this."

It couldn't end here. He had to keep this up somehow. He hated talking. He hated how much he sucked at it. But this was something else. This was bullshitting. And he could do that. Probably.

True, the stakes were a tiny bit higher than usual. But strangely, that only made things clearer to him. He had to bullshit like he'd never bullshitted before. And his mind was calm. Maybe it was Rasalased's doing. Maybe he'd lost his goddamn mind. He couldn't worry about that right now. Whatever the reason, in this moment, it was helping him. There was no panic. No anxiety. No distractions.

Only the knowledge that if he lost control or simply gave up, then everyone here would die.

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Eight: 'Hold true...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There was only one thing that Hector knew Ivan wanted. One thing that Hector could hold hostage.

"If you kill them... then I won't fight you," said Hector.

Ivan let out a laugh. "What?"

Hector knew he couldn't let up. "Listen. My power. It's too volatile right now. If I use it here... then... everyone will die, anyway. It would be... ah, it would be the same as just letting you kill them. That's why I haven't intervened. That's why... I didn't kill your Marauder, even though I could have. Obviously."

The Salesman just kind of blinked at him."

"1132

--Monday donation bonus (Page 2/3)--

"So," Hector went on, "if you want to fight me, then we can't do it here. We have to go somewhere else. And you have to... leave these people alone."

Ivan looked over their audience another time before returning to Hector. "For a second there, I almost believed you. Playing up to my fun-loving bloodlust. Smart. Thing is, though: it's been done and done and done. So I'm just not buying it. I'm a stingy customer in that way. More of a seller, you know. Ha."

"I'm not lying," Hector lied. "I don't care what happens to me. I'll let you kill me or capture me or whatever. And then you won't get the fight you want."

"Nah. You won't do that. Even if you do have a power that puts your buddies at risk, you wouldn't just let them die."

Hector glared at him. "You don't understand how dangerous my power is."

The Salesman met his gaze evenly. "Hmm. And what is this oh-so-dangerous power of yours, exactly?"

Garovel could've helped with that one. Hector very much wanted to consult the reaper right now, but there just wasn't time. He couldn't allow himself to get distracted. So instead, he said, "What's yours?"

“Ha. Do you know what the weak interaction is?”

With hesitation, Hector shook his head.

“Then there’s no point in explaining.” He turned to the Lord Blackburn again. “What’s his power?”

“...I-I don’t know,” said Ismael.

“Mm. Well, at least you were honest.”

The blue cage converged. A flash consumed Ismael’s body, and then the man was dust. Dead. As quickly as that.

“No!” Hector yelled. “I told you--!”

“Relax,” said Ivan. “It was only the servant. The reaper yet lives.” Another blue cage came through the same hole in the wall, this one holding a reaper. “See?”

And Hector wavered. His focus. His resolve. He didn’t know if he could just stand here and watch what was about to happen.”

"1133

--Monday donation bonus (Page 3/3)--

But he had to. He couldn’t act emotionally now. If he made a move, did anything stupid, then everything would have been for naught. It was clear enough that the Salesman at least partly believed him--otherwise he would’ve attacked Hector already--but the man in yellow still had full control of the conversation.

“Tell everyone your name,” said Ivan.

The reaper in the cage groaned but didn’t answer. Hector felt the air grow heavier again, but still, the reaper remained silent.

“This one is resilient, too,” said Ivan. “Well, that’s fine. As it so happens, information is my great hobby. Everyone, this is Rholtam. He is the reaper for Ismael Blackburn. Rholtam is one of the oldest remaining Rainlords. One of the first generation. Not many of those left. Isn’t that right, Rholtam?”

The reaper gave a slow nod.

Hector had to try again. "Stop this. I won't fight you unless--"

The cage converged. A blue flash annihilated Rholtam in an instant.

Hector's breath caught, and his face grew hot with anger. This was worse than torture. Having to watch this motherfucker kill people? He couldn't hide his scowl, and after a few moments, he stopped trying to.

Ivan just stood there, though. Observing him. Waiting with that look of expectation. Hoping for Hector to do something.

Hector resisted. He seized his mind back, his calm. And with it, he took the opportunity to talk to Garovel. 'Stay away. I might be captured by the Salesman soon.'

'Hector! What are you--?!'

He had to block the reaper out again. Even that stray thought in the back of his mind--the one asking how he was even capable of blocking Garovel out--that had to be ignored, too. He needed all of his concentration for whatever Ivan said next. He couldn't miss anything. Not a word. Not a movement. Not anything."

"1134

Ivan folded his arms. "I guess you didn't care much for those two. Alright. How about Darktide, then?" He turned toward Melchor.

"Stop!" said Hector. But he was powerless as he watched a cage surround the fallen Rainlord. It was going to happen again. And he had to watch.

A jostling of debris interrupted them, and a green light filled the room. Hector saw a horizontal pillar of smoke shoot toward Ivan. The Salesman saw it, too, but not in time to prevent himself from being enveloped in it. After a second, a blue wave knocked the smoke away, and Hector witnessed the results.

Xuan Sebolt was there, missing most of his body. Some had been sacrificed for smoke, still smoldering even now, but the majority had been given to acid, in which the Salesman had been entirely coated.

Hector remembered seeing it before. The Seadevil's acid had eaten through Horatio Blackburn in a matter of seconds, even despite the enhanced regeneration of pan-forma.

But this was the Salesman of Death. And Hector could hear a low laugh behind the loud hiss of the acid.

Ivan's yellow suit was tarnished, missing chunks here and there. His hat sizzled, mostly eaten through. And some of the flesh on his face was gone, revealing more of his teeth and parts of his bare skull.

And that was it.

"Ouch," Ivan said, sounding more amused than pained.

A blue field converged on Xuan, and the few remains of his body disintegrated in a flash. After a moment, the Seadevil's reaper floated out of the rubble, too, though not by his own volition. Duvoss was still unconscious, instead being carried in another blue cage.

"S-stop," Hector tried.

"What a lunatic," said Ivan. "I bet that guy would've become a real problem, one day."

And he crushed Duvoss as well."

"1135

Hector was losing hope. Maybe this was pointless. Maybe the Salesman was the one deceiving him. The bastard could probably tell how weak Hector was all along and was just using this opportunity to fuck with him. With each passing second, Hector grew more convinced. It was over. It had been over this whole time, and he'd just been too stupid to realize it. How could he have even hoped to win anything against one of the most powerful people in the world?

But in spite of all those thoughts, he didn't flinch. He couldn't let himself. He kept eye contact with the Salesman.

The man wasn't regenerating, Hector realized. His half-melted face stayed that way, even as the sizzling subsided. And then Hector realized something else. The man wasn't using a hyper state. This whole time, he'd only been hearing Ivan speak with one voice. It was such an obvious thing that he'd missed it, somehow. Where was this guy's reaper?

Regardless, Ivan didn't seem to be in much pain. Or any, for that matter. He set his briefcase down and popped it open. He pulled out a small mirror and a handkerchief. He looked at himself and dabbed the wounds, but the acid hadn't left much blood flowing.

"What do you think?" Ivan asked. "Charming, in its own way, no?"

Hector didn't respond.

"Not very presentable, though. If I wasn't meeting clients all the time, I think I'd just stay this way."

Hector didn't understand. Was this a trick? Or just more psychotic rambling? It didn't seem right to engage him, either way.

"Well, if you're not going to do anything, then I've got an idea. Stay right there." He dropped his mirror and handkerchief back in his briefcase, then pulled something else out. A phone, it looked like. He pointed it at Hector. "Smile for me."

Hector did not.

"C'mon, no one likes a sourpuss."

Hector just waited."

"1136

Ivan took the picture and then tinkered with his phone for a bit. "Let's see. You told the Monster your name was Hector Goffe, right?"

"...What are you doing?"

"Nothing. Be with you in a minute."

Hector tried to think. What would Ivan want his picture for? Ah. No. That could be bad if Ivan found out--

"The Darksteel Soldier," the Salesman said.

Hector had to keep himself from wincing.

"And--oh? Lord Darksteel? Of Warrenhold. Well, well. You didn't mention you were nobility.”

“...It’s a recent development.”

“Ah, indeed. A self-made man, I see.”

Hector wasn’t sure that was true, but he didn’t see much point in contesting it. In fact, maybe he could use this.

Ivan wasn’t done reading from his phone, though. “You fought some of my men. And only a couple of them reported back.”

Reported back? Hector had thought Ivan was just consulting the internet. Was that not the case?

“Mm, perhaps I’ll have a talk with this Desmond Grantier fellow.”

So Desmond survived. That was news to Hector. This was really weird, though. Somehow, he’d managed to pump a morsel of information out of the Salesman. Dare he try for more? No, he didn’t give a shit about them. He had to stay focused. He had to get ahead of it. “I’d like to take credit for that,” he said, “but, uh... I wasn’t the one who wiped out your men.”

“No?”

There was no sense in lying about that part, Hector figured--not when Ivan apparently had firsthand reports from other people who were there. “That was the Vanguard’s doing. Not mine.”

“Ah. I see.”

And Hector sensed a plan forming. In the back of his mind. Maybe. There was something. A lifeline to latch onto. Possibly. It wasn’t all there yet. “Actually, that whole thing... um. It was a very complicated... misunderstanding.”

“Oh? How so?”

"1137

Hector could see it on the Salesman’s face. He’d piqued the man’s interest. This was good. Now he just had to... do... what, exactly?

"I'll tell you," said Hector. And, as he didn't actually know how to finish that thought, he instead followed up with, "...But only if we take this conversation somewhere else."

"Ugh!" Ivan groaned. It had enough force behind it to make the room tremble again. "You're still going on about that?" The Salesman sighed and looked around the room another time. He tossed his phone back into his briefcase. "You really will just let them all die unless I do as you ask, won't you? That is pretty heartless, you know. I think that's heartless, and I'm me."

Hector just maintained his composure.

"Agh, fine. Such a hassle. Where do you want to go, then?"

Hector required a silent moment. He'd actually agreed?! This was actually working?! No, shut up. Focus. Poker face. The Salesman could still be fucking with him, even now. "...Just take us a few kilometers past the city limits."

"Excuse me? 'Take us'? You expect me to carry you?"

"I told you. If I use my power, then it would kill everyone that I--"

"Yeah, yeah, alright. C'mere, then."

Blue enveloped him, and he shot through the ceiling with such force that he thought his body might tear apart. But it held. And he could see the Salesman following closely behind as they soared through the clear mid-morning sky together.

The sandy horizon stretched endlessly around the forested oasis of Moaban. But those golden yellow dunes were fast approaching. Soon, this small reprieve would be gone, so Hector decided to make use of it while he could."

"1138

'Can't talk long,' he thought. 'I'm with the Salesman, still. What can you tell me about him?'

'What are you--Hector, I don't--'

'Quick, Garovel. Life and death situation here.'

‘Ah--okay. Um. The Salesman is best known for war profiteering. Supposedly, he has a gigantic network of spies all over the world and heads up most, if not all, of Abolish’s intelligence-gathering operations.’

That was about what Hector had been expecting. ‘What about his power?’

‘Wha--uh--I don’t know.’

‘What can you tell me about the weak interaction?’

‘Er--is that--? Agh, I can’t explain that quickly! I don’t even understand it that well to begin with! And I’m not sure anyone does!’

Not very helpful, but oh well. ‘Okay.’

‘Hector, why hasn’t he killed you by now?!’

‘He may be under the impression that I’m three hundred years old.’

‘What?!’

‘I have a plan. It’s stupid as shit, though. You should keep running.’

‘Hector!’

He could feel his blue cage slowing down. ‘Gotta go.’ He tuned the reaper out again as his feet neared the sand. They stopped just short of touching it, however. And the blue cage around him did not dissipate, either. Hector gave the Salesman a look.

“What?” said Ivan, easing himself down on the apex of the nearest dune. “I’ve done as you requested. You shouldn’t need me to free you now, right?”

There was no good answer to that question, Hector felt. Better to just sidestep it. “Yes, well... before we get to any of that... I have a small confession.”

“Is it that you were lying about how powerful you are? Because I suspected as much.”

He could’ve come clean here, but that didn’t seem like the right move. He didn’t intend to give ground until he absolutely had to. Instead, he said, “No. I was lying, but not about that.”

The Salesman snorted. "Do explain, then."

"1139

"I didn't ask you... to come all the way out here... in order to spare bystanders from our fight. At least, not just that. Really, I asked you to do it... because I didn't want anyone to overhear our conversation."

"Is that so?"

Hector took a silent breath and braced himself. This was it. This was where the stupid-as-shit part came into play. "...They don't call you the Salesman for no reason, right? So I was wondering... do you like to make deals?"

The yellow man paused at that. He gave Hector a wide, empty-eyed stare, as if he'd become a porcelain doll all of a sudden. Then he smiled faintly. "You certainly aren't a Rainlord. Ha."

Hector didn't know what to make of that.

Ivan blinked a couple times, still smiling the whole time. "To be frank, I'm about eighty percent certain that what you're telling me is complete nonsense, but I must admit: I am curious as to where you think you're going with any of this. Are you trying to stall? For whom, exactly? There is no one in this entire country who could possibly show up to save you from me right now. Trust me, I keep track of these things."

"...I'm not lying," Hector said again. "Why would I need anyone to save me from you? The only way for me to be capable of lying to you... is if I'm powerful enough to resist you. So from your perspective, I'm either lying but not in need of saving... or simply telling the truth."

"Mm, yes. But you see, I've heard stories. About certain people. Certain irregulars. And these folks, for whatever reason, seem to be entirely immune to the psychological effects of oppressive soul power. It's quite strange."

"1140

That was the first Hector had heard of that. He couldn't let it shake him, though. "...Have you ever met anyone like that?"

"Well, no. It does seem like a bit of a tall tale. And yet, as I stand here, speaking to you, I am made to wonder."

"Look," said Hector, "the truth is... that whole mess that I got into with your men in my home country... like I said, it was a misunderstanding. I was trying to work with them. Not against them."

"Oh," laughed Ivan, "is that so?"

"I was never trying to kill them. Otherwise, I... would've done so as soon as they arrived. But they wouldn't listen. And... I'm sure they... misreported my... capabilities in battle, as a result of that."

"Uh-huh."

Hector grit his teeth. "...Don't tell me you actually believe that Atreya could have survived all this time on its own. Without someone protecting it?" That was a pretty good point, actually. He surprised himself but didn't have time to dwell on it. More bullshit was already on its way out of his mouth. "Your men... they weren't the first to try something like that, you know. They were just... the loudest. They never understood that I was... letting them stay in my country. For months, I left them alone. But still... they just wouldn't understand. And then, of course... the Vanguard interfered."

"Mm."

Hector couldn't tell if he was buying any of this. The man's smile was unreadable. So he just kept pushing. "I never killed any of your men," he said. "I wanted to work together. In fact, uh--that's why I came to Sair. I was... I heard that Abolish was operating in this area, so... I came to find out more."

"1141

The Salesman returned that hollow-eyed look of his. "Unlike certain others, I'm not that difficult to get in touch with. Why would you come to Sair and not Calthos or Kavia?"

"...My information network isn't as good as yours, obviously. I didn't know I'd run into you so soon. I just started looking a few days ago. As a matter of fact, um... ah..."

Hector faltered. The thought was there in his head, ready to be finished, but his stupid mouth wouldn't do what he wanted. And he could just tell that his tongue would trip over the next word a dozen times over if he pushed on too hard right now. He had to relax. And he had to concentrate. Wait, were those opposites? Shit.

Ivan was waiting. "...Yes? As a matter of fact, what? You sure like to take your sweet time with explanations, don't you?"

"Ah. Y-es. Well... that may've contributed to, uh... to the misunderstanding I had with your men." Hector refocused. Half of this crap was coming out of thin air. But it felt like it was making sense. Hopefully. No time to worry about it, though. "But, ah... I was trying to say that, your information network... is exactly the reason why I wanted to work together. With you, I mean. Mine's not so good, like I said. Or, uh, rather, it's more... nonexistent."

Ivan seemed amused again. "Well, you certainly wouldn't be the first person to want that from me. But you've failed to explain what it is that you are offering. Even if you really are three hundred years old, I can't say you've intrigued me with your battle prowess thus far."

"I'm not offering my strength," said Hector. "I'm offering... all of Sair."

The Salesman laughed outright. "Oh, you are, are you?! Well, then! I can't wait to hear your explanation this time!"

"1142

"Obviously," Hector said slowly, "I was going to offer you something else... but seeing as you're here now, you clearly want Sair. And I am... in a position to deliver it to you."

"And how's that, exactly? You're the new leader of the Sandlords, are you?"

"Of course not... Don't be ridiculous. But if you know who I am... then you know that I am close with the Atreyan royal family... which is close with the Sandlords."

"Ha. One political marriage does not make them close."

“Fine. Not close, then. But connected. And... I can use that connection to your advantage.”

And Hector gave him the opportunity, but Ivan didn't say anything. He merely waited with that too-still expression on his face.

“I have a free pass into the Golden Fort,” Hector went on. “In fact... I was there a few days ago.”

“So you want to be my inside man, do you? Why would I need that? I don't know if you've noticed, but I have invisible soldiers at my disposal.”

“Invisible soldiers who aren't very reliable,” said Hector. “But hell... maybe I'm wrong. Did this attack on Dunehall go the way you wanted it to?”

The Salesman's smile soured somewhat. “And you. You are reliable?”

Hector felt he'd already given enough ground. Possibly too much. He had to pull it back here. “Maybe,” he said. “Depends on what you offer me.”

“Ha. You grow more brazen by the second. What is it you want, then? I assume you want me to spare your Rainlord friends, no?”

“Of course. But also... well, you might not like my second request.”

“How nice of you to warn me.”

“...I want you to leave Sair and pretend that I... repelled you.” He'd nearly said ‘defeated you’ before thinking better of it.”

"1143

Ivan's brow raised and he laughed. “What?”

“It would give me... even more clout with the Sandlords,” Hector said, “and by extension... make it easier to hold up my end of the deal.”

“Ha! And be quite the boon to your reputation!”

“...Well, yeah. Wouldn't be a very good deal for me, otherwise. You're getting an entire country.”

The Salesman relinquished a nod. "That is a fair point and well-made, sir. Thing is, though: I have absolutely no reason to accept such a deal."

"You have every reason," Hector countered. This guy hadn't been listening to him this whole time just for shifts and giggles. And even if he was, Hector couldn't let himself believe that right now. He had to press forward. No matter what. "If your invisible soldiers could... infiltrate the Golden Fort just like that... then you would've had them do it a long time ago. You would've killed all the Sandlords in their sleep. But you didn't do that. You waited."

"I like to play with my food," said Ivan. "Clearly. I'm doing so at this very moment. I know it's a bad habit, but what's life without a few bad habits, hmm?"

No, that was bullshit. The Salesman was smarter than that. He had to be. Hector remembered those news reports that Lynn told him about over the phone. They fit into this. "You've... you've been harassing the Sandlords. Trying to pull them out of the Golden Fort. Spread their forces thin. Why would you do that? Why wouldn't you just send a cloaked team in and kill them all while they're sleeping?"

"Like I said--"

"Please." The word ended up sounding even more sarcastic than he'd intended, but oh well. It would have to do. "It's because... it's because the Golden Fort is so crowded right now, isn't it? These invisible men of yours... they can't just push their way through a crowd. They need space to work. And I bet they can still trip physical alarms, too, huh? Like from... a broken window, maybe?"

"...Ha," was all the Salesman said."

"1144

"An inside man would be a big help to you," said Hector. "You'd be able to avoid a difficult fight."

"Perhaps. But who doesn't love a good fight?"

"You don't. Not when it means... that you'll have to fight the Vanguard soon afterward."

Ivan didn't have anything to say to that.

Finally, Hector could sense an advantage. It felt like he'd just about puzzled it all out. "Isn't that what you're really worried about? I mean... sure, you could take the Golden Fort. It would be messy, but you could take it. Problem is... what happens when the Vanguard comes to take it back? Because you know they will."

Ivan was no longer smiling.

Hector wasn't done, though. "And... if you let the Sandlords weaken your forces too much, then... you definitely won't be able to hold onto the Golden Fort. Much less, the rest of Sair." Agh, shit. 'Definitely' was probably too strong of a word there.

For a long moment, however, Ivan just stared at him, the dead-eyed look on his face even more unsettling than usual.

Hector couldn't think of any more ammunition, though, so he just waited.

"Supposing I accept," said Ivan, "how would you use your inside influence to assist me?"

Oh fuck. Hector hadn't expected to get this far. He had to keep the shock from reaching his face. "...Ah. Well. It's obvious, isn't it?"

"Pretend it isn't." The Salesman didn't sound very jovial anymore. In fact, he sounded a little annoyed.

Thankfully, Hector did have an idea to fall back on. "I will... uh, I will use my free pass to kidnap a few important Sandlords. Key children."

Ivan just looked at him.

At first, the idea had felt like it just sprang out of nowhere. But now Hector knew. That tactic was exactly what the Vanguard had done to the Rainlords. His time spent at Marshrock had taught him more than he'd realized, it seemed."

"1145

Hector still couldn't tell what this bastard was thinking. Ivan was giving him plenty of opportunity to keep blabbering on in elaboration, but Hector decided against it. He didn't mind playing the waiting game. If anything, he preferred it.

"...You think you can just waltz out of the Golden Fort with a bunch of Sandlord children?" the Salesman finally said.

That was a damn good point. Hector needed to stall. So he just calmly said, "Yes." And nothing else.

The Salesman's expression flickered with irritation. "How?"

"I'll... make a game of it. They... won't even know that they are being kidnapped."

"Details."

"...You don't need the details."

That hollow look came over the Salesman's face again. And then he put his smile back on. "You're right," he said. "Here, let me give you my phone number."

Hector felt his left arm lift by itself. A slew of blue lasers appeared and tore through his arm, blowing it to bloody pieces.

The Salesman burst out laughing. "Wow! I figured you were weaker than you let on, but holy cow! You're really that weak?! You really are less than a year old!"

What? That was it? The jig was up? It happened so quickly that Hector could scarcely process it. Ivan had known all along? Everything he'd just said had been for nothing? His annihilated arm didn't hurt, but the sinking feeling in the pit of his stomach was one of the worst things he'd ever felt.

But he'd be damned if he allowed his composure to slacken even a little bit. Even if it was completely hopeless now, even if everything he'd been working for was crumbling in front of him, he absolutely was not going to give this bastard the satisfaction of seeing it break him. Fuck that.

"That's alright. I'll be gentler with your other arm."

"1146

Hector felt his right arm lift, and this time, the lasers that appeared were not blue, but red. They burned a long series of numbers into his bare flesh and then dissipated.

"I hope you like your new tattoo," said Ivan. "It's going to be there a while."

Hector didn't know what he meant. His left arm wasn't growing back, it seemed, but he thought his regeneration had simply worn off. This was not the case, he soon realized.

Ivan gave a short flourish with one hand, and then the meat and bone began to culminate and reform itself around Hector's shoulder, regrowing again. "I suppose you'll be needing that back."

Hector was reluctant to say anything. Impulsively, he wanted to ask Ivan what he was doing, ask why he hadn't killed him yet, but Hector held his tongue. He wasn't sure how much, if any, of this ruse might still be salvageable.

"Ah, that look on your face. Ha. You really don't care whether you live or die, do you? I was right. You are one of those irregulars. Interesting."

Everything had gone wrong so quickly, but Hector's brain seemed like it had forgotten how to panic properly. Perhaps it was just too sudden, and he hadn't processed everything yet, but whatever the reason, he was still trying to figure a way out of this, still calmly searching for solutions.

Sadly, none were coming to mind.

"Did you honestly think I wouldn't bother to test your defenses?" Ivan asked. "I'll admit: I was hesitant to, in case it provoked a fight before our lovely conversation concluded, but I was always going to get around to it sooner or later."

He just clenched his jaw in silence.

"Oh? Are you genuinely at a loss for words this time? Or are you going to explain this away, too?"

Hector had nothing."

“Ha. Well. Credit where credit is due. I do appreciate a capable liar. And you were right. On several points. And by now, you’ve probably realized that I don’t intend to kill you. So I’ll tell you what: you can have your deal.”

Hector’s eyes narrowed.

“I will leave,” said Ivan, “just as you asked. And I will spare all of your friends--well, the ones that I haven’t already killed, anyway. But in exchange for this generosity, you will do exactly as you promised, as well.”

Shit. He could see where this was going.

“You will lead the Sandlords out of the Golden Fort. You can do it however you like. Murder. Kidnapping. Stink bomb. Duck, duck, goose. I really don’t care, as long as you keep them occupied somewhere else for at least two days.”

He didn’t bother asking what would happen if he failed or refused, figuring Ivan was going to tell him regardless.

“Tell me something,” the Salesman said, straightening his acid-eaten tie. “What do you think is the worst way to die?”

“...I don’t really think there is one,” said Hector.

“Oh, there is. Trust me. I’m a veritable connoisseur of these things. But it’s not surprising that you don’t know. So many people overlook it. Probably because it’s so common. Everyone thinks, oh, fire is the worst. Or being eviscerated. Or listening to smooth jazz. And sure, those are all equally horrible things. But none are truly the worst.”

Hector just waited.

“The worst way to die is simply starvation. Do you know why?”

Hector shook his head.

Ivan motioned with his right hand, as if to help him explain. “It’s the hope. Starving to death is slow. It takes you a long time to accept that it is even happening. You hold onto hope for quite a while, which only serves to enhance your suffering, really. And you’re never certain when your final moment is going to arrive. Each time you begin to fall asleep, you wonder if you'll wake up again, and even when you do, it's not relief you feel, but dread. Until, eventually, that same hope turns on you, and you begin hoping that you won't wake up again. Because you exist in constant agony. You only know suffering. And at that point, you even lack the physical strength required to end your own life. You're simply waiting for it to be over. Let me tell you, that is true horror.'"

"1148

Hector didn't think he could argue with any of that. But he did feel gutsy enough to ask the question on his mind. "...Is that how you died? Originally, I mean."

"Yes, that was indeed the voice of experience you were hearing just now." His voice had grown softer. "Though I'm surprised you noticed. Everyone seems to think that we of Abolish are simply callous, unfeeling monsters, that we don't understand suffering and loss and sadness and remorse. But they could not be more wrong. We understand all of these things even better than they do." Ivan paused for a beat. "Well, most of us, anyway."

Hector couldn't resist the obvious point of contradiction. "If that's true... then why do you hurt so many people?"

Ivan gave him that empty-eyed stare again. "That is a very innocent-minded question from such a shameless liar."

"I'd... just like to understand why you do what you do. I always thought it was just... for fun."

"Ha. Fun is the effect, not the cause."

"Then... please explain. I'm listening."

Ivan let his gaze linger on him another time. "Mm... nah. It'd be best if you figured it out for yourself. Take a good, long look at the world and try to see things for how they really are. Then, maybe you'll understand. And if not, well, perhaps I'll explain it to you the next time we meet."

Hector didn't like that last notion very much. He wanted to say something to contest it, but the words weren't coming now.

"I'll give you one year," said Ivan.

And Hector blinked. In spite of himself, he said, "Why a whole year?"

"Because I like the cut of your jib."

Hector raised a dubious eyebrow. "...Now who's lying?"

"1149

"Alright, fine," said Ivan. "The real reasons are boring political ones. And you don't want to listen to me explain all that, do you?" The man allowed another beat to pass. "Also, I'd have to kill you after I told you. So there's that, too."

Hector had to force himself not to react to that. Maybe it didn't really matter at this point, but he didn't want Ivan to see any sense of relief on his face.

After another moment of repose, the Salesman picked the conversation back up. "I suppose I don't need to mention this, but, well. I want to. Naturally, if you fail to deliver your end of this bargain, I will hunt down everyone you care about in this world and kill them. Slowly, of course. By starving them to death. That's why I brought that up earlier, see? That wasn't just a random tangent. It was foreshadowing. I was using foreshadowing."

"Yeah, I got it."

"Of course you did. You're a smart kid. That's why I'm sure you won't let me down. That's why I'm sure I won't have to go to all the trouble of finding all your friends and family and then gradually depriving them of food until they begin begging for death. I was never threatening you, you understand? Although, I could do that, too, if you like. In addition to your loved ones, I mean. Not instead of."

"...Do you always ramble this much when threatening people?"

"Usually, yes. What can I say? It gets me excited, and I just can't stop talking. But I suppose I should. We've been at this a while, you and I, and I have a lot of important business to take care of."

"I'm sure you do."

"1150

"I look forward to hearing from you," said Ivan. "You have my number. Oh, and if you don't call me at least once a week, I may decide to renegotiate the terms of our deal."

Hector's expression stiffened. "What do you mean?"

"Oh, it's nothing. Just make sure you keep me apprised of your progress. A weekly update is all I ask. That's not so unreasonable, is it?"

Hector turned his head slightly, reevaluating Ivan from the corner of his eyes. "Are you... I mean... do you not have many people to talk to?"

"What?! No! I have tons of people!"

A suddenly awkward silence intervened.

"It's just--" Ivan tried. "They're all--they're very same-y, you know what I mean? And this was an unexpectedly pleasant conversation, so I-- look, shut up. Don't make this weird. I'm cutting you a lot of slack here. The least you could do is call me once in a while."

"...O-okay."

After that, the Salesman just stood there, looking like he wasn't entirely sure what to do next. "Alright, well. Good, then. I'll talk to you later."

"W-wait, uh."

"What?"

"Uh. You didn't clarify. Are you going to pretend that I forced you to retreat from here? I mean, ah... I only ask because i-it would help me help you."

Ivan seemed to regain his composure all at once. "Mm. Right. Yes. I suppose I could oblige. Doesn't matter to me how much--" He cut himself off.

Hector waited, but Ivan just stared blankly past him. Then Hector saw that mad smile again.

“Ha. Well, well. Who is that?”

Hector didn't know what he meant. But he did hear a noise. A distant hum in the direction of Dunehall. An airplane? Probably not, his gut told him."

"1151 -- CXXIX.

"Is that really the Sunsmith?" Ivan asked, not to Hector, seemingly, but simply aloud. "To come to me alone like this--does he fancy himself a warrior now? Have his days of cowering beneath the corpses of better men come to an end?" He threw Hector a knowing glance. "If so, I'm disappointed. Bravery doesn't suit him."

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Nine: 'O, guardian of the Sun...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

After receiving the distress call from Raml'hahl, he'd come to assess the situation personally. It was certainly not proper for the presiding head of the Qal'majilis to attend such a matter alone, but he could not abide waiting for everyone to catch up. In terms of first responders, none in Sair would best him, save perhaps Rayen Merlo, but by all accounts, that woman was quite possibly a traitor and now captive of the Vanguard.

And now that he'd seen the devastation--not just in Raml'hahl but all across Moaban--his mood had only worsened. The fact that he now sensed this overwhelming soul power was just icing on the cake, really.

Over the years, he and Haqq had tested the suit as intensely and exhaustively as they possibly could. In theory, he was prepared, but he held no illusions about it. No simulation could match a real fight with one of Eleg's juggernauts.

The Lord Abbas Saqqaf tapped his index finger and thumb together, holding them there for a second, and the suit answered him. Two drones deployed out of the shoulder mounts and began following closely behind him as the fusion-propulsion jets on his back carried him across the sky. The drones couldn't break the sound barrier under their own power like his suit could, but they could still take advantage of the small draft he created in his wake."

"1151 -- CXXIX.

"Is that really the Sunsmith?" Ivan asked, not to Hector, seemingly, but simply aloud. "To come to me alone like this--does he fancy himself a warrior now? Have his days of cowering beneath the corpses of better men come to an end?" He threw Hector a knowing glance. "If so, I'm disappointed. Bravery doesn't suit him."

Chapter One Hundred Twenty-Nine: 'O, guardian of the Sun...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

After receiving the distress call from Raml'hahl, he'd come to assess the situation personally. It was certainly not proper for the presiding head of the Qal'majilis to attend such a matter alone, but he could not abide waiting for everyone to catch up. In terms of first responders, none in Sair would best him, save perhaps Rayen Merlo, but by all accounts, that woman was quite possibly a traitor and now captive of the Vanguard.

And now that he'd seen the devastation--not just in Raml'hahl but all across Moaban--his mood had only worsened. The fact that he now sensed this overwhelming soul power was just icing on the cake, really.

Over the years, he and Haqq had tested the suit as intensely and exhaustively as they possibly could. In theory, he was prepared, but he held no illusions about it. No simulation could match a real fight with one of Eleg's juggernauts.

The Lord Abbas Saqqaf tapped his index finger and thumb together, holding them there for a second, and the suit answered him. Two drones deployed out of the shoulder mounts and began following closely behind him as the fusion-propulsion jets on his back carried him across the sky. The drones couldn't break the sound barrier under their own power like his suit could, but they could still take advantage of the small draft he created in his wake."

"1152

‘Time until the others catch up?’ thought Abbas in Valgan.

‘You’re about eighty minutes ahead of everyone,’ said Worwal from all the way back in Kuros.

The number surprised him, somewhat. The suit was performing very well. Almost too well. Unless this fight somehow turned into siege warfare, eighty minutes was far too long to attempt holding out for reinforcements.

But that was fine. With all the trouble and foul rumors about Calthos, Abbas had left the Golden Fort knowing that he might meet one of Abolish’s strongest today.

Already, he could see the Salesman in great detail. The ocular replacements were doing their job. Someone had gotten a good hit in, judging by the man’s half-eaten face and smote clothing. And with the onboard computer drilled directly into his thalamus and cerebral cortex, he was able to get an easy targeting lock from more than two miles off.

Abbas tapped his little finger to his thumb and held it there. The suit responded by detaching the front chest piece, which immediately fell off behind him. But it would catch up soon enough. Once it transformed itself and repositioned its inner components, it would become a cruise missile, strengthened by his own soul.

The Salesman could sense him now, too, it seemed. Abbas saw him looking up in his direction.

Abbas veered up higher and let his twin drones go in first. Soul-strengthened bullets rained down on the Salesman from their customized submachine guns as they zig-zagged toward him. They didn’t carry much ammunition, but that didn’t matter, because their real purpose was only to serve as a distraction while trying to get in close and self-detonate.

Ivan didn’t allow the latter to happen. Both drones exploded inside a blue cage before they got anywhere near him.

This was also as expected.

The suit’s shoulder mounts began regenerating. In forty-five seconds, Abbas would have both drones back, complete with full ammunition and detonators."

"1153

It was fortunate that he'd found the Salesman all the way out here in these empty sand dunes. It meant he didn't have to worry about the citizens of Moaban. Because there would be no holding back in this fight.

First, he required his soul-empowered smokescreen. If the Salesman landed a solid hit, Abbas didn't know if even this suit would be able to withstand it. So that was what he'd been doing while Ivan was occupied with the drones. He'd only gained enough time to create a relatively small cloud to conceal himself within, but it would have to serve until--

In a blink, the cloud was gone, dissipated into nothingness. Abbas didn't get the opportunity to question it, either, as his sensors warned him of the Salesman's approach from below.

Abbas made two fists, and the suit answered. The jets bolted him straight up, tearing higher into the sky at maximized acceleration.

Then came the system alerts. Every component of the suit was experiencing rapid power loss and structural degradation.

It was that man's power, Abbas knew. The Salesman's control over atomic interactions meant that he could quite literally suck the energy out of anything.

Well. Almost anything.

Antimatter was another story.

Abbas didn't typically use his ability in combat. In fact, he didn't typically participate in combat. The Sunsmith had earned his name from the technological support he provided his more battle-oriented comrades. But in the end, his support wasn't enough to save any of them. In the end, Abbas outlived them all. Without ever holding such ambitions, he'd become the eldest Sandlord--and indeed, the eldest servant in all of Sair. Even Octavia Redwater was younger by a good thirty years or so.

And as such, he'd been working to change that part of himself.

Because he had to. For the sake of his homeland, he had to."
"1154

Integration was not inherently powerful. Abbas had learned that lesson very early. But it did help him keep his brethren at the forefront of technological advancement.

As such, the most valuable--or at least, most difficult--piece of technology that he currently possessed was the fusion-propulsion system that powered the jets on his back, calves, and upper arms. Six, they numbered in total, and their thrust-to-weight ratio was unrivaled by anything else he'd ever made--probably, even, by any other currently existing technology.

But that was only half of it.

Their real secret--one Abbas hadn't even shared with Haqq--was their ability to create antimatter particles. He'd gotten the idea from the still-fairly-recent discovery that antimatter could be created by lightning storms. Needless to say, it was still an emerging technology, and unfortunately, even these jets couldn't withstand the combustion force that resulted from it. They would regenerate, but the antiparticles would interfere and slow the process to a crawl. Functionally speaking, that meant he had six and only six jets to work with.

Six chances to defeat the Salesman of Death, in other words.

And he had to use one right now, or the fight would already be over. He chose the one on his left calf. The whole section of the suit up to the knee ejected itself, leaving only its thin underlayer of rubber and cotton behind.

It detonated less than a second after ejection, but Abbas couldn't just leave it at that. He had to make a hard U-turn and catch the explosion's aftermath. Wind and sky and scorching sunlight all screamed past his vision as he curved back around.

He also needed to account for the missing jet. He could actually use the imbalance it created by working it into the U-turn, but as his course straightened out again, he had to adjust his right leg with delicate precision.

And then, of course, there was still the Salesman to account for. A head-on collision with the man was imminent."

"1155

He couldn't see the Salesman's translucent ability against the blue sky, but he could certainly feel it. The draining effect. Even this suit wouldn't be able to withstand it for long.

But Abbas had counted the seconds correctly. His cruise missile arrived in time to flank the Salesman for him. Ivan noticed it too late, only capable of giving the warhead a look of bug-eyed anger before impact.

The force of the explosion might have knocked Abbas off course if not for the suit's automated impact mitigation system. Far quicker than Abbas himself could have reacted, the suit calculated the path of least resistance and corrected his course for him in order to incur as little turbulence as possible. This meant that, rather than curving out and away from the explosion, the suit dove headfirst into it, keeping his body perpendicular to the blast's point of origin, like an arrow piercing a balloon.

He came through it, no worse for wear, and the Salesman was no longer in the way. Abbas knew that he only had precious few moments to press this fleeting advantage. He rocketed toward the smoke and radiation and lingering antiparticles of his expended jet and let his suit absorb their effects.

The result, as expected, was more explosions. But these were only physical, and his suit had soul-strengthening on its side. The antiparticle effects were not going to last long as they tried in vain to collide with their oppositely charged counterparts, so Abbas had to act immediately, even while wreathed in subatomic annihilation.

He curved around and pushed through the debris of his cruise missile. He saw the Salesman, a half-missing husk tumbling through the air. One might be forgiven for thinking that the man was no longer a threat in such a state, but Abbas knew better. This job was not yet done."

"1156

The gap between them closed within seconds, and Abbas reached out to grab him.

Ivan saw him. Half his face was gone. Only one eye, a few teeth, burned muscles and shattered bones remained. But the man was still able to fight back.

Abbas felt it. The sudden crushing weight all around him. Even with the antiparticles protecting him, a sea of pressure was trying to swallow him. And the debilitating effects, too. He could still feel them as well. Weakening his grip, blurring his vision, numbing his mind, sucking the very breath out of his lungs--the very life out of his body.

But he reached him. Abbas' armored hand found its target, and the suit still had enough power to clamp down on Ivan's neck. His other hand arrived to help, and suddenly he had the leverage he needed. He didn't need to think. His hands reacted on their own and tore the rest of the Salesman's head off his shoulders.

Immediately, the pressure lessened, and Abbas could sense himself again. His hands were still going to work, tearing the rest of the smote flesh from Ivan's head, leaving only the bloody-and-hairy skull with the still-living brain inside.

Abbas had to consciously stop them.

He lingered there in the air, floating in place, still struggling to come back to himself. A few more blinks and he realized.

He'd won. The Salesman was incapacitated.

He almost couldn't believe it. Theory was one thing, but to think that it had actually worked...

His whole body was trembling.

'...I have captured the Salesman,' Abbas reported in Valgan.

There came a long silence. Or at least, he thought there did. It might've been that he just didn't catch what Worwal said.

'Abbas...' That seemed to be all the reaper had to say."

"1157

The suit was warning him about a dozen different things, Abbas abruptly realized. He began his descent, having no real choice in the matter, and just tried to focus on not crashing. He managed it well enough, but the suit buckled around him, and he toppled down the side of a sand dune.

He could hardly breathe or feel any of his limbs, and these were problems, because his reaper wasn't around to invoke the regeneration. He ejected the chest piece in order to alleviate some of the pressure on his lungs. It felt like he'd broken a rib or two, though he wasn't sure at which point that might've happened. His grip had grown weak as well, and the Salesman's skull slipped out of his hands and rolled to the bottom of the dune.

Abbas tried to stand back up but found he could barely even crawl. The Salesman's ability had taken an even larger toll on both the suit and his own body than he'd realized.

He had to hurry, though. It was true that without a body, the Salesman had no conduit through which to channel the ability from his brain, but there was still the matter of severing communication. So long as Ivan's brain remained unfrozen, he would still be able to talk to his reaper.

Abbas was kicking himself for not freezing it as soon as he'd gotten his hands on it. Sure, it was a surprising victory, but that didn't excuse such amateurish work. He'd acted like he'd never captured an enemy combatant before. He grumbled Valgan curses into the sand as he crawled after the skull.

"Are you okay?!" came a sudden voice.

Abbas twitched. Who was that? There shouldn't have been anyone else out here. He wanted to check the suit's sensors, but they were down for the count, too."

"1158

Abbas reached the skull again, but he could hear stomping footsteps in the sand now. He extended all the fingers of his right hand and then touched them all together in unison.

The suit did not respond.

He tried the motion again.

Still nothing.

“Sir, can you hear me?!” The footsteps were louder. And the voice was speaking Mohssian, too, Abbas noticed.

He ignored it, though, and tried to run system diagnostics, but the information streaming into his brain was garbled and irritating, so he turned it back off. He would have to work on some kind of durability improvements for that feature, he decided.

Then he saw the dark figure appearing over the rise, kicking up sand as he rushed closer. “Sir, are you--?!” His words cut off as he saw Abbas staring right at him. A young boy, it seemed to be.

But appearances were not reliable. Abbas’ grip on the skull tightened. “Identify yourself,” he said in Mohssian. It had been a while since he’d needed to speak this language.

“Ah--I’m Hector Goffe. I’m--er--I’m a friend of Lord Asad. Are you--? ”

“What are you doing out here?”

“Ah... oh... er, it’s a long story. Do you, er--do you need help standing?”

“Stay where you are,” Abbas said with as much authority as he could muster. “Answer my question.” He could barely even move, at the moment, but this Hector didn’t need to know that yet.

“Ah, well... I was... uh... I was trying to get the Salesman to leave without killing anyone else.”

“...You were what?”

“I was trying to trick him. And it was... sort of working. But, uh, I’m pretty sure he would’ve hunted me down and killed me later. So, ah, th-thank you for showing up when you did. That was incredible.”

This child was tricking the Salesman of Death? Abbas didn’t quite understand."

"1159

“Oh,” said Hector. “I should tell you, uh. Abolish is, er--they’re using invisible soldiers. To harass your people. Trying to spread your forces thin.”

Abbas just kind of squinted at him.

The boy trudged onward through explanations, though he seemed to grow increasingly worse at it. Mercifully, however, the boy’s apparent reaper arrived, and things began to make a little more sense to Abbas. Hector pulled out a familiar crimson shard, and Garovel clarified numerous details, particularly about hailing from Atreya, as well as meeting Haqq, Asad, and... Rasalased?

Admittedly, that part was still rather confusing, but Abbas at least knew that there were more pressing matters to attend to right now.

He allowed Hector to assist him in finally freezing Ivan’s skull so as to cease all brain activity. To do so meant venting one of the suit’s supercoolant packs, but that was fine. In its current state, the suit wasn’t about to be flying anywhere. The lingering effects of Ivan’s power would take a few days to wear off, at the very least. Perhaps longer.

Hector had to help Abbas walk. The boy seemed to be having trouble using his own ability. Garovel said it was probably because of something Rasalased had done, but Abbas was too exhausted to ask for clarification on that subject, too.

Together, they dragged themselves back toward Moaban at a pace that would have rivaled a very determined tortoise.

‘By the way,’ said Garovel during the intervening period, ‘I am terribly impressed that you were able to achieve victory over the Salesman of Death. As far as feats go, that is not one that the world is likely to forget anytime soon. Congratulations, Sunsmith.’

And maybe it was because he felt so battered and weak, but for whatever reason, Abbas wasn’t in the mood to let such unwarranted praise stand.”

"1160 -- CXXX.

“The only reason I won was because I took him by surprise,” Abbas said. “His power could have countered mine quite easily, if he had known what he was facing.”

Indeed, if that fight had not ended so quickly, Ivan would have surely won, Abbas knew. The Salesman would have soon figured out that Abbas was using antimatter against him. And sadly, antiparticles did not truly nullify the Salesman’s control over weak interaction--they only required Ivan to use his power differently.

Naturally, this would become a problem if the Salesman was ever freed. And it was probably just a matter of time until someone came to Sair in order to do exactly that, Abbas figured.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty: ‘Thy persistent shadow...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

This wasn’t how he’d planned it. Ibai hadn’t intended to leave Hector and Uncle Mel and everyone else behind. He’d meant to grab the Elroy kids and quickly get them out of danger. They were obviously the most vulnerable. It only made sense to help them first and then go back for the others.

But the Monster was bloody fast. Each time Ibai teleported, Gohvis was less than a second behind.

But it was more than that, too. After the first few jumps, Ibai noticed Gohvis’ soul in the void, not because it looked particularly different from any of the others, but because it was the only one that was clearly moving. Toward them, no less.

It was almost like the Monster knew where they were going, like he could sense their location even while they were teleporting. In different circumstances, Ibai would’ve liked to stop and ask him.

But after what must have been the thirtieth jump or so, there was a change. Emiliana Elroy shoved her little brother and sister out of Ibai’s shadow."

"1160 -- CXXX.

"The only reason I won was because I took him by surprise," Abbas said. "His power could have countered mine quite easily, if he had known what he was facing."

Indeed, if that fight had not ended so quickly, Ivan would have surely won, Abbas knew. The Salesman would have soon figured out that Abbas was using antimatter against him. And sadly, antiparticles did not truly nullify the Salesman's control over weak interaction--they only required Ivan to use his power differently.

Naturally, this would become a problem if the Salesman was ever freed. And it was probably just a matter of time until someone came to Sair in order to do exactly that, Abbas figured.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty: 'Thy persistent shadow...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

This wasn't how he'd planned it. Ibai hadn't intended to leave Hector and Uncle Mel and everyone else behind. He'd meant to grab the Elroy kids and quickly get them out of danger. They were obviously the most vulnerable. It only made sense to help them first and then go back for the others.

But the Monster was bloody fast. Each time Ibai teleported, Gohvis was less than a second behind.

But it was more than that, too. After the first few jumps, Ibai noticed Gohvis' soul in the void, not because it looked particularly different from any of the others, but because it was the only one that was clearly moving. Toward them, no less.

It was almost like the Monster knew where they were going, like he could sense their location even while they were teleporting. In different circumstances, Ibai would've liked to stop and ask him.

But after what must have been the thirtieth jump or so, there was a change. Emiliana Elroy shoved her little brother and sister out of Ibai's shadow."

Ibai didn't realize what the girl had done until it was too late. They teleported away, leaving Shenado and the children behind.

Ibai's first impulse was to go back for them. But when he saw the Monster still following, he understood. So he fled into another teleport, pulling only Emiliana and Chergoa along.

Soon, he stopped even paying attention to where they ended up after each jump. He only watched the void for guidance--the souls suspended in it, the ethereal surfaces of buildings and of the ground, of the planet itself. He had to minimize the delay between teleports as much as possible if they were to have any hope of escaping.

Faster, faster, and faster still. He tried not to worry too much about the fact that it didn't seem to be working, that the unrelenting soul actually seemed to be getting slightly closer after each jump.

And then Ibai felt a giant hand around his neck. Everything had stopped moving, he realized. His muddy shadow dispersed, revealing the jet black dragon-man in front of him. Chergoa was already in Gohvis' other hand.

Well.

This was unfortunate.

Ibai wanted to say something, but the Monster's grip on his throat wasn't allowing it.

"Please stop," said Emiliana, sounding exceptionally calm, given the circumstances. "I'll go with you quietly, if that's what you want. Just don't hurt him. He hasn't done anything wrong."

To be honest, Ibai was a bit surprised to hear her come to his defense like this.

The Monster locked gazes with Ibai.

Never had the aberration seen such demonic eyes. He'd never really believed it was possible to stare into someone's soul, but with the way Gohvis was looking at him, he was beginning to have doubts.

In fact, he was starting to think it might be possible to look at someone to death.

After a few more moments of flirting with oblivion, the Monster's huge hand loosened slightly."

"1162

Ibai wasn't sure if he should say anything now. There were plenty of questions running around his head, but he probably wasn't the one who should ask them, considering Gohvis could still snap his neck at any moment. It'd be best to let Emiliana and Chergoa handle things. There was no reason to gamble with his life here.

Could be fun, though.

He decided to risk it.

"So what do you want with her, anyway?" he said, having to choke through some of the words.

Gohvis digned not to answer.

He supposed he should've seen that coming. It was fine, though. He'd gotten plenty of practice with people like this recently. "Want to play a game? I spy with my little eye--"

The Monster's grip tightened back up, and the words stopped coming out again.

Emiliana decided to speak up again. "You obviously do not want me dead," she said. "For now, at least. So what do you want from me?"

Gohvis' tail snaked around her and scooped her up off her feet, but the giant lizard man did not answer her question. Instead, he simply crouched down low and stayed there for a moment.

Ibai wondered what he was doing, but the inability to breathe was becoming distracting. Thankfully, Gohvis loosened his hold again, this time deciding to roll Ibai up under his arm like a newspaper. Ibai didn't get another chance to speak, though, because he saw the Monster's huge legs become suddenly even more so. In one beating pulse, they grew by maybe a third of their previous size.

And then Gohvis jumped.

The ground flew away from Ibai's vision at rocket speed, and he very nearly lost consciousness, even with his muddy shadow protecting him. Still, he did catch sight of the mushrooming cloud of sand that Gohvis had left behind."

"1163

Through the disorientation and roaring wind, Ibai had a difficult time following what was happening, but after a fashion, he did notice Emiliana. The poor girl was as limp as could be. The sheer force with which they'd left the ground had probably been enough to break every bone in her body and rupture most of her organs. He wondered if she was unconscious or simply dead. There was a fair chance that her brain had been turned to jelly.

It was a bit humbling to know that he would be in the same boat right now if not for his shadow. Humbling--and exciting.

Also, they were still ascending, Ibai realized. Was this really the power of a single jump, or had Gohvis grown wings and started flying? Both seemed equally likely.

Oh, but back to the shadow--he found it surprising that it hadn't protected him completely. He knew that it wouldn't shield him from soul-empowered damage very well, but what were its physical limits, he wondered? Come to think of it, he'd never really thought to test that before. Why not? That kind of experimentation could have been super fun.

Hmm. He supposed he'd just never had much occasion to. He'd always thought the shadow was basically perfect. The idea that it actually had some kind of impact threshold hadn't really crossed his mind.

Maybe it didn't even matter. Clearly, the threshold was pretty high. A proper experiment would mean that he'd have to do something pretty extreme.

Like what?

Like falling out of the sky and hitting the ground at terminal velocity? Would the shadow protect him from that? He could test that right now, if he wanted. He could teleport out of Gohvis' hand and just let himself fall. It'd be easy.

Nah, that was a bad idea.

Wasn't it?

Yeah, an awful one.

But maybe...

Nah. The Monster might just catch him again anyway. Somehow.

But, fun?

Bah, he should stay with these three. That was what a responsible person would do.

Wasn't it?

Ah, hey, they were descending now. So it was just a jump, after all."
"1164

As they neared the ground again, Ibai could see the edge of the desert--or of the sand, at least. The barren landscape stretched on for a while yet, but he could see more green on the horizon.

They hit the ground again with the force of a bomb, and just as before, Ibai lost track of what was happening. When his senses returned, he expected to be in the air again, but that was not that case. Instead, he found himself staring at the ground as it rushed past.

The Monster had resorted to running, Ibai realized.

And it was surprisingly enjoyable. Even dangling under Gohvis' arm like this, the ride wasn't bumpy at all. The Monster's gigantic footsteps were so nimble that it felt like being carried along a rail line, curving smoothly up and down the long stretch of foothills in front of them.

At least, that was what Ibai imagined it felt like. He'd always wanted to ride on a train.

Ibai saw a cliff ahead. Approaching fast. Too fast, actually. Gohvis didn't intend to go around it, did he? Nope, he was accelerating toward it, Ibai realized.

They surged forward, faster still, and tore through the cliff like wet paper. Ibai barely even felt it, too.

Then there was more running. Lots more running.

Ibai ended up contemplating the subject of that cliff for a good long while, though. Gohvis hadn't even raised his hands to punch through it. The guy had literally parted solid rock with his face. Plus a ton of momentum and inertia, but still. What was even the point of doing that? Certainly, the Monster could've jumped over it with ease. Was he just showing off? Or did a dozen meters of solid rock really mean so little to him that it genuinely felt the same as running through open air?

Agh, he wanted to know so badly, but there was no way Gohvis would answer a question like that. Ibai could see it now. He would ask, and then Gohvis would just give him that silent look that made him feel like he might die horribly in the next few seconds.

Eh, maybe he'd try asking later anyway."

"1165

As the landscape changed around them, Ibai began wondering where the Monster was taking them. If nothing else, it seemed apparent that they were leaving the Sandlord's territory, but that wasn't exactly surprising.

After a spell, his old nemesis finally arrived.

Boredom.

He shouldn't just teleport out of Gohvis' grip right now. There was no reason for it. That would be a very stupid thing to do. And he wasn't stupid. He was responsible.

But supposing he did... what would Gohvis do? Would he just leave him behind? Would he chase Ibai again? Hmm.

Anyway, it was a bad idea.

But... this was taking forever. And he was so bored. It had been like three minutes since an interesting thought had occupied his mind. That had to be some kind of personal best. Really, he'd done an amazing job holding out this long.

So he teleported. To his left, he jumped through the void and waited to see where he would end up.

He felt freedom. Tumbling through the air while utterly disoriented, and the resulting rush of excitement brought him back to himself.

But then it was gone. Before he could regain his bearings, before he could even touch the ground again, he felt the Monster's arm there, having reacquired its hold over him.

Ibai didn't understand. When he actually DID regain his bearings, he was precisely where he had been before--tucked snugly under the Monster's left arm.

But. But.

Had he not teleported? No, he was sure that he had.

So he tried again.

He jumped. He saw the flash of mud, the void, and felt the freedom.

And now he was here again. Somehow, Gohvis had caught him. Just that quickly, Gohvis had caught him.

Another question Ibai wanted an answer to. If nothing else, though, it gave him something to ponder for a good long while--so long, in fact, that his brainstorming was interrupted by the realization that the Monster's pace had finally begun to slow."

"1166 -- CXXXI.

Ibai looked around, searching for any kind of clue about where Gohvis had brought them. The sand and barren desert had been replaced by craggy rocks and equally barren highlands. A steep valley lay ahead, and Ibai could see its narrow central path branching off in a dozen different directions, seemingly offering a variety of routes up to higher ground.

Ibai felt his feet touch ground as Gohvis plopped him down.

"Flee now, if you want," said Gohvis with his two voices. "I will not chase you."

Well, now Ibai didn't feel like it. He was much more interested in learning what Gohvis wanted with the Elroy girl. He'd been more interested in that all along, though admittedly, it had slipped his mind a bit when boredom reared its ugly head.

Ibai wasn't sure if he should say any of that, though. So far, the Monster didn't seem to appreciate talking very much. More information gathering was required first, Ibai felt. So he just kind of stood there, waiting.

Gohvis didn't seem to like that, either. "I will not give you this opportunity again. If you do not leave now, then you will be staying with me indefinitely."

Ibai shrugged. "Okay."

"Make me chase you one more time, and I will not bother capturing you alive."

Ibai felt shivers run down the length of his body.

Huh. Weird.

"I understand," said Ibai. "So what do you want with her, anyway?"

Gohvis' tail finally set Emiliana down. Rather than answering Ibai's question, however, he held Chergoa near the girl's limp body. "Revive her."

The reaper hesitated but did as she was told.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-One: 'The Monster of the East...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana coughed from behind her mask, making her own hot breath splash back onto her face as her eyes slid open. Slowly, she rolled over and sat up."

"1166 -- CXXXI.

Ibai looked around, searching for any kind of clue about where Gohvis had brought them. The sand and barren desert had been replaced by craggy rocks and equally barren highlands. A steep valley lay ahead, and Ibai could see its narrow central path branching off in a dozen different directions, seemingly offering a variety of routes up to higher ground.

Ibai felt his feet touch ground as Gohvis plopped him down.

“Flee now, if you want,” said Gohvis with his two voices. “I will not chase you.”

Well, now Ibai didn’t feel like it. He was much more interested in learning what Gohvis wanted with the Elroy girl. He’d been more interested in that all along, though admittedly, it had slipped his mind a bit when boredom reared its ugly head.

Ibai wasn’t sure if he should say any of that, though. So far, the Monster didn’t seem to appreciate talking very much. More information gathering was required first, Ibai felt. So he just kind of stood there, waiting.

Gohvis didn’t seem to like that, either. “I will not give you this opportunity again. If you do not leave now, then you will be staying with me indefinitely.”

Ibai shrugged. “Okay.”

“Make me chase you one more time, and I will not bother capturing you alive.”

Ibai felt shivers run down the length of his body.

Huh. Weird.

“I understand,” said Ibai. “So what do you want with her, anyway?”

Gohvis’ tail finally set Emiliana down. Rather than answering Ibai’s question, however, he held Chergoa near the girl’s limp body. “Revive her.”

The reaper hesitated but did as she was told.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-One: ‘The Monster of the East...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana coughed from behind her mask, making her own hot breath splash back onto her face as her eyes slid open. Slowly, she rolled over and sat up."

"1167

The giant black lizard man was still there, Emiliana saw. It hadn't been a dream.

When he first arrived back at Dunehall, Emiliana had begun questioning her sanity again. It wasn't until she was sure that everyone else could see him too that she started to think she might not have gone crazy.

But there was another reason why it was so surreal for her. Not only was this hallucination suddenly NOT a hallucination at all, but her brain had been disturbingly undisturbed by it. Every thought was so calm, so quiet, having no trouble assessing her circumstances despite the rest of her body being on the verge of panic.

By now, she'd attributed it to something being wrong with her fight-or-flight response. It was a natural biological process triggered by the brain's perception of extreme danger. Her body had responded appropriately, but seemingly, her brain had not.

Or... perhaps it had responded, only differently. This calm did feel rather unnatural.

She could only imagine that it was Rasalased's doing--though, whether or not the effects were temporary or permanent, she couldn't say. If they were temporary, then they were taking a while to wear off, because she could still feel them even now, even with the Monster of the East looming over her as if he were the abyssal god of lakefire himself.

Emiliana stood and brushed herself off. She had plenty of questions she wanted to ask, but she decided to wait for Gohvis to say something first. It was obvious enough that he was the one in control here, and she would've only been repeating herself, anyway.

"How long ago did your power manifest?" the Monster asked.

Emiliana had to think about that. "A month or so." She actually wasn't sure. Too much had happened. Maybe it had only been a couple weeks. It felt more like a year, though. "Why do you want to know?"

Gohvis ignored the question. "Show me your face."

"1168

Emiliana would have liked to protest, but she knew there was no point in it. Slowly, she removed her mask. The sunlight on her face was much more unsettling than she remembered. It felt almost irritating against her skin, but that was probably just psychological, she figured.

Gohvis' crimson glare lingered on her.

She grew more uncomfortable by the second. "What do you want from me?" she said, sounding a bit angrier than even she'd anticipated. "Just tell me, already."

The Monster spared a glance in Ibai's direction before returning to Emiliana. "I am a collector of our kind."

Emiliana didn't buy that. "...So I am some sort of toy to you? You certainly went through a lot of trouble in order to collect me. Going against your own comrades."

"Comrades is a strong word."

She could feel the air growing heavier. The Monster's doing? It didn't matter. Right now, she only wanted answers. "I heard what Ivan said. Is it true? Are you and I related somehow?"

Gohvis just stared at her.

How annoying. "If you are, then just say so. Don't play these games. I will find out one way or another. I promise you." Her mind was far too calm, she was sure. Far too confident. This wasn't how you were supposed to talk to someone like Gohvis.

But right now, she didn't care. For some reason, she wasn't afraid of him. Well, no, she was. She was very afraid of him. It was more like... the fear she felt couldn't touch her thoughts, couldn't hinder her concentration. If anything, it seemed to be helping her focus.

"Misinformation has all but destroyed your family," said Gohvis. "You have the Vanguard to thank for that. I am not an Elroy. I am not a Rainlord. I never have been.””

"1169

“Then why are you bothering with all of this?” Emiliana asked. “Only because I have mutation? There must be thousands more like me.”

“I am not an Elroy,” Gohvis repeated, “but I did share a bond with House Elroy, once.”

Emiliana blinked. “What do you mean?”

“A man named Agam Elroy. He and I were linked. Our mutations tied us together in an anomalous way--a way which, to my knowledge, has never occurred again, either before or since.”

She wasn’t sure she understood.

“But it would seem that you have inherited his power,” said Gohvis.

Her head reared back. She was beginning to get the picture.

The Monster crouched down to look at her more closely, but he was still taller than her by a good meter or so. His red eyes seemed like they might burn holes into her. “I have been awaiting his successor for a very long time.”

“...Why?” was all Emiliana could think to ask.

Gohvis took his time with that one. “I must study our link. It possesses untold potential.”

That brought up other questions for her. “How much do you know about this link?”

And perhaps that was too far, because Gohvis stopped answering her.

Emiliana waited, but a long period of silence was all that followed.

Before it could get too long, however, Ibai chimed in.

“So where are you taking us?” the aberration asked. “Is it somewhere fun? Perhaps I’m being presumptuous, but I thought it might be somewhere very far east. Given your name and all. Will we get to see the Luthic Ocean? I have always wanted to go there. I heard there was a big resurgence in piracy there a few years ago. I would love to meet some real life pirates. Do you think we could do that? Oh! Or maybe you'll take us all the way to Ardora! Maybe we could--!"

"Please be quiet," Emiliana said, having grown increasingly worried that the Monster would snap the man's neck if for no other reason than annoyance."

"1170

Ibai did as she asked, but he didn't look disappointed, as she might have expected. Perhaps he'd just been trying to revive the conversation.

Emiliana decided to try a different approach. "Why are you with Abolish?"

The Monster tilted his head at her.

She understood his reaction. The question probably wasn't contextually appropriate. But this calmness was playing on her, it seemed. She wanted to get a better idea of what she was dealing with here, of who she was dealing with. If rumors were to be believed, this thing standing before her was without humanity or mercy, more like a force of nature than a human being.

Though, to be fair, as she looked at him, she could certainly see where those rumors had come from.

“You do not seem so terrible,” Emiliana went on, wondering if she was pushing her luck here. She felt like she had a bit of leverage to work with, though she couldn’t tell how much.

“What do you know of Abolish?” Gohvis asked her.

Emiliana wasn’t sure how to answer that. It sounded like a loaded question.

The Monster answered for her. “You know only what the Vanguard wants you to know. You know half-truths and propaganda.”

“Enlighten me, then.”

“I will,” said Gohvis. “In time.”

The way he said that made Emiliana feel almost as if it were impossible to question him. If not for this stillness in her mind, she might have succumbed. “Why not now?” she asked.

Again, Gohvis took his time. “This is not the place for it.”

That made Emiliana look around. Rocky wilderness was all she saw--excepting, perhaps, the narrow valley in front of them. It did seem like a strange place for Gohvis to have stopped, and she was about to ask why when an interruption arrived.”

"1171

It was another man, Emiliana saw. He dropped out of the sky in a flurry of wind, stopping in mid-air, just above the ground. A gusty wave passed over Emiliana, rustling her hair and clothes and stealing the breath from her mouth for a few moments.

“Kind of you to wait up for me,” the man said in two voices.

Gohvis hadn’t bothered to turn around and look at him. He remained crouched in front of Emiliana as he said, “Why are you following me, Vanderberk?”

“You don’t already know? I figured that was why you stopped. To clear the air.”

“Clear it of what?”

Vanderberk paused to look at Gohvis’ guests, and Emiliana observed him in return. He seemed normal enough. Perhaps too normal. His flip-flops, tie-dyed shirt, and knee-length shorts didn’t exactly make him look like a typical member of Abolish. Assuming he was one, of course--but Emiliana was reasonably certain about that, considering the way he and Gohvis were talking to each other.

“You must know how this looks,” said Vanderberk. “Ivan having just been captured, you coming from the direction of Sair--where, apparently, you attacked some of Ivan’s men. Until you stopped to talk to me, I was worried that you might be fleeing the scene of some foul treason you’d committed.”

Gohvis still didn’t turn around. “And?”

“Hmph. And... I’m just wondering what you’re doing out here. Where you’re headed. And why.”

“It doesn’t concern you.”

“No? I’m not sure about that. See, the report is that Ivan was captured by one Abbas Saqqaf. One of the Sandlords. Curious thing about that, though, is that according to our intelligence--the Salesman’s own teams--Abbas Saqqaf should not be capable of such a thing. Supposedly, he was using some type of suit of armor, but even still. It’s quite the unexpected development, wouldn’t you agree?”

"1172

“Get to the point,” said Gohvis.

“Oof. Did you betray Ivan?”

“Do your reports say that I did?”

“Well, no--”

“Then you have your answer.”

“Mm. I see. Good. Then you won’t mind coming with me to free him.”

"I'm busy."

"That is a shame, but I do think this takes precedence. And I'm sure the others would agree with me. You and I are the closest to Kuros right now, therefore it falls to us to take care of this as quickly as possible. Come."

"No."

Emiliana felt the atmosphere shift. The ensuing period of silence was abruptly heavier.

"I'm sure it won't take long," said Vanderberk. "Between the two of us--"

"No."

Vanderberk smacked his lips and scratched his forehead. "See, when you say things like that, it makes you look suspicious. Either that, or it makes me think that you don't respect me as your equal."

"I don't."

Vanderberk's face scrunched up. "Bold words, considering it's just you and the old man now. The two of you are running low on reliable friends. Doesn't make much sense for you to be treating me this way."

Gohvis finally deigned to stand all the way up and look at the man. Even in this relatively high sunlight, the Monster's giant shadow reached almost all the way to Vanderberk. "Have I hurt your feelings? Perhaps obliterating another orphanage will dry your tears."

"Hoh! Maybe it would! But hey, don't knock it 'till you've tried it, my friend. Solving future problems today--that's my motto. And every soul counts, isn't that right?"

"If you are so interested in avoiding future problems, then I suggest you leave me alone. Now."

"1173

"Threats, now?" said Vanderberk. "You're being very stupid. Think about our circumstances for a moment. It's you, me, Jercash, Morgunov, and Dozer. That's all we've got right now. What if the Vannies decide to take advantage? Hmm? What if they launch a full-scale assault tomorrow? Or next week? The five of us would have to repel the eight of them. Do you honestly not see the importance of freeing Ivan as soon as possible?"

Gohvis did not answer him.

Emiliana felt the air grow heavier still.

Vanderberk smacked his lips again. "Fine. You don't consider me your equal yet. Comes with being the new guy, I suppose. But tell me. What about the Star? Is he your equal, you think? Because I imagine he'd like to put that to the test. And sometime soon, am I right? I mean, after Horsht and Jesbol, he must be feeling very good about himself. And oh, I have heard such tales! About how he tore your boys to pieces! Gunny and Dunny both! Always thought they were two peas in a pod, so I suppose it's only fitting that they went out together like that--but by the Star? Of all people? Oof, it must be eating you up inside."

The air grew heavy enough that Emiliana felt like a thick blanket had been thrown over her. She heard rocks shifting and settling all around them.

"Hey, don't get mad at me," said Vanderberk. "I didn't kill your friends."

"They weren't my friends. And neither are you."

"Oh, is that right? Is that why you've been sitting on your ass this whole time instead of avenging them? Why you're not en route to Jesbol right now in order to make things right? Because they weren't your friends? Because Dozer doesn't care that two of his top three were killed in one night? Doesn't mind how weak that makes him look--especially to us? No, sure, I get it. Obviously. Makes total sense. It's certainly not because you're scared or anything like that, right?"
"1174 -- CXXXII.

"I'm not your errand boy," said Gohvis. "If you want Jackson dead so badly, go kill him yourself."

Vanderberk's face flashed with annoyance. "It must be humiliating, having to follow a man who can't even protect his most valuable assets."

"The only thing that would humiliate me is working with a man who thinks himself my equal and yet still wants someone else to protect him."

This time, anger arrived on Vanderberk's face and stayed there. "This is not productive."

"Then go and fetch your Salesman. I am not stopping you."

Vanderberk only stood there.

"You fear the Sandlords," Gohvis observed. "Admit that to yourself and then go find Jercash. I'm sure he will hold your hand for you."

Rather than responding, Vanderberk's eyes just glossed over, and he looked from Gohvis to Emiliana to Ibai.

The Monster didn't seem to have anything more to say, either.

Unsurprisingly, though, Ibai did. "Hey, does anyone know where we are?"

No one answered him.

"I only ask because that valley over there sort of looks like the Valley of Peace, so it would be kind of ironic if you guys decided to fight here."

"Who are these two?" asked Vanderberk.

"Not your concern," said Gohvis.

"Well, apparently, you consider your business with them to be more important than rescuing one of your most valuable allies. So perhaps they are my concern."

"I am not going to tell you again," was all the Monster said.

Vanderberk nodded and took a deep breath. "I understand. This relationship of ours won't be able to move forward until I adjust that attitude of yours."

And Emiliana watched the sky darken.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector certainly had his hands full over the next few days. Due to the almost complete destruction of Dunehall, along with Moaban's geographical isolation, the city had been deemed unfit for civilians, and the Sandlords had issued a mass evacuation. More than three hundred thousand people were in the process of relocating south to Egas."

"1174 -- CXXXII.

"I'm not your errand boy," said Gohvis. "If you want Jackson dead so badly, go kill him yourself."

Vanderberk's face flashed with annoyance. "It must be humiliating, having to follow a man who can't even protect his most valuable assets."

"The only thing that would humiliate me is working with a man who thinks himself my equal and yet still wants someone else to protect him."

This time, anger arrived on Vanderberk's face and stayed there. "This is not productive."

"Then go and fetch your Salesman. I am not stopping you."

Vanderberk only stood there.

"You fear the Sandlords," Gohvis observed. "Admit that to yourself and then go find Jercash. I'm sure he will hold your hand for you."

Rather than responding, Vanderberk's eyes just glossed over, and he looked from Gohvis to Emiliana to Ibai.

The Monster didn't seem to have anything more to say, either.

Unsurprisingly, though, Ibai did. "Hey, does anyone know where we are?"

No one answered him.

"I only ask because that valley over there sort of looks like the Valley of Peace, so it would be kind of ironic if you guys decided to fight here."

"Who are these two?" asked Vanderberk.

"Not your concern," said Gohvis.

"Well, apparently, you consider your business with them to be more important than rescuing one of your most valuable allies. So perhaps they are my concern."

"I am not going to tell you again," was all the Monster said.

Vanderberk nodded and took a deep breath. "I understand. This relationship of ours won't be able to move forward until I adjust that attitude of yours."

And Emiliana watched the sky darken.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Two: 'Resound! Thy swelling regard...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector certainly had his hands full over the next few days. Due to the almost complete destruction of Dunehall, along with Moaban's geographical isolation, the city had been deemed unfit for civilians, and the Sandlords had issued a mass evacuation. More than three hundred thousand people were in the process of relocating south to Egas."

"1175

Between trying to help people out of the city and all the meetings where his presence was requested, Hector didn't find much time for sleeping or even eating--though the latter wasn't so much of an issue after the first day, because the Moabanis just started giving him food. They were rather enthusiastic about it as well, even getting into arguments over it.

Apparently, word about the young black lord from a foreign land had gotten around, and now he couldn't go anywhere without people recognizing him. It was even worse than back home. At least in Gray Rock, his skin color didn't immediately give away who he was. Hector wasn't sure he'd seen even just one other black person since he'd arrived in this country. There had to have been someone in the Golden Fort, though, he figured. That place was packed.

Still, at least all the attention wasn't negative. As painfully embarrassing, uncomfortable, and distracting as it all was, it did feel pretty nice, at times. He just wished that he could hide in his armor again. That would have made it a little more bearable.

He'd been hoping that his materialization would just snap back to how it was before, but so far, no such luck. It didn't seem to matter how hard he concentrated; at the moment, all he could produce was a bit of powder.

When he'd been in Ivan's presence, he could have attributed the sudden weakness of his materialization to the Salesman's insanely oppressive soul power, but that couldn't be the explanation now. Garovel didn't have any relevant knowledge on the subject either, sadly, which only made Hector even more convinced that this was Rasalased's doing. To what end, remained to be seen, but Hector was trying to give the ancient Sandlord the benefit of the doubt. Surely, this was as intended. Rasalased wouldn't have screwed him over like this... probably.

He tried not to dwell on it too much. Time would tell. Or at least, that's what Garovel told him."

"1176

Primarily, though, the subject causing Hector the most concern was not himself. It was the Rainlords. Or rather, what would become of them. Several more Sandlords had arrived in Moaban not long after Abbas, and despite how supportive they'd been so far, Hector had seen the discontent in their ranks.

Those were the meetings that Hector was the most interested in. He'd been dreading what the Sandlords would decide to do--not just with the battered Rainlords but with Asad, too. And it didn't help that so many of them were still unconscious.

Or dead.

Xuan Sebolt and Ismael Blackburn had not been the only losses that the Rainlords had suffered. Far from it, Hector had learned. Caster and Ivan had not been the only big threats in Dunehall that day. Hector had since heard about two other terrible opponents who were present, only one of which the Rainlords had managed to kill--through the combined efforts of Salvador Delaguna, Joana Cortes, Diego Redwater, and Horatio Blackburn.

But even that feat had not been accomplished before the Lord Delaguna lost his wife Elba and his son Lorenzo--both of them, along with seventeen of the man's cousins, nephews, and nieces.

Word was, emergence had factored into that fight enormously, and Hector didn't doubt it--especially after seeing for himself how vacant-eyed Salvador had become. He seemed like a totally different person, compared to the raucous man that had laughed while testing him in Luzo.

And yet, even with how badly House Delaguna had been hit, House Sebolt had been hit even harder.

Among the family's thirty-nine casualties, Lord Abel and Lady Amaya had both been among them. Xuan, too, of course. Dimas, however, was still alive, though he had not yet awoken."

"1177

House Blackburn was having its share of fresh troubles as well. With Ismael dead, Darktide unconscious, and Ibai missing, the person who everyone expected to lead them was Lady Nere. But apparently, the woman had suffered a nervous breakdown, and now the family was in disarray. Garovel hadn't been able to get all of the details yet.

And then, of course, there were the Elroys.

Quite possibly, Zeff looked worse than anyone. He didn't just have bags under his eyes. He had bags around his eyes, as if the upper half of his face were trying to sink into itself.

Hector thought he felt tired. Zeff looked like he never intended to let himself fall asleep ever again.

Before Hector had even made it back to Dunehall with Abbas, Zeff had gone off in search of his children. After a few hours, he returned with Marcos and Ramira, who was finally able to receive proper medical attention for the wound on her foot. Since then, Zeff had been going out periodically in search of Emiliana. Hector, among others, had even accompanied him a few times.

But finally, it seemed, the Lord Elroy had given up. For the time being, anyway. Hector didn't imagine he would ever really stop looking. It was probably just a matter of finding some kind of lead.

Currently, though, Zeff wasn't letting Marcos and Ramira out of his sight. He would even bring them to meetings with him, despite the looks of disapproval from various Sandlords.

All in all, Hector had never seen so many devastated people in one place. The somber air was so heavy among the Rainlord encampments that Hector could practically feel it on his bare skin, as if their sorrow had somehow manifested physical weight.

Though, maybe it had. Garovel said that these were just the effects of normal human empathy, but Hector wasn't entirely convinced. At this point, he wouldn't have been surprised if soul power played some subtle part here, too."

"1178

Garovel had been noticeably preoccupied as well. Hector sometimes caught the reaper lost in thought, and whenever he asked about it, Garovel avoided elaborating. At first, Hector chalked it up to worrying about Chergoa, but after it kept happening, Hector decided to push harder.

'Alright, alright,' Garovel finally said. 'I've just been thinking about our next move.'

'Well, me too,' said Hector. 'There's no reason for you to be all coy about it.'

'I wasn't being coy. I was being careful.'

'...Somehow, I doubt that.'

'Hey, fuck you. I'm being serious here. There are a lot of gears in motion all around us right now. A lot of things to take into consideration.'

Hector thought about giving him more crap but decided to just keep listening as he lifted a young family's couch onto the back of a flatbed truck.

'We might have an opportunity to do something that would have a big impact on a lot of people,' said Garovel. 'There's a very good chance that the Sandlords will try to send the Rainlords away. Maybe helping them go into hiding, maybe just flat out exiling them. In either case, we have a place where they can lay low for a while, don't we? We should invite them.'

Hector stopped in front of the couple's old refrigerator and spared Garovel a glance. 'Uh... well, actually, I was planning on doing that, anyway.'

'What? Are you serious?'

Hector hugged the fridge tightly and lifted it. 'Yeah.'

'Why didn't you tell me sooner?'

'Er... I thought you'd disapprove, considering we only met them like two weeks ago or something.'

'Ah, well, that's true, but I also have Chergoa's judgment to go on. She obviously trusted the Rainlords enough to join up with them, and I trust her, so by extension, I think we can consider them trustworthy, too. And if they do end up betraying us someday, I'll just blame her forever.'"

"1179

Hector and Garovel had discussed the subject of Chergoa already and come to the difficult conclusion that there wasn't anything they could do to help her right now. Garovel didn't show it much, but Hector was pretty sure that he was extremely worried about her. The telling trait was how closely Garovel followed everything that Zeff was up to, because if anyone was going to find Emiliana and Chergoa, it was Zeff.

'Hold on,' said Garovel. 'So you would've invited the Rainlords to Warrenhold even if I'd told you not to?'

'Uh...'

'Here I am, trying to be cautious and think through all the possible consequences of our actions, and you're just jumping in headfirst, not even giving a shit.'

'I gave a shit. I was thinking, maybe... I mean, maybe they could help us rebuild Warrenhold. If they want.'

'Yeah, maybe. Or bringing so many people there at once will become total chaos. Or the Queen will get upset at us for not consulting her first.'

'...Should we try and call her?'

'Hell no. What if she tells us not to do it?'

It didn't take much longer to finish loading up the Moabani family's truck. They'd only needed help with the big things, and they didn't seem to own very much in the first place.

Hector didn't think that was a coincidence. Sure, they weren't much older than he was, but at this point in the evacuation, there weren't many people left in Moaban, and he'd begun to notice a trend among many of those who remained.

They all bore a distinctive mark on their left cheek.

At first, he didn't think much of it. Maybe it was some kind of popular tattoo--maybe like Asad. But then he saw the way other people were looking at them. Avoiding. It wasn't a tattoo. It was a brand. And it was intended to humiliate them."

"1180

When he asked Garovel about it, the reaper was able to explain further. The brand meant that these people had broken the law in some way, and if they ever attempted to conceal their brands, they would probably be beaten or arrested, depending on local law or custom.

It made Hector wonder what this young couple could have done to earn such a harsh punishment. They looked harmless enough to him-- both very gaunt with wary eyes, as if they expected Hector to turn on them at any moment. Their baby certainly looked plump and healthy, though.

He never exchanged a single word with them. They probably didn't speak Mohssian, he figured. He was content to leave at that and be on his way, but as he turned to go, the husband raised his voice and began speaking in Valgan.

'He's saying you smell like the inside of an old diaper,' said Garovel.

Hector had to stop himself from squinting.

The baby-holding husband came closer and grabbed Hector's hand, shaking it up and down while nodding furiously. He looked like he might start crying.

'He's telling you to go eat your own shit forever. Like an ouroboros made of your own feces. Man, this guy sure has a mouth on him.'

The husband let him go, making room for the wife to come in and wrap her arms around him.

'Yeah, she hates you, too. She's not really saying, but I can just tell.'

The woman was sobbing into Hector's shirt now.

Hector just kind of stood there, trying not to move. This was way more physical contact than he'd bargained for, but he was hoping he could just clear his mind and wait it out.

It took a while, but she did eventually release him.

Hector remained frozen there, trying not to look traumatized by a hug.

'Wait a minute.' Garovel floated across Hector's vision. 'I may've been mistaken.'"

"1181

Hector didn't stay with the young family for much longer. There were still others in need of assistance, but the encounter certainly left a lasting impression on him. Hector had been a bit reluctant to ask Garovel for more details, but now he was simply growing too curious.

As he was helping a similarly-branded old man with a large stack of boxes, Hector had to ask, 'Can you tell what crime these people committed? I mean, like, does the brand specify or something?'

'Yes, it does.' Garovel allowed an appreciable pause. 'This guy you're helping now defaulted on a loan from the state.'

Hector had to stop and look at Garovel. 'What?'

'The Sandlords take debt very seriously. If you fail to pay off your debts, you're considered untrustworthy. It's a pretty strict cultural taboo.'

Hector eyed the old Moabani man another time. If anything, Hector felt even worse for him. The brand didn't exactly look recent, and the old man looked about seventy years old or so. After a moment, though, Hector set back to work loading boxes into the back of the old man's station wagon.

'So that couple we helped earlier couldn't pay off their loans, either?' asked Hector. 'That's horrible. They're so young, and this is gonna follow them for the rest of their lives?'

'Yep. But their brands weren't for debt. Women can't be branded for debt. Only men can.'

'What? Why?'

'Well, it used to be that women couldn't even take out loans in the first place. These days, though, they can. And the branding laws haven't changed to account for them. Which, I suppose, is a good thing. Sort of. It created a new kind of gender inequality, which is unfortunate, but the branding laws are pretty fucked up in the first place, so. It's good that more people aren't getting branded, at least.'

'Huh... Then what were their brands for?'

'Incest.'

Hector nearly dropped the box he was holding. 'Oh...'

'Yeah.'"

"1182

'Uh... I don't, uh...'

'Yeah.'

'They... they had a baby with them...'

'They sure did.'

'Er, I mean... I'm not judging...'

'You're kind of judging.'

'Well, it's--I, ah--it's... uh--'

'Yeah. It's weird. And the Sandlords don't exactly smile upon it.'

'I see...'

'There are reasons for that, too. Historical reasons, that is.'

'Wait... You're not just telling me all this because you wanna give me another history lesson, are you?'

'Hey, I'm not telling you anything that isn't true. If a history lesson just evolves organically out of my own scholarly truthfulness, then who are we to go against that? Is that what you want, Hector? To go against the laws of nature?'

'...“Truthfulness,” huh? I seem to recall you lying right to my face not too long ago.'

'Oh, yes, well, exemptions from the truth can be made when something is hilarious. Everyone knows that.'

'It wasn't hilarious.'

'It was to me.'

'I'm gonna get you back for that, by the way.'

'I'm shaking in my nonexistent boots.'

Hector just sighed. At least he was almost done loading up the old man's car.

'So do you want my history lesson or not? It's super interesting. You'll like it. C'mon.'

'Fuckin'... yeah, alright. I'm sure you'd just tell it to me, anyway.'

'Okay, so back in the day--we're talking, oh, 1700 years ago or so--a little group emerged from the then-very-powerful Valgan Empire. You may have even heard of this little group. They were called the Sandlords.'

'Nope, never heard of 'em.'

'Their rise to power was facilitated by the discovery of their "divine ability." You know the one.'

'Explain that to me again.'

'Well, it's the materialization that Asad--'

'I was joking, Garovel.'

'Never joke about asking me to explain something, because I will always take you seriously and explain the shit out of it, just in case.'

'Alright, geez.'"

"1183

'Anyway,' said Garovel, 'the point I was trying to make was that the Sandlord's divine ability used to be even more important than it is nowadays. It was how Sandlord families distinguished themselves from the "common folk," as it were. It was a really crazy time, actually. A poor family could, literally, be propelled into the upper class overnight if one of their bloodline manifested the ability.'

'Whoa...'

'Naturally, this created all sorts of chaos. Fraudsters and the like tried to capitalize, if only to flee the country with a handful of riches. It didn't usually work out well for them. We're talkin' public executions with barely even a trial. Beheadings, torture, tying people to a post until the sun cooked them to death. The Sandlords' displeasure with such criminals became pretty well known, even in distant countries.'

Hector didn't have a hard time believing that.

‘So of course, the Sandlords became very suspicious of others and, well, elitist. Even more than they already were, that is. When everyone considers your bloodline “divine,” I imagine it’s pretty difficult not to get at least a little full of yourself. And it just grew worse over time. The Sandlords became more and more isolated from society.’

‘Which is where incest factors in?’ Hector guessed.

‘Basically, yeah. Trying to keep their precious bloodlines as “pure” as possible.’

‘Right...’

‘There was about a 150-year time period where incest was commonly practiced among the Sandlords, and at its peak, some Hahls were so paranoid that they wouldn’t even allow marriage with any of the other Hahls. They would actually force siblings or first cousins to marry, and it would be treated like a status symbol.’

‘I’m guessing all this didn’t end very well.’”

"1184

‘No, it did not,’ said Garovel, ‘and for two big reasons, madness being the first. There were a LOT of insane Sandlords who cropped up during this time period. And a few of them were fun. Or even brilliant. In fact, one of them built Dunehall. Others, though... not so much. They started to fight--sometimes with each other--and frequently neglected their subjects. Or worse. The most famous example was probably the family that began a tradition of cannibalism.’

‘Whoa, what?’

‘Hahl Rahhak. They don’t exist anymore.’

‘That’s good, I guess. They really ate people, though?’

‘Yup. Story goes, a famine gripped their land for several years, so they resorted to cannibalism as a means of coping. But then the famine ended... and they just kept on eating people, anyway. Acquired a taste for it, apparently.’

‘Ugh, wow...’

‘Yeah. The story of how that family was finally destroyed is pretty interesting, too. It was an elaborate plot of Hahl Duxan--which does still survive to this day, by the way. And it was pretty dastardly on their part, I must say. But in a good way, y’know? Since the Rahhaks were a bunch of man-eating assholes ‘n all. I guess I should give some context on the conflict between the two families, though. Basically, it started when the head of Hahl Duxan allowed the Rahhaks and many of their subjects to take refuge in--’

‘Hey, ah, hold on,’ said Hector, sensing that this tangent was going to derail the conversation entirely, ‘what about the second thing?’

‘What second thing?’

‘With, um... how all the incest stuff ended badly?’

‘Oh! Right. Yeah. Insanity was the first reason. The second reason, you probably know already. Ever heard of the Wiseman’s Plague?’

‘Uh... sounds kinda familiar.’

‘Hmm. Maybe you know it better as the Great Green Sickness.’

‘Oh. Yeah. I read about that in school. It sounded horrible.’”

"1185

‘An understatement if ever there was one,’ said Garovel. ‘Having witnessed it first hand, words can’t really express how awful it was. For a while, there was a widely prevailing belief that humanity was just... done. Hell, even I was starting to think so. It genuinely felt like the end of the world, at times.’

‘Really? Even though servants couldn’t be killed by it?’

‘I never said my belief was entirely rational. You have to understand--it was like being in a nightmare. Literally, it felt like that. Surreal. Because, just, everywhere I went, people were suffering and dying. And I went to a LOT of a places. The Great Green Sickness ravaged all of Eloa and Ardora and most of Qenghis. Eventually, though, I did find out that Luugh had made it through untouched.’

‘Damn. What about the Undercrust?’

‘Untouched as well. But that’s not so surprising, I guess. Anyway, the point I was getting at, was that possibly the worst pandemic that humanity has ever known occurred while the Sandlords were widely practicing incest.’

‘Ah... that means... what does that mean?’

‘It means that genetic variation within their ranks was at an all-time low. None of them were immune--or even mildly resistant, for that matter. So the plague simply DECIMATED them. Every single non-servant among the Sandlords was dead in under six months.’

‘Holy fuck...’

‘Holy fuck, indeed,’ said Garovel.

Another question occurred to Hector, and he figured he should ask it before Garovel started blabbering on about something else. ‘When was Rasalased in relation to all this? I mean, when did he... er, happen?’

‘Oh, he was born right before all this shit went down.’

‘Really? Does that mean he’s... uh...?’

‘A product of incest? Possibly. I don’t know. I bet Qorvass would, but let’s avoid bringing it up, shall we? He might not appreciate us asking that kind of question about one of his most beloved ancestors.’”

"1186

‘I wonder what he and Asad will think about the fact that we actually talked to the Dry God,’ said Hector.

Garovel chortled. ‘I hope they’re jealous.’

Soon enough, Hector had to start heading back. Garovel kept going on about history, but Hector was only half-listening now. His mind had returned to worrying about the present. The Sandlords were scheduled to reconvene this afternoon, and now that the evacuation of Moaban was nearly finished, their excuse for delaying was more or less gone.

Hector could understand their reluctance to make a decision. They were stuck between the Vanguard and the Rainlords. One way or another, they had to betray someone's trust. And of course, the well-being of their own subjects was at stake--and wasn't that a lord's priority?

It was enough to give Hector pause. He was a lord, too. Technically. This whole time, he felt like he hadn't really understood what that meant--the responsibility it implied. And the potential consequences. He certainly didn't envy the Sandlords' position right now, but he was realizing that he might very well find himself in a similar one, someday.

He arrived at Dunehall again as the sun neared the height of its arc in the sky. From the outside, the castle looked largely the same. Hector supposed that was one advantage of being covered almost entirely in sand: structural vulnerabilities were hidden. Apart from the scarcely noticeable lump or depression in the sand's surface, Dunehall seemed no different.

Most of the Sandlords were waiting in tents all along the castle grounds. The Rainlords were no longer here. They'd headed for Egas the previous day, while Hector and a handful of representatives had stayed behind at the request of Abbas."

"1187

The separation had been rather sudden, but it couldn't have been helped. The Sandlords had learned that the Vanguard was much nearer than anyone realized. Apparently, they had been repelling Abolish forces in Calthos for the past few days, keeping them away from the border with Sair.

Hector heard the names Iceheart and Lamont a few times. They both referred to the same person, he eventually realized, and according to Garovel, Lamont was a Vanguardian who wielded as much power as Ivan or Gohvis.

And even though there'd been no official announcement, the Sandlords seemed to believe that Lamont would show up in Moaban any day now--probably due to all the media attention surrounding the attack and subsequent evacuation.

When the meeting finally began, Garovel translated for Hector as usual. A few arguments broke out among the Sandlords, which weren't exactly new, but this time, they had more vitriol behind them. Hector could feel the growing dread in the air, the desperation. Several times, they talked about how there could be no more delays, how Iceheart would make the decision for them if this stalemate continued.

Hector also noted that Jada Najir, despite attending every meeting as her Hahl's representative, never spoke. She only ever observed. Which might have been for the best, he figured. The other Hahls were not exactly pleased with Asad and his family at the moment, even if no legal consequences had been discussed as of yet.

As the meeting drew out and familiar talking points were retread, Hector began to feel his attention slipping. This was going to be another day of indecision, after all, it seemed. If he'd known that, he would've put this time to better use.

Then Garovel stopped translating for him, and Hector's attention snapped.

'...Garovel?' said Hector."
"1188

The reaper's skeletal face wore an expression that Hector didn't recognize. Was that... annoyance? Mixed with anger, perhaps.

'I'm going for it,' said Garovel.

'Going for what?' Hector asked.

Instead of answering him, Garovel drifted forward and began speaking rather loudly in Valgan. Whatever the Sandlords had been saying was lost as everyone turned to Garovel.

Of course, Hector couldn't tell what was being said, but there was only one thing that he could imagine Garovel would be telling them here and now.

All things considered, the Sandlords hadn't required much convincing. If anything, they seemed relieved. Perhaps they'd been hoping this whole time that Hector and Garovel would take the Rainlords off their hands and had just been too polite to come right out and ask.

As soon as they had their consensus, the entire atmosphere of the meeting shifted. Word was sent almost immediately to the Rainlords in Egas about the offer of asylum, and from there, the meeting became about how they might actually be able to sneak four hundred fugitives from the Vanguard out of the country.

It was very quickly agreed upon that simply trying to fly everyone to Atreya was not going to work. Even if the Vanguard wasn't watching all their borders like a hawk, the Lorentian government's Air Traffic Control would certainly be suspicious of a sudden fleet of private jets in their air space.

The Sandlords were talking about splitting the Rainlords up into several groups and trying to sneak them out separately in all different directions.

But Hector saw that expression on Garovel's face again.

'Please excuse my use of Mohssian here,' said Garovel, 'but I would like my servant to understand what I am about to ask of you.'

A heavy silence elapsed as the Sandlords waited. Lord Abbas gave a nod from the other end of the table.

Garovel returned it gratefully, then addressed the bearded man on Abbas' left. 'As I recall,' said Garovel, 'Hahl Duxan controls a passage to the Undercrust, no?'"

"1189

The question made Hector's eyes widen.

The Lord Duxan's answer was in Valgan, but it did seem to be an affirmation.

'Our home has such a passage as well,' said Garovel. 'I believe that is our most discreet option available here, though I will need to make a call first.'

A rumble of voices passed over the Sandlords as they discussed it amongst themselves, but they soon came back with a nod from Abbas and a few more Valgan words for Garovel.

Garovel answered in Valgan this time, too, and then moved away from the table, motioning for Hector to follow.

Hector excused himself and exited the tent with his reaper. He'd mostly followed what had happened there at the end, but the details had eluded him. He shielded his eyes as the harsh sun greeted him again.

'Tell me you still have Gina's number,' said Garovel

Hector searched his pockets for his phone. "Yeah..."

'Call her. I need to talk to Voreese as soon as possible.'

Hector hesitated, frowning.

'What's the matter?'

"Nothing. It's just... international rates are ridiculous. I think I lost like thirty troas just letting Ramira browse the internet for pictures of spiders the other day."

Garovel's bony face twisted impossibly. 'Really? THAT'S what you're worried about? Since when do you give two shits about money?'

"Since I need it in order to rebuild my busted-ass castle. Not to mention, uh... feeding everyone who's apparently gonna live there."

'Yes, well, I'm glad you're trying to be so financially mindful, but a couple hundred troas isn't going to make much difference with that, either way.'

"Wait, what? A couple hundred?!"

Garovel shrugged. 'It might be a long conversation. I dunno.'

"Agh. I need a better data plan..."

"1190 -- CXXXIII.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Three: 'Thy deepening concern...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Gina wiped her nose for what felt like the fiftieth time in the past hour.

She lay in bed, nestled in a small fortress of blankets and pillows as she browsed through old emails on her laptop.

She was not alone, however. The girl not-really-watching television on the other side of the room was her guest--a guest whose stay was currently indefinite.

Madison Reach pursed her lips absently. "So, um... any word yet on when Roman will be back?"

Gina had to consciously avoid rolling her eyes. "No."

"Right. Of course. Sorry to keep asking."

"It's fine," said Gina.

Another long period of silence intervened, leaving only the background noise of the television in the room.

Gina didn't necessarily mind Madison's company, as such. The girl needed a safe place to stay. Apparently, things had gotten a little crazy in Steccat, and now, the Andalero group wanted her dead or captured. And it was largely Master Roman's fault.

Not too surprising. Gina understood.

But Madison's apparent obsession with Master Roman had become rather grating. And it didn't even make sense. Shouldn't she have been upset? From what Master Roman had said, he'd nearly gotten her killed and quite possibly ruined her entire livelihood. And yet she hadn't mentioned any of that to Gina even once. Was she just incredibly forgiving? Somehow, Gina didn't think so.

It was distracting, to say the least. Gina just wanted to lie in bed, chug cold medicine, and maybe find some new intel on these Andalero people.

But no. Madison had to be here, too. Being all nice and thoughtful. Making Gina breakfast, lunch, and dinner--and well, too. How did she even know how to cook, huh? Weren't movie stars supposed to be crap at that sort of thing?"

"1190 -- CXXXIII.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Gina wiped her nose for what felt like the fiftieth time in the past hour. She lay in bed, nestled in a small fortress of blankets and pillows as she browsed through old emails on her laptop.

She was not alone, however. The girl not-really-watching television on the other side of the room was her guest--a guest whose stay was currently indefinite.

Madison Reach pursed her lips absently. "So, um... any word yet on when Roman will be back?"

Gina had to consciously avoid rolling her eyes. "No."

"Right. Of course. Sorry to keep asking."

"It's fine," said Gina.

Another long period of silence intervened, leaving only the background noise of the television in the room.

Gina didn't necessarily mind Madison's company, as such. The girl needed a safe place to stay. Apparently, things had gotten a little crazy in Steccat, and now, the Andalero group wanted her dead or captured. And it was largely Master Roman's fault.

Not too surprising. Gina understood.

But Madison's apparent obsession with Master Roman had become rather grating. And it didn't even make sense. Shouldn't she have been upset? From what Master Roman had said, he'd nearly gotten her killed and quite possibly ruined her entire livelihood. And yet she hadn't mentioned any of that to Gina even once. Was she just incredibly forgiving? Somehow, Gina didn't think so.

It was distracting, to say the least. Gina just wanted to lie in bed, chug cold medicine, and maybe find some new intel on these Andalero people.

But no. Madison had to be here, too. Being all nice and thoughtful. Making Gina breakfast, lunch, and dinner--and well, too. How did she even know how to cook, huh? Weren't movie stars supposed to be crap at that sort of thing?"

"1191

Gina couldn't figure this girl out. Worse, still, was the fact that her search for information on Andalero had so far turned up bupkis. And she was supposed to be recuperating, not twisting herself into a ball of muted frustration.

At length, she caught herself caving in and searching instead for intel on Madison Reach. She caught herself. And then went ahead anyway.

She quickly found more than she bargained for.

Many people did not have nice things to say about Miss Reach. Apparently, she was all types of bitchy and arrogant, making her notoriously difficult to work with. And a hypocrite, too, for multitudinous reasons, though the biggest seemed to be a drug addiction, which some said she'd kicked while others said she hadn't.

To her credit, though, she did have many passionate supporters as well--enough so that the flame wars Gina found were among the most vitriolic she'd ever seen. Which was saying a lot.

In the end, though, none of it was helpful to her. If anything, she was even more confused about what to think than before.

She didn't need to rely on random forum posters, though. She had plenty of informed associates from all over the world. Maybe one of them knew something about Madison. Ah, but shady people were looking for Madison, so asking about her might draw suspicion from nosy data miners. She'd have to encrypt her emails and make sure not to send them to anyone she didn't think--

"So are you and him...?"

The question made Gina put a pin in her evil plan. "Excuse me?"

Madison was fidgeting in her seat. "You and Roman. Are the two of you...?"

She must've been holding onto that question for the last couple days, Gina figured. Gina wasn't entirely sure that she wanted to answer that question, though. Maybe she'd just play dumb a little longer and hope for the best. "I'm not sure what you mean.""

"1192

Miss Reach's brow lowered. "I'm asking if you two are lovers."

Gina had to stop and blink at her sudden bluntness.

Madison waited.

"I..." Gina reconsidered what she was about to say. Something on Madison's face was telling her that there was little point in dancing around it. "No, we're not lovers, but..."

"Good. That's a relief. Because I'm sure you've noticed by now that I like him. And I wouldn't want to interfere with anything the two of you have."

"Well, I don't know if... agh..."

Madison tilted her head. "You don't know if, what? You wouldn't mind if I started dating him, would you?"

Gina's expression tightened. "Yes! I'd mind!" She might've said that louder than she'd meant to, because Madison flinched in apparent surprise. Gina took a second to settle herself. "To be perfectly honest, yes, I would mind. It would bother the crap out of me."

"...Oh."

A part of Gina wanted to just leave it at that, but it wouldn't have felt right. "But, look, it's not that simple with Master Roman. He's not... agh... how do I put this...?"

"Oh, you mean he's gay?"

"No..." A beat passed. "At least, I'm pretty sure he's not."

"You aren't certain?"

"Well, I've never seen him with a guy. Intimately, I mean. But the thing is... I've never seen him with a woman, either."

"Ah, so he keeps his private life private, huh?"

That was one way of putting it, Gina supposed--an inaccurate way, but a way, nonetheless. She could've elaborated. She could've told Madison about her own past obsession with Master Roman, about how she used to watch his every move on the mansion's security footage, how she tracked his phone and kept logs of all his conversations.

She could've brought all that up. But she decided against it."

"1193

Gina tried to concoct a more diplomatic means of sharing her ill-gotten knowledge, but Madison wasn't done talking.

"You really like him, though, don't you?"

Gina just flattened her lips and said nothing.

"Hehe, you don't like admitting it? The way you blurted it out a second ago, I thought you were pretty comfortable with your feelings."

Gina tried not to scowl. "Yeah, well. I just didn't want there to be a misunderstanding. I would've felt bad if I caused some kind of confusing... emotional stuff."

Madison giggled, then laughed outright. "You have no idea how much I appreciate that!"

Gina tilted her head at her.

"I've had my share of relationship drama," said Madison. "I am definitely not looking to get myself tangled up in a mess like that again. So as far as I'm concerned, he's all yours. I won't go after him. I promise."

"...Just like that?" said Gina.

"Just like that."

Gina gave her a dubious look.

Madison breathed a laugh. "Look, I don't need to go after your stupid boyfriend. I can get any guy I want. I am a beautiful, self-actualized young woman. And I have lots of money."

Gina laughed faintly. "First of all, he's not stupid. And secondly, he's not my boyfriend."

"Yeah, whatever. As far as I'm concerned, he's off the market now."

Gina wasn't sure how to feel. Had she just ruined something for Master Roman? Didn't seem fair to him.

Oh well, though. He probably wouldn't have gone for Madison, anyway. Miss Reach could say whatever she liked, but Gina didn't think anyone could get Master Roman. She'd seen him turn down countless women--even a few supermodels who said they just wanted a fling.

Come to think it, she didn't know why she'd allowed herself to get so worked up in the first place. She could've just kept her mouth shut, and everything would've been fine. She blamed the cold as she wiped her nose again. All this sinus pressure was muddling her brain."

"1194

"So, uh," said Madison, "from the way you said all that just now, I presume you haven't told him how you feel?"

Gina's expression stiffened.

"How long have you known him?" Madison asked.

Gina just frowned.

Madison seemed amused. "A while, huh? A year or two?"

More like five, but there was no need to admit that and embarrass herself, so she just nodded.

"Heh. How about I help you out, then?"

"What?"

"You know, like, put in a good word for you. You wouldn't know this about me, but I can be quite the matchmaker."

Gina could see where this was going. Over a cliff, basically. "Please don't," she said firmly. "That would probably make me hate you."

Madison blinked at her, then giggled again. "Alright, geez. But you've gotta tell him how you feel. You can't just pine after him forever. You've gotta--"

"Stop right there." Gina held up a hand. "I know all that crap, okay? And it's not that simple."

"Why?"

"Because I know Master Roman better than anyone. He's just not emotionally available. Which is fine. I'm perfectly content with the way things are. I don't need some fairy godmother to show up and wave a magic wand around and fix everything." That was a weird and rambling analogy. Gina felt her forehead. It was pretty warm.

Madison made a face. "Emotionally available? What does that mean? Is he, like, hung up on a past girlfriend or something?"

"No, no, nothing like that."

"Then what?"

Gina hesitated. Was it okay to tell her? Eh, probably, who cares? "Master Roman took a vow of celibacy."

Madison reared back in her chair. "What?"

Gina bit her lip. Maybe she shouldn't have said that. Would Master Roman be upset? Maybe. Maybe not. Maybe he wouldn't care.

Shit."

"1195

"Why did he take a vow of celibacy?" Madison asked.

"Uh..."

"What, do you not know?"

"It's just. He's building... things. Look, that's not important. I mean, it is important, and I respect his decision, but the details aren't... Agh, why are we even talking about this?"

“Um. Because it’s relevant to your happiness? Don’t wimp out on me now. Tell me. How does him building stuff relate to him not having sex at all?”

“It’s a matter of responsibility and personal... things.”

“More things, huh?”

“Look, it’s his business. It’s not for me to gossip about.”

“Sure it is! In fact, you should’ve just told me that from the beginning! Why didn’t you?”

“Agh, because it makes people treat him differently, and now you probably think he’s really weird...” Gina rubbed her forehead and closed her eyes. “Also, I’m stupid right now... I think I might have a fever.”

Madison stood and replaced Gina’s hand with her own. After a moment, she nodded. “Be right back.” Then she left the room.

She soon returned, however, with more medicine and a wet towel.

Gina took both gratefully and settled herself even deeper into her pillows and bed sheets.

Madison allowed her a few minutes of peace before asking, “Better?”

Gina shut her eyes and sighed comfortably. “...I think so, yeah. Thank you.”

“Of course.”

Madison let another beat pass. “So let me get this straight: you’ve got a crush on someone who took a vow of celibacy.”

Gina groaned. She was starting to wish she was even sicker so that she could just start barfing and end this conversation.

“Girl, if that’s the case, then you’ve gotta let him go. I mean, unless you’re interested in a sexless relationship, I guess.” Another beat passed. “Are you?”

Gina opened her eyes to glare at her.”

“...Or convince him to break his vow,” Madison went on. “Or end it. End probably sounds better than break, now that I think about. Yeah, definitely don’t ask him to break anything. Unless you’re into that sort of thing, I suppose.”

Gina squinted. “What does that even mean?”

“...I don’t know. I’ll be honest with you. Men who’ve taken vows of a sexual nature are a bit outside my area of expertise.”

“You don’t say.”

“Call me when you fall in love with someone else. Preferably not a priest or monk.”

“Yeah, thanks.”

“You’re not going to call me at all, are you?”

“Probably not, no.”

“That’s unfair. It’s not my fault that your circumstances are so weird right now. If he were a regular guy, I would be able to help the crap out of you.”

“You would, huh?”

“Oh yeah. I’ve helped loads of people find love. Haven’t you seen my movies?”

Gina just looked at her flatly.

“I’m joking,” said Madison. “Relax. I’m not that much of an airhead.”

“...Good one.”

Madison giggled. “So stiff. Fine, then, how about you help me find a boyfriend? I hate being single.”

“Well, I wouldn’t open with that line.”

“I’d like someone who’s tall and maybe kind of--what’s the word? Stoic? Yeah. My last boyfriend was a total asshole who just loved to hear himself talk. And the one before that--ugh, I could practically write a book about how much of a douche he was. In fact, maybe--”

Gina stopped listening. Her eyes were already closed, so it was easy to just kind of drift off while Madison’s voice melted into background noise.

At length, however, a ringing phone stirred her out of it.”
"1197

Gina looked over and saw that Madison was already moving to answer it for her. Gina held up a hand, then motioned for Madison to hand it to her instead.

Madison did so, perhaps only then remembering that no one was supposed to know that she was here.

“Hello?” Gina said into the receiver.

<“Gina? It’s Hector.”>

She blinked, then smiled. “Ah. How is everything?”

<“Uh. Not so great. As usual, I guess.”>

“Mm. Should I be worried?”

<“Oh, uh, no. But I need to talk to Roman. Like, right now, if possible.”>

“Ooh...” Gina bit her lip. “It’s not possible, unfortunately. Master Roman is away on business.”

<“...Hmm. Well, um. This is really important, though. Is there no other way I can contact him? Specifically, I need information from Voreese.”>

Gina frowned. With everything she knew of him, she didn’t think Hector would exaggerate about the severity of a situation. “Unfortunately, there isn’t. Even I can’t contact him right now.”

<“...How can that be?”>

Gina had to mull her answer over first. She supposed if it was Hector she was telling, then Master Roman wouldn't get mad at her. "He's in the Undercrust."

<"Ah...">

"You know about that, don't you?"

<"Yeah, I do.">

"So you know that I can't just call him up. His service provider doesn't exactly have coverage there. Assuming he even took his phone with him in the first place."

<"I get it. Okay. Hold on a second."> There came a rather long pause.
<"Alright, um. How did he get to the Undercrust?">

"Uh. He went down a big hole?"

<"Yeah, but which hole? They have names.">

Gina shrugged to herself. "I don't know. It was in Steccat."

<"Mm.">

"Oh, and, I guess... he may have infiltrated a paramilitary base belonging to a certain lady-servant emperor. Or empress, as it were."

<"What the--? Are you kidding?">

"Nope."

"1198

<"What is he trying to do?"> Hector asked.

"Not sure I'm allowed to tell you that. I've already told you a lot, so."

<"...Is it a mission from the Queen?">

Gina opened her mouth but realized that she didn't know what to say. Dammit, Hector.

<"...Nevermind. Sorry to bother you.">

"Sorry I couldn't be more help."

<“Actually, um... you’ve been a big help.”>

Gina tilted her head. “Have I?”

<“Yeah. Take, uh--take care.”>

“You, too.” And she moved to hang up.

<“Oh, uh--hold on, there’s something else,”> said Hector. <“Um, do you, um... uh...?”>

“...Yes?”

<“Sorry. My reaper is explaining something. Um. He wants to know if you have a picture of Roman.”>

“A picture? What do you need a picture for?”

<“It might help with finding him. Apparently.”>

“Mm. I doubt it. Master Roman likes to disguise himself, remember? Especially when he’s traveling. I don’t think anyone will recognize a normal picture of him.”

Another long pause transpired. <“...Even so, I’m being told it could be useful. In fact, um, if you have more than one picture of Roman, could you just send me all of them?”>

Clearly, Hector didn’t know what he was asking.

“Sure,” said Gina. There was no need to correct him. She’d just have to pick out a few of the ones that looked like they’d been taken with Master Roman’s permission. “I’ll send them in a few hours. Is that okay?”

<“Yeah,”> said Hector. <“Thanks.”>

“Anything else?”

<“Ah... no. Thank you. Again. But, uh. I feel like I’m always asking you for stuff. I mean, I’m stupid-busy right now, but, um, is there--is there anything I can help you with, maybe?”> Gina’s head reared back a little. “I... don’t think so, no. I’m fine.””

"1199 -- CXXXIV.

<“You sure?”> said Hector. <“Want, like, your own room in my castle or something? Or, like, a souvenir from Sair?”>

“You’re in Sair right now?”

<“Oh, uh, yeah.”>

Gina had to stop and rethink what else she’d just heard. “Wait, did you just ask me to live with you?”

<“Uh... that’s not... I mean, when you put it like that, it sounds creepy.”>

She smirked. “How was it supposed to sound?”

<“I meant, y’know, as... a special guest... type... thing. VIP status or... whatever. And Roman could stay, too, of course. Or any of your family or... I didn’t mean... I, um. Just... Nevermind.”>

Gina laughed. Her nose started to run again, and she had to dab it with a tissue. “I appreciate the offer, but I’m all good here.”

<“Alright, well, I definitely gotta go now,”> said Hector. <“Talk to you later. If you think of a way I can return any of these favors, then just, uh, let me know.”>

“Hector, they weren’t really favors. We’re on the same team here. I’ve just been doing as Master Roman says, more or less.”

<“Yeah, that, uh... that sounds like bullshit. I owe you big time. Oh! Ah! Yeah, alright!”> A brief rustling noise intervened on Hector’s end. <“Talk to you later.”> And he hung up.

Gina pulled the phone away from her ear and stared at it.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Four: ‘O, unknown messenger...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Five times now, Hector had asked Garovel to explain this to him, but the reaper was intent on being mysterious with him again. They couldn’t call, email, meet up with, or even know the whereabouts of Roman Fullister; but apparently, that didn't matter, because... of something, Garovel assured him. Something that Hahl Duxan had at its disposal.

That was as much as Hector had been able to get out of Garovel. He tried Jada Najir's reaper, Atalim, but Garovel intervened then, too, asking Atalim to help him "preserve the surprise."

Atalim agreed, naturally.

All these reapers were far too pleased with themselves, Hector felt."
"1199 -- CXXXIV.

<"You sure?"> said Hector. <"Want, like, your own room in my castle or something? Or, like, a souvenir from Sair?">

"You're in Sair right now?"

<"Oh, uh, yeah.">

Gina had to stop and rethink what else she'd just heard. "Wait, did you just ask me to live with you?"

<"Uh... that's not... I mean, when you put it like that, it sounds creepy.">

She smirked. "How was it supposed to sound?"

<"I meant, y'know, as... a special guest... type... thing. VIP status or... whatever. And Roman could stay, too, of course. Or any of your family or... I didn't mean... I, um. Just... Nevermind.">

Gina laughed. Her nose started to run again, and she had to dab it with a tissue. "I appreciate the offer, but I'm all good here."

<"Alright, well, I definitely gotta go now,"> said Hector. <"Talk to you later. If you think of a way I can return any of these favors, then just, uh, let me know.">

"Hector, they weren't really favors. We're on the same team here. I've just been doing as Master Roman says, more or less."

<"Yeah, that, uh... that sounds like bullshit. I owe you big time. Oh! Ah!

Yeah, alright!"> A brief rustling noise intervened on Hector's end.
<"Talk to you later."> And he hung up.

Gina pulled the phone away from her ear and stared at it.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Four: 'O, unknown messenger...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Five times now, Hector had asked Garovel to explain this to him, but the reaper was intent on being mysterious with him again. They couldn't call, email, meet up with, or even know the whereabouts of Roman Fullister; but apparently, that didn't matter, because... of something, Garovel assured him. Something that Hahl Duxan had at its disposal.

That was as much as Hector had been able to get out of Garovel. He tried Jada Najir's reaper, Atalim, but Garovel intervened then, too, asking Atalim to help him "preserve the surprise."

Atalim agreed, naturally.

All these reapers were far too pleased with themselves, Hector felt."
"1200

The trip to Egas happened very quickly after his last meeting with the Sandlords. Hector was able to sleep the whole way there, but Garovel stirred him awake as they neared the seat of Hahl Duxan's power.

'They call it Sununeash,' said Garovel. 'In Mohssian, it's known as the Swallow's Nest.'

Still a little bleary-eyed, Hector hadn't even gotten a good look at Egas itself yet, but he was already seeing the buildings all around them fall away as a hulking structure came into view.

Another castle, Hector abruptly realized.

Instead of having one large outer wall, the Swallow's Nest had three--each one rising up and then sloping smoothly back down at different points, creating a waving, layered formation. Because of the design, the foremost wall had obvious gaps, but they were all covered by lookout installations built into the second and third walls.

Hector found himself gawking again, and he was reminded of all the other castles he'd visited in the past few weeks. Mostly, though, it made him think of Warrenhold, of its reconstruction. Maybe there was something to be learned from all these visits. He only wished he'd had more opportunity to examine each castle in greater detail.

As he passed through the front gates of Sununeash, he tried his damndest to take it all in. Four towers, by his count, all constructed from the same brown stone as the walls. Not as tall as the ones in Warrenhold but definitely broader. There was also no garden to speak of, but sparse foliage did exist in the form of gangly tall trees with big, bulky leaves. Covered walkways were abundant as well, and Hector was thankful for them as everyone exited their vehicles and stepped out into the punishing heat again."

"1201

The more he looked around, the more Hector noticed the defensive design choices present in the Swallow's Nest. Each walkway was flanked on both sides by enormous pits and burrows, all of which were manned by dozens of patrolmen. And since these walkways appeared to be the only means of approaching the towers, any invading forces from this entry point would doubtless have to expose themselves to an onslaught of attacks.

Then there were the towers themselves, on which he could see embrasures, where more defenders would be able to fire from. And inside, of course, the very first room they encountered was partially walled off, bearing even more embrasures. Even the staircase seemed to be--

Garovel's laugh pulled Hector out of his imaginings. 'Yeah, I thought you'd want to be awake for this.'

Hector couldn't help smirking a little. 'How'd you know?'

'I saw the look in your eyes at the Golden Fort and Dunehall. Even a little bit in Marshrock, once the fighting was done. And then what you said about needing money for Warrenhold? You've been developing a real thing for castles, haven't you?'

Hector just bobbed his head, unable to deny it.

'I guess you've always been a bit of a nerd about construction, haven't you?'

'Carpentry club is hardly the same thing as building a freaking castle,' said Hector.

'Yeah, whatever.'

'I mean, it's important, though, isn't it? A good castle can protect a lot of people, and seeing all these incredible places now... it makes me realize how amazing Warrenhold could be.'

'Yes,' said Garovel. 'With just a little love and five easy payments of ten million troas, it could be our dream home.'

'Agh. You really think it'll take THAT much money?'

'Maybe not, but it certainly won't be cheap. And our new friends aren't going to pay for all of it, no matter how much they like us.'

"1202

'You're probably right,' said Hector. 'And Asad's got his own wrecked castle to worry about now, too.'

'He sure does.'

A suddenly long pause intervened.

'I'd like to help him rebuild it, if I can.'

Garovel groaned. 'Of course you do.'

Hector laughed a little now, too. 'I'm just saying, like, someday.'

'Uh-huh.'

'He's an important ally now, right?'

'Yeah, he is.'

'And, I mean, Dunehall was just so... cool.'

‘Uh-huh,’ said Garovel.

‘What, am I wrong?’

‘Maybe you can trick Roman into footing the bill on that one.’

‘Somehow, I doubt that,’ said Hector. ‘Isn’t tricking rich people kind of his thing?’

‘I bet he wouldn’t see it coming from the likes of you, though.’

‘Yeah, let’s just... build everything on a foundation of tricks and lies. I’m sure that would go great.’

Hector could see that they were about to head underground, so he made sure to check his phone beforehand. Thankfully, Gina had come through with the pictures of Roman, though Hector still wasn’t quite sure how they would help.

At length, after an elevator ride down and a staircase going even deeper, Hector finally began seeing some familiar faces. He was almost surprised by all the space down here, but then he remembered that this place had its own path to the Undercrust. He wondered if it would look any different from the one in Warrenhold.

That was not their first destination, however. Instead, the Lord Duxan broke away from the rest of their party and guided Hector and Garovel through a pair of corridors and down another flight of steps. They arrived in a large bedchamber--so large, in fact, that Hector could imagine it belonging to the Lord Duxan himself.

Lord Hasan Duxan had not spoken to Hector directly at all thus far, and Hector was beginning to get the impression that the man simply did not speak Mohssian--or at the very least, not fluently.

Not that it mattered, of course. Between Garovel and Hasan’s own reaper, Emiross, there was no lack of translators."

"1203

Lord Hasan beckoned them deeper into the room until finally stopping in front of a tall cabinet. He opened it, revealing a mirror and nothing else.

Hector was still confused and waiting for answers from Garovel.

‘Have a closer look,’ was all Garovel said.

Hector did so. And indeed, he soon noticed something. The mirror. He could see himself in it, but there was a kind of fog behind the reflection. And maybe his eyes were playing tricks on him, but it looked like the fog was moving.

His reflection was strange, too. It mirrored his movements, but it did it too slowly, as if the image were on a delay.

‘The fuck?’ thought Hector.

‘Creeped out yet?’ asked Garovel.

‘A little. What is this thing?’ Yeah, that fog was definitely moving, Hector decided. He backed away from the mirror again and saw that Lord Hasan had pulled up a chair in order to sit in front of the thing. The man was also holding a candle in one hand and a book in the other.

Lord Hasan said something in Valgan.

‘He said you can sit wherever you like while we wait,’ said Emiross.

‘Wait for what?’ asked Hector.

‘Patience, dear boy,’ said Garovel with the echo of privacy. Then he turned to Emiross and said publicly, ‘Pen and paper?’

‘On the table by the window,’ Emiross said.

Garovel nodded and floated over to it. Hector followed suit and sat down there, still awaiting instruction. The window next to him didn’t lead outside, instead offering a pleasant view of an underground courtyard. Hector spotted a few Rainlords conversing by the central fountain. Blackburns, he was pretty sure.

‘Okay, Hector,’ said Garovel privately, ‘now you need to write a letter to Roman.’

Hector blinked. ‘A letter? Like a snail-mail letter?’

‘Yep.’

‘...Why?’

‘Heh. I mean, obviously, I could tell you, but what would be the fun in that?’

‘Ugh...’”

"1204

Hector set to work on the letter. Garovel was kind enough to help with that much, at least. Hector didn't think he could've explained their current circumstances with the Rainlords without Garovel's input. Additionally, the letter included two locations in the Undercrust where Roman would be able to meet up with them.

Hector had even more questions now, but he figured he should just save them until Garovel stopped being a secretive asshole.

He finished writing with ample time to spare, apparently. He tried to just relax and enjoy the peace and quiet while he could. He considered meditating, but now probably wasn't the time for that, he figured.

Then he saw it.

A man appeared. Or the figure of one, at least. From thin air, it simply faded into existence, standing directly in front of Lord Hasan.

Hector just stared.

No flesh of any kind was visible. A dark gray cloak covered most of the figure's body, save only the head and hands, which were instead concealed by sandy brown bandages--including even the eyes, nose, and mouth.

‘...Is that a fucking mummy?’ said Hector.

‘Yep,’ said Garovel.

‘But--? Why is it--? I mean, what does it--?’ An appropriate question evaded him.

Lord Hasan stood and looked at Hector.

Hector took that as his cue and walked over with the letter in hand.

Then he realized he wasn't sure who to give it to, but when Lord Hasan held out his hand to receive it, that was good enough for Hector.

The Sandlord took the letter, then promptly handed it off to the mummy.

'Roman Fullister,' said Garovel publicly.

"Roman Fullister," Hasan repeated, though more slowly and in his thick accent. And then again, "Roman... Fullister."

'Now the pictures,' said Garovel."

"1205

'Oh.' Hector whipped out his phone and found the photos that Gina had sent him. He tried to show one of them to the mummy's bandaged face, but it didn't provoke any kind of response.

Lord Hasan took the phone from Hector and showed it to the mummy himself.

The mummy grabbed the phone.

Lord Hasan seemed surprised but didn't say anything.

Then the mummy pulled up the hood of its cloak, shuffled back a step, and bowed before the Lord Duxan. And without uttering a single word, it disappeared again, vanishing into thin air as quietly as it had arrived.

Hector looked to Hasan, who just kind of scratched his beard, avoided eye contact, and then walked away with his reaper.

'...He stole my phone,' said Hector.

Garovel hesitated. 'Gonna be honest with you. I didn't see that coming. I hope you weren't attached to it.'

'What?' said Hector. 'What do you mean you didn't see it coming? Haven't you done this before?'

'Sure, but that was before phones could store pictures in them.'

Hector didn't quite know how to put his disbelief into words.

'I guess this makes sense, though,' said Garovel. 'Normally, you give them pictures, and then they just take those pictures with them. I guess we should've printed them out first.' A beat passed. 'Whoops.'

'Garovel, are you fucking kidding me, right now?'

'Look, I'm sorry, alright? It's just a phone. You can always get a new one. You were wanting a new service provider anyway, weren't you?'

Hector sighed as they started heading for the door. 'Okay, whatever, I need a new phone now. No big deal. But what happens if my old phone's battery dies, and then the mummy guy can't see the pictures we gave him?'

The reaper hesitated again.

'Garovel, are you shitting me?!'

"1206

'Eh, don't worry too much,' said Garovel. 'It'll be fine.'

'Are you sure?!'

'Yeahhh,' said Garovel unconvincingly.

Hector just gave him a look.

'Alright, just relax,' said Garovel. 'These "mummy guys," as you call them, were doing this sort of thing for a VERY long time before pictures were ever a factor. They are insanely reliable. Trust me.'

Hector didn't see how he had much choice otherwise. 'Okay, so what if Roman gets the message but is too busy to meet up with us? Or just decides not to? I mean, the Rainlords ARE fugitives from the Vanguard.'

'Ugh, I hope that doesn't happen. Because then it would be up to me to guide us back to Warrenhold.'

'But you don't know the route.'

‘I know it’s near a place called Capaporo. Given time, I’m sure I could suss out the right path.’

‘Given time, huh?’

‘Don’t look at me like that. I’m trying my best here. If you’ve got a better plan, I’d love to hear it.’

‘Not saying I do. But I might be able to help you more if you didn’t keep shit from me for no reason.’

‘Oh, come on, that was a great surprise.’

‘Are you even gonna tell me who or what that mummy guy was, exactly?’

‘Well, the truth is, even with my incredible powers of exposition, that is not an easy task.’

‘Uh-huh.’

‘They’re a rather mysterious bunch, those couriers. There’s not a whole lot that’s actually known about them. For instance, no one even knows WHY they do what they do. We just know that they’ve BEEN doing it for thousands of years now. And that they’re really good at it. Though, maybe a bit slow by today’s standards.’

‘Huh. Well, what DO you know about them, then?’”

"1207

‘We know, more or less, HOW they operate,’ said Garovel, ‘but the specifics are still pretty unclear. Their movements are especially confusing. You saw how that one just “appeared” out of nowhere, right?’

‘Yeah.’

‘They can all do that. They can just show up wherever they want, seemingly.’

‘Sounds like Ibai’s power.’

Garovel paused at that. ‘You’re right. I hadn’t put that together.

Aberrations are still a relatively recent development in the world. I wonder if that's just a coincidence, or if there's some underlying reason behind it.'

'You think aberrations and the mummy guys are related somehow?'

'Alright, well, before anything else, I should probably mention that they're not actually called "mummy guys."'

'I find that hard to believe,' said Hector.

'In Valgan, they're generally called "zalabaram." In Mohssian, they're called dark walkers. Or dark messengers.'

'Or mummy guys.'

'Yes, Hector. Or mummy guys. Might be easiest to just call them Couriers, though. But capitalized. Because capitalizing things means they're special.'

'So I should capitalize Mummy Guys, in other words.'

'You're not gonna stop calling them that, are you?'

'Why would I?'

'Because you're supposed to be an Atreyan lord now, and calling a group of ancient and mysterious beings "Mummy Guys" makes you sound about as dignified as an eight-year-old playing in the mud?'

'...That's a really good point.'

'I know.'

Hector wanted to say "Mummy Guys" again, and could see Garovel waiting for it, too, but he resisted, choosing to go for another question instead. 'Do they ever talk?'

'No,' said Garovel. 'As far as I'm aware, none of them have ever spoken.'

'...Little creepy.'

'Maybe. But they've never been hostile. Not to anyone.'

'Or maybe everyone who ever noticed their hostilities is dead.'

‘Or that highly unlikely thing you said, yes.’”

"1208

Hector had another question already queued up in his head. ‘What’s the deal with the foggy mirror?’

‘Ah, that’s how they choose who they work for,’ said Garovel. ‘I’m sure you noticed how the Courier only responded to Lord Duxan. When a Courier chooses to work for you, they just show up out of nowhere and give you one of those mirrors.’

‘Hmm. Weird. How do they choose people, then?’

‘Dunno. That’s what I meant by not knowing why they do what they do. They can apparently choose anyone, and their reasons for doing so are never made clear. It’s all very odd, but they do seem to gravitate toward people with power and influence.’

‘Hmm.’

‘Hell, one of ‘em could show up at Warrenhold and give you a mirror, someday. You’ve been getting pretty famous, lately.’

‘Does, uh... does that mean they work for Abolish, too?’

‘Yep. They don’t have any set allegiances that I know of. Oh, and they can decide to take their mirror back at any time and stop helping you.’

‘...This sounds like some conspiracy-type shit. Controlling the flow of information or whatever.’

‘You’re not the first to have that thought.’

‘You trust them?’

‘For the most part. They have a very solid track record when it comes to keeping sensitive information secret.’

Hector supposed he’d have to take Garovel’s word on that.

They’d been walking for a while now, with Garovel leading the way, but only now was Hector finally starting to see some Rainlords again. This place was a bit of a maze, but with the way Garovel navigated it, Hector wondered if the reaper had been here before. It wouldn't be too surprising, he figured.

But before any of that, he still had more questions about the Couriers. 'Where do they come from? They're mummies, right? So they used to be human?'"

"1209

'Yeah, that's the theory,' said Garovel. 'Mummification used to be pretty common. These days, people seem to think it was only royalty and the super rich who were mummified, but that's not quite true. Anyone who worked under those people could also be mummified--sometimes, even while they were still alive.'

Hector's brow lowered. 'What? Why?'

'Because tradition, that's why. For example, if your job was washing the king's feet, and then your king went and died before you did, some cultures believed that you should be entombed with him.'

'That's... so fucked up.'

'Such were the ancient customs and religions of the world.'

Hector still had more questions about Couriers, but they got shoved out of his mind when he saw Asad and Qorvass approaching.

"You're awake!" said Hector.

'Good to see you both,' added Garovel.

Asad looked pretty sore, judging from how stiff his movements were, but he offered Hector a handshake as soon as he was close. "When I heard about what you did for everyone, I had to come thank you."

A bit confused, Hector took the handshake. "What I did?"

Asad tilted his head at him. "Zeff told me all about it. You lured the Salesman away from Dunehall and saved all our lives."

Hector blinked. Zeff had been conscious through all that?

Really, though, that whole affair felt so surreal now, like a dream he'd had, rather than anything he'd actually lived through. A dream. Or nightmare, maybe.

Hector wasn't sure what to say. You're welcome? No, that was stupid. Shit, this was getting embarrassing very quickly.

Garovel helped him out. 'You're welcome.'

Hector gave the reaper a look, but Asad and Qorvass both laughed.

Dammit.

'Zeff also brought us up to speed on the current plan,' said Qorvass. 'We were wondering if there was some way we could help.'

'You're asking me?' said Garovel.

'It is your plan, is it not?' said Qorvass."
"1210

Garovel relinquished a nod. 'I suppose it is. And now that you mention it, I was hoping to ask you for a favor. Would you mind going to Warrenhold ahead of us? Aboveground, I mean.'

'We could do that,' said Qorvass, 'but would it not be more prudent to stick together?'

'Perhaps, but it would also be very helpful to have someone who can open the entrance for us when we get there. The door is rather strong, and trying to break it down might prove problematic.'

'Curious,' said Qorvass.

'I understand,' said Asad. "I will send my children to do this task for you. I fear I may be needed in the Undercrust. One never knows what one will encounter down there."

'True enough,' said Garovel. 'How many children do you have, by the way?'

"Only two," said Asad. Then he turned around to talk to his daughter, who'd been standing behind him the whole time. "Were you listening?"

“Yes, abbi,” said Jada.

He placed a hand on her shoulder. “Go to Kuros and fetch your brother. Then take him to Warrenhold and wait for me.” He turned to Garovel and Hector again. “Can you give her directions?”

‘Of course,’ said Garovel.

Jada interrupted, saying something in Valgan, to which Asad responded, also in Valgan.

Hector glanced at Garovel.

‘She’s asking about her mother,’ said Garovel privately. ‘Wants to know if she should bring her to Warrenhold, too. Asad says no. Jada says taking her brother will upset her mother. Asad says they’ll discuss it later.’

‘Apologies,’ said Qorvass to Hector and Garovel. ‘Please have no doubt that we will see this task completed.’

‘Your diligence is appreciated,’ said Garovel. ‘But before you send anyone to Warrenhold, there’s something I should mention. It concerns mental health.’”

"1211 -- CXXXV.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Five: ‘Thy temperate descent...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector felt like some kind of robot in this thing. And not a cool robot, either. A robot that could barely move or function at all, was his impression.

‘Agh, this shit is so heavy,’ he thought.

‘That’s because you’re basically wearing a refrigerator on your back,’ said Garovel.

Sounded about right. ‘How are the non-servants supposed to move around in these suits?’ Hector asked.

‘They’re not,’ the reaper said. ‘Their suits are much newer and lighter. But the Sandlords don’t have enough for everyone. So you get the old and shitty one.’

‘Great.’

‘Heh. Be thankful you get a suit at all. At least you’ll get to see the Undercrust this way.’

Hector tried to stand up, but the bulky suit resisted too much, and he just kind of settled awkwardly back down. He eyed Garovel through the visor in his helmet.

‘Just think of it as training. Like you’re wearing heavy armor. And building muscle mass.’

‘Does muscle mass even matter for servants?’

‘Kinda. If you arm wrestled Dimas, for instance, and you both were using your super human strength, he’d probably still beat you, ‘cuz he has more natural muscle mass.’

‘Huh...’ A weird example, sure, but Hector hadn’t thought about it that way before. He’d been under the impression that doing push ups and stuff like that was a complete waste of time, but he supposed now that it wasn’t. He’d have to remember that whenever he found time to train again.

He looked over to the other side of the room and saw the huge containers being carted in. Climate-controlled pods, Hector knew. Garovel had told him about them earlier. With so many non-servants needing to make the trip through the Undercrust, some would have to do so in medically-induced comas, packed together in cooling chambers like sardines."

"1211 -- CXXXV.

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Five: ‘Thy temperate descent...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector felt like some kind of robot in this thing. And not a cool robot, either. A robot that could barely move or function at all, was his impression.

‘Agh, this shit is so heavy,’ he thought.

‘That’s because you’re basically wearing a refrigerator on your back,’ said Garovel.

Sounded about right. ‘How are the non-servants supposed to move around in these suits?’ Hector asked.

‘They’re not,’ the reaper said. ‘Their suits are much newer and lighter. But the Sandlords don’t have enough for everyone. So you get the old and shitty one.’

‘Great.’

‘Heh. Be thankful you get a suit at all. At least you’ll get to see the Undercrust this way.’

Hector tried to stand up, but the bulky suit resisted too much, and he just kind of settled awkwardly back down. He eyed Garovel through the visor in his helmet.

‘Just think of it as training. Like you’re wearing heavy armor. And building muscle mass.’

‘Does muscle mass even matter for servants?’

‘Kinda. If you arm wrestled Dimas, for instance, and you both were using your super human strength, he’d probably still beat you, ‘cuz he has more natural muscle mass.’

‘Huh...’ A weird example, sure, but Hector hadn’t thought about it that way before. He’d been under the impression that doing push ups and stuff like that was a complete waste of time, but he supposed now that it wasn’t. He’d have to remember that whenever he found time to train again.

He looked over to the other side of the room and saw the huge containers being carted in. Climate-controlled pods, Hector knew. Garovel had told him about them earlier. With so many non-servants needing to make the trip through the Undercrust, some would have to do so in medically-induced comas, packed together in cooling chambers like sardines."

Simply getting everyone down into the Undercrust was going to take a while, Hector had learned. The passage was identical to the one in Warrenhold--the only difference being that the Sandlords had built a working elevator for theirs.

A simple enough idea, certainly, but Garovel made it quite clear what an impressive technological feat it was. The sheer distance the elevator needed to travel was problematic enough, but the added complexities of tectonic movement and regular maintenance meant that Hector shouldn't get too eager to build one at Warrenhold.

Even with the elevator, however, several days would be needed for all the Rainlords to make the trip. The hole was simply not wide enough for more than a handful of people to go down at once.

As Hector understood it, the elevator had been carrying people down practically nonstop since the Rainlords arrived at the Swallow's Nest. And being that Hector and Garovel hadn't gotten here until a few days afterward, much of their traveling party was already waiting for them down there.

Hector boarded the elevator as soon as it returned, sharing it with the Najirs. It wasn't exactly spacious, especially in this refrigerator suit, but at least there was a place to sit. And light.

A kind of grinding hum filled Hector's ears as the elevator shifted and began moving. The noise was a bit faint, though probably muffled by his suit, he figured.

This trip down was going to take six hours, according to Qorvass. And apparently, that was considered quick.

Hector was surprised to see that Jada wasn't wearing a suit like he was. Asad and Imas, sure, but Jada, too? He wondered how old she was as a servant.

Well, if nothing else, at least he'd have plenty of time to pester Garovel with questions. He tried to remember all the different ones he'd been meaning to ask."

"1213

‘So how old do I need to be in order to not need this suit?’ Hector asked. ‘As a servant, I mean.’

‘Bare minimum?’ said Garovel. ‘Eight years. Your passive soul defense would be strong enough to protect you from all the heat, though you’d still be sweating like a dog. Which doesn’t make sense, because dogs don’t sweat. They primarily use their tongues in order to cool off. Point is, though, you’d still be uncomfortable, even at eight years old.’

‘Thank you for shoehorning that extra bit of trivia in there.’

‘Well, if you’re not laughing, you’re learning. Win-win, right?’

‘Yeah, but I was already--whatever. Is there anything else I should know about the Undercrust before we get down there?’

‘Oh-ho yeah,’ said Garovel, all but laughing.

Hector waited. ‘...Well?’

‘Eh.’

‘Garovel, don’t be an asshole!’

‘Alright, alright. I was about to bring this up anyway. Ever heard of something called a feldeath?’

‘A what?’

‘Feldeath. As in, a death that’s... fel.’

‘What are you even saying, right now?’

‘You would’ve heard of it in myths and legends, if at all.’

‘Doesn’t ring a bell,’ said Hector.

‘Mm. Well, there’s a moderate chance that we’ll run into one, so I should probably warn you so that you don’t shit your pants.’

‘...Why would I do that?’

‘Because they’re some of the most dangerous and terrifying beings in existence.’

‘Oh, is that all?’

‘Bit of background is probably needed here,’ said Garovel. ‘So you know how, after a normal person dies, their soul is removed from their body and begins to degrade over time?’

‘Uh, yeah? I think. I remember you saying something about the soul becoming a prison of agony within a couple days.’”

"1214

‘Ah, good memory,’ said Garovel. ‘Technically, I said “raw agony,” but that’s neither here nor there. The point I’m getting at is that souls have power. As you’ve seen. Many times now. And over the course of human history, an absolutely RIDICULOUS amount of people have died. Each one leaving a soul behind, a little packet of power. And even with all the reapers in the world--try as we might--sometimes, we miss them.’

‘I think I see where this is going...’

‘Mmhmm. Now, if we miss a few souls here and there, nothing happens. It’s very sad and unfortunate, of course, because those souls are left to suffer constantly until one of us finally stumbles onto them, but beyond that, there aren’t any “real world” consequences, as it were.’

‘But?’

‘But, let’s say... an entire town gets wiped out. And let’s also say that no reaper finds them for, maybe, a decade or two. Or a century, even. All those souls just sit there. All that power. Think for a second about the potential there. A reaper and a servant together, only TWO souls--but given long enough to synchronize? Those two can become virtually unstoppable.’

‘Oh...’

‘Over time, even without a reaper to bind them, all those souls together will coalesce. It’ll become like a melting pot, cooking by the heat of that same “raw agony” that I mentioned before. Their shared suffering gradually fuses them together. And that is how a feldeath is born.’

‘Shit...’

‘Now, a whole town being obliterated and then completely forgotten, even by reapers? Historically, that is a rare occurrence. At least, on the surface world, it is. There’ve only ever been a handful of feldeaths on the surface, which is why they’re regarded as largely mythical up there. But in the Undercrust... not so much.’

‘Why’s that?’

"1215

‘In the past, there were a lot of isolated places in the Undercrust. Communication and traveling were so difficult that people just didn’t do them. In fact, I’m sure that’s still the case, to a large extent. Advancing technologies make it easier and easier, but still. We’re talking about solid rock that is so thick, a man could spend his entire life trying to tunnel through to the other side and still die of old age before he gets there. And what happens when there’s a cave-in? Which is a frequent occurrence, by the way.’

‘So you’re saying the Undercrust is a breeding ground for these feldeath things?’

‘Sadly, yes. By now, I imagine there must be tens of thousands of them down there.’

‘How... uh... how dangerous are they, exactly?’

‘Depends on how many souls they were born from and how old they are,’ said Garovel. ‘But, broadly speaking, if you happen to see one, and your name’s not Sermung, you should probably just run.’

‘Seriously? They’re that strong?’

‘Potentially, yeah. And since there’s no real way to gauge their strength until you’re neck-deep into a fight with one, running is the preferred solution. But there is some good news.’

‘Really? Are some of them friendly?’

Garovel laughed. And then kept laughing. ‘Ah... no.’

‘Fuck.’

'The good news is that they're only REALLY dangerous if you piss them off.'

'What does that mean?'

'It means don't piss them off.'

'Yeah, I got that. I meant, more like... how do I avoid pissing them off?'

'Well, don't attack them.'

'Wasn't really planning on it.'

'Also, don't be named Hector. They hate that.'

'Garovel.'

'No, they like Garovels just fine.'

'Please stop.'

'Ask me a good question, and maybe I will.'

'Agh. Alright. So... as long as we don't attack these feldeath things first, they'll leave us alone?'

'No no no. If they sense us, they'll try to kill the shit out of us. But they'll only half-ass it, is the thing.'

'You've lost me.'"

"1216

'The thing about feldeaths is that, as long as you don't antagonize them, they'll only take a swat at you. Like how a dog snaps at flies buzzing around its head. That's pretty much how feldeaths see us, I'd wager. Annoying bugs.'

'Hmm.'

'They're actually kind of animalistic, in many ways. Even though they're arguably the deadliest creatures in the world, they're not necessarily a big threat to humanity.'

'They aren't? But couldn't they just waltz into a city and kill everyone?'

‘They could, and that’s what everyone worries about, but historically speaking, that’s an exceptionally rare occurrence.’

‘It is? Why?’

‘Well, for one thing, they tend not to wander around very much. They just kinda hang out in their own territory. And annihilate anyone that gets close.’

‘Huh...’

‘Unfortunately, their territories can be pretty enormous. These days, though, Sai-hee famously devotes a lot of resources to keeping track of feldeath movements and protecting cities from them. The Vanguard helps out quite a bit, too--oftentimes, Sermung himself, as I understand it.’

Hector couldn’t even imagine what a fight between a feldeath and an emperor-level servant would look like. ‘Geez...’

‘Anyway, the takeaway from all this, is that you don’t want to attack a feldeath, even if you’re doing it defensively. Because that’ll make it mad at you, and if it gets mad at you, it’ll chase you. And you never wanna be chased by a feldeath. Ever.’

‘Are they super fast or something?’

‘Yes. But also, they don’t give up. They’ll chase you to the other side of the planet, if they have to.’

‘Hmm.’ Hector paused, thinking. ‘That’s weird.’

‘What is?’ said Garovel.

‘Well, uh... I mean, if you get far enough away, shouldn’t they give up? Like, once you’re out of their... sensing range... or whatever? They wouldn’t know where you are anymore, right? So how could they keep chasing you if they don’t know where to go?’

"1217

‘I think the problem with that is their “sensing range,” as you put it,’ said Garovel. ‘Once they memorize your soul, they’ll be able to track you no matter where you go.'

Hector paused again. 'No, that doesn't make sense.'

Garovel gave him a look. 'What do you mean?'

'Well, earlier, you said that if they sense us, they'll try to kill us. So if their sensing range is like half the planet, then they should always be sensing tons of people.'

'No, when I said that, I meant "sensing us within their territory." I'm sure their ability to sense souls goes beyond just their chosen territory. The fact that they usually keep away from cities is pretty strong evidence.'

'If that's what you meant, then that's what you should've said. How am I supposed to understand all these explanations that you love so much if you don't say what you mean?'

'Alright, Captain Pedantry, calm down. I apologize.'

'Apology not accepted.'

'Wow, Hector.'

Hector could feel the vigor wearing off. He'd needed it just to get inside the elevator. He was beginning to notice, however, that whenever the vigor wore off, it didn't leave him feeling quite so exhausted as it used to. Perhaps his body was finally getting accustomed to it. Frankly, he thought it never would.

A different question popped into his head. 'So, uh... are there any other terrible hellbeasts of the Undercrust that I should know about?'

'Oh, definitely. A couple are even comparable to feldeaths, actually.'

'Are you serious? Like what?'

'Golems, for one. Rock beasts.'

'The fuck is a rock beast?'

'Exactly what it sounds like. A big ass monster made of solid rock.'

'Like a bunch of rocks held together by a soul?'

'No, they don't have souls.' Garovel paused for a pensive expression.

‘Or at least, not really.’”

"1218

‘Then, how the--?’ Hector needed a second to locate the question he wanted. ‘What? How are they alive, then?’

‘They’ve got something that functions like a soul, at least for them. We call it “ardor.” Or “the planet force.” Because that’s where it comes from. It’s like a normal human soul, except MUCH more powerful.’

Hector’s eyes widened as he let his imagination run with these ideas. ‘...I feel like you should’ve told me all this a long time ago.’

‘Eh. What would’ve been the point?’

‘I... well, I mean...’ He couldn’t find the words.

‘Anyway, golems are very strong. They’re pretty docile, though, so we generally don’t need to worry about them. In fact, occasionally, they’ve been known to protect humans.’

‘For real?’

‘Yep. But you know what we DO need to worry about? Worms.’

Hector cocked an eyebrow inside his suit. ‘Worms?’

‘Ugh. Worms are the worst. They have ardor, too, and they are definitely NOT friendly.’

‘...Worms, though? How can a worm be dangerous?’

‘Oh, you innocent child. Worms on the surface are harmless. The worst you’ve got are parasitic ones--which, admittedly, are not fun. But in the Undercrust... oh... Thankfully, the really big ones are rare.’

Hector was almost afraid to ask. ‘How big are we talking, here?’

Garovel paused, perhaps thinking it over. ‘What’s the biggest animal you know of?’

‘Uh... elephant?’

‘Bigger than that.’

‘No, wait, uh. Blue whale.’

‘Bigger than that. Well, longer, anyway. Maybe not heavier. Yeah, a blue whale is a decent comparison. They’re similar sizes.’

‘How is that possible?’ said Hector. ‘I mean, what do they eat?’

‘Everything.’

‘Agh...’

‘Including people and reapers.’

‘AGH.’

‘Oh, and it gets better. Some can generate electrical currents so strong that they can barf lightning at you. Or acid. Or lightning AND acid--which can combust. And their bodies are all squishy and slimy and tough as hell, due to the ardor.’”

"1219

‘Okay, so then... between these worms and feldeaths, which is worse?’

‘Worms, no question,’ said Garovel. ‘Like I said, unless you piss them off, feldeaths will just take a swipe at you as you pass. Dangerous, sure, but you can just run. Worms, though--those motherfuckers will chase you. And they’re not slow. They’ve been known to steamroll through entire cities, just eating everything.’

‘Hmm. But in terms of, like, power level or whatever--aren’t feldeaths stronger than worms?’

‘Not necessarily. The strongest worms could fight a feldeath no problem. But they’re incredibly rare--or at least, they were. I suppose they could be extinct by now, but I kinda doubt it.’

‘Huh...’

‘Y’know, killing worms was how Sermung got really famous,’ said Garovel. ‘Originally, that is.’

Hector blinked.

‘You see, the previous leader of the Vanguard was killed by a worm-- arguably the most dangerous one that has ever lived. I remember, they called it Nla Erujeje. “The Great Terror.” By this point, Sermung had already made a name for himself as a worm slayer, but in those days, there were many such warriors. And besides, this was something else. This was another level. The beast that had killed the most powerful servant in the world? Everyone in the Undercrust lived in fear of that thing. Renowned warrior after renowned warrior fell to it, and the beast only grew stronger each time.’

‘Wow... you mean, it could, like, absorb their powers or something?’

‘More or less, yeah. That’s what makes worms really dangerous. The big ones, anyway. The slime covering their bodies is like a nasty glue that slowly digests anything that gets stuck in it, allowing the worm to absorb whatever it touches into its body.’

‘That... sounds horrible.’

‘It is.’”

"1220

‘And Sermung killed the strongest one ever?’ Hector asked.

‘That, he did.’ A beat passed, and then Garovel added, ‘Arguably the strongest one ever, that is.’

Hector hesitated with his next question. ‘Is there... like, a similarly strong one that’s still alive?’

‘Not as far as I know,’ said Garovel.

That didn’t sound as conclusive as Hector would’ve liked.

‘If one like that did exist, I have to imagine that either Abolish or the Vanguard would’ve launched a campaign to kill it. But you never know.’

‘Wait, Abolish fights them, too?’

‘Oh yeah. Morgunov and Dozer have both been known to hunt worms.’

‘Why would they bother? Aren’t worms basically doing their job for them?’

‘I can’t pretend to fully understand their motivations, either,’ Garovel admitted. ‘But it’s not so unthinkable that Abolish would want to protect its own interests. Worms don’t exactly pick sides, and you can’t fight a war very well when a giant slime monster is flattening your fortresses and devouring your resources.’

‘I guess that makes sense.’

‘Plus, I bet they want to study them. As far as mad scientists go, Morgunov is right up there at the top. Or so I’ve heard.’

Hector gave a grim frown. ‘You’re just full of comforting thoughts, today.’

‘Also, some worms leave trails of toxic sludge behind, rendering places completely uninhabitable for decades.’

‘Ugh...’

‘Alright, fine, you want comfort? I saw a golem kick the shit out of a worm, once. It was awesome.’

‘Really? You saw it happen? And you’re not lying to me like an asshole?’

‘Yes, really. The golem was protecting a little village. And that same little village went on to become a big center for tourism. The people there took the dried husk of the worm and turned it into a monument. The golem stuck around, too, and kept on protecting everyone there.’

‘That’s amazing.’

‘See? I can offer comfort.’

‘I appreciate it.’”

"1221

Abruptly, Hector realized he was sweating. The increase in temperature had been gradual enough that it snuck up on him, and he was suddenly reminded of why he was wearing this cumbersome suit.

‘Should I turn this thing on?’ Hector asked.

‘Yeah, go ahead,’ said Garovel.

Hector flipped the series of switches on his chest and then hit the button in the center. The cooling unit on his back roared to life, loud enough that Hector nearly jumped, and after a few moments it settled into an only slightly quieter hum, like a wild dog growling endlessly behind him.

It worked, though. Boy, did it work. It felt like he’d been dunked in ice water. Quite the relief, at first, but soon, he decided to turn the knob on his stomach a couple times. The temperature in the suit gradually balanced to a comfortable level.

When the elevator finally began to slow down, Garovel invoked the vigor so that Hector could actually stand up again.

The elevator eased to a crawl, then jostled into a dead stop. The half-circular doors slid open, and Hector saw a crowd of earlier arrivals. Hector and the others exited and joined the mass of waiting Rainlords.

His suit garnered its fair share of attention. He could tell that the noise was disrupting a few conversations, so he tried to put some distance between himself and everyone else.

Garovel followed, of course. ‘This feels familiar,’ the reaper said privately, though with a hint of laughter.

‘What do you mean?,’ said Hector.

‘You all on your own while the other kids are having fun.’

Hector found a conspicuously bench-shaped rock and clunkily sat down.

‘Sorry,’ the reaper said. ‘If I’d realized this would happen, I might not’ve agreed to have you wear this thing.’

‘I think I’ll be fine, Garovel.’”

"1222

‘Oh, is that so? Well, look at you, Mr. Well-Adjusted.’

Hector snorted a quiet laugh. 'Shut up.'

'I liked you better when you could barely even speak to people.'

Hector shook his head. 'What?'

'You heard me. In fact, you should try to channel that old part of yourself, from time to time--so that you don't forget how to do it, I mean.'

'What are you even saying, right now? I honestly have no idea.'

'Hector, listen to me. That old shyness of yours could come in very handy, one day.'

Hector just blinked, incredulous. He wasn't sure if he'd ever heard anything so stupid in his entire life.

'Don't look at me like that. Hector, that meek persona could be used to trick people.'

'What?' he said again.

'You could use it strategically,' said Garovel. 'Think about it. You could intentionally give certain people the wrong impression. Make them think that you don't know what you're doing, that you're incompetent, that you're not a threat. Make them underestimate you, in other words.'

'...Y'know, usually, I can tell when you're joking. But now, I'm just confused.'

'Hector, don't you see? If you could but learn to harness the power of shyness within you, then you and I could rule this gullible world.'

'Okay, Garovel. Please shut the fuck up now.'

The reaper laughed. 'I'm only half-joking. A part of me is convinced that it would work. If you hone your acting skills, that is.'

'Excuse me? It's not an act that I can just do! I was never acting!'

'I'm not saying you ever were. But you could take that experience and turn it into an act, is the idea. And then we could use it to trick people.'

A part of Hector wanted to get genuinely upset at Garovel. It was still a sore spot for him, to be sure, but he knew the reaper didn't mean anything ill by it. So instead, Hector merely sighed. 'I don't want to trick people, Garovel.'

'Excuse ME?' the reaper said. 'You don't want to trick people? YOU? The guy who tricked the Salesman of Death into sparing hundreds of Rainlords?'

Hector opened his mouth to argue, only to realize that he couldn't.

'Oh, I get it,' said Garovel. 'You're trying to trick ME now. Well, it won't work! I'm too smart!'

'That's not--I don't--' Hector didn't have the words and just ended up laughing.

'Don't play games with me, young man.'

'I'm not, uh--I mean, ah... aha... I don't know what to tell you...'

'Uh-huh.'

An awkward silence arrived.

Hector wasn't sure how to articulate what he wanted to say. He'd already told Garovel that the whole deal with the Salesman had felt like some kind of crazy fever dream, but he didn't know what else to say beyond that. And Garovel was as much in the dark about it as he was, apparently.

The prolonged quiet brought Hector's mind back to Rasalased, to what the ancient Sandlord had done to him. "Tempered" his soul. Whatever that meant. It had to have been connected to what happened with the Salesman. Didn't it?

'Hey, are you meditating?' said Garovel.

'Uh... well, I was thinking about it.'

'Alright, then I'm gonna go talk to Qorvass. Let me know if you make any progress.'

Hector gave a nod and watched the reaper float away. He certainly envied Garovel's ability to make friends so quickly. The reaper made it seem so easy, like it was the most natural thing in the world. Then again, perhaps it was."

"1224

--Donation Bonus Day (page 1 of 4)--

Still, Garovel did seem a little too good at it, sometimes. It had not escaped Hector's attention how many of their "alliances" were the result of Garovel's plans or old connections. It was enough to make Hector wonder if Garovel had some kind of greater motive that he hadn't told him about yet.

Just one more thing to ask about, Hector figured.

He tried to focus.

The truth was, a part of him had been dreading this, dreading what the result of Rasalased's "tempering" might actually be. After the first few failed attempts at trying to use his ability, Hector had, perhaps, not been allowing himself as much time as he should've in order to continue trying. It was hard not worrying that his ability was gone for good, that his iron would not be returning--and the longer that thought remained there, the more disheartening it became.

But there was nothing for it now. He didn't have an excuse to put it off, at the moment. No civilians in need of help or meetings to attend. Not down here.

So he steadied his breathing and searched his mind for that familiar feeling, the indescribable sensation that he'd always felt when summoning his iron. It was so strange. He'd never really been conscious of that feeling until now, when it was present but his metal was not.

It was so uncomfortable, so hollow. Another reason why he'd grown reluctant of these attempts. He didn't like this emptiness.

But he had to ignore these feelings, he knew. He had to push onward. His power was there. It had to be.

Maybe he was going about this the wrong way. Maybe concentrating harder wasn't the answer. Maybe he needed to meditate more deeply.

Like how he'd done when he'd first met Rasalased. That time had certainly felt different, somehow.

Worth a shot, he supposed."

"1225

--Donation Bonus Day (page 2 of 4)--

Hector cleared his mind again. No more thoughts. No more worries. No people, no abilities, not even himself. And then he recalled it: that sense of immeasurable enormity that he'd felt just before meeting the Dry God. Like floating through an infinite space and being slowly consumed by one's own sense of triviality and smallness.

Then, through the eternal dark, there came a great ring. A shaking. A light. All at once, all connected.

It was enough to startle Hector out his meditation entirely, and he looked over at the crowd of Rainlords. And the few Sandlords. It was Asad Najir who Hector found himself focusing on. The epicenter of that ringing light--Hector had a sense that Asad was standing right where it would have been, if it were real.

Or, had it been?

And at once, Hector understood. It was the Shards. Hector had sensed their presence--their exact location, even. Hector had returned them to Asad after the battle at Dunehall, and now Asad was carrying them--in the inner pocket of the large bag over his shoulder, to be precise.

Hector just... knew they were there. As if he'd placed them there himself, as if he could see them right now through the bag's rigid cloth.

As he realized all of these things in rapid succession, Hector could only stare. After a fashion, he blinked a few times and tried to think. He wasn't sure what to do with this knowledge, but it was a bit unsettling. So he could locate the Shards of the Dry God. Was there some reason for this? Moreover, was there some use for it?

Didn't seem like it.

Wait a minute. He felt something on his left hand. Inside the suit, he felt something. A familiar kind of... dust. Or powder."

--Donation Bonus Day (page 3 of 4)--

He blinked another time. With his hands covered by the suit, he couldn't look at them directly, but hope swelled in his chest as he imagined what it was. He concentrated, and sure enough, he was able to make the powdery feeling vanish, then reappear, then vanish again.

True, he'd been able to make powder already, but only when concentrating hard. This time, he hadn't even been thinking about it. Maybe this was progress? It was enough to give him hope, anyway.

There was no point in stopping here, he decided. He pushed harder. He wanted a metal lump in the palm of his hand--outside the suit, this time.

He got a lot more than he bargained for.

A full heater shield materialized in an instant and dropped onto his left hand with unexpected heft, then clattered to the ground. Even inside his bulky suit, Hector had jumped with pure surprise.

A moment of stunned silence longer, and then Hector was laughing. 'Garovel!'

The reaper came rushing over, quick to notice Hector's work on the ground. 'Whoa. What've we got here?'

Hector looked down at the shield. It was more than a little familiar. The vertical stripes. The darker color. It was metal, certainly. But that was not iron.

Disbelief struck, and Hector's eyes narrowed. 'It can't be...'

'Is that what I think it is?' said Garovel.

Hector waved his left hand, and the shield annihilated itself. Hector still couldn't believe it. Another wave of his hand, and the shield reappeared, this time resting comfortably in his grip. 'Garovel...'

'You're able to materialize Haqq's shield,' the reaper said, sounding about as shocked as Hector felt.

Hector couldn't help the smile that crossed his lips. He made the shield disappear and then reappear again. It really was true."

"1227 -- CXXXVI.

--Donation Bonus Day (page 4 of 4)--

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Six: 'Thy renewed vigor...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'Make something else,' said Garovel.

'Oh, uh...' Hector blinked, trying to think. He waved his right hand, aiming to make the first thing that popped into his head. A metal bench, shaped like the rockier one he was currently sitting on.

And indeed, a bench appeared. But it was not the same as his shield. Granted, the lighting was a bit low in this place, but Hector was sure that he was looking at iron this time. Slightly lighter and grayer and plainer. And familiar, too, in that strange way. It was almost like he didn't even need to look at it in order to know that it was iron.

'Hmm,' mused Garovel.

Hector was confused, to say the least. He annihilated the bench and tried again with something else. This time, he made a big cube, as tall as a person. It, too, was iron, Hector knew. He destroyed it and tried again, but the result was the same.

'Wait,' said Garovel before Hector could give it another go. 'Try destroying the shield first this time.'

Hector did so, but it didn't change anything. He kept getting iron.

'Keep trying,' said Garovel.

Iron, iron, and more iron. And then the heater shield again. And then more iron. And then the shield.

Hector was at a loss. What the hell had happened to his power? It was like he could only control it some of the time.

‘It’s your hands,’ Garovel observed.

‘What?’

‘Well. Technically, it’s probably NOT your hands, really. It’s probably an unconscious thing, utilizing the different sides of your brain. But the point is, when you use your right hand, you make iron, and when you use your left hand, you make the metal of Haqq’s shield.’

"1227 -- CXXXVI.

--Donation Bonus Day (page 4 of 4)--

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Six: ‘Thy renewed vigor...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘Make something else,’ said Garovel.

‘Oh, uh...’ Hector blinked, trying to think. He waved his right hand, aiming to make the first thing that popped into his head. A metal bench, shaped like the rockier one he was currently sitting on.

And indeed, a bench appeared. But it was not the same as his shield. Granted, the lighting was a bit low in this place, but Hector was sure that he was looking at iron this time. Slightly lighter and grayer and plainer. And familiar, too, in that strange way. It was almost like he didn’t even need to look at it in order to know that it was iron.

‘Hmm,’ mused Garovel.

Hector was confused, to say the least. He annihilated the bench and tried again with something else. This time, he made a big cube, as tall as a person. It, too, was iron, Hector knew. He destroyed it and tried again, but the result was the same.

‘Wait,’ said Garovel before Hector could give it another go. ‘Try destroying the shield first this time.’

Hector did so, but it didn’t change anything. He kept getting iron.

‘Keep trying,’ said Garovel.

Iron, iron, and more iron. And then the heater shield again. And then more iron. And then the shield.

Hector was at a loss. What the hell had happened to his power? It was like he could only control it some of the time.

‘It’s your hands,’ Garovel observed.

‘What?’

‘Well. Technically, it’s probably NOT your hands, really. It’s probably an unconscious thing, utilizing the different sides of your brain. But the point is, when you use your right hand, you make iron, and when you use your left hand, you make the metal of Haqq’s shield.’

"1228

Hector blinked and stared at his hands. ‘I don’t understand...’

‘I do. We thought Haqq’s shield was destroyed, but it wasn’t. Rasalased absorbed it and returned it to you. Now you can materialize it from scratch. This must be what he was referring to when he said that you’d brought him a “gift.” Hmm. He did say that he sensed its “residue” in your soul. Must’ve been an effect of you using it. So then, I suppose, he figured that it belonged to you.’

‘But... that shield was... I mean, what was it even made of?’

‘The dark vertical stripes were tungsten carbide,’ Garovel recalled. ‘The rest of the shield was a combination of steel and titanium alloys. Or at least, that’s what Sazandara told us.’

‘So...’ That just made Hector even more confused. ‘So I’m able to materialize all of that stuff now?’

‘Seems like it.’

‘But, uh... what?’

‘Hmm. Try and make something with your left hand. Something that ISN’T the shield.’

A bit hesitant, Hector did so. His left hand tensed into a kind of claw-formation as he concentrated, and the result of his work materialized all at once.

It was the exact same shield again.

Hector frowned. He annihilated it and tried one more time, but the result was the same.

‘What were you trying to make?’ said Garovel.

‘Just a box,’ said Hector.

‘Hmm. So you can only make the shield, then.’

‘I guess so.’ He gave it another shot, just to be sure, but indeed, there was no change. The only object that he could materialize with his left hand--or with the left half of his brain, rather--appeared to be this shield. Haqq’s shield.”

"1229

It was a bit disappointing, to say the least. And upon further investigation, he discovered that he could not materialize a second shield, either. The volume limit of his new materialization power must have been exactly that of the original shield, Hector figured. He couldn’t even generate any extra dust afterward.

‘Well, this is certainly strange,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ve never heard of anyone being able to add on to the materialization ability this way.’

‘Never?’

‘I wouldn’t have thought it was possible if I weren’t seeing you doing it right now.’ He was almost laughing. ‘Rasalased... after all these years, what kind of monster has he become?’

Hector was beginning to have doubts, however. He flipped the shield over in his hands, inspecting it up and down. True, it certainly looked like Haqq’s shield. But could it really be identical, he wondered? In every way?

Garovel seemed to be having the same thought. ‘I wonder how strong it is,' the reaper said. 'Does it still carry the soul-strengthening effect from Abbas?'

If he could touch it with bare skin, that question might be answered, but unfortunately, this suit was in the way. And it was probably too late to take it off, he figured.

'Let Asad hold the shield,' said Garovel.

"Ah, good idea," Hector said aloud, though it might've been lost over the noise of the suit. He stood and made his way over to the Sandlord, who noticed him approaching and decided to come meet him halfway.

"Something the matter?!" Asad said over the racket.

Hector offered the shield to him and let Garovel do the explaining.

It didn't take long for Asad to understand what they were asking. He grabbed the shield, held it pensively for a few moments, then looked blankly at Hector and Garovel."

"1230

'You don't feel any different?' Garovel asked.

Asad glanced at Qorvass.

'He feels perfectly normal,' the reaper said. 'As do I. And shouldn't I be affected by it as well?'

'Yes, you should,' said Garovel. 'Hmm...'

'Let's test it on Jada.' Qorvass hovered quickly away, then soon returned with her.

She seemed a bit confused about what was going on but took the shield nonetheless.

Everyone waited, but nothing happened.

'Curious,' said Garovel. 'Would you mind helping us test its strength now, as well?'

'Not at all,' said Qorvass.

The small troupe ventured off together, wanting to put themselves a safe distance away from the crowd. They found an isolated, yet well-lit spot near the bench where Hector had been sitting. A broad corridor lay far to the right, but no one was using it.

And Hector paused, abruptly realizing that he had yet to see anyone other than the Rainlords and Asad's family. He wondered when he would see his first inhabitant of the Undercrust. He wondered if they would look any different from normal people. Or "surface" people, at least. He wasn't sure he knew what qualified as "normal" anymore.

He pushed the thought out of his mind and set the shield down, propping it up against the wall. He backed away and decided to use the same hallway he'd seen before. He wasn't terribly concerned about getting hurt, of course, but he figured it would be bad if he let the suit get damaged. Using the corner as cover, Hector poked his head out to watch Asad work.

The Lord Najir started off easy. He clapped his hands together, and then, as he brought them apart again, a large spear of solid quartz materialized, which he grabbed with both hands, as it continued to grow beyond his own wingspan."

"1231

With one deep breath and a bit of vigor from Qorvass, Asad gripped the spear tightly in his right hand and threw it with full strength.

It hit the shield dead on and shattered in all directions, some of which were toward Hector, who made full use of his cover.

'Was that soul-strengthened?' Garovel asked.

Hector peeked out again and saw Asad returning an affirmative nod. Hector's eyes returned to shield, which didn't have so much as a scratch on it.

He couldn't help smiling a little.

Asad tried again, this time with molten quartz, also strengthened with his soul. It splashed against the shield with a steaming hiss. Asad let it sit there for a bit before annihilating it, and they discovered some of the rock around the shield had been melted away, but the shield itself remained perfectly pristine.

Asad gave a frustrated look.

'In his defense,' said Qorvass, 'he is still quite tired.'

Garovel probably wanted to make some retort, Hector figured, but the reaper restrained himself.

Hector saw some Rainlords coming over to join Asad, no doubt wondering what was going on. After a brief conversation, a few of them decided to give it a go, as well.

Try after try, servant after servant, the result remained the same. It quickly developed into a contest, of sorts, with more and more Rainlords lining up to give it a go--until, at length, the challengers ceased their attempts and instead began searching for representatives.

They found the Lord Dimas Sebolt.

And apparently, the man didn't wish to waste anyone's time. He merged with IzioI straight away and invoked pan-moc. Hector could see light distort and bend around the man's whole body, and so could everyone else, it seemed, as they collectively backed away from him."
"1232

Hector could barely see Dimas' attack, but he could certainly hear it--like a hail of bullets without the gunfire, all pinging off the shield.

After a moment, Dimas let up, and Hector craned his neck to get a good look. The shield bore only two small holes in it, though a plethora of dents littered its body. And then, even those disappeared, melted back together as if nothing had happened.

All in all, Hector had expected more damage. And so had Dimas, it seemed.

‘Don’t look so disappointed,’ said Qorvass. ‘Considering you are younger than Asad, that was very impressive.’

Hector wondered if anyone else would step up. He noticed the Lord Salvador Delaguna observing, along with a few people urging him on, but the man just waved them off.

A lull came over the crowd of Rainlords as they searched for another contender.

The Lord Zeff Elroy stepped forward.

He still looked mostly terrible, as if he hadn’t been sleeping, and even Asad put a hand on his shoulder, as if to say that this wasn’t necessary.

They exchanged a few words, which Hector couldn’t hear, and then Asad’s concern appeared to be placated.

Zeff merged with Axiolis and invoked pan-forma. He placed his hands close together, as if holding an invisible ball, and then steam began erupting from within. It spewed out in all directions, loudly enough and violently enough that many of the Rainlords decided to back away even farther.

And slowly, an orb of rushing water coalesced. The water spun with such force that it made the wind howl around it.

Hector watched intently. He’d seen Zeff do this before in the fight against Caster Egmond. It seemed more stable now--and perhaps smaller, too, though that might’ve also been because Zeff was holding back."

"1233

Then the orb vanished completely. Annihilated harmlessly by Zeff. And Hector was briefly confused--until the splashing boom came in the next moment, this time located right on top of the shield.

The impact was so strong that it shook the huge chamber and nearly knocked Hector on his ass. Streams of water vaulted in all directions before dissipating into a light drizzle, and for a few lingering seconds, it was actually raining underground. The water quickly turned to steam, however.

Hector's eyes searched for the shield but didn't see it anymore. He ventured out from behind his corner in order to get a closer look, and at length, he found a sliver of it remaining. A chunk of its pointed bottom, he was fairly sure.

It was steadily regenerating, he noticed, but it was still a bit slow, comparatively. He waved his left hand, and the shield retook its full shape almost instantly, just as pristine as before.

Garovel hovered over to him. 'Well, that was informative.'

'Yeah,' said Hector. 'It's definitely just as strong as before. But the self-regeneration seems a little redundant now.'

'And not being able to materialize anything else with the right side of your brain could be problematic.'

'Don't you mean the left side of my brain?' said Hector.

'Ah. No, I don't, actually. The right side of your brain controls the left side of your body. And vice versa.'

Hector tilted his head. 'Really? But that's so counter-intuitive.'

'I know, right? Evolution should really get its shit together.'

Hector stooped down and picked up his shield. He held it up in front of himself and turned it over, inspecting it another time.

'We still don't know for certain if it can boost your passive soul defense,' said Garovel. 'I'm guessing not, since Asad didn't feel anything when he held it, but I suppose it's possible that the boost only works for you now.'

'Hmm.'

'Probably not, though. And this isn't a good place to test it out.'

"1234

Hector continued staring at the shield, but his gaze began to hollow out as his thoughts drifted. An inkling of an idea nagged at him from the back of his mind. It wasn't quite fully formed as of yet, but there was definitely something there, he felt. Something he'd almost forgotten about materialization but that could be relevant now. He squinted as he racked his brain, trying to grab the thought before it slipped away.

And then he got it.

He blinked, eyes shifting as his brain worked, evaluating the idea even further. Was it really possible now? Maybe not. Maybe there was some new limitation that he simply didn't know about yet. Hmm.

But still. If it was possible...

He had to test one more thing, Hector decided.

He finally looked up to discuss his idea with Garovel, but the sight of the Elroys approaching made Hector put it on hold.

Zeff was carrying Ramira in his arms now. Her little suit looked much sleeker and less cumbersome than Hector's, though it did bulge around the cast on her foot. Zeff also had her tiny crutches strapped to the bag on his back.

She gave Hector a wave, which he gladly returned. It was nice to see her in relatively high spirits again. The last few times he'd visited her, she'd seemed to be in considerable pain.

'That was quite a performance,' said Garovel.

'Thank you,' said Axiolis.

'What was that technique, by the way?' asked Garovel. 'Do you have a name for it?'

'It is still quite new,' said Axiolis. 'We haven't been able to come up with one yet. For now, hand signals will have to suffice.'

'Ah.'

Hector grew impatient. He didn't want to interrupt their conversation, but this was probably more important. Or better yet, maybe the Elroys could help him."

"1235

Zeff's hands were full, so Hector looked at Marcos, suited up and standing next to his father. Hector held the shield out to the boy. 'Ask him to hold this for me, please,' he told Garovel.

'Uh. Hey, Marcos, would you mind holding this for Hector?'

Marcos hesitated but took it. Its weight seemed to surprise him.

Hector threw another look around the area. There was plenty of space here, but which direction would be best? That hallway from before. It was very long, he remembered. Hector pointed in the direction opposite of the hallway. 'Ask them to go that way for me,' said Hector.

'Um. Hector?'

'Oh.' He probably should've explained, he realized. 'I wanna try to make a second shield.'

'Ah...'

'I've gotta get this first shield outside of my ability's max range,' said Hector. 'Because then my volume limit should reset, right?'

'Hmm.' Garovel was quiet a moment, perhaps thinking.

Hector wondered if the reaper was about to inform him that he was being stupid. But that didn't happen.

'Alright,' said Garovel. The reaper proceeded to explain Hector's reasoning and instructions to the Elroys.

As Zeff listened, his gaze fell upon Hector, and the young Atreyan lord began to feel increasingly self-conscious.

Hector wasn't sure he'd ever seen such a stern face staring at him like that before, but he tried not to worry about it too much. From what he knew of the Lord Elroy, that was just the man's normal face.

Why'd he have to stare like that, though? Hector didn't need another reason to be second guessing himself.

In the end, though, neither Zeff nor Axiolis voiced any sort of disapproval. They ventured off with Marcos and the shield, just as Hector had wanted.

Hector and Garovel made for the hallway together."
"1236

‘If this works,’ said Garovel, ‘what do you intend to do with it?’

Hector thought that should be obvious. ‘I’ll make shields for everyone here--or, y’know, as many as I can in the time we have left.’

‘Mm.’

‘...Something wrong with that?’

Garovel paused. ‘Not necessarily. But what about after we make it out of here?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘Well. I can see this power making our lives very complicated.’

Hector cocked an eyebrow. ‘Our lives aren’t exactly simple, right now.’

‘Ha. Even so, I think it’s best that we try to keep this ability secret as best we can. And if you’re gonna be handing these shields out to the Rainlords like it’s no big deal, then they need to understand how important this secret is, too. And YOU need to understand just how much trust you’re placing in them to keep that secret for us.’

‘Uh... would it really be so bad if people found out?’

‘Hector. I know you just want to protect people, but these shields are incredibly powerful. And, I mean, it took Haqq Najir months to craft just one of these shields. And now, potentially, you’d be able to make them in, what? An hour or two? Maybe even less? Hector, if you can start mass producing these things... Do you see what I’m getting at? Essentially, you’d be able to single-handedly turn the tide of... practically any war in the world.’

Hector stopped. He stared down the length of the empty hallway as he let Garovel’s words sink in.

‘That, my friend, is something that only a VERY small number of people on this planet can do,’ the reaper went on. ‘And don’t you think there are people out there who will want to take advantage of you? Especially if they find out how young you really are?’”
"1237

‘...I see your point,’ said Hector as he started walking again.

‘Good.’

Hector tested his ability with his left hand, but as expected, he couldn’t make anything yet. Doubtless, he still wasn’t far enough away. He kept trying as they moved down the length of the corridor.

‘You might be tempted to sell these shields,’ said Garovel, ‘but I’d advise against that. While we could certainly use the money for Warrenhold, it would be a big problem if word got around about an Atreyan merchant selling something that so many people might want.’

‘Selling them?’ The thought hadn’t even crossed Hector’s mind.
‘Wouldn’t that basically make me, like... a war profiteer or something?’

‘Pretty much, yeah.’

‘...I don’t exactly consider the Salesman of Death a role model, Garovel.’

The reaper laughed at that. ‘Good to know. But I’m just saying, it wouldn’t be too difficult to rationalize. The idea, of course, would be that you’d only sell to people you trusted. Like the Rainlords, perhaps. But the problem would be that some customers simply aren’t going to take no for an answer, unless you have the power to force them to.’

‘...Or allies to force them for me?’

‘Or that, yes. But you’re more interested in doing the protecting than being protected, aren’t you?’

‘Well, yeah. But, uh... all this talk does make me think. I mean, even disregarding this, uh, war profiteering bullshit--how likely is it that Warrenhold will develop into that kind of... “point of interest” or whatever? It’s bound to happen sooner or later, right?’

‘Hmm. At the rate we’re collecting people, perhaps sooner.’

‘Stasya Orlov wanted Warrenhold to be a center of trade between the Undercrust and the surface,’ said Hector. ‘And... I want that, too, I think. But... if we manage to make that happen, somehow, then...’

‘Yup.’”

"1238 -- CXXXVII.

‘It’d be stupid of me to think I can protect everyone by myself,’ said Hector. ‘If our time in Sair taught me anything, it’d definitely be that.’

‘Heh. And here I thought your self-confidence was growing.’

‘I... I don’t--I mean, uh... eh... that’s a different... thing.’

‘Eloquently put.’

‘Shut up.’

Hector kept walking for quite a ways, and Garovel kept giving him sass all the while, as expected, until at long length, finally, one of his attempts to create the shield succeeded. Partially. Half of it was missing. He annihilated it, took another step forward, and tried again.

The shield materialized in full this time.

‘Welp. That confirms it.’ Garovel hovered around him, looking the shield over. ‘I’m not sure if I like this “blessing” from Rasalased.’

‘I wonder if he can hear you.’

‘I hope he can. Hey, Rasalased! Why’d you give this to Hector, huh?! Why couldn’t you just upgrade his soul power with your own or something?!’

‘Would that have been possible?’

‘No, but I didn’t think this shit was possible, either, so who the fuck knows?!’

Hector couldn’t help laughing as he started back toward the Rainlords with his second shield in hand. ‘You sound very upset.’

‘Yeah, well, I am. If we’re not super careful, this shield bullshit is gonna bite us on the ass. And I bet Rasalased knew that, too. What a fuckin’ prick.’

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Seven: ‘Buried in the Dark...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There wasn’t a lot of time left until they needed to leave, but Hector spent every moment of it making as many extra shields as he could. And after seeing the kind of punishment that his work was capable of withstanding, the Rainlords were quite keen to help him out.”
"1238 -- CXXXVII.

‘It’d be stupid of me to think I can protect everyone by myself,’ said Hector. ‘If our time in Sair taught me anything, it’d definitely be that.’

‘Heh. And here I thought your self-confidence was growing.’

‘I... I don’t--I mean, uh... eh... that’s a different... thing.’

‘Eloquently put.’

‘Shut up.’

Hector kept walking for quite a ways, and Garovel kept giving him sass all the while, as expected, until at long length, finally, one of his attempts to create the shield succeeded. Partially. Half of it was missing. He annihilated it, took another step forward, and tried again.

The shield materialized in full this time.

‘Welp. That confirms it.’ Garovel hovered around him, looking the shield over. ‘I’m not sure if I like this “blessing” from Rasalased.’

‘I wonder if he can hear you.’

‘I hope he can. Hey, Rasalased! Why’d you give this to Hector, huh?! Why couldn’t you just upgrade his soul power with your own or something?!’

‘Would that have been possible?’

‘No, but I didn’t think this shit was possible, either, so who the fuck knows?!’

Hector couldn’t help laughing as he started back toward the Rainlords with his second shield in hand. ‘You sound very upset.’

‘Yeah, well, I am. If we’re not super careful, this shield bullshit is gonna bite us on the ass. And I bet Rasalased knew that, too. What a fuckin’ prick.’

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Seven: ‘Buried in the Dark...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There wasn’t a lot of time left until they needed to leave, but Hector spent every moment of it making as many extra shields as he could. And after seeing the kind of punishment that his work was capable of withstanding, the Rainlords were quite keen to help him out."

"1239

They formed a relay line, of sorts. Hector remained stationary so as not to exhaust himself by relying on his undead vigor any more than he already had. Instead, he simply handed his freshly made shields off to the nearest Rainlord, who then took a running start and chucked it down the line with full strength.

It certainly sped things along. He was able to pump out several shields per minute. But apparently, his ability’s maximum range had grown since he’d last tested it. The Rainlords were telling him it was around two hundred meters now.

Thinking about it now, he wondered if an increase in maximum range could even be considered a good thing. He had a hard time imagining a practical scenario in which materializing something that far away from himself would be useful.

But maybe that was his own fault. Maybe he just wasn’t thinking hard enough. Materialization was the power of creation, after all. It only made sense that using it to its fullest potential would require great creativity.

At length, Hector knew that his shield-making marathon had reached its end when a train arrived. Or at least, it seemed like a train. It didn't quite sound like any train he'd ever heard of. There was no loud hissing of steam or puffing of smoke or screeching of metal against metal. Of course, his suit was interfering with the noise, but Hector was sure that the sound he heard was more of a rumbling growl.

And in the low light, Hector hadn't previously noticed the rail lines, but they weren't just lain on the ground. They were also suspended in the air on slender pillars, allowing the wheels on the train's rooftop to connect.

Which earned a double-take from Hector as everyone was boarding."
"1240

'Why are there wheels on top?' he said to Garovel.

'They add much needed stability,' the reaper said. 'And... well, you'll see pretty soon.'

'Hmm.' Hector thought about that answer for a bit. 'Wait a minute... You said you haven't been down here in three hundred years or something, right?'

'Yep.'

'But... you already know about this train technology?'

'Yep.'

'So you're telling me they've had trains like this for more than three hundred years?'

'Yep.' A beat passed. 'Okay, well, maybe not JUST like this. This one does look a lot spiffier than I remember. But the whole double-track thing is old tech. In fact, I don't think the trains down here ever DIDN'T have them. The one-track design was a surface-level thing.'

'Huh...'

Hector ended up taking over a couple of empty seats near the front of the train, but there wasn't a whole lot of extra space remaining, and he felt sorry for the Rainlords who were stuck sharing a cabin with his noisy suit. He watched the train doors slide shut and felt the whole room begin rumbling gently.

Soon enough, they were underway. There weren't many windows to speak of, and the few they did have were quite small and circular, the kind Hector imagined seeing on a boat or plane. At first, he saw a few faint lights streaming by, but then there was only pitch darkness.

Their first destination was going to be a place called Babbadelo, as Hector recalled. Naturally, Garovel hadn't told him anything else about it--though that might've been because Garovel hadn't been there in so long.

In the meantime, Hector tried to occupy himself with meditation, but a sudden, rather violent shift in the train disturbed him.

'What was that?' he asked.

'Heh,' was all Garovel said. He'd latched onto Hector's shoulder while the train was in motion.

Nobody was panicking, Hector noticed, so he supposed the shift wasn't anything to be too concerned about. But something was definitely different."

"1241

Gravity had shifted, Hector realized. The train was going almost straight up, it felt like. And perhaps the only reason he hadn't begun sliding out of his seat was because of the arm rest supporting his weight. He grabbed onto it with his free hand and spread his feet apart unconsciously.

'This doesn't feel very safe...

'Well, you're supposed to have a seat belt on,' said Garovel.

'You tell me this now?'

'I'm pretty sure the seat belts won't fit around your suit.'

'You could've warned me, at least. What if I fell out?'

‘Was kinda hopin’ you would.’

‘What if I landed on someone?’

‘Eh, Dimas is right over there. I’m sure he would’ve stopped you. Or you would’ve stopped yourself. You’ve got your iron again, remember? You could’ve whipped something up.’

Hector would’ve expressed his annoyance, but the cabin shifted another time and took his mind off it. Gravity leveled out, and he supposed they were moving horizontally again. He decided to maintain his grip on the arm rest anyway.

From there, the journey began to feel rather tedious. It would take a few hours to reach Babbadelo, apparently, and Hector couldn’t sleep or meditate for fear of falling out of his seat.

That left only one thing for him to do, really.

Pester Garovel with all the things that he’d been meaning to ask for a while now.

‘Hey, Garovel, I have a question.’

‘Yeah?’

‘Have you ever gone to the moon?’

The reaper laughed. ‘I think I see where this is going. But no, I have never gone to the moon.’

‘Why not? You can fly wherever you want, right?’

‘As it so happens, no, I can’t. Reapers can’t leave the planet’s atmosphere.’

‘Hmm. So you’ve tried, then?’

"1242

‘Yeah,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ve tried a few times, actually. Everyone experiments in their youth, right?’

‘Your “youth,” huh? What were you, like, five hundred?’

‘Two hundred, the first time. Occasionally, I give it another shot, just to see if anything’s changed. I might do it again, eventually. Assuming someone doesn’t kill me first, that is.’

‘Hmm. So how does it, uh...? I mean, what happens when you go up that high, exactly?’

‘I start to lose consciousness.’

‘Ah...’

‘It might be for the best, though. Can you imagine how terrifying it would be if you flew up into space and got lost? AND you weren’t able to die? So you just... drifted? For millions of years, potentially? If not billions? In fact, who knows if you’d ever find your way back at all?’

‘Shit, when you put it like that, why would you even risk going up there?’

‘Mm, curiosity.’

‘Reapers must get REALLY bored, if that’s all it takes.’

‘That’s a bigger problem than people usually realize. I bet there are plenty of wars that were largely the result of some bored reaper.’

‘I can believe that,’ said Hector. ‘But, uh. I’m still wondering, um...’ He had to take a moment to find his wording. ‘Well. Hmm. What’s the planet’s role in all this?’

‘Heh. What do you mean?’

Hector’s brow furrowed. ‘What do you mean what do I mean? And what’re you laughing about?’

The reaper laughed outright at that. ‘I’m just getting the impression that you’re about to ask me a particular question that nobody knows the answer to. Something that a LOT of people have been trying to figure out for a very long time.’”

"1243

‘And what would that be?’ said Hector.

‘I don’t know--what WOULD it be?’

‘Argh. Just tell me.’

‘No,’ laughed Garovel, sounding almost like a stubborn child.

‘Ugh...’

‘I feel like you know the question already,’ the reaper said. ‘It seemed like you were working your way up to it. Maybe just cut to the chase and ask me, hmm?’

At first, Hector didn’t know what Garovel meant. But as he thought about it, an idea did pop into his head. It was something that had been bothering him for quite a long time now, on some level. Even before Garovel told him about this “ardor.” Perhaps even before Garovel told him about the Undercrust. There was just something about the nature of souls, about everything he’d come to learn of them during his time as a servant.

‘...Where do souls come from, exactly?’

‘That’s not the question.’

‘...Do they come from the planet?’

‘Mm. Getting warmer.’

Hector took a minute to deliberate. It was a bit of a leap, but if he supposed the answer to that last question was “yes,” then...

Hector tilted his head. ‘...Is the planet alive?’

‘There it is!’ Garovel laughed. ‘Well done, my dear boy.’

‘Nobody knows if the planet is alive?’

‘Depends on what you mean by “alive,” now doesn’t it? Certainly, if you just mean, as an ecosystem capable of supporting life, then yes, the planet is obviously alive. And the molten core is like it’s heart, and if you destroyed the core, you’d essentially be “killing” the planet, right? There’s no real debate there. But if that’s not what you mean by “alive,” then... Well. Things get a bit more difficult to figure out, to say the least.’”

"1244

‘Hmm,’ said Hector. ‘Would there even be a definitive way to determine whether the planet is alive or not?’

‘Well, again, what do you mean by “alive?” Do you mean “possessing a consciousness?” Do you mean “self-aware?” Because there are plenty of single-celled organisms that wouldn’t fit that criteria.’

‘Aw, hell, I don’t know...’

‘You don’t know what you meant by alive?’

‘I always feel so stupid when you start bringing up scientific shit.’

‘Well, good, because that’s why I bring it up. Not to help you learn anything. To make you feel stupid. It gives me great pleasure.’

‘I’m sure it does.’

‘I was being facetious.’

‘Were you, Garovel? Were you?’

‘Don’t get all pouty on me. I’m trying to help you.’

‘Okay, so is the planet alive or not?’

‘You weren’t listening to me at all, were you?’

‘I listened to you spout a bunch of vague bullshit!’

Garovel laughed. ‘Wow.’

‘Remember that conversation you had with Rasalased?! Well, that’s what talking to YOU is like!’

‘Alright, there’s no need to hurt my feelings,’ said Garovel. ‘What didn’t you understand?’

‘I don’t know! I was just wondering if there was more to the planet’s... energy or whatever. More than most people realize, I mean.’

‘The answer to that is yes.’

‘Okay... so... could you elaborate?’

‘Not really, no.’

‘Why not?’

‘Because, as far as I am aware, nobody really understands the planet’s “energy or whatever,” as you put it. So we’re not sure if that means it’s alive.’

‘But, uh, you said that “alive” had a weird definition and that I’m dumb.’

‘I didn’t say you were dumb.’

‘Sounded like you did.’

‘Then you misheard.’

‘Yeah, well, I bet you were thinking it.’

‘No, but I’m thinking it right now.’

It was Hector’s turn to laugh."

"1245

‘Anyway,’ said Garovel, ‘the planet’s ardor is widely theorized to be the source of all human and animal souls as we currently know them. But that’s a bit difficult to prove. It could be that souls and ardor developed independently of one another. Or from some third thing that we haven’t even discovered yet.’

‘Hmm. So, wait. Every living thing in the world has a soul?’

‘Yes.’

‘Even, like, those single-celled organisms you were talking about just now?’

‘Yep. Even them. But it must be said that their souls are extremely weak, comparatively.’

‘Huh. Does that mean...? Uh. Does that mean you could’ve taken, like--I don’t know--a hamster as your servant?’

‘I thought I did. I mean, just look at you.’

‘Fuckin’...’

‘I had to, Hector. You set it up for me so perfectly.’

‘Fuck you.’

‘But yeah, in theory, I could’ve taken a hamster for a servant. Anything with a large enough brain.’

‘A hamster has a large enough brain?’

‘Yeah. The requirements aren’t too strict. Good thing, too, otherwise you wouldn’t--’

‘Alright, shut up.’

‘Heh. Generally speaking, though, taking anything other than a human as your servant is an incredibly stupid thing to do. Not being able to communicate complex ideas to your servant is a pretty big problem.’

‘Makes sense.’

‘I’ve known a few reapers who did it, too. Haven’t known any where it worked out for ‘em, though. Shockingly, animals can be rather unpredictable.’

‘I bet someone figured it out,’ said Hector. ‘Imagine having a bear as your servant. A super old bear with soul power? That would be insane.’

‘Literally,’ said Garovel.

‘Maybe. Not something I’d wanna fight, though.’

"1246

‘Eh, I’d bet on you,’ said Garovel. ‘You’ve already faced worse, I think.’

Hector blinked at the sudden compliment. It was nice, but a part of him would’ve preferred another insult.

‘Oh, and by the way,’ the reaper went on, ‘I know we’ve been busy, but I haven’t forgotten about your birthday.’

Hector kind of had. ‘...What day is today?’

‘You don’t know?’

Hector gave a stilted shrug. ‘If I’m honest, everything’s just a blur to me right now.’

‘It’s the twenty-third. Your birthday’s in two days.’

‘Oh...’

‘Do you need me to remember how old you are, too?’

‘You’re one to talk,’ said Hector. ‘How old are you, exactly, huh?’

‘You don’t get to use that excuse until you’re at least a hundred,’ said Garovel.

‘I’m turning seventeen. Happy now?’

‘Actually, you’ll be turning eighteen.’

‘What?’

‘I’m just fucking with you.’

‘Ugh.’

‘But the fact that you seemed genuinely confused for a second is amazing.’

‘I was only confused because I trust you to tell me important shit!’

‘Oh, well, I’m flattered.’

‘I should just never trust anything you tell me.’

‘Aw, don’t say that. I got you a birthday present in order to demonstrate my affection.’

Hector’s brow lowered. ‘...How could you get me--? You don’t have a physical body, so you couldn’t have--’

‘Does that mean you don’t want it?’

Hector’s mouth flattened. ‘...Alright, where is it?’

‘It’s not a physical object, you materialistic fuck. I got you a verbal birthday card.’

‘A what?’

‘A verbal birthday card.’

‘Is that as stupid as it sounds?’

‘If by “stupid” you mean “incredibly thoughtful of me,” then yes. Don’t worry, though. I’m not expecting anything in return.’”

"1247

‘Why would I get you something for MY birthday?’ said Hector.

‘You wouldn’t,’ said Garovel. ‘I mean, I’m not upset about it.’ A beat passed. ‘Would’ve been a nice gesture, though.’

Hector opened his right hand and materialized a smaller, iron hand therein. He made sure that only its middle finger was extended. ‘Here’s your present.’

‘How crude.’

Hector annihilated his work before anyone else saw it. ‘Okay, then, let’s have it. I’m ready for this verbal birthday card of yours.’

‘It’s not your birthday yet.’

‘Wow, you’re gonna make me wait to experience something so incredible?’

‘You’re that curious, huh? I suppose that’s to be expected. Alright, fine, I’ll give it to you early. It goes like this. Ahem. “Dear Hector. You’ve been my servant for around nine months now, and so--much like a fetus maturing into a human being--you’ve made the journey from complete uselessness to NEAR complete uselessness.”

‘Well, thank you.’

‘I’m not done.’

‘Of course you aren’t.’

‘I’ll continue. Ahem. “I know I can sometimes come across as callous or ungrateful for many of the things you’ve done for me, but I just want you to know that. Well. I am. Both of those things. Because you never do anything right, and really, I'm the amazing one for being able to put up with so much of your shit."

'Birthday cards aren't this long, Garovel.'

'Stop interrupting. Ahem... "Ahaha! But I'm merely teasing, of course. We do have fun, don't we? I only make fun of you because I know you can take it. If I'm being completely serious, though, then I do feel genuinely compelled to thank you. I know that sometimes, my cynicism gets the better of me, but even after only nine months, I can say with some confidence that it is an honor to have you as my servant.'"

"1248 -- CXXXVIII.

Hector felt himself blushing. 'Alright, thanks, you can stop now. I don't--'

'I told you to stop interrupting.'

Hector frowned.

Garovel waited a moment. 'Okay, I'm done now.'

'Agh.'

'So what'd you think? I worked hard on it.'

'I... uh...'

'Speechless, eh? That's only to be expected, I suppose. You're welcome, by the way.'

Hector was still a little flustered. So after another uncertain pause, he decided to just address the problem directly. 'Somehow, I always get a lot more uncomfortable whenever you start acting all... sincere out of nowhere like that.'

'Ah, well, sincerity is important, Hector. Sometimes, at least. I can't very well be a facetious prick all the time, now can I? I mean, I COULD, technically--don't think I couldn't. But ultimately, it would stand in the way of progress in our relationship. You can't build trust out of jokes and insults. And believe me, I've tried.'

‘Hmm...’

‘And y’know, miscommunication between reaper and servant is the primary cause of every major conflict in the world.’

Hector squinted. ‘...There’s no way that’s true.’

‘See? You understand when I’m spouting total bullshit. That means we’re communicating very well with one another. And thus, my point is proven.’

Hector kept squinting. ‘...No, it isn’t.’

‘Exactly. Good for you, understanding that, too.’

‘Shut up, Garovel.’

‘You shut up.’

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Eight: ‘The land of leviathans...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To say the very least of things, the city of Babbadelo was not what Hector expected. There were no buildings. At least, not by conventional standards. Instead, there were only pillars, tall and broad and wreathed in streaks of amber light. It was like some gargantuan forest where the trees were hewn from rock and glowed in the dark.

But there were trees, too. Many, in fact. None were in the ground, but they were here. They stood in vats of various sizes, depending on the tree, though some of those vats were so large that they became walls unto themselves while supporting an entire row of trees. They all looked to be the same species, as well, though Hector couldn’t exactly identify them. Frankly, he was surprised any kind of plant life could survive the temperatures down here.

And then, of course, there were the people."
"1248 -- CXXXVIII.

Hector felt himself blushing. ‘Alright, thanks, you can stop now. I don't--'

'I told you to stop interrupting.'

Hector frowned.

Garovel waited a moment. 'Okay, I'm done now.'

'Agh.'

'So what'd you think? I worked hard on it.'

'I... uh...'

'Speechless, eh? That's only to be expected, I suppose. You're welcome, by the way.'

Hector was still a little flustered. So after another uncertain pause, he decided to just address the problem directly. 'Somehow, I always get a lot more uncomfortable whenever you start acting all... sincere out of nowhere like that.'

'Ah, well, sincerity is important, Hector. Sometimes, at least. I can't very well be a facetious prick all the time, now can I? I mean, I COULD, technically--don't think I couldn't. But ultimately, it would stand in the way of progress in our relationship. You can't build trust out of jokes and insults. And believe me, I've tried.'

'Hmm...'

'And y'know, miscommunication between reaper and servant is the primary cause of every major conflict in the world.'

Hector squinted. '...There's no way that's true.'

'See? You understand when I'm spouting total bullshit. That means we're communicating very well with one another. And thus, my point is proven.'

Hector kept squinting. '...No, it isn't.'

'Exactly. Good for you, understanding that, too.'

'Shut up, Garovel.'

'You shut up.'

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Eight: 'The land of leviathans...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To say the very least of things, the city of Babbadelo was not what Hector expected. There were no buildings. At least, not by conventional standards. Instead, there were only pillars, tall and broad and wreathed in streaks of amber light. It was like some gargantuan forest where the trees were hewn from rock and glowed in the dark.

But there were trees, too. Many, in fact. None were in the ground, but they were here. They stood in vats of various sizes, depending on the tree, though some of those vats were so large that they became walls unto themselves while supporting an entire row of trees. They all looked to be the same species, as well, though Hector couldn't exactly identify them. Frankly, he was surprised any kind of plant life could survive the temperatures down here.

And then, of course, there were the people."

"1249

Their eyes shone with white light, and if they had irises or pupils, then Hector couldn't see them. It was such a strange yet familiar sight, like something out of a cartoon. Or perhaps a horror film--he wasn't quite sure.

Everyone seemed to be completely bald, as well, even lacking eyebrows and facial hair. If not for their still very human-looking physiques, he might have thought they were from a different planet.

And boy, could he see their physiques. They barely wore any clothing at all. Occasionally, he'd spot someone entirely nude.

That much, he wished Garovel would've warned him about. Maybe it would've made him feel a modicum less uncomfortable right now. He tried not to stare.

It was difficult to discern their skin color, though. The poor lighting and the gloss on his suit's visor didn't help, but he was fairly certain that he saw slight variations in skin tone, at least.

As they proceeded on, however, Hector noticed changes among the crowd. More and more people wore clothes--or perhaps, harnesses was a better word for it, since the primary purpose of their clothing seemed to be in carrying things.

He supposed it made sense, though. Given the extreme temperatures down here, these people probably didn't ever have to worry about staying warm.

'What can you tell me about these people?' Hector asked.

'Well, there are several different races who live in the Undercrust,' said Garovel privately. 'In Mohssian, these gray folks with the glowing eyes are called the Hun'Kui--or "people of the ash." They're probably who you'll be seeing the most of out in the open like this. There aren't many other races who can withstand these temperatures as well as they can.'

Their sheer numbers made Hector curious. 'They're not all servants, are they?'

'No.'

'Then, how do they survive? Isn't it like a thousand degrees down here or something?'

"1250

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

'Not quite a thousand,' said Garovel. 'My knowledge is a bit archaic when it comes to the Undercrust, but as I recall, the average Hun'Kui can comfortably withstand temperatures of up to eight hundred degrees. In thermoregulatory terms, they're what's called eurytherms, meaning they can live in an extremely wide range of temperatures. But that's all relative to the Undercrust. If you tried to take one of them back up to the surface, they'd still freeze to death.'

'Oh.'

'In Fahrenheit, the surface has a temperature spectrum of three hundred degrees or so. One-hundred in either direction, that is. But the Undercrust has a much, much larger temperature spectrum, beginning around five hundred degrees and ending around four thousand.'

‘That... sounds unpleasant.’

‘Just a bit, yeah. For reference, any area that’s more than three thousand degrees is generally regarded as uninhabitable by the people here. They don’t even try to mess around with temperatures that high.’ The reaper paused. ‘Or at least, that’s how it was when I last visited a few hundred years ago. Maybe they’ve made some breakthroughs while I was gone. In fact, I hope they have. I love seeing new technology.’

‘So, wait. They can deal with TWO thousand degrees? That still sounds completely insane to me.’

Garovel pointed a bony finger upward. ‘Take a look up there.’

Hector wasn’t sure what Garovel was talking about. He only saw a dark and very distant cavern ceiling amid a visibly warm haze.

But no, wait. After a few moments, he began to see it, even through his visor. There was something there. His eyes needed time to distinguish the deeper blackness from the rest, to interpret the faint contours in the darkness.

‘Holes?’ thought Hector. There seemed a few of them. Maybe five or six--he couldn’t be sure. They must’ve been gigantic to be visible at this distance.

‘Yes,’ said Garovel. ‘Heat funnels, to be precise.’”
"1251

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

‘Funnels?’ Hector vaguely recalled one of the reapers mentioning such a thing when he’d first learned of the Undercrust’s existence.

‘It’s an absolutely ancient technique. Perhaps the oldest method, even.’

He still wasn’t quite sure he understood. ‘Oldest method of what, exactly?’

‘Of creating survivable conditions here. Of colonization, that is.’

Hector blinked.

‘The invention of heat funneling--down here? Historically speaking, it’s on par with the invention of agriculture. Its importance and influence to civilization here can’t really be overstated.’

‘Wow, uh. Okay. How does it work?’

‘It’s pretty simple. Have you ever heard the phrase “heat rises?”’

‘Sure.’

‘Well, that’s a lie.’

‘What?’

‘Or at least, it’s not the whole truth. Really, heat just flows from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. From hot to cold. Until both areas are the same temperature. It’s part of nature’s eternal pursuit of equilibrium. We only think of heat as “rising” because heat affects the density of matter, and matter with a low density will generally get pushed up by matter with a high density. That’s why a rock sinks in water, and oil rises above it. But anyway, the point is, heat often gets conflated with the rising movement created by changes in density, even though heat itself is not prone to any particular direction.’

‘...I feel like I should’ve known this, already.’

‘Eh, you probably did, on some level. It’s fairly intuitive. And if not, well. That’s why I’m here, right? Don’t be too hard on yourself.’

‘You’re not gonna call me stupid again?’

‘Oh, yeah. You’re stupid.’

‘Ugh.’

‘Thanks for reminding me.’

‘Happy to help.’

‘Anyway, what was I talking about?’

‘Uh. Heat funneling?’

‘Right, right. So, ah, okay. Everything I just explained is an important part of how these cities down here maintain relatively safe temperatures. It’s hard for me to tell, since I can’t actually feel temperature, myself, but at a guess, I’d say that the streets of Babbadelo here are hovering around four or five hundred degrees.’”
"1252

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

‘Okay, but how does the funneling actually work?’ said Hector. ‘I mean, where does the heat go?’

‘Oh, the heat is transferred into a “cooler,” which is an area where someone--likely a servant or team of servants--is working around the clock to maintain a low temperature. It would be a very tightly-controlled environment. They used to just be caves that had been lined with loads of heat shielding materials, but they might be different now. I’m curious to see one, but I don’t know if we’ll get the opportunity. We didn’t come down here for a tour, after all.’

‘Hmm. But, uh... so these servants who are keeping that place cold... uh... are they not in the city itself? Or...?’

‘Well, they could be, I suppose, but they’re probably not. The idea behind heat funneling was to construct a vast network that could cool many cities, without ever making it so that any one city was entirely reliant upon any one cooler--the logic being that, if, for whatever reason, a cooler failed, then the other coolers in the network would be able to pick up the slack.’

‘Smart.’

‘Before funneling was invented, it was just as you said. Very powerful servants would create “safe zones,” and everywhere else was pretty much off limits.’

That made Hector want to ask what happened so long ago to make people migrate all the way down here in the first place, but someone bumped into him before he could formulate the question.

A loud group of Hun’Kui were crowding around a young Rainlord on his right, and even though Hector couldn’t tell what they were saying, their intentions seemed apparent enough from the way they were pushing into the comparatively small entourage of Rainlords.

The body language, the shouting, the unprovoked aggression--Hector had seen this plenty of times before in Atreya. Without even thinking, he flicked his wrist and encased every single one of them in iron."

"1253

The commotion died instantly, and the Hun'Kui looked around in apparent confusion, as Hector had left only their heads uncovered.

The young Rainlords that they'd been bothering all looked toward him at once, and Hector wasn't sure what their expressions meant. Had he made a mistake? Maybe he shouldn't have interfered. It wasn't like the Rainlords needed--

An unfamiliar sound rang out--a heavy, piping noise that simultaneously carried a whip's crack with it.

Pain came knifing through Hector's chest.

The street erupted into shrieks as the crowd around the Rainlords scattered, and Hector saw several more clusters of Hun'Kui letting everyone flee around them. One was aiming at him with a long, two-handed rifle of some strange kind. Tendrils of blue smoke--or something like it--swirled up from both the tip of its barrel and the back of its apparent loading chamber.

This time, it was the Rainlords' turn to react. Everyone bolted away from Hector, and within as much time as it took for him to turn his head, the Hun'Kui were nearly all subdued--many by crystal or metal, some by threat of a blade or gun, and the last lingering few by a hand or foot pressing them into the dirt.

Hector, however, was more concerned with the gaping hole in his chest, and thus, his suit. And despite already having the vigor required to walk in this cumbersome thing, Garovel had not been numbing his pain. And so, he felt every bit of that searing air as it rushed in and scorched his flesh, exploding up through his punctured lung and burning his throat, mouth, and nose with every breath.

His body wanted to panic, of course, but he knew it wouldn't last long.

He knew Garovel's help was imminent, and indeed, it soon arrived. All pain flew away from him as quickly as it had arrived.

But when he turned to look at Garovel, he saw that the reaper had a gaping wound, too."

"1254

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

'Ah--are you alright?' Hector asked.

'Dandy,' the reaper said. 'A bit surprised, though. What the hell was that weapon?'

'I was gonna ask you that.'

'Ugh,' said Garovel. 'Y'know, when I said I loved seeing new technology, this isn't what I had in mind.' Black and white smoke had begun to rise from the hole in his ethereal body--an indicator that it was very slowly repairing itself, Hector knew.

Hector, remembering that heat was leaking into his suit and cooking him alive, decided to just patch the hole in the chest with iron.

'You've got a hole in back, too,' said Garovel.

And he heard the clamor of his refrigeration unit abruptly stop.

'Oh. Good.'

'Uh... am I just fucked now?'

'Pretty fucked, yeah. But, hmm. Let's see here. Hey, Asad!'

Axiolis and Qorvass were already hovering toward them with their respective families following.

'Having trouble?' said Axiolis.

'Do we have someone who can repair this thing?' asked Garovel.

Qorvass inspected the damage. 'Ooh, I do not think so. This looks quite bad.'

‘Does it?’ said Garovel. ‘The hole’s not that big, though.’

‘Yes, but it pierced the battery.’

‘Mm. Did we bring a replacement?’

“Yes, of course,” said Asad. “I told the Duxans to load up several spares just before we left. I made sure to...” He drifted off as his expression shifted into one of recollection. “Actually, no... I never did do that, did I...?”

‘Asad, please don’t tell me you forgot,’ said Qorvass.

And to his credit, the Lord Najir didn’t tell him.

‘Argh! I asked if you’d forgotten anything important right before we left!’

“...I remembered my luggage.”

‘And, what?! You consider that progress?!’

"1255

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Asad scratched his cheek and gave Hector a stiff look. “...Sorry.”

“It’s fine,” said Hector, feeling more amused pity than disappointment. He looked over the reapers. “But, uh... what now? I mean, uh, I don’t want to be a burden on you guys, so if it’s easier to just go on without me, then we should do that.”

‘Mm, yeah, maybe that’d be best,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ll just revive you from scratch when we’re back at Warrenhold.’

“No, no, no,” said Asad, “that will not be necessary. This is my doing, so I will make it up to you.”

“Uh, how?” said Hector.

“I will simply follow you around, making temperature-controlled armor for you,” said Asad. “Whenever it begins to melt, I’ll remake it.”

Hector bobbed his head. He supposed that would work, but it sounded like a lot of trouble to go through. He didn’t get a chance to voice his concerns, however.

“Allow me to do it,” said Zeff, still carrying the wounded Ramira in one arm.

Asad blinked at him. “Why? It was my mistake.”

“There is a certain technique I am trying to develop,” said Zeff. “I think this might prove a good opportunity to practice it. And besides, I owe the both of you so very much. So, please.”

Asad could only return an admmissive nod.

Zeff looked to Hector now. “Remove the suit,” he said. “It will only get in the way.”

A bit hesitant, Hector did as he was asked, but he needed help toward the end. He couldn't feel any pain from the heat, but he could certainly feel the way it turned his muscles to jelly, even in spite of the regeneration's best efforts."

"1256

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Hector and Zeff found an empty side street and put some distance between themselves and everyone else.

Hector wasn't entirely sure why this was necessary, and moreover, he was beginning to worry that he'd been suddenly drafted as Zeff's practice dummy.

‘Would you mind explaining your work to Hector as you go?’ said Garovel, who Hector noticed was observing from a distance. ‘Truth to be told, I’ve been hoping that he would get an opportunity to learn from a fellow materializer.’

Zeff rubbed his hands together. “Very well.”

‘And don’t leave anything out,’ Garovel added. ‘Pretend he’s a total idiot who doesn’t know the most basic stuff.’

Hector frowned. He might’ve protested more, but he was starting to feel woozy and having trouble even just standing here.

Qorvass decided to chime in. ‘Alternatively, pretend he’s Asad and that he’s forgotten everything he’s ever learned.’

“Hey...”

“I understand,” said Zeff.

Hector tried simultaneously to both listen carefully and also brace himself for whatever was about to happen.

“For this to work,” Zeff began, “I cannot simply douse you in freezing waters, because the extreme heat here would cause it to flash boil and explode. Which would probably kill you.”

“Oh,” Hector mumbled exhaustedly.

“Enhancing the water with soul power is a possible solution, but if I were to make a mistake, it might still flash boil and simply create an even deadlier explosion.”

“Fantastic...”

“Instead, I will begin with a cloud of steam.”

And sure enough, steam appeared all around him.

“Next, I will add a layer of water around you.”

Hector was immediately engulfed. An unsupported batch of water suspended itself in midair all around him.

And that certainly grabbed his attention. How was Zeff holding it in place? From everything Hector knew about materialization, Zeff shouldn’t have been able to control the water once it was created, and yet here it was now, holding an impossible shape and remaining almost perfectly still.”

"1257

Hector would have liked to ask Zeff directly, but he didn’t think shouting through the water would work, so he just motioned with one hand for Zeff to stop and hoped the man would take his meaning.

Zeff seemed to.

Hector relayed his question to Garovel.

‘Hector would like to know how you’re able to hold this water in place.’

Zeff annihilated the water around Hector’s head so that the young lord could hear him. “I am applying a counter-force technique,” he said.

‘Are you talking about a velocity state?’ said Garovel.

“No, but that is the first step. I apply an upward velocity to my creation, which counters the downward effect of gravity.”

“I’ve tried doing that,” said Hector. “It never works, because gravity is a constant force, and I can only apply velocity once.”

“You are correct,” said Zeff. “That is what makes this technique more difficult. The key is to think in layers. Yes, you can only apply a velocity state once per creation, so the solution is to break your work up into many creations. Layers.”

Hector’s brow rose. “Oh...”

“With each layer, you apply a slightly stronger velocity state, because each new layer must not only counteract gravity but also support the layer on top of it, which has begun to be affected by gravity.”

Hector had very nearly forgotten to keep listening, having felt for a moment as if Zeff had just handed his brain a light bulb. Layers! Of course!

As excited as the idea’s potential made him, however, he did have concerns. “That sounds insanely hard. You’d have to constantly be applying higher and higher velocity states, or it’d completely fall apart, wouldn’t it?”

Zeff gave an affirming nod. “Applying a counter-force like this for an extended period of time is a good way of measuring a materializer’s overall skill level. Even the most powerful servants in the world will eventually have difficulty creating high enough velocity states to keep their work perfectly still.”

“I see...”

"1258

Zepp blinked as if suddenly remembering something, and then he said, "Oh, but that is merely the way that I am doing it. It is not the way that it should be done."

Hector cocked an eyebrow. "Say what?"

Zepp annihilated the water around Hector and then refreshed it. "I am purposely using the most difficult method possible, because, as I mentioned earlier, I am trying to further develop my skills. But, ah--I should explain that, when working with layers to achieve perfect stillness, it is certainly not necessary to continuously strengthen the velocity states indefinitely. I am doing that because I am adding each new layer to the bottom while removing them from the top, which makes the acceleration due to gravity endless--or at least, until terminal velocity becomes a factor, at which point, in order to maintain the training regiment, you would want to--or, ah, no, that's just going to confuse you. Um. Very well. So, as I was saying, if--ah--if you were to simply add each new layer to the top and remove from the bottom, the technique becomes much simpler to maintain."

By now, Hector was just staring with wide eyes. "Uh..."

Zepp destroyed his water again, but instead of refreshing it immediately, he rubbed his forehead. "As a means of training, my method is ideal, but for general use, ah--you should not start by learning that. Ah, perhaps, no, we should begin with the layer-less version of this technique. Yes, and then from there, we can revisit--"

Axiolis' sigh intervened as he floated up behind Zepp. 'I apologize for my boneheaded servant. Knowledgeable though he may be, Zepp is not the most experienced when it comes to teaching.'

Zepp returned a flat look.

'Hey, Asad, would you mind helping Zepp? Perhaps you could keep him from confusing poor Hector here.'

'Oh, I highly doubt that,' said Qorvass.

Asad gave his reaper a similar look as he stepped forward. "I would be happy to assist," he said.

Qorvass seemed greatly amused by this. 'Good luck, Hector!'

And Hector just kind of frowned."
"1259

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 3))

"I do not require help in teaching Hector," said Zeff.

"So you say," said Asad, "but look at his face."

"I know that I was, perhaps, a bit unclear, but I will do better. I know exactly where to begin now."

"Why don't you just let me take over for a bit. You deserve a rest."

And for the first time that Hector had seen, Zeff actually smiled.

"Oh, shut up," said the Lord Elroy.

"I'm only thinking of your well-being," said Asad, smirking now as well.

"Why don't you stand back and observe? Perhaps you'll learn even more than Hector."

"Oho! Now THAT is an amusing thought--especially considering the fact, as I recall, our record is still 133 to 131 in my favor."

"Hmph, that means nothing. The last time we fought was four years ago."

"It hardly matters," said Asad. "There exists no universe in which your skill is superior to mine."

"Aside from this one, perhaps."

Garovel chimed in for a private word. 'I'm not sure if they actually want to teach you, or if they just enjoy competing with one another.'

Water reappeared around Hector, this time surrounded by glass, but the two men didn't stop arguing.

Well, at least it was slightly cooler now. He wondered what the other Rainlords were up to. The street had emptied of all bystanders a while ago, so he looked around for Dimas and soon saw him standing next to Horatio Blackburn and Salvador Delaguna, along with a slew of others that Hector recognized but couldn't name. One of them might've been Zeff's sister, but he wasn't sure.

They seemed to be talking to one of the Hun'Kui that Hector had encased in iron."

"1260

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 3))

That was good. Hector hoped they were making better progress than he was. With the sudden commotion about trying to not melt to death, he hadn't even been able to think about why they'd been attacked. Perhaps it had just been a misunderstanding. Looking back, he supposed he had kinda helped escalate the situation.

He hoped they wouldn't be upset with him. Something to worry about later, he supposed.

He turned back to Zeff and Asad.

They were still bickering. Only now, both of their reapers had joined in.

"Uh, guys...?"

They didn't hear him.

"Guys..."

Still nothing.

He turned to Garovel.

'Go on. You've got this.'

'But...'

'C'mon, Hector, you can do it. Command their attention as the Lord Darksteel of Warrenhold.'

Well, shit. When Garovel put it like that, Hector didn't even want to argue.

Alright.

He took a moment to deliberate, then started decorating the two men in iron paraphernalia. Iron spectacles for Asad, a dangling pocket watch for Zeff, a waistcoat for Asad, and as soon as Zeff paused in apparent surprise, Hector popped an iron umbrella into his hand.

They both looked at him.

“Are you guys ready yet?” He added a top hat to Asad and a monocle to Zeff, making sure to hook it around the ear so it didn’t fall off.

“My apologies,” said Zeff.

“Mine as well,” said Asad.

Hector paused, then gave Asad a walking cane, and Zeff, a curly mustache with a strap around to the back of his head.

“Stop that.”

“What are you doing?” said Asad.

And at the question he’d been hoping for, Hector couldn’t help smiling just a little. “I was just trying to help you start acting like lords again.”

There came a brief silence, and Hector worried he might’ve pissed them off. Then Garovel exploded with laughter.”

"1261

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 3))

The reaper’s amusement infected a few of the others, even getting to Axiolis and Qorvass, apparently.

For their part, however, Zeff and Asad did not look altogether pleased as they began walking toward him in unison.

“The young lord wishes to learn,” said Zeff.

“Then it is our duty to teach,” said Asad.

And so they taught. For quite a long while, in fact. And arguably, at times, against Hector’s will.

First, Zeff completed the technique he’d been trying to demonstrate earlier. It turned out much more advanced than Hector expected.

From the cloud of steam surrounding a blanket of water, Zeff clapped a full suit of solid ice armor around Hector's body. Then, he removed the cloud of steam, which made the blanket of water begin boiling--then hissing as it began turning to steam so quickly that the body of water looked as if it were melting into Hector.

When the water was almost all gone, the ice began disappearing as well. But it never quite did. Zeff had chosen to soul-strengthen vital areas of the ice armor; and moreover, to those areas, he had "bound" a self-regenerating condition. This was the technique that the Lord Elroy had been wishing to practice, apparently, and it resulted in an endless cloud of steam which followed Hector wherever he went--and without requiring Zeff to accompany him and maintain it, even.

Hector was suitably impressed, but Asad seemed upset that Zeff could pull such a thing off. Regardless, Hector all but demanded a full explanation for this "binding" thing that Zeff was using.

Asad took the liberty of explaining. "Essentially, it is a highly advanced memory technique which requires years of meditative training."

That caught Hector's attention.

"It allows the user to convert a task which normally requires active concentration into a task which does not."

Hector's brow rose as he tried to imagine that."

"1262

'Oh, hey, I'm familiar with that technique,' said Garovel. 'Even non-servants can do it, to an extent, no?'

"What?" said Hector. "Really?"

"Yes," said Asad.

'Speaking is a good example,' said Garovel. 'Normally, it requires active concentration, but it's certainly possible to hone one's ability to speak without thinking. Rote memorization is one way to accomplish it, but you can also learn to just babble words generically while thinking about completely unrelated things or nothing at all.'

"Wow," said Asad. "You explained it better than I was going to."

'Heh heh.'

"I wish you wouldn't boost his ego like that," said Hector.

'Oh, come on, I haven't gotten to explain anything this whole time.'

Beyond that, Zeff and Asad also lectured him on a few things he already knew about. Temperature manipulation, visualization, position and velocity states--the fundamentals, they called them. He didn't mind listening to their perspectives. If anything, it helped reinforce a few things in his head.

They made him practice, too. That was probably the part that he enjoyed the least, and the part that they clearly enjoyed the most. They made him try his hand at a suspended iron cube, using layers like Zeff had described, but it quickly descended into a jiggling mess that could scarcely stay afloat, let alone hold its shape.

After laughing at him vengefully, however, they were courteous enough to teach him an easier method of accomplishing a similar feat. Rather than using layers, he could simply create an object in midair, and then "grow it" straight upward at a speed equivalent to the acceleration of gravity. From there, he needed only keep annihilating it from the bottom while continuing to grow it from the top."

"1263

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Of course, it wasn't truly still, like Zeff's water had been. Hector could see the iron moving in place--and feel it, too, when he ran his finger across it--but the overall shape was almost trivial to maintain. It only took Hector a few seconds to get a feel for the acceleration of gravity, and then, like magic, he had it down.

Also like magic, he found it quite fun to stare at. He marveled at the iron cube hovering over the palm of his hand, feeling like a genuine sorcerer. But then again, he supposed he kind of was one--and had been this whole time, perhaps.

He was going to be playing around with this a lot, he felt. A perpetually falling-yet-stationary object. He wondered if it had any practical applications. He couldn't think of any, at the moment, but... hell, even if it didn't have any, that'd be okay, he supposed. The technique just had a kind of elegant simplicity to it, and he was slightly disappointed that he hadn't thought of it himself. And a bit surprised that Garovel hadn't known of it.

There was also another technique that they had been mentioning-- something they called "mapping," which Zeff seemed to finally be getting around to explaining, but as luck would have it, an interruption arrived before he could.

The other Rainlords had grown tired of waiting around for them and wished to proceed on, and Hector couldn't really blame them. By now, they'd probably interrogated every single one of the Hun'Kui who'd assaulted them.

'Shall we continue this later?' said Garovel.

"Very well," said Zeff, as the group began walking together. "In the meantime, work on your precision-crafting."

"And temperature manipulation," Asad added.

"Ah, yes.""

"1264

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

"If you can make a falling object float in place so easily, then your ability should already be more than strong enough to manipulate temperatures. It is just a matter of raising your skill level to match your raw power."

Hector tried to take those words to heart. After so many failed attempts on his own, he'd been growing discouraged and thinking that he just wasn't strong enough to manipulate his iron's temperature yet, but clearly, they knew better than he did. He just had to keep at it.

When they finally rejoined the other Rainlords, Hector's newfound status as a walking rain cloud was enough to earn more than a few looks. But at least it was quieter than that damn refrigeration suit. The steam did cause a kind of low hissing, but it wasn't so bad, comparatively. Hector was already getting used to it.

Either that, or perhaps Zeff had muffled the noise, somehow. The man had managed to ensure that Hector's eyes were never covered too much, so maybe that was possible, too. After everything he'd seen Zeff do and heard him say, Hector had come to have quite a lot of faith in the man's mastery over materialization.

As the Rainlords made their way through the streets of Babbadelo again, it was Mevox, reaper to Lord Salvador Delaguna, who began explaining what they'd learned from the Hun'Kui.

'So the local government here is in complete chaos,' said Mevox. 'Seems our arrival here is badly timed.' He paused for a low chortle. 'Or, AMAZINGLY timed.'

'You are beginning to sound like a lunatic again,' said Iziol, the reaper to Dimas.

'I don't need to hear that from YOU,' said Mevox. 'Anyway, like I was saying, this place is in chaos, right now, and the reason for it is dick-shittingly incredible.'"

"1265

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

'Ugh,' said Iziol. 'MUST you speak that way?'

'Yes! Now quit interrupting me!'

'The reason is a treasure hunt.'

'Oh, you thunder-stealing bastard!'

"Treasure hunt?" said Asad.

'Rumors are swirling that--'

'No, shut up!' said Mevox. 'Rumors are swirling that there's a crazy treasure trove somewhere around here! Something that's been thought lost for centuries!'

'Wait a minute,' said Qorvass. 'Centuries? You're not talking about the Hand of Arkos, are you?’

‘Actually, no, I’m not,’ said Mevox.

‘Oh,’ said Qorvass. ‘Well, forget I said anything, then.’

Axiolis chimed in now. ‘Are you talking about the Shifting Spear of Logante?’

‘Nope, not that, either.’

‘What about the Lost Library of Erudia?’ tried Garovel.

‘Are you kidding? Why would that be here?’

‘I dunno. That’s why I asked.’

‘Ooh!’ said Iziol. ‘Is it the Repeating Discs of Karugetti?’

‘Nope, that’s not--wait, what? You already know what it is!’

‘I just wanted to participate.’

Garovel tried again. ‘How about the Crown Jewels of Yena Maria?’

‘Still nope.’

‘Is it the Golden City of Arnuwe?’

‘No.’

‘The Golden City of Pomurnen?’

‘No.’

‘The Golden City of--’

‘It’s not one of the golden cities. Those probably don’t even exist.’

‘Hey, don’t be like that.’

‘I do not suppose it is the Fountain of Lhutwë, is it?’

‘Oh, wow, no. Could you imagine?’

‘I could, yes.’

‘What about the Daring Doll of Damian?’

‘That dumb shit?! Thank god it’s not that!’

‘How about the Undulating Arch-Throne?’

Mevox broke for a hearty laugh, then said, ‘Oh, I wish. That would be amazing.’

‘Could it be the Rolling Fists of Chaos?’

‘Nope.’

“Perhaps you should give them a hint,” offered Asad.

‘No!’ they said in unison.

‘Be quiet, Asad.’”

"1266

Their game continued for quite a while, and as much as he would have liked to know more about the ancient treasures of the world, Hector found it difficult to keep listening to them just endlessly naming things.

But it reminded him. Didn’t they already have some legendary treasure with them? His eyes went to the bag on Asad’s back.

He could still sense the Shards there. In fact, he’d been sensing them this whole time and just kind of gotten used to the feeling. For the most part. It was like a slow, gentle pulse that existed underneath everything. Easy to overlook when he wasn’t focused on it, but always there, like a heartbeat.

He’d yet to mention this to Garovel, as it had simply slipped his mind, but clearly, he needed to.

‘...Is it the Sosho’Diyu?’ said Axiolis.

‘Yes!’ Mevox finally said. ‘That’s it! You got it!’

‘Ha!’

‘Aww...’

“What is this Sosho’Diyu, then?” asked Zeff.

Mevox was eager to answer. 'It's supposedly the final resting place of one of the greatest thieves in history. He was so great that no one ever learned his name, in spite of the fact that he stole enough money to bankrupt five kingdoms.'

"Wow," said Zeff.

'Is that all you know of it?' said Axiolis.

'Uh,' said Mevox. 'Yeah, why?'

'Because that is not the whole story.'

'Oh? Do go on.'

'The Sosho'Diyu is a term from the Aidai language. In Mohssian, it roughly translates to "the Grave of the Underworld."'

'Oh... I'm guessing there's a reason for that, huh?'

'Yes,' said Axiolis. 'This thief, as you said, was unknown, but the story also goes on to say that he stole something so immeasurably valuable that the Gates of Hell opened, and the God of Death came to claim it from him.'

A beat passed as, apparently, no one knew what to say to that.

'Huh,' said Mevox. 'Well, that's a bit of a mood killer.'

"1267

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

After that, the reapers continued on discussing ancient treasures, some they'd already mentioned, some they hadn't. Regardless, Hector found it difficult to keep listening. The pulse of the Shards had his attention again.

Or, in a way, it felt almost like they wanted his attention.

Then again, maybe they did. They did have a mind of their own, after all. Maybe Rasalased wanted to talk to him or something.

Now there was a thought.

He wanted to consult Garovel about it, but the reaper was still conversing with the others.

So instead, he found himself saying, “Hey, uh, Asad...”

The Sandlord turned to look at him.

He wondered how to broach the subject without sounding like a lunatic. “Uh... I, uh... I forgot to ask you earlier. Were you and Qorvass able to talk with Rasalased?”

Hector had, of course, already told them about meeting the Dry God. As soon as he'd returned the Shards to Asad, it was the first thing that came up. And to say that Asad and Qorvass were surprised, would be an understatement. Rather, they had required about an hour to fully process that bit of information, asking disbelieving questions intermittently, not all of which Hector and Garovel were able to answer.

And so, when Asad looked at him now with an expression that was equal parts doubt and disappointment, Hector understood why. “No,” said Asad, “we haven't managed it, yet.”

That was strange. Hector thought it would be easy for Asad, now that they'd “woken” Rasalased up or whatever, but maybe it wasn't that simple. Maybe that encounter with him really had a been a freak accident, after all. He did recall Chergoa mentioning something about a “hyper anomaly,” though he was pretty sure she'd been joking.

Whatever the case, it didn't change what he wanted to ask, here and now.”

"1268

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

“Would you mind letting me hold one of the Shards again?” said Hector.

Asad hesitated. “Why?”

“I... I think Rasalased might be trying to talk to me.”

“...What makes you think that?”

“Uh... it might sound a bit hard to believe.”

“I’ll try to keep an open mind.”

Hector frowned. There was no dancing around it, he supposed. “I can sense the Shards. Somehow. Like... like they’re alive. And. Sort of. Calling to me? Does that make sense?”

‘Not really,’ said Qorvass, who’d apparently started listening.

The reapers had finally stopped blabbering on about treasure, Hector realized.

Asad was already digging through his bag, however. He pulled out a Shard. “Here.”

Qorvass looked noticeably more reluctant than his servant, and the pair of them paused in silence briefly, perhaps exchanging words between themselves.

Hector accepted Asad’s offer. His cloud-coated hand touched the Shard, and a shiver shot up the length of his arm and straight into his brain.

And a sense of familiarity washed over him.

But nothing else happened, seemingly.

He’d stopped walking with the group, he realized, and began to feel a bit light-headed. He needed to pay better attention to his surroundings, he told himself, rubbing his forehead. He’d been letting himself get distracted way too easily, especially in this new and dangerous place. He was supposed to be staying alert.

“Are you okay?” Asad and Qorvass had stayed back with him. The others had stopped just ahead of them, and Garovel was floating over now as well.

“Y-yeah...” He inhaled deeply, thinking. The daze in his head was clearing. He couldn’t hear Rasalased. But maybe he needed to initiate the conversation. He wasn’t sure how else to begin, so he just tried to concentrate on the Shard, to think into it. ‘...Hello?’

‘...Hector?’ came the response.

And he blinked. Multiple times. Because, somehow, he could immediately tell who he was talking to. And it wasn't Rasalased. It was Emiliana Elroy."

"1269 -- CXXXIX.

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Nine: 'Solicitous souls, take heart...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana couldn't believe what she'd just heard. Had that really been Hector just now? Was she hallucinating again?

The whole room trembled briefly as the storm outside raged with the strength of an earthquake for a moment, but she was growing accustomed to that by now and so didn't allow it to distract her.

'...Emiliana?'

She nearly laughed. 'Hector! It IS you!' She wasn't sure if she was happier knowing that it really was him or just knowing that she wasn't going crazy.

'How...? Uh...? What is happening, right now?'

'I have no idea,' she said, still smiling. She wasn't wearing her mask, as Gohvis had taken it from her.

'Where are you?'

'Oh, I--' And she hesitated. Impulsively, she wanted to say. Of course she did. But what logic would there be in that? So that Hector would come after her? Or, perhaps more likely, her father?

No.

She couldn't allow that. There was virtually no doubt in her mind that Gohvis would kill anyone who tried to take her away from this place.

'...I don't know where I am,' she said.

'...Are you okay?' said Hector. 'Is Chergoa?'

‘Yes, we are both fine. Gohvis has not harmed us.’ Well, technically, he had broken every bone in her body on the way here, she supposed, but he hadn’t permanently harmed her, at least.

‘So Ibai couldn’t get away, then.’

‘No. Gohvis is... inescapable, it would seem.’

‘I see...’

There came a long pause, as apparently neither of them knew what to say next.

Hector was the one to pick it up again. ‘Oh! Your father wants to talk to you. Here, I’ll put him on.’

Emiliana held her breath as she waited to hear her father’s words.

But they never came."

"1269 -- CXXXIX.

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Thirty-Nine: ‘Solicitous souls, take heart...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana couldn’t believe what she’d just heard. Had that really been Hector just now? Was she hallucinating again?

The whole room trembled briefly as the storm outside raged with the strength of an earthquake for a moment, but she was growing accustomed to that by now and so didn’t allow it to distract her.

‘...Emiliana?’

She nearly laughed. ‘Hector! It IS you!’ She wasn’t sure if she was happier knowing that it really was him or just knowing that she wasn’t going crazy.

‘How...? Uh...? What is happening, right now?’

'I have no idea,' she said, still smiling. She wasn't wearing her mask, as Gohvis had taken it from her.

'Where are you?'

'Oh, I--' And she hesitated. Impulsively, she wanted to say. Of course she did. But what logic would there be in that? So that Hector would come after her? Or, perhaps more likely, her father?

No.

She couldn't allow that. There was virtually no doubt in her mind that Gohvis would kill anyone who tried to take her away from this place.

'...I don't know where I am,' she said.

'...Are you okay?' said Hector. 'Is Chergoa?'

'Yes, we are both fine. Gohvis has not harmed us.' Well, technically, he had broken every bone in her body on the way here, she supposed, but he hadn't permanently harmed her, at least.

'So Ibai couldn't get away, then.'

'No. Gohvis is... inescapable, it would seem.'

'I see...'

There came a long pause, as apparently neither of them knew what to say next.

Hector was the one to pick it up again. 'Oh! Your father wants to talk to you. Here, I'll put him on.'

Emiliana held her breath as she waited to hear her father's words.

But they never came."

"1270

At length, she heard Hector again. '...Emiliana?'

'Yes?' she said.

‘Could you not hear him?’

‘No, I did not hear anything.’

‘Huh. He was trying to talk to you just now, though.’

‘Ah, then... perhaps this only works for the two of us.’

‘You might be right,’ said Hector. ‘You’re holding one of the Shards, right now, aren’t you?’

‘Yes.’

‘That makes sense. I mean, sort of. We both met Rasalased.’

‘And my father didn’t.’

‘Yeah...’

Another long silence.

Then Emiliana realized there was still a question that she desperately wanted an answer to. ‘How are Marcos and Ramira? Are they safe?’

‘Yeah. They’re doing just fine. They’re right here with me, too.’

Relief ran through her. ‘What about my father? How is he doing?’

‘...Well, he’s been through a lot, but... I mean, he’s handling it better than I would, I think. A lot better.’ Hector paused. ‘At the moment, though, uh... he doesn’t seem too pleased with me...’

‘Why?’

‘I think he’s mad that only I can talk to you.’

‘Oh.’ She smiled faintly at that.

And yet another intervening silence arrived.

As she thought about it, there were about a million other questions she wanted to ask--how the hell they survived their encounter with the Salesman of Death, for instance--but she was having difficulty deciding which question was most important.

Unfortunately, before she could make up her mind, the tall, forest green door on the other side of the room began opening, and she hurriedly pocketed the Shard. 'I have to go,' she threw out to Hector, but she didn't hear an answer, presumably because she had stopped touching the Shard directly.

Maybe it would've been better to keep touching it in her pocket, but she still wasn't quite sure how this all worked, and she didn't want the distraction right now.

The one who entered was not Gohvis. Instead, it was a mostly average-looking man, save for the large, arching horn in the middle of his forehead."

"1271

Upon seeing Emiliana sitting there on the edge of her bed, the stranger stopped. He said something in a language she didn't understand. After a beat, he said something else in what sounded like another language she didn't understand.

She merely tilted her head at him.

"Mohssian, perhaps?" he said.

She perked up. "Y-yes, hello."

"Ah, there we are. My apologies, cedo. I could have sworn that this was my room."

Emiliana wasn't sure how to respond.

"Alas, I do not recognize you," he went on. "Have you been here long?"

"Only a few days." She shifted slightly as she wondered if she should even be talking to this person.

"I see. Well, it is lovely to meet you, cedo. My name is Germal. Would you grant me the honor of knowing yours?"

She hesitated but said, "Emiliana."

"Ah. A name with its roots in the old Arman language, if I am not mistaken."

Perhaps it was time to ask some questions of her own. "How many languages do you know?"

The horned man paused pensively. "Eight, if I am trying to impress. Three and five-quarters, if I am not."

She merely tilted her head at him again.

Germal took a step farther into the room, but he left the door open. His attire looked like something a casual school teacher might wear, but the way he spoke seemed far from casual to her ears. Perhaps it was just his accent, though. She couldn't place it.

"Forgive me if I am mistaken," he said, "but you seem quite young, cedo, and those horns on your face--has anyone explained their significance to you?"

"What do you mean?"

He motioned to his own horn. "As a first experience with mutation, these are extremely common. Nearly universal, in fact. But few people know that the number of initial horns can be very enlightening.""

"1272

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 3))

The man had certainly gotten her attention. "Enlightening in what way?" she asked.

"For example, two horns are indicative of a predisposition for mammalian traits. Three horns are indicative of reptilian traits. Seven are indicative of avian. Ten, amphibian. Thirteen, I believe, are arachnid. And so on."

Emiliana noticed the most obvious omission. "What do four horns indicate?"

"I was rather hoping you would be able to tell me," said Germal. "The reason I broached the subject at all is because I have never seen four horns before."

That figured, she supposed, her expression growing briefly bitter. "What about one horn, then?"

Germal smiled. "Alas, I am also something of a curiosity."

How odd. Emiliana decided to take this man's words with a grain of salt. Primarily, she wondered what kind of mutations he had subjected himself to. Aside from that lone horn, she could see no other obvious modifications. And from what she knew of mutation, the ability would activate itself if he didn't use it for too long.

She considered asking him about it, but she wasn't sure how to phrase the question, and Germal asked something else before she could figure it out.

"Has anyone given you the grand tour, yet?" he said.

Gohvis had showed her around a little when she first arrived, but only enough to know where a few things were. She'd seen a kitchen, a handful of bathrooms, a whole lot of locked rooms, and one immense observation deck at the top of a flight of stairs.

That place had been particularly informative. The encircling view of the world's most notorious storm was something to behold. Bright as any cloud-covered day in one moment, dark as night in the next, followed by a string of lightning strikes that lit up the rocky and barren landscape like a strobe light."

"1273

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 3))

Extended tremors were frequent as well, usually following the abundant lightning but not always. Loud rain, louder hail, and ferocious blizzards were all equally common, from what she'd seen so far. It felt as if the weather in this place could change by the minute, and oftentimes, the entire building would shudder in its wake.

'Why have you brought us to Exoltha?' Chergoa had asked, much to Emiliana's surprise.

The Monster had not answered her, however. "I advise you not to set foot outside the Library," he said. "I may not stop you, but the Dáinnbolg certainly will."

And through the observation glass, Emiliana had seen it. A creature of unbelievable proportions, rising out of the ground--melting out of it, like some kind of phantom.

Its hulking form drew nearer, and Emiliana got much too good of a look at its grotesque body of black-and-red fire. Its five arms were long, spindly things that each looked big enough to cradle an elephant like a baby, and its gaunt face seemed to be less of a face and more of a loose amalgamation of constantly moving and twisting ridges.

“What is that thing?!” said Emiliana.

“A feldeath,” said Gohvis. “One of the many inhabiting this place. They do not like it when you look at them.”

It was close enough now that it was practically breathing on the observation windows. Assuming it even did breathe, in the first place.

‘A-are we safe from it in here?’ asked Chergoa.

“Probably.”

It opened its mouth, and a blinding light poured forth. Even with the unwanted filter on her eyes, Emiliana had to squint nearly to the point of closing them. And when the light subsided, it did not altogether disappear. Rather, it was replaced by that of a roaring inferno, as the creature had engulfed the exterior of the observation chamber in fire.

Gohvis didn’t seem too concerned about it, though. They retired downstairs soon afterward, and Gohvis took Chergoa with him, leaving Emiliana to her own devices. She hadn’t seen him since, but she could still feel his weighty presence in the air.”

"1274

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 3))

Chergoa occasionally chimed in to check on Emiliana, but the reaper was apparently being held somewhere, temporarily. According to Chergoa, Gohvis claimed that he would allow the reaper to roam freely soon, because the ground of Exoltha served as a kind of natural soul net and did not allow reapers to phase through it--or at least, not safely.

Emiliana had spent the intervening time in her room, mostly, while she mulled her situation over and played with the lone Shard in her possession. She was simply amazed that she hadn't lost the thing on the way here.

She did wonder where Ibai Blackburn had gotten off to, though. She even ventured off in search of him a couple times, but the layout of this place was beyond confounding, and she hadn't seen the man even once since they'd arrived here. She just hoped Gohvis hadn't changed his mind about killing him.

And so, at the moment, the prospect of having an actual guide for this labyrinthine building was quite appealing, even if she didn't know what to make of Germal yet.

She decided to accept his offer of a tour, and they left the room together.

As they walked down the first corridor, she thought of her first question. "Does this place have a proper name? I heard Gohvis call it 'the Library,' but I am not certain if that was a name or... um..."

"Perhaps you are confused by the noticeable lack of books around here, hmm?"

She bobbed her head. "That is one reason, yes."

"Would you like me to show you where the books are? That is undoubtedly where we will find Gohvis."

"Oh, um. Yes, please do."

"Very well."

"But... you never answered my question."

"Hmm? Oh, the name of this place. Yes, of course. This is the Library of Erudia. Or the Library of Erudition, if you prefer."

"1275

The name didn't mean much to Emiliana, but maybe Chergoa would be able to tell her more about it. She'd have to ask her later.

As they continued on, they met several other mutation users. Emiliana had seen a few of them already but hadn't gone so far as to speak with any of them. None of them looked particularly welcoming, but Germal seemed to have no reservations about initiating a conversation with each one.

The first was an apparent beetle-man with an enormous sword on his back. Germal asked him about Vantalay, to which the beetle-man grumbled about there being a spike in terrorist activity. Germal asked if he required help, but the beetle-man said that Gohvis had already promised him reinforcements.

After the beetle-man, they encountered a gorilla-man, a hawk-man, a falcon-woman, a crocodile-man who expressed interest in following Gohvis' example, a kind of chimera-creature mixing several different animals together, and one very large dog with a cigar in its mouth.

Not a dog-man. Just a dog. Or perhaps wolf. Emiliana had never seen a wolf in real life before, but she had difficulty believing that they were supposed to be this size. On all fours, it was nearly as tall as she was and seemed closer to the weight-class of a tiger, if not beyond it.

Ironically enough, despite not being able to speak, the dog was the one they spent the most time talking to.

"This is my traveling companion," said Germal. "His name is Koh. Perhaps you have heard of him?"

A bit hesitant, Emiliana just shook her head.

"The Silver Devil of Dante?" said Germal. "The Man-Eater of Melmoore?"

Emiliana blinked, because that last one did ring a bell.

Koh growled and bumped into Germal, knocking him on his ass.

Germal chortled as he stood back up and brushed himself off. "Forgive me. Koh does not like those names."

"1276

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Emiliana took a step back unconsciously as she recalled where she had learned of "the Man-Eater of Melmoore." It was her mother's doing. From time to time, the woman had forced her to study the names and accounts of notorious servants around the world.

As the name implied, the Man-Eater was supposed to have devoured upwards of four hundred people over the last sixty years or so. He'd become something of a Melmoorian bogeyman, and Emiliana even remembered reading one story about a village that formed a cult around his legend and conducted human sacrifices in order to appease him.

Looking at him now, Emiliana wasn't sure what to believe.

Koh puffed on his cigar and then swished it over to the other side of his mouth. He leveled his orange-eyed gaze her way.

"I think he wants you to pet him," said Germal.

Emiliana didn't think he wanted that at all.

"Go on. He will not hurt you. I give you my word."

She frowned and began moving her non-clawed hand slowly toward Koh's huge head.

For a time, Koh merely watched her hand approach, but then, apparently, he grew tired of waiting and met her halfway.

The top of his head was surprisingly fluffy. She scratched behind one of his ears, and the giant dog went abruptly limp and shut his eyes. He nestled up closer to her, and she brought her clawed hand up to use on the other ear. He seemed to appreciate that quite a lot.

After observing for a short while, Germal decided to interject. "Strange to think he used to be a grown man, eh?"

Emiliana's mouth flattened. Somehow, that idea began to spoil her enjoyment, and she pulled away.

Koh's eyes popped open, and he growled at the horned man again."
"1277

“Oh, did I ruin it?” said Germal innocently.

In an instant, Koh torpedoed into Germal and ripped one of his arms off. Germal shrieked as blood splattered across the corridor.

“REALLY?!” the man screamed. “WAS THAT NECESSARY?!”

Koh seemed content now, however, and had lain back down to start gnawing on his prize.

Germal gave a throaty groan as he tried in vain to stifle the bleeding with one hand. “Unbelievable. You realize, now we must arrange a meeting with Nerovoy? Which will put us behind schedule.”

Koh didn’t appear to care very much.

Emiliana had a handful of fresh questions, but she decided to start with the most courteous one. “Are you alright?”

“Yes, yes,” said Germal, sounding more annoyed than pained now. He pulled off his half-shredded overshirt and began trying to tie it around the open wound. “Heightened pain tolerance was one of my earlier modifications. I would highly recommend it, as soon as you are capable.”

Emiliana helped him finish wrapping it, more or less. She did know how to dress a wound properly, and that was most definitely not proper, but she supposed it didn’t matter so much for a servant. The main concern was just to avoid getting blood everywhere.

They decided to leave Koh alone after that.

Emiliana posed her next question while they walked. “So this Nerovoy is your reaper, then?”

“Yes,” said Germal.

“Why is... he or she not with you now?”

“He and I are rarely together,” said Germal. “The nature of our job keeps us very far apart.”

“What job is that?”

“Oh, it is quite dull. I doubt you would be interested.”

“I’ll be the judge of that.”

"Heh. If you must know, I am but a glorified paper boy.""
"1278

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

"What do you mean, 'paper boy'?" asked Emiliana.

"A deliverer of news," said Germal. "It is as mundane as it sounds."

A rather brief and dismissive answer, Emiliana noticed. She tried a different angle. "How old are you?"

Germal found the question amusing. "A word of advice, cedo. Inquiries such as those are invitations for lies. You will have to choose your words more skillfully than that if you wish to learn anything useful from strangers."

They came to an intersection of seven different hallways, and Germal chose the far right one.

Emiliana followed. "...So you are not going to tell me how old you are?"

"Would you trust my word if I did?"

"You've yet to give me a reason not to."

"Ah. In that case, I am three years old."

"...No, you aren't."

"And now I have given you your reason."

Emiliana smacked her lips. "Very well. If you will not tell me about yourself, then what can you tell me of Gohvis?"

"Ha! He is not prone to talking about himself."

"Yeah, I guessed as much. But is he as bad as everyone says?"

Germal stopped walking to look at her. "Everyone? Who is everyone, cedo?"

She wasn't quite sure what he was asking. "Um..."

"You have not heard what everyone says, I should think. If you believe that everyone thinks him evil, then you have heard but one side of the debate."

"Tell me the other side, then."

Germal continued walking. "The Black Scourge. The Monster of the East. In this place, and many others, those names are all but heresy. Speak them aloud and you are liable to receive a lashing that you will not soon recover from."

Emiliana just listened.

"Gohvis is a hero to many--and I do not mean only our kind. There are some places where he is even revered as the greatest hope for all humanity."

"1279

Emiliana found that rather difficult to believe but didn't think being rude would prove useful, so as sincerely as she could manage, she simply asked, "Why?"

"Because, for one thing, as far as I have been able to tell, he always acts either defensively or with great precision," said Germal. "Unlike many of his contemporaries, he rarely causes collateral damage. And for all their talk, many of the Vanguard's strongest cannot truthfully make the same claim."

That was hard to argue with, she supposed. All things considered, she didn't really know as much about the Vanguard as perhaps she should have; but after hearing the Lady Stroud talk about what transpired at Rheinhal... Emiliana didn't think she would be forgetting the names Sanko, Parson Miles, and Xavier Lawrence anytime soon.

"For another thing," Germal went on, "Gohvis is not trying to annihilate humanity, as you have no doubt heard. On the contrary, he is trying to ensure its survival."

Beyond all others thus far, Emiliana found that claim to be exceptionally dubious. She decided to keep her mouth shut, however, as she began to notice tall bookcases replacing the walls of the corridor. And indeed, they soon arrived at their destination. The hallway opened into an enormous chamber--much more enormous than she had been expecting, in fact.

It was a great stairwell, she saw, and each floor was filled with thousands of books. The wide pit in the middle of the room offered a view that went both above and below, and while she could see a distant ceiling, she couldn't see a bottom floor.

Germal led her downward, and she tried to glimpse the titles of some of the nearest books, but they were in a language she didn't recognize."

"1280

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

As they continued, it was hard to not feel a bit overwhelmed by this place. Suffice to say, in her entire life, she had never seen so many books at once. Or even cumulatively, for that matter. And this scent. She had never thought of "knowledge" as a smell before, but that was what came to mind. Musty, papery, inky, dusty.

Comforting, in an odd way. Welcoming, perhaps. Intoxicating, too, somehow. As if every word on every page was simply waiting to be read.

She couldn't claim to have ever been an avid reader, really, but this place was making her wish she was otherwise. Surely, there must've been all sorts of juicy secrets hidden around here. Why else would Gohvis be interested in a library?

She stopped following Germal and, almost unconsciously, found herself drawing closer to the nearest bookcase. A quick peek wouldn't hurt. Her hand searched for a book.

Abruptly, Germal was right there next to her, holding her wrist. "I would not do that if I were you."

"Why not?" she asked.

"The Library of Erudition has three very important rules, so listen well," said Germal. "First, you can never take a book without the Keeper of the Library's permission. Second, any book you do take will return to the Library within twenty days. And finally, if you attempt to break either of the first two rules, the Library will devour your soul and every bit of knowledge that you carry.”

Emiliana just stared at him.

He moved her hand back down to her side for her. “Perhaps I should have mentioned that before we came here,” he said.

“Yes, perhaps.”

“The Library is a great honey trap, of sorts. I have heard that it has a will of its own and that it can be rather malicious.””

"1281

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Another tremor arrived, but it was more noticeable this time, because a crashing sound followed it, as well as a whole lot of rustling paper.

Emiliana and Germal both looked out over the anciently baroque handrail, searching for the source of the commotion amongst the layered sea of bookcases. They couldn't find it, but the noise never quite died down, only lessened to a background murmur.

“What do you think that was?” Emiliana asked as they continued on.

“At a guess, I would say the Library ate someone just now,” said Germal, “but... then again, perhaps not. It is not usually so aggressive.”

She squinted. “Are you saying that it normally eats people in an unaggressive manner?”

“As a matter of fact, yes. The Library usually consumes you via a kind of hypnosis. You begin reading, and then... you simply never stop. The desire to continue reading overpowers all others in your mind, even thirst and hunger and rest. And with every bit of knowledge you discover, with every new secret you unlock, a small part of your soul is overtaken by the Library. In the end, I suppose, you do learn all of the Library's secrets. The only problem is that, by that point, you've become part of the Library.”

That sounded awfully familiar, Emiliana felt. “How do you know so much about it?” she asked.

"The acquisition of delicate information is my trade," said Germal.

"...That is not an answer."

"Alright, fine, Gohvis told me."

The noise from before resurged and stole their attention again. This time, it sounded closer.

"You have heard the Library make these sounds before?" Emiliana asked.

"Yes, but only once. Gohvis had just discovered this place, and the Library was upset that it could not eat him. But that was years ago, and--"

A brown shade appeared, and then Ibai Blackburn was standing there next to her. "Hello, Em!" he said, all smiles. "Isn't this place great?!" He had a whole stack of books under one arm."

"1282

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

"Ibai, what are you--?" But Emiliana didn't get to finish her thought.

The bookcase next to them exploded into a flurry of pages that went straight for the middle-aged Rainlord.

But he wasn't there anymore. "Hey, this one looks interesting," came his voice from behind Emiliana and Germal, making them both turn. He pulled a book off the shelf there, and it exploded, too. But still not in time to catch him, apparently. "A History of Worms and Greatworms, by Leonardo Erickson." He was standing next to her again. "I think I've heard of him. He was a famous Vanguardian scholar, wasn't he?"

Another explosion of books arrived. It missed Ibai again, but Emiliana caught some of it instead and earned herself several enormous paper cuts extending all the way up her right arm.

"Oh!" Ibai bit his lip as he observed her from yet another new angle. "I'm terribly sorry about that. Maybe we should talk somewhere else."

“Yes, maybe we should,” she said, wincing and nursing her arm. She would’ve liked to have that heightened pain tolerance that Germal was talking about earlier.

He avoided another flurry of books and paper. “Okay!” he said. “We’ll catch up later! I’ll show you all the cool books I found!”

“Do try to be careful, please.”

“Aha! Sure thing!” He paused. “Oh, but wait, here! You might like this one!” He offered her a book titled The Many Mysteries of Mutation, by Agam Elroy.

And she very nearly took it from him before catching herself. “If I take that from you, the Library will come after me, too!”

“Really?”

“Yes! Didn’t you know that was why it was trying to kill you?!”

“Huh. I thought it just didn’t like me.”

“No! You need to put those books back or get permission from the Keeper of the Library!”

“Aw, do I have to?”

“Yes!”

"1283

“Fine,” Ibai pouted. “Where do I find this Keeper of the Library, then?”

“Bottom floor, most likely,” said Germal. After a beat, he seemed to remember something and added, “Oh, and the current Keeper is Gohvis, by the way. Perhaps I should have mentioned that earlier.”

Emiliana just kind of stared at him.

“Ah, Gohvis, huh? I suppose--” Ibai was interrupted by the Library again, but this time, it wasn’t an explosion.

Instead, it was only a simple rumbling. Which grew more intense. And kept growing more intense. Until Emiliana was sufficiently unsettled and began to prefer explosions.

Every single bookcase in her line of sight was shaking, even the ones on the other side of the room's center pit.

Ibai smacked his lips. "Well, I'm going to go now." He teleported away just as the room erupted into a storm of paper.

Thousands of books and pages flew together in the center of the room, coalescing into a single, connected form, and a kind of hulking serpent was born. It spiraled in place for a moment, hovering, and then snaked up and over to the floor directly above them. A cluster of familiar crashing noises soon followed. Then there was a pause. Then more crashes.

The pattern repeated from there, and Emiliana got the feeling that it wouldn't be stopping anytime soon.

At length, Germal began leading her downward again. "...Is your friend going to be okay?" he asked.

"...I have no idea."

When they finally did reach the bottom floor, the first thing Emiliana noticed was a gargantuan pile of bones just sitting there by the stairwell.

"Are these dinosaur bones? Shouldn't they have a proper display exhibit or something?"

"Those are not dinosaur bones," said Germal. "Those are the Library's previous Keeper."

"1284

Emiliana had to stop walking and eye the bones anew. The previous Keeper? The skull did look vaguely humanoid, but it was far too large, and the cuspids were much too long and sharp. Not to mention, the cranium was wildly misshapen.

Or, wait. No.

It wasn't so much misshapen as it was smashed in, she realized. There were cracks all along the sunken cleft where the forehead should've been, and most of the occipital bone was simply missing.

She was almost afraid to inquire any further. "...Did Gohvis do this?"

Germal gave an affirming nod. "The Keeper would not allow him to take more than one book at a time."

"So he killed it?"

"The creature had been in thrall to the Library since eons past. Letting it live would not have been a mercy."

Emiliana wondered about that. She crouched down and ran her fingers along the front, side, and upper sections of the old Keeper's skull. It was as she thought. "...And punching it so hard that its brain flew out the back of its head? You call that a mercy?"

Germal seemed confused. "How--?" He blinked a couple times. "You figured that out from touching it just now?"

She pointed to the fractured indentation above the eye sockets. "The brow bone is incredibly thick--noticeably more so than the rest of the skull. If not for that, I imagine the impact would have caused the entire head to explode."

"Impressive. I am student of anatomy, too. But then, I suppose we all are, hmm?"

"I didn't do it to impress you."

"Hmph." Germal started walking again. "The creature died so quickly that I doubt it felt any pain. So yes, I would still call it a mercy."

Emiliana gave the bones one last look and then followed.

It didn't take much longer to find Gohvis."

"1285

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 3))

The Monster stood before an immense desk loaded with stacks of books that were as tall as he was. Beyond the desk, Emiliana spotted an enormous globe. It didn't seem to be what Gohvis was interested in, but it caught her attention nonetheless, what with the way its polished metal shimmered against the countless amber lanterns spread throughout the Library.

As they drew nearer, Emiliana heard Chergoa's soundless voice speaking continuously.

'--thus, the Primordials grew to know shame for all they had wrought, and only then did the Void deign to claim them. The land, the sea, and the sky lamented their loss, and the Heart of the World raged in molten fury. But the Void refused to return them until they learned the meaning of--' The reaper stopped reading when she noticed Emiliana.

"What are you doing?" Emiliana asked.

'Gohvis asked me to translate these ancient tablets for him,' said Chergoa.

Emiliana wasn't sure what to say to that. She wanted to ask why the reaper was helping someone like him, but she supposed refusing wouldn't have been very smart, either.

"Your timing is unfortunate," the Monster said with his two voices. "We will speak later. Leave now."

"Is something the matter?" said Germal.

Gohvis opened his lipless mouth to speak, but paused and seemed to change his mind. "Nevermind." He grabbed the black mask that he'd confiscated from Emiliana before and offered it to her. "Put it on. And remain quiet."

And Emiliana was confused but not for long, because after a few moments, she felt it. Another enormous soul had arrived. One to rival Gohvis' own, perhaps.

She did as he'd asked of her. Not that he'd needed to. If anything, she was more comfortable in the mask.

At the far end of the room, a pair of doors opened, inviting some of Exoltha's furious wind and sleet inside, along with a man in a raincoat."

"1286 -- CXL.

Chapter One Hundred Forty: 'O, virtuous Wicked...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana followed Germal's ushering lead off to the side of the main path as the stranger approached.

Gohvis opened one of the drawers in his desk and retrieved a large jar from it. He circumnavigated the metal globe in the middle of the room in order to greet his visitor.

"So," came the man's two voices, "is there a reason you've been jilting my messengers, or do you just like making my life difficult?" He pulled the hood of his coat off, revealing his bronzy complexion more clearly, along with a dark, beastly mustache.

"It is not my fault if the Dáinnbolg kills them before they make it here," said Gohvis.

"You could've met them halfway. I'm sure they made it close enough for you to sense them, at least."

"I have been busy."

"And I haven't? You DO know that the Vanguard's nearly got us by the short-and-curlyes, don't you?"

"I have complete confidence in you, Jercash."

"Oh, is that right?" the man laughed. He shifted something that he was carrying beneath his raincoat. "I never thought it would be your kindness that you would kill me with."

Gohvis offered him the jar. "For all your complaining, you certainly took your time getting here."

Jercash accepted it. "Eh. I kind of didn't want him back. Guy's a real prick, y'know."

"I do know."

"Is that why you showed him who's boss?"

“He wanted to prove himself,” said Gohvis.

“Ah. Where’s Elinox?”

“Who?”

“Vanderberk’s reaper.”

“In the jar with him.”

Jercash held the jar up to his ear and shook it. “Awfully quiet in there.”

“The whining was obnoxious.”

“Agh. How bad is it?”

“The reaper should recover in a day or two.””

"1286 -- CXL.

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Forty: ‘O, virtuous Wicked...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana followed Germal’s ushering lead off to the side of the main path as the stranger approached.

Gohvis opened one of the drawers in his desk and retrieved a large jar from it. He circumnavigated the metal globe in the middle of the room in order to greet his visitor.

“So,” came the man’s two voices, “is there a reason you’ve been jilting my messengers, or do you just like making my life difficult?” He pulled the hood of his coat off, revealing his bronzy complexion more clearly, along with a dark, beastly mustache.

“It is not my fault if the Dáinnbolg kills them before they make it here,” said Gohvis.

“You could’ve met them halfway. I’m sure they made it close enough for you to sense them, at least.”

"I have been busy."

"And I haven't? You DO know that the Vanguard's nearly got us by the short-and-curlyes, don't you?"

"I have complete confidence in you, Jercash."

"Oh, is that right?" the man laughed. He shifted something that he was carrying beneath his raincoat. "I never thought it would be your kindness that you would kill me with."

Gohvis offered him the jar. "For all your complaining, you certainly took your time getting here."

Jercash accepted it. "Eh. I kind of didn't want him back. Guy's a real prick, y'know."

"I do know."

"Is that why you showed him who's boss?"

"He wanted to prove himself," said Gohvis.

"Ah. Where's Elinox?"

"Who?"

"Vanderberk's reaper."

"In the jar with him."

Jercash held the jar up to his ear and shook it. "Awfully quiet in there."

"The whining was obnoxious."

"Agh. How bad is it?"

"The reaper should recover in a day or two."

"1287

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 3))

"Mm," Jercash hummed, eyeing the jar another time. "So how'd he do, then?"

"I expected worse," said Gohvis.

"Oho! High praise, coming from you."

"He will still require babysitting for a while longer, I think."

"Well, yeah. Hell, with your little fire buddy running amok out there, I wouldn't mind being babysitted, myself."

"You fear Jackson that much?"

"You don't?"

"Hmph."

"That's not a no."

"Contrary to what you may have heard, I have no interest in fighting him," said Gohvis.

"That doesn't mean he isn't interested in fighting you. From what I've heard, he hates you more than anyone. Even Vanderberk. Hell, even my boss. And everybody hates that guy."

"What has that old loon been up to lately, anyway? I have not been keeping up with--"

"Whoa, whoa. No changing the subject. I want to know what you plan to do if Jackson hunts you down."

"If that happens, I will probably fight him."

Jercash's expression went flat. "That's it? You're just gonna fight him head on?"

"Probably."

"Ugh. Come on, man. I've got plans, here, and you're part of them, remember? And even if you weren't, I still wouldn't want you to die! You're the only real friend I have left!"

The Monster gave a low laugh--low enough, in fact, that Emiliana mistook it for a growl, at first, before being entirely surprised that he even could laugh. "Your concern is touching."

“You think I’m joking? Well, I’m not, goddammit. In fact, if I’m being completely honest, you’re probably the only person whose company I find even remotely enjoyable, anymore.”

Emiliana wasn’t quite sure what she was witnessing.

Gohvis still seemed amused. “I shall try not to die for your sake, then.”

“I’m not in the mood for your sarcasm, asshole. If you die, then who does that leave me with, huh?” He held up the jar again. “This shithead? Gimme a break!”

"1288

“You seem stressed,” said Gohvis.

“I am!”

“Perhaps a nice book would help you unwind.”

Jercash looked like he wanted to scream. After tapping his fingers against his forehead for a few silent moments, however, he composed himself. “...I still can’t believe that one of the most feared men in the world decided to become a librarian.”

“I think it suits me,” said Gohvis. “I only wish I had known about this place when I was younger. It would have saved me considerable grief.”

Jercash ventured over to Gohvis’ desk. “Your mutation studies are going well, then?”

"They are."

"Does that mean this dream of yours is--?" Jercash cut himself off as his gaze fell upon Germal and Emiliana. "Who're they, by the way?"

"My pets. You needn't worry."

Emiliana raised an eyebrow from behind her mask.

Jercash squinted. "Hey. We recognize you. You're Germal, aren't you?"

"I am." The one-horned man shuffled urgently forward to offer a handshake. "It is a sincere pleasure to meet you, sir. I am a great admirer of your work."

"We've met before, haven't we?"

"Yes, sir, although that was many years past. I am flattered you remember."

"You've earned yourself a few accolades since then." Jercash broke for another laugh. "The Gentleman of Palei. The Vanguard sure didn't like that nickname, did they?" He snapped his fingers a few times. "What was the one they tried to push on you, instead?"

"Ah, I am afraid I do not--"

"The Liar of Lyste. That's right. Quite catchy, in its own way."

"Perhaps a bit too catchy, where Lyste is concerned," said Germal.

"Ah, well, don't worry about it too much. What're you doing, hanging around with the likes of him? Is he keeping you here against your will?"

"Oh, you see--"

"Leave them be," Gohvis interrupted. "We still have much to discuss, do we not?"

"1289

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

"I'm just taking an interest in what my best pal--which is you, by the way--is up to," said Jercash.

"Mm."

"You don't need to hide anything from me. I am only here to support you in whatever capacity you require. And if that means unraveling a bit of the age old mystery that is you, then so be it."

Gohvis made no response.

"Alright, fine. I'll tell you more about my plans, if you tell me more about yours."

"There is nothing more to tell."

"Bullshit! There's something way off about this library. I'm sure it's just chock full of juicy secrets."

"I am merely using it to preserve knowledge."

"Yeah, and my nineteen ex-wives all married me for love."

"I am sure it was your inability to let things go that won them over."

"C'mon, just clue me in a little bit. For old time's sake. I already know your endgame. Just tell me your next move."

"Studying is my next move."

"Ugh, alright, then what's the move after that one?"

"More studying."

"What's the move after you finish all your studying?"

"Researching."

"That's the same thing! I wanna know when you're gonna punch somebody!"

"I won't know that until I do more research."

"I will blow up this damn library."

"Jercash. I genuinely do not have any short-term plans that you would be interested in."

The man just looked at him.

"Shall I bring in the Weaver and have her read my mind for you?" said Gohvis.

"Yeah, I already know her power doesn't work on you. Nice try, though."

Gohvis gave a hulking shrug and returned to his desk. He began sifting through the books that he had stacked there."

"1290

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

"Fine, forget it," said Jercash. He pulled something out of his raincoat and placed it on the desk, knocking a number of tomes off.

Gohvis' tail caught each one.

"I brought you a gift," said Jercash.

Emiliana found herself wandering closer for a better look. It was a long, metallic object. A rifle? Her mother had taught her about a wide variety of firearms, but this one didn't look quite right to her eyes.

"Why?" was all Gohvis said.

"You can't tell?" said Jercash. "It's an ardor-fueled rifle from the Undercrust."

"Mm. How powerful is it?"

"This one? Not very. But stronger ones exist. Also, it has no fuel. I was wondering if you might be able to remedy one or both of those problems."

"Isn't this a task more suited to that lunatic of yours?"

Jercash clicked his tongue. "Morgunov was working on it for a little while, but then he got distracted. He's on some crazy feldeath kick, right now."

"That sounds rather dangerous, even for him."

"It is. But he's obsessed with finding the most efficient method for powering up aberrations.”

“He is trying to feed feldeaths to them?”

“Yeah. And I don’t think he’s had even one success yet. They keep dying. The leap in power might just be too great for an aberration’s otherwise normal body to handle. Or maybe he’s just having trouble taking feldeaths down, in the first place. I’m not sure. I didn’t stick around to observe.”

“He didn’t order you to help him?”

“Of course he did. I told him to get bent. I’m not fightin’ one of those damn things just so he can complete another one of his insane experiments.”

“That reminds me. What ever happened to that mechanical army he was trying to build?”

“Oh, he completed it. Then he destroyed it, because he didn’t like it anymore and wanted to start over.”

“I might have guessed.””

"1291

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

“If you have any idea as to how I can get his attention back to more pragmatic weapons development projects like this one, then I’d love to hear it,” said Jercash.

A beat passed, but Gohvis didn’t answer him. Instead, the Monster picked up the weapon and inspected it more closely.

“The primary problem is fuel,” said Jercash. “Even if we can’t figure out how to build these ourselves, we could always just steal them. But not having a reliable source of ammunition can’t be so easily remedied. Peacemaker’s been helping the Hun’Kui protect their resources, and even if she wasn’t, the refining and manufacturing processes are still largely mysteries, as well.”

“You are asking quite a lot of me.”

"I know, but I would be ever so grateful. And if not you personally, then you've got a few smart gents working under you, right?"

"As do you."

"Sure, but we've got our hands full. As soon as I return to Eloa, I'm gonna have Lamont, Kane, and Grant all breathing down my neck. Possibly Carson and Graves, too, since I'm not even sure where they are. Hopefully, your old man will be keeping them busy for us along with Sanko."

"What about Jackson?"

"Well, I'm pretty sure he'll be coming after you, not me, but if worse comes to worse, then maybe I'll just feed Vanderberk to him and run."

"Without even attempting to fight?" said Gohvis. "Have a few rumors made you so cowardly?"

"Hey, I haven't survived this long by relying on just strength."

"No. You have survived this long by getting people to underestimate you."

Jercash paused at that. Then he smiled and gave a dark laugh. "Well... not all of us can be flat-out unstoppable. I suppose we just come from different schools of thought, you and I."

"I suppose we do."

"1292

Jercash's gaze drifted toward Emiliana and Germal again. "This guy talks tough, but he's actually worried sick about me. I just wish he'd come right out and say so for a change. Is that so much to ask?"

"Your assessment noticeably left out the Crystal Titan," said Germal.

"Oh, I've got something that'll keep him occupied," said Jercash. He turned back to Gohvis. "But that reminds me. You wouldn't mind lending me a hand, personally, would you?"

"I already said no."

“C’mon, it wouldn’t be for long. A few days, tops.”

“The last time you said that, I ended up following you around for seven years.”

“Yeah, but that was a complex geopolitical situation that needed navigating. This’ll just be a quick favor.”

“You said that before, as well.”

“I just want you to help me gaslight a few people.”

“No.”

“And maybe scare a few others.”

“No.”

“It’ll be easy.”

“No.”

“Agh, fine. Then how about just lending me some of your people?”

“I do not have that many.”

“But the ones you do have are absurdly valuable. So just give me, like, ten.”

“You can take one.”

“Five.”

“One.”

“Four?”

“One.”

“Three? Pretty please?”

“One.”

“I hate negotiating with you.”

“None.”

“Alright! I’ll settle for one. Damn.”

“Who do you want?”

Jercash stroked his mustache. “...Can I have the dog?”

Gohvis thought a moment. “Fine.”

“Ha! Awesome. Thanks, best pal.”

“He will not go with you if he does not want to, however. You will have to persuade him.”

“Aw, shit, really? Can’t you just order him to follow me?”

“I could. But I am not going to.”

"1293

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

“Ugh,” Jercash groaned. “Where’s Ivan when I need him?”

“I doubt he would be able to help you here,” said Gohvis. “Koh bit Ivan’s head off a few years ago.”

“Hoho! So much for being able to strike a deal with anyone.”

“The Man-Eater is not known for his ability to operate discreetly,” Gohvis warned. “I would exercise caution, were I you.”

“Caution is my middle name’s motto, and exercise is its ugly sister.”

“Stop trying to sound clever.”

“Stop trying to sound... not cool.”

“What?”

“I don’t know. I changed my mind about insulting you halfway through that, so...”

Germal interrupted. “Would it be alright if I accompanied Jercash as well? Koh and I always travel together.” He motioned with his bloodied stump. “And I cannot ask Nerovoy to come to such a dangerous place in order to regrow this.”

Gohvis gave a silent nod.

"The more the merrier," said Jercash. "How did you lose that, anyway?"

"Koh."

"Shoulda guessed," said Jercash. "Has he maimed anyone else today?"

"Not today," said Germal.

Jercash glanced Emiliana's way. "Are you familiar with the saying, girl?"

She was a bit surprised that he could tell she was a girl with her mask on. "Ah--no. What saying?"

"Don't mess with the dog."

"Actually, Koh seems to like her," said Germal.

That gave Jercash pause. "Is that so?" He eyed Emiliana again. "And why might that be, hmm?"

"He is that way with all children," said Gohvis.

"Oh? I never knew that. So the Man-Eater has a soft spot, does he?"

"Most people do," said Germal.

"Most people are not dogs," said Jercash.

The conversation continued between the two of them, but Emiliana's attention went to Gohvis, who abruptly flew up three floors in a single leap and then returned a few moments later with a large book in hand. He offered it to Jercash.

"What's this?"

"The real reason I wanted you to come here in person."

Jercash inhaled audibly. "A gift? For me? You do care!"

"Shut up and take it."

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Jercash accepted the tome and flipped it over in his hands, inspecting it up and down. He opened it and began sifting through the pages.

“Hmm. What language is this?”

“Lyzakki,” said Gohvis. “And a few others.”

Jercash gave him a look. “The Lyzakks didn’t write books.”

“No, but they did preserve knowledge in stone.”

“Ah. So these pages are transcriptions, then?”

“Yes, from an underground ruin in Vantalay that I discovered some forty years past.” He held up Chergoa. “I had forgotten all about it until I recently acquired a Lyzakki translator.”

“Huh. Well, uh, that’s great, pal, but I can’t read this.”

“Find a translator for yourself, then.”

“Can’t you just lend me yours?”

“No.”

“But what if I--?”

“No.”

He smacked his lips. “Then could you at least give me the gist of what’s written here?”

“It is a rumination on the Theory of the Hidden Third.”

Jercash’s eyes widened. “Are you serious?”

“I also transcribed several passages from a few other sources that I found here in the Library. To my knowledge, there does not currently exist a more comprehensive pondering of the subject than the volume that you are holding right now.”

Jercash’s eyes widened even more. “Um. Wow. Just. Damn. Thank you.”

“Mm.”

And Emiliana waited, but from the way they were talking, it didn't seem like anyone was going to ask the question that she wanted answered. So she gathered her audacity and said, “What is this Theory of the Hidden Third?”

Jercash smiled at her. “That, dear girl-whose-name-I-still-don't-know, refers to a question that has been bothering us for millennia. And might you have any idea what that question is?”

She shook her head.

“Then I'll ask it to you. How many different powers does a single servant possess?””

”1295

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Emiliana wasn't sure what he meant. “Um...”

“Don't follow me? Well, okay, let's count them, then, shall we? So we've got our primary power: the ability which varies between servants. That includes all our transfigurations and materializations and so on. We lump all those together as one power because every servant only gets one, right? Right. Okay.”

“The World,” said Gohvis.

Jercash threw him a confused glance but kept going with Emiliana. “So what other powers do we have?”

Emiliana thought about it. “Regeneration?”

“Ah, yes, but that is not ‘ours,’ so to speak. Regeneration, enhanced strength, and so forth--these things come from reapers, not from us. They must be actively granted to us.” He broke for a moment of deliberation. “But, I suppose it must be said that you lovable mutant freaks may be somewhat of an exception on that count, simply because of all the strange ways you've learned to manipulate your ability. But I digress. Try again, girl.”

“...Soul power?” she said.

“That’s right. So between our--”

“The Heavens,” said Gohvis.

Jercash clicked his tongue. “What’re you on about?”

“...Continue,” was all Gohvis said.

“If you’d like to take over, then go right ahead.”

The Monster didn’t respond, and instead merely returned to looking over the materials on his desk.

Jercash exhaled half a sigh before addressing Emiliana again. “So between our abilities and our souls, we have these two major powers. And together, they have created a kind of ‘great duality’ that we’ve come to know quite well over the last few thousand years.

“But the Theory of the Hidden Third suggests that something else exists, as well. A third power that we still don’t fully understand yet, perhaps because we only ever catch glimpses of it. Like with, most notably, emergence. What really causes emergence, hmm?”

"1296 -- CXLII.

Emiliana didn’t know what to think. Truth be told, she’d never really imagined that there could be some other power that even her parents hadn’t known about.

“So you see,” Jercash continued, “it’s quite the subject that my best pal over here has gifted me a few clues for. What a guy!” He turned to Gohvis and opened his arms wide. “C’mere, ya big palooka. Bring it in.”

Gohvis did not bring it in.

Jercash nodded and then went in for the hug, anyway.

The Monster only stood there, as reciprocative as a demonic statue.

Emiliana was mainly just surprised that he didn’t try to rip Jercash in half.

Jercash released him. "Did we just have a moment? I think we just had a moment."

"Do that one more time, and you will not be having moments of any kind ever again."

Jercash just laughed.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-One: 'O, perilous mediator...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

This was the third fortress he'd visited in as many weeks, and admittedly, the famed Lava Base of Dagerto was a wee bit more intimidating than the others, what with its jet black walls that rose to arching points and its many turreted lookouts that linked up with the cavern's rocky ceiling. Not to mention the various spouts and streams of actual lava running through it. The place even boasted an enormous lavafall in the middle of the compound, passing right by the central lookout's main window.

And sure, perhaps blending in among the average citizens of the Undercrust was considerably more difficult than it was on the surface. And certainly, most of the servants around here were powerful enough to pound him into an Atreyan steak sauce if they realized he wasn't supposed to be here.

But Roman hadn't let any of that stop him."
"1296 -- CXLI.

Emiliana didn't know what to think. Truth be told, she'd never really imagined that there could be some other power that even her parents hadn't known about.

"So you see," Jercash continued, "it's quite the subject that my best pal over here has gifted me a few clues for. What a guy!" He turned to Gohvis and opened his arms wide. "C'mere, ya big palooka. Bring it in."

Gohvis did not bring it in.

Jercash nodded and then went in for the hug, anyway.

The Monster only stood there, as reciprocative as a demonic statue.

Emiliana was mainly just surprised that he didn't try to rip Jercash in half.

Jercash released him. "Did we just have a moment? I think we just had a moment."

"Do that one more time, and you will not be having moments of any kind ever again."

Jercash just laughed.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-One: 'O, perilous mediator...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

This was the third fortress he'd visited in as many weeks, and admittedly, the famed Lava Base of Dagerto was a wee bit more intimidating than the others, what with its jet black walls that rose to arching points and its many turreted lookouts that linked up with the cavern's rocky ceiling. Not to mention the various spouts and streams of actual lava running through it. The place even boasted an enormous lavafall in the middle of the compound, passing right by the central lookout's main window.

And sure, perhaps blending in among the average citizens of the Undercrust was considerably more difficult than it was on the surface. And certainly, most of the servants around here were powerful enough to pound him into an Atreyan steak sauce if they realized he wasn't supposed to be here.

But Roman hadn't let any of that stop him."
"1297

Of course, it would have been easiest if they would've just let him in as an official Atreyan ambassador in the first place. But no. Apparently, the base was on some kind of low-level lockdown and not permitting any unexpected visitors.

Normally, Roman might have given up there and simply moved on to the next location on his list, but as it so happened, Roman knew a little something about the visitors that Lava Base was expecting. The previous fortress that he'd been to was sending a replacement janitor to fill in for one who had fallen ill. So it was just a matter of ambushing the poor guy along the way and assuming his identity.

Unfortunately, that same poor guy had been a Hun'Kui, which meant that Roman needed to disguise himself as one. Which was certainly a new experience for him. He'd used body paint before but never to this extent, and it seemed like the materials that they used here in the Undercrust were different, too. Of course, the paint did have to endure much higher temperatures, but was it supposed to be this itchy? He was beginning to think he was having an allergic reaction.

Maybe that was just from all the shaving, though. He'd never been so hairless in his entire life.

The disguise didn't end there, however. His non-glowing eyes would've been a dead giveaway, obviously, but he'd found an easy solution to that. Many of the Hun'Kui had taken to wearing goggles. At first, he'd thought they were just some kind of fashion trend, but Voreese eventually discovered that these things were infused with ardor, and when wearing them, the Hun'Kui could see reapers.

Suffice to say, Roman was surprised.

And so, here he now was, navigating through Lava Base as a mostly naked, goggle-wearing, gray-skinned janitor. He didn't think he'd be forgetting this experience for a while."

"1298

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 3))

All things considered, though, Roman wasn't too impressed with this place's security. They barely even questioned him upon his arrival; and these weird metallic credentials that he'd spent two solid days learning how to forge properly--the security guards scarcely glanced at them. Even worse than that, for the last few weeks, he'd been working hard at honing his ability to eavesdrop over greater and greater distances, and had reached a point where he could listen through walls--a skill which he had used extensively in preparation for this infiltration. Dozens of conversations, he'd listened to, wanting to minimize the risk of being outed by any questions that the real janitor should've been able to answer.

But that was all unnecessary, it seemed. These people hardly gave him the time of day. He'd expected the Peacemaker's subordinates to be a bit more vigilant.

Maybe they just didn't see much action around here. The nearest town did seem pretty peaceful.

Come to think of it, with the way Voreese had described the Undercrust to him, he'd been expecting a hell of a lot more danger during this trip, but aside from one encounter with a feldeath, things had actually been rather nice so far. With his control over particle vibrations, the extreme heat was a complete non-issue for him, and most of the Hun'Kui that he'd encountered seemed nice enough. Sure, he couldn't understand a damn thing they said, but with Voreese as a translator, that wasn't much of a problem, either. Hell, even that encounter with the feldeath had resulted in another emergence for him.

On the other hand, all of this smooth sailing was beginning to make him wonder if he wasn't overdue for some truly terrible luck by now.

A sobering idea, to say the least.

He had to remain cautious, regardless of how lazy these people seemed, because if nothing else, he could certainly sense that someone big was here. This presence that he was feeling was not normal. Not at all."

"1299

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 3))

He supposed he should locate this heavy hitter first, and given the layout of the compound as he understood it, the central tower seemed like the best place to start.

He caught some servants littering along the tilestone pathway that led there, so he decided that he might as well do his fake job while he was here. He tried to give the offenders the stink eye, but his goggles probably got in the way, he figured.

Either that, or these people just didn't give a shit.

Hmm. The more time he spent here, the more he noticed that no one was really looking at him. Like they were avoiding eye contact. Or simply looking through him, perhaps. He couldn't quite--

'How's it going in there?' came Voreese's concentration-ruining voice, as usual.

'Hey, these goggles aren't making me invisible, are they?'

'What? Of course not. The hell kinda dumbass question is that?'

'It just feels like no one's even noticing me.'

'What, are you lonely without me there to baby you?'

'I'm serious. This whole atmosphere is off. And I don't like it.'

'Relax,' said Voreese. 'I'm sure it's just 'cuz they think you're a Hun'Kui. I've been listening to people all over Dagerto, and it sounds like the Hun'Kui around here are being treated a little bit slavishly by Sai-hee's people.'

'...That's supposed to make me relax?'

'Sure. Nothing suspicious is going on. They're just a bunch of horrible racists.'

'How comforting.'

'Actually, though, the situation seems a little more complex than just that. From the way some of these Hun'Kui talk, they're kinda dickish, too.'

'They were nice enough to me,' said Roman.

'I think that was because they could tell you were a surface-dweller. And you were alone. A single outlier is interesting. Charming, even. A whole group of 'em, though--that can be kinda overwhelming and scary.'

'Lava Base isn't exactly new,' said Roman. 'Shouldn't these people be beyond any initial unease by now?'

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 3))

'Maybe,' said Voreese, 'but I'm also hearing talk about some kind of recent coup that has everyone on edge.'

At that information, Roman stopped walking and sized up the central tower in front of him one more time. 'Coup? What kind of coup? And where did it happen?'

'The extremely bloody kind of coup. And apparently, it happened in Acacero.'

'And how far away is that?'

'Pretty far. In the Higher West layer. It's a good two days' ride by train from here.'

'Hmm.' He entered the tower and started making his way up the eastern staircase.

'It's fairly close to Capaporo, though. Which is where the hole to Warrenhold is, as you may recall.'

'Oh. Excellent.' Roman arrived at the second floor and stopped as a thought struck him. 'Wait a minute. Did you say you were wandering around town? You're supposed to be watching the guy I kidnapped.'

'I am.'

Roman waited.

'...More or less.'

'Voreese.'

'I'm keeping a good view of the shed he's in. Besides, the fuck am I supposed to do if he escapes, anyway?'

'Uh, tell me so that I can go recapture him, maybe?'

'You can't just drop everything and leave Lava Base now that you're inside. Sai-hee's people would be suspicious as fuck.'

Roman wasn't so sure they would, but that was beside the point. 'If he gets loose, then this mission should be aborted.'

'Eh, it'll be fine. You used my godlike knot-tying techniques, remember?'

Roman could already tell that this was going to devolve into an argument of attrition, so he decided to just forego it entirely. 'Alright, shut up for a minute. I need to listen for conversations.'

'Don't tell me to shut up. I'll talk as much as I please.'

'I'm trying to not get killed here, Voreese.'

'Maybe you should try to not be such a rude prick, while you're at it.'

Mercifully, however, she did in fact go silent after that, and Roman began listening for voices beyond the wall on his right."

"1301

He found one conversation about television and another about sleeping. Strangely, that second one was so mundane that it actually held his attention for a bit before he moved on. He soon found a third one about toilet paper and then a fourth about muscle cramps.

All in all, he wasn't terribly surprised. He'd been eavesdropping on these people for the last few days, and this was about the same level of intrigue that he'd come to expect. He did manage to learn a couple more names, though, in the increasingly unlikely event that anyone ever bothered to question him.

Really, though, he was just looking for someone named "Leo." From everything he'd heard, that name belonged to the person in charge, which meant that was probably who he wanted to talk to.

But then again, he had to wonder... maybe this was just a waste of time. Even if he did convince these people to return with him to Atreya... would they even prove themselves useful? They hadn't exactly inspired much--

"YOU ARE A DISASTER!"

Roman winced. He held his forehead and waited for his right ear to stop ringing. When it did, he shook his head, blinked a couple times, and then searched for that conversation again, making sure to reduce the volume. It had come from a few floors above him, he was fairly sure.

--a mess! Honestly, Leo! What the hell have you been doing here?!"

"Just, y'know, man. Relaxin'. Takin' it one day at a time. I don't see what the big deal is, inspector-man."

"The big deal?! The lava isn't supposed to be IN the compound, you moron!"

"Yeeeaah, but it's kind of a hassle to clean up, y'know? And besides, it looks pretty gone, don't you think?"

"Pretty what?"

"Gone. Y'know, like, outta sight. Cool as ice 'n beans, man."

"Argh, it's not cool! It means the structural integrity of your perimeter is compromised! And what if you ever have guests who aren't immune to lava, huh?! I shouldn't have to explain this to you!"

"I think you just need to take a chill pill, daddy-o."

"1302

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

"And you need to get your head out of your ass!"

"Man, nobody'll care if we just take the energy down a notch or two. This place hasn't been attacked in, like, a hundred years 'r somethin'. We ain't got no worries."

"It's actually only been forty years, but that's not the point. I'm telling you, Sai-hee wants everyone on high alert. And while we're on the subject of what she wants, is there a reason you failed to show up to the meeting in Acacero? Because she was not happy that you weren't there."

"Yeah, I know, man, and I'm real sorry about that. But it was just, like, I wasn't really feelin' it, y'know?"

"No, I don't know! What the hell are you talking about?!"

"It just, y'know--it sounded like it'd be a real drag. And I've been tryin' to eliminate as many stress-triggers from life as possible. Tryin' to live that healthier lifestyle and be one with Mother Nature, ya feel me?"

"Leo! People are depending on you! And whatever crap you just said is definitely not a good enough reason to simply stop doing your job without even telling anyone, you hippie bastard!"

"Hey, man, there's no need for name-callin'."

"Shut up! Do you even know how many problems you've been causing?! And what's all this I've been hearing about you treating the Hun'Kui around here like slaves?!"

"Yo, nobody's a slave, man. That's just them showin' their appreciation for us--same way we show our appreciation for them by keepin' 'em safe from all the bad juju down here."

"What?! That doesn't make any sense!"

"Of course it makes sense, man. Makes all the sense in the world. They volunteered to do chores 'n all sorts o' groovy things for us, man. What, you think I should've turned down their generosity?"

"Yes! You should've turned them down! It's a complete breach of protocol!"

"I don't know about that..."

"I do! And I know exactly what Sai-hee will think of it, too!"

"1303

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

"Ugh, man, why ya gotta be so uptight? We got a great thing goin' here, and you can't just show up outta the blue like this and talk all this smack like we ain't even civilized 'r nothin', man."

"Oh my goddess, Leo. Sai-hee is going to flip her shit when I tell her what you've been doing here."

"Well, then, maybe don't tell her, man."

"What? Of course I'm going to tell her. Your actions--or the lack thereof, I suppose--have consequences, Leo. Honestly, even for you, this is a new low. You've always been a bit lazy, but I've never known you to be irresponsible. And where the hell is Ericoros, by the way? He's at fault, too, for not keeping you in check."

"Oh, y'know, he was crampin' my style, so I decided to give him a time out for a little while."

After that, there came an extended silence. Roman looked around the open-air lobby another time and decided to keep heading up stairs, stopping intermittently to check if their conversation had resumed yet.

If nothing else, Roman knew that he wouldn't be asking Leo for help, but whoever he was talking to seemed to know what they were doing. Roman just had to find the right opportunity to negotiate with them. Admittedly, he wasn't quite sure how he was going to accomplish that just yet. Maybe start with a bit of stalking while he waited for an opening, and then if worse came to worst, he could always throw money at the problem and hope for the best.

He hated doing that, though. Winning people over with devilish good looks and a can-do attitude was always preferable, he felt.

'Leo...'

Ah, there'd been a reaper present, too, Roman realized. That might've explained all the silence. His ability couldn't help him hear voices that didn't actually make sound, obviously, but now that he was on the same floor as them, he was close enough to hear everything. Conveniently enough, he spotted a janitor's closet. Less conveniently, it was locked, and he wasn't sure he had a key for it or not, so he decided to just lean against the door while he listened.

'...Are you feeling alright, Leo?'

"Never better, man.""

"1304

‘Your behavior is worrisome.’

“Nah, dude, I feel great. The whole reason I joined up with the ole’ biddy in the first place was ‘cuz I wanted to enjoy some peace ‘n quiet, y’know? I was sick ‘n tired of workin’ hard all the time just to stay alive, man. But then the ole’ biddy just kept puttin’ me to work, anyway, and nothin’ changed, really. Until I finally pulled this gig here. And, I mean, it’s a cushy job, but somebody’s gotta do it, right? I don’t see why that somebody can’t be me.”

‘Listen, Leo. What you’re experiencing is not uncommon. Some might even say this is overdue for you. It’s natural for servants to go through a period of... self-reevaluation. But it WILL pass--I promise you. And until then, you need to--’

“I get that you’re concerned about me, man, and I appreciate that. I really do. But y’know, I’m pretty happy with the way things are around here. Might not seem like it, but these are some pretty cozy digs.”

“We’re glad you’re so comfortable here, Leo, but just to be on the safe side, I think I’ll schedule a meeting for you with Amaris.”

“That’s not necessary. I just wanna be left alone, man.”

“If you’re worried about Sai-hee, don’t be. We’ll work something out with her. Right now, the priority is making sure you’re alright.”

“Nah, you’re not hearin’ me, fellas.”

“We are, Leo. Everything is going to be just fine. You’ll see. Once we tell Sai-hee about what you’re feeling, she’ll--”

There came a great splattering noise. Followed by silence.

Roman blinked and strained to listen harder. He was able to make out a dripping sound but nothing else."

"1305

‘Uh, Voreese?’ thought Roman.

‘Yeah?’ she said.

'I think the leader of Lava Base just murdered one of his own comrades. Reaper included.'

'...Fuuuck.'

Roman pulled himself away from the janitor's closet and started back the way he'd come. 'Think I'll just--'

A door opened on the other end of the hall, and a man exited. He spotted Roman immediately and called out to him.

Roman tried not to wince and turned around to face him.

Long, frayed dreadlocks. A thick scraggly beard. Tattered clothing.

Yeah. That was probably Leo, Roman figured as he approached. And when he got close enough, Roman also discovered some of the worst body odor that he had ever encountered. He had to stop breathing for a few seconds in order to process how putrid the man smelt.

Leo said something to him, but it was in Hunese, so Roman had to repeat it to Voreese for a translation.

'He wants you to clean his room,' the reaper said.

And indeed, Leo motioned him into the chamber.

Much as he didn't want to, Roman did as he was bid.

Huge swaths of blood covered the far wall, as well as the desk in the middle of the room. There was no body, from what Roman could see, but he did spot a few chunks of flesh here and there.

Roman bit his lip, gave the man a nod of acknowledgement, and then turned to leave again, hopefully convincing Leo that he would return shortly with cleaning supplies.

However, at that moment, an unfamiliar figure appeared as if from nowhere, phasing into existence right in front of Roman and Leo both.

It pulled its hood back, revealing a face wrapped entirely in dark bandages, and then offered Roman a letter and a cellphone.

'Uh, Voreese?' he said again.

'Now what?'"

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

'Would you happen to know why there's some kind of horrifying mummy creature standing in front of me right now?' said Roman.

'Holy shit, that's a Courier! It's not there for you, is it?'

'What do you--?'

Leo intervened, trying to take the Courier's items for himself, but the man's hand simply phased through the letter and cellphone both. His expression turned to confusion, and then his eyes fell to Roman.

'...Yeah, I think it's here for me.'

'Well, what'd you get?'

Still hesitant and wondering if he should even accept this delivery, Roman eyed the letter more closely. That was when he noticed the words "From Hector" written in Mohssian on the envelope.

'...A letter from Hector,' he told Voreese.

'Okay, WHAT?! Hector?! How could he have--?! When did--?! What has he been DOING?! How in all of fucktitude did he get access to a motherfucking Courier before WE did?! And we're not even CLOSE to getting one, either! This is some horseshit! He and Garovel are fucking cheaters!'

Roman, realizing that he was probably fucked either way now, decided to just take the items while Voreese was busy ranting. As soon the letter left the Courier's grasp, it burst into flames, and Roman panicked as he scrambled to rescue it. He sucked all the heat out by suppressing particle vibrations around the paper, and the fire quickly died.

He added both objects to the invisible, heatproofed veil that he'd been using for his entire body, and then finally opened the singed letter to read it, glancing at Leo in the meantime.

The man was simply observing with apparent curiosity.

Roman read as fast as he could, but there was a lot written there, and he didn't quite manage to get through it all before Leo took it from him. He maintained his veil around the letter in the hope that he might be able to get it back."

"1307

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

'So what'd it say?' asked Voreese.

'Hector and Garovel are in the Undercrust,' he said. 'They need your help finding something. Leo took the letter from me before I could read the rest.'

'My help? Oh, are they lost? Trying to find the way back up to Warrenhold?'

'Not sure. I think there was something about Rainlords in there, too.'

'Oh, fuck, seriously? Not THEM.'

'What's wrong with Rainlords?'

'Those motherfuckers collect problems like it's a contest. Good in a fight, sure, but asking them for help is like asking a guy on fire for a hug.'

Roman watched the Courier disappear into thin air. He still had a lot of questions about that, but at the moment, he was more concerned about what Leo was going to do next.

When Leo looked up from the letter, he merely stared at Roman.

'...Hey, are you dead?' said Voreese.

'Not yet,' said Roman. 'I might be okay. He still thinks I'm just a normal Hun'Kui.'

"You ain't no normal Hun'Kui, are ya?"

'Shit.'

"You from the surface?" Leo asked.

Roman wasn't sure what to say.

"C'mon, don't be all tight-lipped."

And Roman felt a sudden pressure all around him. Against his will, his next words were pulled from his mouth. "...Y-yes, I am."

"What're ya doin' down here?"

"...Looking for military aid."

Leo tilted his head at him. "Ya don't say? Huh. Well, this is a mighty strange way to go about it, if ya ask me. Why ya spyin' on me?"

Roman grit his teeth, but it didn't help. "I didn't want to ask the w-wrong person for help."

"Ah. 'n I guess you consider me the wrong person to ask now, eh?"

"Yes."

Leo offered the letter back to Roman.

Confused beyond all reckoning, Roman accepted it.

"1308

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

"You know who I work for?" said Leo.

"Y-yes," said Roman. He skimmed through the letter's contents again.

Leo shook his head. "Do you honestly think she'll help you, man?"

Roman returned a steady gaze. "I have to try, right?"

"The Peacemaker. Yeah." Leo smacked his lips and stepped over the streaks of blood and meat on the floor. He made his way to the boxy-looking couch on the other side of the room and plopped down. "I don't think you'd appreciate the kind of help that she'd give."

Roman felt the pressure all around him relent a little. "Why do you say that? What kind of help would she give?"

"She's not what people say she is. Maybe she used to be, but she sure ain't that anymore, man."

"So what is she, then?"

"She's not even human." He tapped a finger to his temple. "Up here, man. Everything's just a game to her. You want her to protect you? Ain't gonna happen. She'll sacrifice you and everyone you love without a second thought. She ain't no savior, man. Folks like to give Sermung and Dozer a hard time, but they don't know. She's worse than either of 'em."

Roman frowned. He didn't have a response for that. He returned to the letter and finished reading it. There were two locations where Hector suggested meeting.

"Oh yeah, and she hates the Rainlords, by the way," Leo added, nodding at the letter in Roman's hand.

"Why?"

"Some old beef, I'm guessin'. But I'm pretty sure she would've wiped 'em out years ago if not for the Vanguard, so... I'd be worryin' about that, if I were you."

Well, that was just wonderful. But with how seemingly candid Leo was being at the moment, Roman was feeling bold enough to inquire a bit further. "...Aren't you worried that she'll come for you now?"

"1309

"Oh, I'm sure she will," said Leo. "But she won't care that I killed one of her errand boys. She'll say she cares, but she won't, really. And, y'know, even if she does care... I just don't feel like runnin', man. Too much hassle."

Roman just frowned at him.

"And my days are numbered, anyway. Ericoros will never allow me to quit my job, which means I can never trust him again. And once that crucial element between reaper and servant has been lost? Well, you can struggle all you like, but it's just a matter of time before someone gets got." He sat back and closed his eyes. "So in the meantime, I'd like to just enjoy an easy life, for a change. Maybe try to achieve enlightenment 'r somethin'. Become one with the universe, y'know? I feel like I've earned a retirement."

Roman didn't think that justified the murder that the man had just committed, but he decided to keep that opinion to himself. "...If you don't mind my asking, how strong are you, compared to Sai-hee's other supporters?"

"Oh, I dunno. I stopped paying attention to that ages ago, man. Too much trouble and ego involved."

"Sure, but you must have some idea."

Leo let out a prolonged sigh. "...Fifth, maybe?"

Roman blinked. "You're the fifth most powerful servant among all of Sai-hee's forces?"

"Actually, no, wait, Morrison killed himself a few years ago, so I guess I'm fourth, now. Or at least, I would be, if Ericoros and I were still getting along."

Even with this oppressive aura that he was feeling, that was still quite a bit higher-ranking than Roman had expected. If nothing else, it added credibility to the man's opinion of Sai-hee. Leo must've had many interactions with her."

"1310

Silence drew out as Roman deliberated over what he should do next. It seemed like Leo was done talking and had resigned himself to just sitting there with his eyes closed. Maybe it was okay to leave now? From everything he'd just said, it didn't sound like Leo would stop him. And certainly, Roman was not interested in acquiring the assistance of an apparently callous murderer.

But then again, Leo had been awfully forthcoming with useful information. And as a few more questions began brewing in his mind, Roman wondered what else he might be able to learn. Relevant intel could end up protecting Atreya just as effectively as any great warrior. Perhaps even more so.

He'd have to tread carefully, though. Clearly, this man was in an unpredictable state of mind, and if he came to think that Roman was trying to take advantage of him...

Well. In fairness, Roman was trying to take advantage of him.

Perhaps he would just test the waters with a bit of encouragement, first.

"...Maybe it's not too late to patch things up with Ericoros," Roman tried.

Leo didn't move or respond.

"I mean, yeah, sure, we all know how stubborn reapers can be," Roman continued. "They're so old, they think they know better than everyone, right? It's maddening. I get it. Believe me, I get it. But at the same time, that doesn't mean it's impossible to change their minds."

Still nothing.

"Just think about it for a second. The world is full of possibilities. So many things, just waiting to be discovered. Or rediscovered, even. And people! There are literally billions of people! And each one represents new potential. Potential for change. Both big and small. So is it so strange to think that one of those people might be able to help you change Ericoros' mind? Maybe the key to fixing your relationship is just... out there. Somewhere. Right now. Waiting for you to come and find it."

Leo opened his eyes. Granted, he didn't have the most optimistic expression on his face, but it was something, at least."

"1311

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 5))

"Look," said Roman, feeling the need to reign in the rhetoric a tad, "I don't know what all you've been through. You're much older and wiser than I am, so maybe this is just my youthful innocence talking, but after everything you've told me so far, it'd strike me as kind of a waste if you just gave up and waited for death."

Leo's half-drawn gaze lingered on Roman for a while before he finally spoke again. "Where're you from, big cat?"

Roman hoped that was a compliment. “Uh...” He wasn’t sure he actually wanted to tell him that information, though.

“Tell me.”

The pressure returned, and Roman no longer had a choice. “I-I’m from Atreya.”

“Atreya? Heh! Wow. I was born in Kahm.”

Roman felt the pressure go away again. “Really?”

“Yeah, man. My mama brought me into this world right near the border, too. Another fifty miles north, and I woulda been Atreyan, myself. Small world, eh?”

Roman was at a loss for words again. Impulsively, a part of him wanted to use this to convince Leo to help him, but he resisted the urge. There was just something very disarming about this guy. So laid-back. Not quite friendly, but... whatever it was, it made Roman want to like him, somehow.

Which was dangerous. He was flirting with disaster here, and he knew it. He’d gotten Leo to perk up a little, but now he needed to get to the point.

“So... if you don’t think I should go to your boss for help, then would you recommend someone else?”

Leo flicked at one of his dreadlocks as he mulled the question over. “Maybe Kane? He likes the Rainlords, I think... But nah, I doubt he’d go against the Vanguard for ‘em.” He paused for another thought. “Yeah, man, you’re screwed. Ain’t nobody gonna help you outta the goodness of their heart--‘specially not with all the baggage in that kooky letter of yours. End of the day, everybody’s just in it for them ‘n theirs, daddy-o. Risk aversion, ya feel me? ‘s in our nature.”

"1312

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 5))

“Oh, come on, there has to be someone,” said Roman. “You honestly can’t think of anyone? When was the last time you left this place, anyway? Maybe you need to get out more.”

Leo merely looked at him--but what a look it was. The twinge of irritation in the middle of his brow. The hint of disgust in his stiffened mouth. And that glare. That sharpness in the man's black eyes had most certainly not been there a second ago.

Roman felt the air shift again, turbulent this time instead of simply oppressive.

Alright.

Perhaps he'd gotten a bit careless with his words there. He decided to shut up and concentrate on not shitting himself.

“Even you are trying to make me leave?” growled Leo.

“It was just a suggestion,” Roman said with raised hands. “A bad one, I now see. You do you, my friend. Forget I said anything.”

A tense silence arrived.

Roman waited.

At length, Roman came to the conclusion that Leo wasn't going to kill or capture him. But the man wasn't going back to his previously relaxed self, either.

It seemed like nothing was going to happen unless he did something, so Roman decided to take his chance. “Welp, uh... Guess I'll leave you to it, then...” He started backing up and gave a small wave. “Nice meeting you and everything.”

“Stop.”

Roman stopped.

“Tell me,” said Leo. “...Why am I angry, right now?”

“Uh... excuse me?”

Leo put a hand to his own forehead, and his eyes went to the charcoal floor. “I haven't gotten angry in... in years, man...” He sounded genuinely confused.

Which made Roman genuinely confused.

Leo looked up at him another time, as if seeing him in a new light.
“...How did you make me angry?”

Roman was still lost. But he was beginning to think that this guy wasn't just being weird again."
"1313

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 5))

"I'm angry, because... because..." Leo stood to his feet and began pacing. "Because... because I'm tired of people telling me to leave. And I thought you were different. More zen, like I wanna be. But... but..."

"I am different," said Roman. "I am so different. You wouldn't even believe how--"

"Shut up. That's not the point, man. You're not the problem."

"I'm not?"

"Nah, man. It's something else... It's me." He stopped and buried his face in his hands. "Why have I been here so long? What have I been doing?" He turned to Roman with wide eyes. "Why didn't I want to leave this place all this time?"

It looked like Leo wanted him to answer, so Roman tried his best. "I... just thought you were some kind of a shut-in by nature."

"No. No, no. This isn't right at all, man." Leo stopped to lean on his desk for support, having apparently become dizzy. "How long have I been here, man?"

That, Roman definitely didn't know the answer to.

"It's been..." Leo steadied himself and shook his head. "Years. Ever since that guy was here... I've been... completely..."

"What guy?"

"That guy," Leo repeated, more to himself than to Roman, seemingly. "Did he do somethin' to me? Yeah. Yeah! He must've. That was the last time I got angry. And ever since then, I've just been... Oh, that bastard.”

“What bastard are you talking about?”

“He didn’t give his name. And his face--I can’t even remember it clearly... Did he do that, too?”

Roman frowned. “Hold on a second. You’re telling me, some mysterious man showed up here at a Lava Base years ago and brainwashed you?”

“Nah, man, not brainwashed... but... I dunno. He messed with my head, somehow. Made me... complacent. Lazy.”

Well, as far as excuses went, that was one Roman hadn’t heard before.”

"1314

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 4 of 5))

“I have to find this guy and make him pay,” said Leo. “Whatever power he’s using, it’s obviously too dangerous to be left alone.”

Roman nodded. “Alright, well, sounds like you’ve got your hands full. I’ll just--”

“My man! You saved me! I can’t just let you leave without repaying the favor!”

“Oh, uh, no, that--that won’t be necessary. I didn’t really do anything, so--”

“Don’t be silly, big cat. Just tell me who, and I’ll take care of it, ya dig?”

“Excuse me?”

“C’mon, no need to be coy. We’re friends now. You came here ‘cuz you want someone whacked, right?”

“That’s not exactly what I--”

“It wouldn’t happen to be the same fella who wrote ya that letter, now would it?”

“What?! No! Definitely not! He’s one of my closest allies!”

“Ya don’t say? Well, that’s a relief. But, um, I gotta be honest with ya, big cat... seein’ as this Hector guy has access to a Courier, well. That alone is reason enough for me to investigate further. In fact, protocol kinda obligates me to, see? So how’s about we go find him together?”

“How’s about we don’t do that?”

“Why not? You weren’t planning to leave him hangin’, were ya?”

“Wouldn’t you rather go find your mystery man?”

“Sure, but I don’t exactly have any leads on that, do I? I mean, the guy hasn’t been here in years, and I don’t even know what he looks like. Or his name, for that matter. Which reminds me. I still don’t know your name, big cat.”

“Ah...” Roman held back a sigh. Certainly, he wanted to believe that this could be an extremely positive development. With as much power and influence as Leo had at his fingertips, protecting Atreya would, in theory, be very easy now.

And yet, somehow, Roman was getting the distinct impression that that wasn’t going to be the case at all.”

"1315 -- CXLII.

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 5 of 5))

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Two: ‘Thine avaricious fever...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Finding a place to stay for the “night” turned out to be more difficult than expected. With so many in their party, no single location had enough space for them, and given everything the Rainlords had been through recently, Hector couldn’t really blame them for wanting to stick as close together as possible, especially with so many apparent hostiles afoot.

From everything he’d seen and heard so far, Hector didn’t think Babbadelo was giving him a very accurate first impression of what life in the Undercrust was like. Gangs roaming the streets, citizens hiding in their homes, businesses afraid of customers, no local law enforcement in sight.

The full story that they'd gotten from the Hun'Kui that they'd subdued earlier hadn't proved very comforting, either. Apparently, there was some sort of recent political uprising in a place called Acacero, and Babbadelo just so happened to be one of the cities that it had spread to. And this business with the treasure hunt had only served to compound the problem. According to Mevox's information, all sorts of unsavory types had been flooding into the city, and now they were clashing with not only each other but also the newly-formed government.

And as one might've expected, said government wanted the treasure, too. No doubt, they were hoping it would help to consolidate their power here and stifle some of this chaos--chaos, which, Hector had already witnessed several more times.

Such a large procession of foreigners did not go unnoticed by the locals, and when the Rainlords weren't being attacked themselves, they frequently witnessed the Hun'Kui fighting amongst each other.

Hector was beginning to see differences among them now, too. Most Hun'Kui weren't wearing much, but certain bands of treasure hunters distinguished themselves with colorful scarves, hats, or sashes--the latter of which were often lined with weaponry.

Which was another issue."

"1315 -- CXLII.

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 5 of 5))

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Two: 'Thine avaricious fever...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Finding a place to stay for the "night" turned out to be more difficult than expected. With so many in their party, no single location had enough space for them, and given everything the Rainlords had been through recently, Hector couldn't really blame them for wanting to stick as close together as possible, especially with so many apparent hostiles afoot.

From everything he'd seen and heard so far, Hector didn't think Babbadelo was giving him a very accurate first impression of what life in the Undercrust was like. Gangs roaming the streets, citizens hiding in their homes, businesses afraid of customers, no local law enforcement in sight.

The full story that they'd gotten from the Hun'Kui that they'd subdued earlier hadn't proved very comforting, either. Apparently, there was some sort of recent political uprising in a place called Acacero, and Babbadelo just so happened to be one of the cities that it had spread to. And this business with the treasure hunt had only served to compound the problem. According to Mevox's information, all sorts of unsavory types had been flooding into the city, and now they were clashing with not only each other but also the newly-formed government.

And as one might've expected, said government wanted the treasure, too. No doubt, they were hoping it would help to consolidate their power here and stifle some of this chaos--chaos, which, Hector had already witnessed several more times.

Such a large procession of foreigners did not go unnoticed by the locals, and when the Rainlords weren't being attacked themselves, they frequently witnessed the Hun'Kui fighting amongst each other.

Hector was beginning to see differences among them now, too. Most Hun'Kui weren't wearing much, but certain bands of treasure hunters distinguished themselves with colorful scarves, hats, or sashes--the latter of which were often lined with weaponry.

Which was another issue."

"1316

These ardent weapons had everyone on edge, Hector included. Thankfully, they didn't seem to be that common, but the mere idea that even non-servants could pose a serious threat... It was just more fuel for the Rainlords' rapidly growing distrust of everyone else.

He could see it in their ranks. The way they talked to each other. The way they stuck so close together all the time. And especially the way they looked at other people. He supposed he should just be glad they didn't look at him that way.

'Keep a close eye on them,' Garovel told him privately. 'This kind of behavior is only natural, and it might very well save our lives, but it can be dangerous, too.'

'You've seen people act this way before, I take it?'

'More times than I can count. The power of groupthink. In the grand scheme of things, it's just an evolutionary trait. Hugely beneficial toward protecting the "tribe," as it were. But it also makes it that much easier for someone to overreact, and that's how innocent people get killed.'

'But... the Rainlords wouldn't allow that to happen... I mean, they're...'

'I know what you're trying to say, but don't be too sure of that. They're still human. Right now, they're hurt, and I'm sure they're feeling vulnerable. And in this world, there exists no better justification for doing something extreme.'

Hector tried to take those words to heart. As much as he'd grown to care for these people, as much as he understood what they were feeling, Garovel was right.

In the end, their party decided to settle on a pair of small inns they found adjacent a large, open area--a kind of rocky park, seemingly. Even with both inns together, there wasn't enough space for everyone, but that was deemed agreeable, because a large group needed to stay outside and keep watch, anyway."

"1317

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

There was also the not-so-small matter of caring for all the climate-controlled pods. In fact, that was perhaps the biggest challenge of this journey so far. Almost every non-servant among the Rainlords was sleeping in one right now, the few exceptions being those like little Ramira Elroy, whom the Sandlords had given their most advanced heatproofing suits to.

That meant that more than two hundred pods needed to be lugged around and protected. Stacking the pods on huge trolleys was the only thing that made the task feasible, but given that the total number of servants at their disposal was only around fifty or so, it still ended up requiring quite a large percentage of their total manpower.

For the most, it was Lord Diego Redwater and Lady Evangelina Stroud who oversaw the effort and gave the pods the most attention, but Hector saw everyone else either pitching in to help or glancing in their direction frequently. And it wasn't difficult to understand why. If even one of those pods was damaged, it meant someone's life. A family member's life.

No doubt, this was why the Rainlords seemed so grateful for the shields that he'd passed out earlier. He discovered that much of his work had gone toward reinforcing the pods directly. And certainly, an added layer of heavy shields made the pods even more unwieldy than they already were, but that was a sacrifice that the Rainlords did not mind making, apparently.

They unloaded some of the pods and brought them into the inns with them, but the majority remained outside with the camping group. The innkeeper on Hector's side didn't look especially pleased with so much floorspace being taken up by unconscious people in pods, but perhaps he was too afraid of the Rainlords, because Hector didn't see him challenge them on it."

"1318

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Hector spotted a much smaller Hun'Kui than he'd yet seen, presumably the innkeeper's son. Hector couldn't think of any other explanation for that body language--hiding behind the man's leg and occasionally pestering him as if asking a parent for something.

Hector wondered what the kid was saying and asked Garovel to translate for him.

'The kid's hungry,' the reaper told him privately. 'Says he hasn't eaten in... days.'

Hector blinked at that news. 'Days?'

‘Well, it must be said, Hun’Kui don’t eat nearly as much as surface dwellers do. As I understand it, they have much slower metabolisms, because they don’t need to regulate their body temperatures like we do.’ A beat passed. ‘Or like YOU do, I suppose.’

‘So... you’re saying it’s normal for people down here to go that long without eating?’

‘...No. I think that’s still kinda abnormal, even by their standards.’

‘What did the dad say?’

‘Just to hold on a while longer.’

He frowned, but not ten minutes later, the innkeeper announced to the Rainlords that dinner would be served shortly, so Hector supposed he’d been worrying for no reason.

And by the time dinner did arrive, Hector was almost as curious as he was hungry. He’d forgotten to ask Garovel about it before, so he had absolutely no idea what to expect. With environmental temperatures like this, food from the surface would’ve been cooking itself, so what the hell did people eat down here?

Some kind of stringy, reddish-brown seaweed-looking thing, apparently. And a bubbling, porridge-y substance in a wavy, bowl-like shell.

‘...What is this?’ he asked Garovel, trying his best to keep an open mind.

‘That’s a romodendra.’

‘What is? This plant thing?’

‘Yeah. There aren’t many plants that can even survive down here, let alone actually GROW.’

‘Uh-huh...’

"1319

Garovel grabbed Hector's shoulder, and Hector felt all of his lingering soreness vanish. 'Just give it a try,' the reaper said. 'I've heard it's not as bad as it looks.'

Hector was suspicious. '...Why did you just numb my pain?'

'Zeff's misty armor is protecting you on the outside, but it won't save your insides from burning like hell when you eat this stuff.'

Hector squinted. If he wasn't so famished, he might've just quit then and there. He looked around the long table to see what everyone else thought of the meal and noticed a few other hesitators, but none who were flat out refusing. He gave his food another look. 'What's this weird porridge stuff?'

'Uh...'

Hector cocked an eyebrow as he waited.

'You sure you want me to answer that?' said Garovel.

'Just tell me.'

'Alright. I'm pretty sure it's worm.'

Hector's jaw clenched inside his closed mouth, and his whole face went taut, though the constant stream of mist around him rendered it unnoticeable.

'The bowl there is made from the dried husk and is also edible, if you're interested.'

He wasn't.

'C'mon, where's your courage? I told you, so now you've gotta try it. You never know. You might like it. Certain types of worms are considered a delicacy.'

Fair was fair, Hector supposed. He gathered his composure, grabbed the boxy-spoon utensil in front of him, and tried the wormy porridge first.

Huh.

Now there was a new taste. He had a difficult time even describing it to himself. Meaty was one word for it. Sour was another. But this texture. Chewy and sludgy at the same time. If beef and chicken had been put in a blender until they had a soupy consistency, then perhaps this would be the result.

Mainly, he was just surprised that he didn't hate it. In fact, maybe it was just because of how hungry he was, but he actually kind of enjoyed it. The same could be said of the romodendra. It was insanely tough, almost like a strip of tree bark, and yet somehow, it complemented the worm pretty well, he thought."

"1320

After a couple more bites, Hector found himself looking around the table for the innkeeper and his son. The quaint dining chamber was packed with people, but Hector only saw Rainlords, the Najirs, and a whole bunch of chattering reapers. When he looked through the open eastern doorway, however, he spotted the kid peeking out from behind the corner there, watching everyone.

Watching everyone eat. And that look on his face. A half-open mouth. Glowing eyes wide with longing.

Hector stopped. He looked at Garovel, but the reaper had gotten swept up in one of the many conversations going on. So many of them were talking at once that Hector could barely even parse out Garovel's voice in his head.

When he looked to the kid again, the innkeeper was there with him, ushering him away from the doorway.

Hector stood and left the table, bringing the meal that he'd still barely touched with him.

As he approached, the innkeeper seemed both frightened and nervous, so Hector slowed his pace a little in hopes of looking as non-threatening as possible. Perhaps Zeff's armor cloud wasn't helping in that regard--in fact, it might've even been dangerous for them if he got too close. When Hector set the meal down on the nearest table and backed away, the innkeeper appeared to relax somewhat.

After a nod from his father, the kid grabbed it, and Hector watched him wolf it down.

So it was like he'd thought, after all. Hector had been wondering if he was simply mistaken. It did seem strange to him that the innkeeper would prioritize feeding guests over his own child. Was there some reason for that?

He got his answer when several more Hun’Kui children entered from the next room over, all looking at the innkeeper expectantly--and then at Hector, as well. Perhaps they’d been watching the whole time.

That was a lot of mouths to feed. The man probably felt like he had to prioritize customers or else it would affect his business. And in the long-term, that might very well result in even less food to go around. If any at all.

Either that, or he was simply scared of what all these foreigners would do if he didn’t feed them. Hector supposed that was just as likely.

Diego Redwater appeared suddenly in Hector’s peripheral vision and forced his porridge into the hands of another child.

Hector turned and saw several other Rainlords filing in behind the man."

"1321

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Garovel floated over to him, laughing in the echo of privacy. ‘Look what you’ve started, Hector.’

Hector mostly just wanted answers, though. ‘Why is there a food shortage?’

‘Lord Diego,’ said Garovel publicly, grabbing the man’s attention, ‘can you ask the innkeeper for more details about what’s been going on around here?’

“I don’t speak Hunese,” said Diego, looking around. “Hold on, I’ll find someone.” He disappeared into the throng of people, then returned a few moments later with Carlos Sebolt, who gave Hector a nod of acknowledgment.

Hector was happy to return one of his own, though he was surprised that Lord Carlos even recognized him. He’d only met the man a couple times, and he hadn’t really spoken to him on either occasion.

Garovel listened in on Carlos' conversation with the innkeeper. '...So, what I'm gathering is that this new government rose to power by promising to redistribute wealth to the lower classes. Ah, I see. The local militia was supposed to hand out food to everyone, but instead, they just started selling it at exorbitant prices.'

'What the fuck?' said Hector. 'They can just DO that?'

'Well, who's left to stop them? This type of thing happens all the time. People get so wrapped up in the idea of a revolution that they don't have a realistic plan for what to do afterwards. And then the few people who still have power, like the ones with guns, see an opportunity. Assuming they didn't plan to do this from the start, that is.'

'Motherfuckers...'

'If they're lucky, this'll all sort itself out within a few months or so, but there's a chance that the militia will establish a more long-term foothold in the city. And between that and this treasure-hunting fever going around, these locals are looking at some rough times ahead.'"

"1322

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

'Where is this militia keeping the food?' Hector asked.

Garovel paused for a look. 'Why do you want to know that?'

Hector met the reaper's hollow gaze evenly through the mist. 'Why do you think?'

'Hector. This isn't the sort of thing we should get involved with.'

'Why not?'

'Because...' Garovel broke for a curt sigh. 'We don't know how dangerous this militia is. They might have servants with them.'

'...So?'

'So the Rainlords have been through enough. They don't need to get dragged into someone else's fight right now.'

‘I was already planning to go alone, Garovel.’

The reaper hesitated and glanced around at their friends. ‘Do you really need me to say it? You’re not strong enough, Hector.’

He furrowed his brow and turned to leave. ‘We’ll see.’

Garovel floated into his path. ‘Okay, wow, holy shit. I’m glad you have so much confidence in yourself, but we don’t even know what kind of resistance we’ll encounter. These armor weapons are still a mystery, and they could also have some extremely powerful servants on their side, like I just said.’

‘Yeah. Or they could be a bunch of pushovers. I’m gonna go find out.’

‘Hector.’ Garovel didn’t sound like he was going to relent.

‘Fine,’ said Hector. ‘I’ll just do some scouting first. If they seem too strong, I won’t fight them. Does that sound fair?’

Garovel made no response.

Hector grew impatient and started toward the exit. ‘I’ll take that as a yes.’

‘Argh, you don’t even know where to go,’ said Garovel.

‘So tell me.’

‘And what if I don’t, huh?’

‘Then I guess I’ll just wander around like a jackass until I find it.’

‘Alright, alright,’ the reaper said. ‘Just hold on a second. Let me see if the innkeeper knows anything else that could help.’”

"1323

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Hector was nearly at the door already, so he said, ‘I’ll be outside.’

‘Okay,’ said Garovel.

Hector exited the inn and found a nice chunk of the building's rocky wall to lean against.

From here, he had a clear sight of the camping group. Part of the reason he'd wanted to come out here was to check how they were doing. Tall, metal walls had been erected in the middle of the park, no doubt the work of a servant, and Hector recognized several of the faces patrolling the perimeter. A few of them were even walking along the walls they'd put up.

The greater view of Babbadelo wasn't too bad, either. Gargantuan pillars bathed in dim amber. And he hadn't noticed before, but now he could see platforms extending between many of the pillars in midair. The city had multiple layers.

It reminded him of Warrenhold. And he wondered if that was a coincidence. Perhaps Stasya Orlov had taken inspiration from the Undercrust when building it.

The door to the inn opened, and Diego Redwater exited. The man looked around, then stopped when he saw Hector. "What're you doing out here?" he asked.

Diego was something of a curiosity, Hector thought. Aside from being the only red-haired Rainlord that Hector had met, he was also the only member of House Redwater present, the rest having been captured by the Vanguard at Rheinhal. Or killed, possibly. Their intel wasn't clear.

But that name. Redwater. Hector knew how famous it was. More famous than any other House among the Rainlords. It was a strange feeling, speaking so normally with someone who had a name like that. It made Hector a little uneasy, somehow, but he tried not to let it show. Seemed like that would be rude.

"What's it to you?" said Hector. Oh shit, wait, that was way ruder.

Diego answered before he could apologize, however. "I just got the feeling you might've been venturing off to go beat someone's ass, is all. And I was thinking I might like to join you."

"1324 -- CXLIII.

Hector needed a little time to consider his response to that. "...I'd rather you guys didn't get involved."

"Guys? What guys?" Diego folded his arms. "I'm not bringing anyone else, are you?"

"I just don't want the Rainlords getting mixed up in anything that they don't need to. You've all been through so much already."

"I wasn't planning on telling anyone my name. And considering that you're practically a walking rain cloud, I'd say you look more like a Rainlord than I do."

Hector had to admit, that was a good point.

The door to the inn opened again, and Asad exited, immediately followed by Jada, Imas, and all three of their reapers.

"I hope you weren't planning on doing anything reckless without me," said Asad.

The door swung open yet again, and more familiar faces came flowing out.

Hector just kind of scratched one of his eyebrows and sighed.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Three: 'O, meddling fellowship...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Including himself, Hector's raiding party grew to be six strong, but that certainly wasn't because no one else wanted to join. In the end, he'd refused more volunteers so as not to break up any of the individual families. And thankfully, the heads of each House agreed with him on that front, so no one tried to argue with him. Everyone understood that if too many people went, then it would jeopardize the safety of their sleeping brethren.

That resulted in an entourage of Hector, Diego, Asad, Imas, Jada, and finally Evangelina Stroud.

The only reason he'd agreed to the Lady Stroud joining was because she was the head of her own House, and there was really no refusing her. Just like Diego, she was the only Stroud present, thanks to the events at Rheinhal. Unlike Diego, however, she'd actually been there when the battle against the Gargoyle of Korgum took place.

And whenever anyone brought it up, she did not hesitate to give her feelings on the subject. The Lady Stroud was certainly no fan of the Gargoyle, or the Vanguard in general. From what Hector understood, Zeff had been there as well, but he'd barely talked about it, perhaps because Evangelina seemed to have the issue so well in hand."

"1324 -- CXLIII.

Hector needed a little time to consider his response to that. "...I'd rather you guys didn't get involved."

"Guys? What guys?" Diego folded his arms. "I'm not bringing anyone else, are you?"

"I just don't want the Rainlords getting mixed up in anything that they don't need to. You've all been through so much already."

"I wasn't planning on telling anyone my name. And considering that you're practically a walking rain cloud, I'd say you look more like a Rainlord than I do."

Hector had to admit, that was a good point.

The door to the inn opened again, and Asad exited, immediately followed by Jada, Imas, and all three of their reapers.

"I hope you weren't planning on doing anything reckless without me," said Asad.

The door swung open yet again, and more familiar faces came flowing out.

Hector just kind of scratched one of his eyebrows and sighed.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Three: 'O, meddling fellowship...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Including himself, Hector's raiding party grew to be six strong, but that certainly wasn't because no one else wanted to join. In the end, he'd refused more volunteers so as not to break up any of the individual families. And thankfully, the heads of each House agreed with him on that front, so no one tried to argue with him. Everyone understood that if too many people went, then it would jeopardize the safety of their sleeping brethren.

That resulted in an entourage of Hector, Diego, Asad, Imas, Jada, and finally Evangelina Stroud.

The only reason he'd agreed to the Lady Stroud joining was because she was the head of her own House, and there was really no refusing her. Just like Diego, she was the only Stroud present, thanks to the events at Rheinhal. Unlike Diego, however, she'd actually been there when the battle against the Gargoyle of Korgum took place.

And whenever anyone brought it up, she did not hesitate to give her feelings on the subject. The Lady Stroud was certainly no fan of the Gargoyle, or the Vanguard in general. From what Hector understood, Zeff had been there as well, but he'd barely talked about it, perhaps because Evangelina seemed to have the issue so well in hand."

"1325

As they walked, Hector had many more opportunities to witness--and indeed experience--the chaos of Babbadelo first-hand. They'd been attacked before, but now it was almost constant, probably because they didn't have intimidating numbers on their side anymore. Nearly every street had a new group of Hun'Kui bandits who seemed keen to test them. Several tried to extort a toll beforehand, but just as many attacked without warning.

It never went well for the assailants. They were rarely ever armed, and even when they were, the reapers noticed it immediately, having become hyper-aware of the threat ever since their first encounter with it.

But the fact that these people weren't armed and yet were still so bold as to attack them anyway... it spoke to Hector of desperation. And Garovel agreed. Maybe some of them were just being assholes, but a lot of them were probably trying to feed themselves or their families in whatever way they could.

It was more than enough reason to go easy on them, Hector felt. And the others seemed to agree, excepting the Lady Stroud. She didn't kill anyone, but she dealt out plenty of broken fingers, hands, arms, and ankles. She just about pulled a guy's leg off before her reaper, Ezura, told her to stop.

Hector wondered if he should ask her to return to the inn. He doubted she would listen to him, but maybe the others would be able to convince her. Regardless, he decided to hold off and just keep an eye on her.

At length, the frequency of attacks began to die down again. Hector wasn't sure if they'd just been passing through a particularly bad area of the city or if the attackers had realized it was a lost cause.

Either way, this sudden calm, though welcome, was rather unsettling, in its own way. Hector could see the reapers constantly scanning their surroundings."

"1326

'We need to be extra careful how we resolve this situation,' Garovel was saying, not for the first time. He'd been trying to explain something, but the constant interruptions from hostile Hun'Kui had been getting in the way, and even now, he looked like he was waiting for something to cut him off again.

The reapers didn't really need to be looking around so much, Hector knew. They could sense the locations of every soul around them if they just concentrated, but after Dunehall, Hector couldn't really blame them for their paranoia here. If aberrations were able to operate undetected by reapers, then it didn't seem outside the realm of possibility that these Hun'Kui and their new technologies might have a similar surprise in store.

Thankfully, though, that didn't seem like it was going to be the case.

Garovel was taking a while to finish his thought, so Hector decided to give him a push. 'What do you mean?'

'Hmm? Oh, yeah. Um. Look, let's say we beat up these food-stealing pricks and start handing it out to everyone. Let's even say that there's plenty of food to go around and that we don't have to worry about rationing it at all. What happens after we leave Babbadelo?'

‘Uh...’

‘How do we know that someone else won’t pick up where these assholes left off?’

‘Hmm...’

‘The answer is that we don’t know,’ said Garovel. ‘That’s the problem. This place is unstable as hell, and that’s not something we can realistically fix unless we stay here indefinitely and work on keeping the peace ourselves.’

Hector frowned. ‘...Are you saying we should turn back?’

‘I’m saying there’s only so much we can hope to accomplish for the locals here. It’s not as simple a matter as you seem to have been thinking. And before you say anything else, do NOT give me any of that cavalier sass from earlier, you prick. Coming up with terrible plans is MY area of expertise, remember? And I don’t appreciate being treated like I’m some kind of lazy piece of shit who doesn’t care about helping people.’

‘That’s not what I was--’

‘Yeah, sure it wasn’t.’”

"1327

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

‘I wasn’t trying to insult you, Garovel... Believe me, I know how much you want to save innocent lives. I mean, shit, without you, I wouldn’t even... uh... y’know... I just--’

‘Yeah, alright, fine, we both know what an incredible humanitarian god-being I am, but that’s only part of what I was getting at. The real point, my young friend, is that you let yourself get a bit too worked up back there. You and I are supposed to be the reasonable ones here, remember?’

‘Sure, but...’ Hector didn’t quite know how to argue that point just yet. He only knew that he wanted to. ‘Mrgh...’

‘Look, I get it. You’re feeling more confident in your abilities and want to help as many people as possible. That's a good thing. Great, actually. Especially considering where you started. But not everything--'

'No, that's not it,' said Hector. 'That's not it at all...'

The reaper fell quiet a moment. 'What do you mean?'

'It's not... agh... it's not that I'm feeling more confident... In fact, it's the exact opposite.' Hector's gaze drifted from side to side as he eyed his companions. 'If anything, I've been... really fucking frustrated with myself.'

'...Why?' Garovel sounded genuinely incredulous, as if he'd just heard something completely nonsensical to him.

'Because! Garovel...! I've barely been able to do ANYTHING lately. Everybody's been having to protect me.' Hector could hardly believe that he was having to explain something so obvious. 'And I hate that.'

'Hector... if that's what you really think, then you're an idiot.'

'No, I'm not. YOU'RE an idiot.'

'Really? That's your comeback?'

'Shut up. When you said that these people here were in trouble, I was just... I was SO ready to help them, because it sounded like I actually COULD! For a change! And isn't that the whole point?!'

"1328

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

'Of course it's the point,' said Garovel. 'But Hector. Come-the-fuck-on. I warned you back in Kuros, back when I was asking if you wanted to go meet Chergoa. I said we'd be stepping into territory that we were not ready for. And honestly, my boy, you've done far better than I ever could have hoped.'

Hector made no response.

The reaper's boney face twisted as he kept pace with Hector. 'You really don't agree? Hector. Marshrock was amazing enough, but Dunehall, too?'

'But that was... I mean... I don't know what that was. But I know that it wasn't something reliable.'

Garovel paused. 'Something reliable?'

'Like... I don't think I could do it again. It was just... It was dumb luck, is all it was.'

'Mm, I dunno about that. I think you're underestimating yourself.'

'I don't.'

'Yes, I see that now. I can't believe I ever thought you were being overconfident. Holy shit.'

'Ugh. I just... I... I mean, I'm not wrong, am I? The Rainlords are going to live with us. Under my roof. They're gonna be relying on me. So...'
He had to consciously avoid sighing in front of everyone. 'I have to become more reliable than just dumb luck. I don't know how, but... I have to.'

'Hector. You can't protect... ah... Hmm.'

Hector threw him a glance. 'Wha?'

'Well, uh,' said Garovel, 'I was about to say that you can't protect the Rainlords from everything that's threatening them, but... frankly, I don't know what you're capable of, anymore. After Rasalased and Haqq's shield and that shit you pulled with the Salesman-of-Goddamn-Death... and now whatever-the-hell is going on with you and the Shards... I just. You... I don't know. Now that I think about it, maybe I'M the one who's underestimating you.'

‘Uh... what?’

‘Argh! Fuck you! Now you’re making ME confused! None of this means that we shouldn’t still be cautious in general! Or that you should stop listening to my sage wisdom, goddammit!’

"1329

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

‘...Okay,’ said Hector.

‘Don’t gimme that shit. My entire worldview is crumbling over here, and all you’ve got for me is “okay”? I don’t know what’s real anymore, you son of a bitch.’

‘...Then why do you sound more excited than upset?’

‘Excuse me? I’m sure I don’t know what you’re talking about.’

‘I’m sure you do.’

‘You must be going crazy. It’s the only explanation. Crazy Hector, that’s what they’re gonna start calling you if you’re not careful.’

‘Right.’

‘Hector the Crazy. Hector “Crazy” Goffe. Crazy Hector and the Crazies.’

‘Did you just put me in a band?’

‘Oh, man, I would love to see you as the lead singer of a band.’

‘I’d sooner face Ivan again.’

‘What kind of band would it be, you think? Heavy metal?’

By the time the group’s destination came into view, Hector was more than ready for a fight to rescue him from this conversation.

It was a hulking platform suspended in midair by a host of thick cables. It wrapped all the way around one of the city’s enormous pillars and was positioned about halfway up to the next layer of streets and buildings. The group had already traveled up two layers on the way here, and the view to either side of Hector was not something he would soon forget, he thought. Like a sea of fireflies flickering in the darkness, both above and below--some moving, some not, but all reminding him of life, of how many people were still relatively nearby, even if he couldn't see any of them.

"Hmm," said Diego Redwater, staring up at the platform above their heads. "That looks like a defensive position, if I've ever seen one. I guess they're expecting us, eh?"

"We were not exactly subtle on our way here," said Asad. "No doubt, they received plenty of warning."

"1330

"If that is the case, then there is no sense in attempting stealth," said Evangelina. Her long, raven-black skirt flowed wildly with every step she took. When they'd first set out from the inn, Hector had thought it rather impractical attire for combat, but after seeing the way the woman could move in it, he was glad he hadn't said anything.

'We should assume that they are more heavily armed than anyone we have met thus far,' said Qorvass. 'It would be best to avoid running headlong into a hail of ardor-infused bullets, no?'

The Lady Stroud's face remained stolid, but she didn't say anything.

Her reaper, however, chimed in. 'That may not be an option, either,' Ezura said, and she motioned upward.

A fleet of blinking white specks were pouring out from the platform above. Hector wasn't quite sure what they were, but apparently Asad was, because quartz raised up from below the group and started carrying them diagonally away.

Blindingly bright spotlights fell upon them, and then a storm of flaming bullets arrived, chasing after Asad's zigzagging work as it pushed the group ever higher and closer to their objective.

The shields came up, and everyone bunched together to form a protective wall around Asad and the reapers. A flurry of bullets occasionally washed over them, pinging off the shields like hail, but Hector was not pleased to see the many dents they left behind.

Ardor-infused, indeed. If they could do that kind of damage to the metal of Haqq's shield, then he didn't want to imagine what they would do to a person. Or a reaper.

As they neared the platform, Hector caught clearer sight of the blinking specks and realized that they were a small army of hovering drones.

And they were in range.

Hector's free hand flexed, and iron clapped around every drone in his line of sight. They dropped instantly, and Hector pulled an iron bowl up from below to catch them like so much popcorn, not wanting them to fall out of sight and kill some poor bystander."

"1331

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Hector moved to eliminate the rest of the drones as well, but he found that they had already been taken care of by glass and were joining his own batch in the bowl below.

The group soon reached the platform, and briefly, Hector got a sprawling view of the military compound that sat upon it.

But only briefly.

A kind of hissing whoosh stole his attention, and he immediately saw the rocket-propelled grenade that it belonged to. Its brightly burning form left little doubt that it, too, carried the threat of ardor, and Hector was about to try to divert its path with materialized iron, but Asad's quartz beat him to it.

Rocket met glass, and the resulting explosion was so fierce that it still reached them and tore Asad's glass elevator to pieces, sending the group toppling off in all different directions.

Hector caught himself, Jada Najir, and Diego Redwater on an iron slide, which carried the three of them smoothly down to the platform full of hostiles, and they all hit the metal ground running. More blazing gunfire erupted, and there was no cover to be found--not from these bullets. The small building in front of them might as well have not been there, and indeed, as they ran sideways, the gunfire bisected it horizontally, making the structure buckle under its own weight.

Several shots grazed Hector's head and legs, and he could feel that whole chunks of flesh were just gone, exploded apart. But he was still running, and the regeneration was doing its work, and that was all that mattered.

Shields out, they rounded the collapsed building and finally had a clear view of their attackers--a firing line of twenty or so Hun'Kui in various types of deeply green garb. When they saw Hector, Jada, and Diego all barreling toward them, they immediately stopped firing and scattered."

"1332

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Hector clapped iron around most of them before they got too far, but the now-all-too-familiar sound of a rocket-propelled grenade demanded his attention again. He flung himself and Jada out of its path with a sudden iron pillar, but the force of explosion threw them even farther than he'd wanted, and they went sailing through the wall of a small tower together.

Jada was first on her feet and helping Hector to his, and without even time to think, they were already storming up a flight of stairs while being chased by more gunfire from more yet-unseen shooters.

At the next floor, they encountered a group of four Hun'Kui who, by their expressions, had not realized they were there.

Hector added them to his collection of iron statues.

They found a balcony on the left, along with still more gunfire. This time, however, the bullets were quickly cut short, and Hector saw why. Asad and the others were pushing through the middle of the compound, drawing fire, encasing assailants in glass, and flattening everyone else.

Hector made an iron walkway from the balcony to the roof of the next building over, and Jada didn't hesitate to run across first. Hector followed, wondering if she was just reckless or if she actually trusted his workmanship that much. As he ran, he was glad he'd thought to include tiny ridges in the iron for added grip. It was a trick he'd noticed in some of Asad's creations and had been wanting to try for himself.

He heard another RPG launch and saw it heading for Asad's group, but it never found its target or even exploded. Instead, Diego Redwater bounded up a stack of crates and snatched it out of the air mid-flight, freezing it solid in an instant--a feat which, frankly, Hector wouldn't have even thought physically possible in temperatures like these."

"1333

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

Diego's whole body smoldered with freezing mist as his power of nitrogen transfiguration clashed with the very atmosphere itself.

And at that moment, all gunfire ceased, and Hector was confused, because he looked around and saw the remaining Hun'Kui laying their weapons down.

He didn't quite know what to think. There were still quite a lot of them left, and they surely could've put up quite a fight, considering how heavily armed they were. And yet they were surrendering so soon?

When he observed the scene a second time, however, he thought he understood. It was Diego--the way the man was standing in the middle of the compound like that, in full view of all the Hun'Kui, having just done what he'd done, looking not entirely unlike some kind of unkillable ice god with that frozen rocket clutched in one hand, while also seemingly poised and awaiting another.

Hector and Jada made their way down from the rooftop and rejoined the others. Everyone shared a similar expression of disbelief and suspicion.

In the end, however, the battle concluded without further incident, and the rest of the Hun'Kui gathered and allowed themselves to be taken prisoner.

Hector certainly had no complaints. That fight could've easily gotten much messier. Brief as it had been, a few of the reapers had still taken a bit of a beating, even despite having positioned themselves behind the shields for extra protection. Qorvass sported a clearly visible bullet hole right in the center of his bony forehead. It looked rather awkward to Hector, but the reaper didn't seem terribly inconvenienced by it.

With all hostiles safely subdued, the group decided to spread out and search the compound. Jada and Atalim chose to remain partnered with Hector and Garovel.

"...I am sorry I could not be of more assistance back there," said Jada."
"1334

The words took Hector by surprise, as he wasn't even looking at her and had been eyeing a large warehouse on the other side of a line of smaller buildings.

And now that he was thinking about it, he and she had been spending a lot of time together lately, and yet he hadn't heard the young woman speak very much at all. He remembered her talking to the Elroys a fair amount during the trip to Dunehall, but he wasn't sure she'd ever uttered a single word to him directly.

Now that she definitely had, though, Hector was suddenly nervous, as it reminded him how little he actually knew of her.

"I feel I should thank you for protecting us the way you did," she said.

Oh shit, and she was really nice, too? Why the hell was this happening now? 'Garovel, help...'

'Tell her it was no big deal,' the reaper said privately. 'And sound manly.'

Hector frowned and looked at her--which turned out to be a bad idea.

This was a proper young lady that was speaking to him. A noblewoman. Those golden yellow eyes that apparently ran in her family easily made for one of the most striking gazes that Hector had ever seen, and combined with the soft contours of her nose, cheeks, and eyebrows, Jada's face created an uncommon blend of keen innocence.

Goddammit.

This was why he was in the habit of avoiding people's faces. Especially women's.

He tried to respond, but his mouth wouldn't move, perhaps because it knew something that his brain didn't. He decided to just go with a simple nod, instead. That would be enough, right?

Thankfully, it did seem to satisfy her.

Garovel picked up the slack before the silence grew too long. 'What is your ability, by the way? We've yet to see you use it.'

"1335

Jada hesitated visibly at the inquiry, then deferred to Atalim.

'I am afraid we cannot tell you,' the reaper said.

'Oh, come now,' said Garovel. 'We're all friends here. And besides, Hector and I have met the Dry God. AND he trusts us. That must lend us credibility, right?'

'Your trustworthiness is not in question,' said Atalim. 'The real problem is that one can never know who may be listening. It is for the best if--'

"Plutonium," Jada whispered, having stepped closer.

Hector's eyes widened.

"Materialization," she added.

Atalim growled lowly. 'Jada. Your father shall hear of this.'

The young woman was not deterred. "In truth, it is not as dangerous as it sounds," she went on quietly. "Even normal people would not be harmed unless they were exposed for a long period of time. Or unless I used certain isotopes. Or soul-strengthening."

'Wow,' said Garovel. 'I've never heard--'

Jada held up a finger. "It is too easy for reapers to be overheard," she whispered.

'Mm,' said Garovel. Then, privately, he relayed his thoughts to Hector.

“...Garovel has never heard of someone having a man-made element as their ability,” he said softly.

Jada paused, seemingly listening to Atalim. “...No element is truly man-made. Only discovered.”

Hector listened to Garovel again. “...Even so, they do seem to be rarer.”

“...As they are in nature.”

Hector had a question of his own now. “Ah... but if it’s not that dangerous, then why all the secrecy?”

“Because,” said Jada, “if the wrong people discovered that I can create something so valuable, they will come for me. Or simply try to kill me.”

Hector understood.

“I am very grateful that I did not need to use it today.” She glanced at Atalim. “My father will be grateful as well.”

Now Hector didn’t understand. “No offense, but... if that’s the case, then why did you come with us? You could’ve stayed at the inn with the Rainlords.”

"1336

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 5))

“Abbi worries over you,” said Jada. “He did not want any harm to come to you.”

By now, Hector was reasonably sure that abbi was a Valgan word referring to Asad. “But that... doesn’t explain why you decided to come.”

“Abbi worries over you. I worry over abbi.”

Hector supposed he couldn’t argue with that. Asad still had not fully recovered from his encounter with the Marauder of Calthos. Jada certainly had every reason to be concerned about him.

But Hector was also beginning to see how these sorts of things could very easily spiral out of control. Various strong-headed and well-meaning people all concerned about each other, all taking steps to protect each other, only for it to escalate matters in unexpected ways.

That was the kind of thing that a lord should be mindful of, Hector supposed.

Ugh.

For now, at least, he could be glad that the situation here had gone smoothly, more or less. There was still the matter of locating all of the stolen goods and ensuring fair distribution, but Hector was feeling good about their prospects now. And he felt even better when he and Jada entered the warehouse that he'd spotted earlier and found it filled to the rafters with food.

Most of it looked just as weird as the stuff he'd tasted back at the inn. Massive slabs of blackened meat, pungent even through the heavy cloth it was wrapped in. Tubs of stringy, white noodles and darkly purple rice. Barrels full of reddish, leafy vegetables that Garovel identified as a kind of rhubarb.

Hector wasn't seeing any fruits, though, and wondered if that trend extended to the Undercrust as a whole. He was about to ask Garovel about it when a large gray box in the corner of the room caught his attention. He made his way over to it, looking for a door.

'Oh my fucking god,' said Garovel.

And Hector stopped, recognizing the reaper's tone all too well. He didn't even want to ask for elaboration."

"1337 -- CXLIV.

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 5))

Garovel floated up from behind him in order to inspect the gray box more closely. Atalim and Jada joined as well.

'...Is this what I think it is?' said Atalim.

Garovel sighed publicly. 'Yeah... yeah, I'm pretty sure it is.'

Hector found the door he'd been looking for. Its outline was so thin that it blended in with the rest of the box and rendered itself almost invisible. The handle was barely noticeable as well--just a small indentation in the wall where it looked like he was supposed to pull.

He didn't think he wanted to open it anymore, though. Sure enough, Garovel's next words reaffirmed his bad feeling.

'Don't open this,' the reaper said. 'You understand me? No matter what. Do. Not. Open it.'

Hector let Jada be the one to ask.

"Why? Do you know what is in here?"

'I can make an educated guess,' said Garovel. But he neglected to elaborate, as if dreading to.

"...And?" pushed Jada.

'...Eggs.'

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Four: 'Thy toxic prize...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"And what is so terrible about eggs?" the young Lady Najir asked.

Hector, meanwhile, already had some idea where this was going. The discussion he'd had with Garovel on the way down to the Undercrust was still fresh in his mind.

Atalim was the one who answered her, however. 'Worm eggs,' was all he said.

Jada's expression shifted from curiosity to flat displeasure.

'This box is vacuum sealed,' said Garovel. 'And given how large it is and that it doesn't appear to be refrigerated, there's pretty much nothing else that could be inside.'

Hector figured he should take a turn asking the obvious question. "Worm eggs need to be vacuum sealed?"

'Indeed,' said Atalim. 'They secrete a kind of sludge, which gives off pheromones. And most species of worm possess a terrifyingly good sense of smell. Greatworms in particular.”

"1337 -- CXLIV.

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 5))

Garovel floated up from behind him in order to inspect the gray box more closely. Atalim and Jada joined as well.

‘...Is this what I think it is?’ said Atalim.

Garovel sighed publicly. ‘Yeah... yeah, I’m pretty sure it is.’

Hector found the door he’d been looking for. Its outline was so thin that it blended in with the rest of the box and rendered itself almost invisible. The handle was barely noticeable as well--just a small indentation in the wall where it looked like he was supposed to pull.

He didn’t think he wanted to open it anymore, though. Sure enough, Garovel’s next words reaffirmed his bad feeling.

‘Don’t open this,’ the reaper said. ‘You understand me? No matter what. Do. Not. Open it.’

Hector let Jada be the one to ask.

“Why? Do you know what is in here?”

‘I can make an educated guess,’ said Garovel. But he neglected to elaborate, as if dreading to.

“...And?” pushed Jada.

‘...Eggs.’

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Four: ‘Thy toxic prize...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“And what is so terrible about eggs?” the young Lady Najir asked.

Hector, meanwhile, already had some idea where this was going. The discussion he’d had with Garovel on the way down to the Undercrust was still fresh in his mind.

Atalim was the one who answered her, however. 'Worm eggs,' was all he said.

Jada's expression shifted from curiosity to flat displeasure.

'This box is vacuum sealed,' said Garovel. 'And given how large it is and that it doesn't appear to be refrigerated, there's pretty much nothing else that could be inside.'

Hector figured he should take a turn asking the obvious question. "Worm eggs need to be vacuum sealed?"

'Indeed,' said Atalim. 'They secrete a kind of sludge, which gives off pheromones. And most species of worm possess a terrifyingly good sense of smell. Greatworms in particular.'

"1338

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 5))

'And certain morons consider that sludge a delicacy,' said Garovel. 'Though, I suppose they could also want these for scientific purposes. Regardless, I thought the practice of capturing these things was outlawed ages ago.'

'I am fairly certain that it was and still is wildly illegal,' said Atalim. 'But invariably, that never completely kills demand. In less reputable circles, such laws only serve to drive up the price.'

'Maybe that's what all this is really about. To the right buyer, these eggs could be worth more than all the food in the city.'

'Hmm. Perhaps we should inform the others of our discovery before getting lost in speculation,' said Atalim.

'Fine, if you wanna be all smart and pragmatic-like.'

They reconvened with the rest of the group and learned that they had not been alone in their findings. Two more warehouses full of rations and foodstuffs were nearby, apparently, and both contained a vacuum-sealed chamber of their own.

Asad and Imas took point on questioning the captives while everyone else discussed what to do next.

"I believe we should destroy the eggs and be done with it," the Lady Stroud was saying.

'I don't disagree,' said Garovel, 'but that would be incredibly dangerous to do in the city. If even the smallest whiff of pheromone escapes, Babbadelo will be swarmed with worms inside twenty-four hours. I think the safest thing to do is take the boxes away from civilization and THEN destroy them.'

"That sounds reasonable," said Evangelina.

"Whoa, whoa, hold up," said Diego. "I don't think we know enough to make that call yet. These things are incredibly difficult to get your hands on, right? What if... someone really needs them?"

The reapers all just looked at him."

"1339

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 4 of 5))

Diego raised both hands defensively. "Look, I'm just saying, it would be a shame if we destroyed them when someone might be needing these eggs for something important, like creating a vaccine for some terrible illness that we don't know about."

Even Yangéra, the man's own reaper, was looking dubious. 'And your concern has nothing to do with the fact that these eggs might be worth a lot of money.'

Diego smiled. "Hey, if we get rewarded for doing god's work, then so much the better, right?"

'Wow.'

Ultimately, they decided to wait until Asad and Imas finished their questioning. It didn't take much longer, as the Sandlords did not seem to be having trouble getting the captive Hun'Kui to talk.

"A deal was struck between the cities of Babbadelo and Ornamegir," Asad explained. "The eggs were to be transported from here to there under armed escort, purportedly for some kind of pressing research by the Cadaculos, which is the largest medical facility in the Higher West layer."

"Ha!" Diego exclaimed. "See?!"

Hector heard several reapers sigh in unison.

Yangéra rubbed her skull with a bony hand. 'I can't believe he was right...'

"What else did you learn?" asked Diego.

Imas picked up where her brother left off. "The eggs were supposed to leave Babbadelo over a month ago, but the railway line that they need to use also happens to pass very close by a recently discovered worm nest."

There was more sighing.

"Both the government AND the militia around here have been trying to organize a heavier escort, but with a damned rebellion going on, they can't cooperate on anything," said Imas. "Not to mention, people aren't exactly lining up to be a part of such a dangerous mission."

"The militia has managed to enlist the help of one of the larger treasure hunting groups," Asad added. "The Akassu. That's why so many of these guys are wearing green. The hunters were much more eager to cooperate with us than the militiamen.""

"1340

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 5 of 5))

'Well, this is just wonderful,' said Garovel.

"None of this changes the fact that we should not leave the eggs here," said Evangelina.

'We could turn them over to the government,' suggested Qorvass.

'And what would stop the militia from stealing them back?' said Ezura.

'That would be up to the government to figure out,' said Qorvass. 'We came here altruistically for the food. We do not have to make the eggs our problem, as well.'

'That's true,' said Garovel. 'And we still don't have a plan for distributing the food, either. It might be best to just turn everything over to the government and walk away.'

Ezura tilted her head. 'You surprise me, Garovel. I thought you boldest among us.'

'I just want to make sure we consider all of our options,' said Garovel. 'But thank you, I think.'

"I think we should go all in," said Diego. "Let's talk to this Akassu group. Maybe we could partner with them in moving the eggs. From the sound of things, if we don't move them, then no one will. Seems like a good opportunity for us. Throw a bit of our weight around, do some good, collect a reward, maybe partake in a bit of treasure-hunting ourselves while we're at it?" He looked around for approval. "C'mon, this is right in our wheelhouse. I can't be the only one thinking this? Am I the only Rainlord here?"

Qorvass hovered around Asad's head. 'As a matter of fact, you and the Lady Stroud ARE the only Rainlords here, yes.'

Diego scratched his head. "Huh. But hey, the reapers count, too, so that's four of... twelve. Hmm. Alright, I see your point."

'I agree with Diego,' said Ezura. 'We should not balk at this opportunity. 'The rain fears not the torch.'"

"1341

'Again, the rest of us aren't Rainlords,' said Qorvass.

'True,' Ezura admitted. 'Then shall we go see what our kin have to say about the matter?'

That made everyone go silent. She'd pretty much won the debate with that, Hector felt.

Evangelina's eyes fell upon him, however. "What does the young Lord Goffe think?"

Hector was surprised, but after a moment, he supposed he shouldn't have been. It was more or less his fault that they'd even come here in the first place, after all.

But the way she was eyeing him... Perhaps he was mistaken, but he felt like she wasn't just asking a question. He felt like she was about to pass judgment on him, like he'd made some mistake and she was waiting for him to either explain himself or apologize.

Maybe that was just how she always looked, though. He'd noticed a similar quality in some of the other Rainlord leaders, particularly Zeff.

Either way, he didn't see much point in letting it bother him. Not after all that had happened.

"...I think I would like to see things through," he said. "And... securing all this food won't be very helpful if a bunch of worms kill everyone before they can eat it."

Diego laughed, but Evangelina's expression did not change, and her gaze lingered on Hector for a bit longer before Asad spoke up again.

"Well, whatever the case, someone needs to go tell Zeff and everyone else what we have found."

A bout of volunteering and counter-volunteering intervened, until at length, the group was satisfied that Diego and Imas would go together while Asad, Hector, Jada, and Evangelina would remain here to watch over the captured Hun'Kui. The pair soon departed, and Hector and the others found a place to sit while they waited."

"1342

((The Monday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Hector had the distinct feeling that things were going to start moving very quickly very soon, so he wanted to make use of this downtime while it lasted. He tried contacting Emiliana again with the Shard in his pocket, but when he received no response, he decided to work on his materialization skills.

He wanted to attempt the "binding" technique that Zeff and Asad had shown him earlier. He figured that would be more useful than simply meditating. And besides, he couldn't very well close his eyes when he was supposed to be watching the captives.

First, however, he had to think of how to attempt the technique. The whole idea behind binding--as he recalled Asad and Garovel explaining it--was to convert a task that required active concentration into a task that did not.

That was about all the information he had to go on, though. He considered asking Garovel for more details, but the reaper was in the middle of a conversation with Atalim and Ezura.

Hmm.

Something that required active concentration...

What about making his iron move through the air? It was one thing to add velocity to a created object and be done with it, but could he possibly make that object fly according to his will? Against gravity, even?

No, strictly speaking. From everything he'd been told, as well as his own experimentation, such a feat was flatly impossible.

But Hector wondered if he could at least make it look like it was happening.

Certainly, he couldn't control his iron once it was created. That seemed to be the First Law of Materialization, if such labels existed. But even so, he could always grow more iron out of his already-created pieces. And growth was a kind of movement, wasn't it? And that other technique that Zeff and Asad had taught him earlier... the perpetually falling object...

Ideas swirled through his head, even though he couldn't quite imagine any practical applications just yet.

Maybe, instead of keeping the falling object perfectly still, he could add on to it in a different direction while also annihilating it from the opposite direction. Wouldn't that give the object the appearance of movement?"

"1343

Hector gave it a shot. He began with an iron cube hovering over the palm of his hand, just as before. It still fascinated him, simply looking at it, falling eternally in place without ever changing shape. He concentrated and started adding on to it from the right while simultaneously annihilating from the left. And of course, he also had to make sure that he didn't stop adding to it from the top while still annihilating it from the bottom, too.

It actually worked. The cube floated to the right, out of his hand, and he couldn't help smiling to himself.

It became unsteadier as it drew farther away from him, however, and then its shape distorted.

He frowned and started over.

Maintaining that level of concentration was difficult enough, but he also had to keep in mind that the angles of both creation and annihilation were constantly changing as well. And worse still, the distance from himself--slight though it was--also seemed to impact his level of precision just enough to mess him up.

For such a simple trick, it sure demanded a lot of concentration. He was starting to understand why he hadn't seen anyone else doing this so far. It probably wasn't worth all the effort. He was probably just wasting his time.

But still, he didn't want to give up. Because, somehow, it felt more personal than usual. Like he was inventing something. Even though he was sure someone else had figured this all out ages ago, he wanted to keep puzzling it out for himself, wanted to uncover all the little secrets that he could without relying on anyone else for help.

And, hmm. Maybe there was a simple solution to the distance problem. Maybe he could make the cube orbit around him in a perfect circle. Then the concentration requirements would never change.

He blinked at himself, mulling it over in his head a couple more times.

But what would it need to orbit, exactly? His body? Or his brain?

Hmm."

"1344

((The Monday Triple: page 3 of 3))

He supposed it might prove easier to have it orbit around his brain, so that was where he started. He created the cube directly in front of his face, made sure it was hovering and stationary, then began moving it. He kept his head still as he concentrated, visualizing his work as it curved around to the right and beyond his peripheral vision.

Adding the curve felt a bit tricky, but he wasn't having any trouble picturing its movement in his mind. He just needed to maintain its course until it curved all the way back around from the left.

He waited, trying not to get so eager to see it reentering his view that he ended up breaking his own concentration. It was on its way. Hopefully. He just needed to focus. It should've been getting close. Any second now, and it would--

There it was. It worked. But the sight of it floating there was enough of a relief that it pulled a small laugh from his lips, which did break his concentration. The cube distorted and then plummeted. Rather than destroying it, he let it clatter to the ground and then picked it up.

It was very hot to the touch, he found, and then realized that it would've been much more so if not for Zeff's misty armor drenching and cooling it for him. The constant, low hiss of the armor was somehow easy to forget about, at times. But he knew that if he ever left Zeff's range, the Undercrust's searing heat would be sure to remind him. He was just glad that the Lord Elroy's range was so enormous.

He tossed the lump of iron into the air and annihilated it again.

Alright, well, he'd come up with something that required active concentration. Now, this "binding" technique could convert it into something that didn't require concentration...

...How the hell was he supposed to pull this off, exactly? Purely through memorization? Really? What was the best way to commit something like this to memory?

Shit. Maybe this technique was too advanced for him, right now. Come to think of it, the way they'd talked about it kinda suggested as much...

Eh, whatever. He wasn't afraid of failing. He'd already failed harder at so many other things. Important things. This was kiddie shit."

"1345

Hector took a deep breath, found his focus, and put a new cube into orbit.

When it came down to it, it was just a pattern. A fairly complex pattern, sure, but a pattern nonetheless. And if he thought about it like that, then it didn't seem so difficult to memorize.

Two instances of creation, two instances of annihilation. Top and right, bottom and left. These were the constants. The easiest parts. The real difficulty of it stemmed from the shifting angles at which he had to maintain said constants.

But maybe he could think of the two instances of creation as just one. Two instances of adding to his iron. If he applied the same force to both of them, then...

The cube swung past his vision sooner than he'd expected, then swirled around again, quick as a curving arrow shot, and then again, so fast that it cut audibly through the air, and then several more times at such a speed that he wasn't sure he was even doing it himself anymore.

Then it flew completely off course and punched a hole through the wall next to him.

Hector stared with an open mouth, not quite sure what had just happened.

He looked around, wondering if someone had taken control of his iron or something, but no one was paying any attention to him--well, aside from a few of the captive Hun'Kui, who were looking worriedly in his direction.

Hmm.

Whatever just happened, he needed to replicate it.

He started over, taking the same steps, trying to repeat his same thought process, and then--

Yep. The second cube did the same thing, making a new hole only a half-meter or so away from the first one.

Oh, wait.

That constant rate of growth he'd applied on the right side... that was equivalent to gravity, wasn't it? And gravity was accelerative. As in, increasing. So... since there was no counter-force being applied by actual gravity like there was on the top side of the cube... then he'd essentially made the cube grow faster and faster... until his concentration could not keep up and he simply lost control of it.

Huh.

He scratched his head.

That was... almost worryingly easy, Hector felt. He would've thought that he'd have more trouble making the annihilation on the left and bottom keep pace with the accelerated growth on the right, but apparently not. It was like he'd barely even needed to think about it."
"1346

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

For a time, Hector merely sat there, mulling over what he'd just done. He supposed the only explanation was that his degree of control over iron was simply higher than he'd realized. Granted, he had lost control there at the end, but the point of interest was how fast the cubes had gotten before escaping him, not to mention how many revolutions around him that they had made.

It was true that he hadn't tested the limits of his materialization in a while. And had he achieved emergence recently? He didn't think so, but as he thought about it, he realized that he wasn't actually sure--a thought which he found slightly worrisome. Shouldn't that have been something he could be certain about? Maybe this was all just the result of meditation. Or Rasalased's "tempering," perhaps.

Or both?

Agh. He couldn't help feeling like he was losing himself, somehow. He wished he had more time to practice, to fully understand his current limits. He hated this feeling of unpreparedness. And he'd been feeling it all too often, lately.

He stood. If nothing else, he wanted to use what time he did have as efficiently as possible, and it occurred to him that he should perhaps locate the iron cubes and see what kind of state they were in before trying to draw any further conclusions.

It took a bit of searching, but he found them on the ground in front of an apparent sleeping quarters, having penetrated a second wall beyond the first and left a pair of cracked dents in a third.

He was surprised, however, to find that the cubes were no longer cubes at all. But after thinking about it more, he supposed that only made sense. When he'd lost control, they'd become distorted, because his control was the only thing making them hold their shape.

...And perhaps that was important to know. He squinted as he eyed the dents in the wall before him another time."

"1347

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

Another question was forming in Hector's head, but he wasn't quite able to articulate it to himself yet.

He decided to do one more test. He formed another hovering cube, but this time, he purposely made it float into the wall.

Nothing happened. But perhaps that wasn't strange. Perhaps it needed to float faster. He swung the cube around and increased the speed.

Again, nothing happened. He tried one more time, increasing the speed even further, and sure enough, nothing happened. Not even a sound.

Which seemed strange to him. At that speed, the cube definitely should have made a noise when it collided with the wall. Moreover, the previous two cubes certainly had made noises.

So what was going on here?

Well, there was only one discernible difference that he could see. The first two cubes were distorted, while the third was not. They'd both changed into long, vaguely conical shapes--not identical to each other but still similar enough that it didn't seem coincidental.

Hector blinked as he realized what had been bothering him. Yes. The reason that third cube hadn't made a noise when it collided with the wall was because it hadn't actually collided with it.

That was the way that "growing" his iron was supposed to work. Materialization could not occur within a solid object. He'd learned that very early on. So the cubes shouldn't have been able to grow into a wall and thereby pierce it, because he had been using this growing technique in order to make them move. Regardless of their speed, they should have simply reached the wall and stopped, not even colliding with it or making any noise, which was what the third cube did.

And yet they had.

Because their shape had changed. Because he'd lost control over their growth. The part of the distorted cubes which ended up colliding with the walls must have not been "growing" anymore. They must've simply been regular iron at that point."

"1348

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

That might've also explained why the cubes flew so wildly off course. The non-growing sections of the cube would have gained their own, genuine momentum while being pushed along at such a speed by the still-growing sections. Not to mention, they would have begun to bear the effects of gravity--and possibly other environmental conditions? He wasn't sure.

Hmm.

This was not a minor discovery, Hector felt. Clearly. With it, he would be able to, in effect, manipulate his iron after its initial creation--even to attack. Sure, it wouldn't be easy and would probably require shitloads more practice, but...

With this, he could evolve his entire fighting style.

He wondered if Zeff and Asad had been intending to teach him this soon. Maybe they didn't think he would've been able to do it. He wouldn't have thought he could do it, either.

Heh. He wanted see their faces when he showed it to them later. Garovel's, too, of course.

But first, it needed refinement. He had to practice more.

Abruptly, however, it occurred to him that he'd stopped keeping an eye on the captives. He annihilated his work and then briskly returned where he'd been sitting before. Thankfully, no one seemed to have noticed. He counted the number of captives, just to be sure none were missing.

Rather than sitting back down, though, he remained standing as he set to work again. Now that he knew not to add an accelerative force to the cube's orbit, he found that it was almost trivial to sustain, almost as if he were keeping it to its path with one of his hands.

He tried out different centers of orbit, around his torso, around his arm, his hand, his leg. They were more difficult but not terribly so. He tried out different angles as well, and found a similar result. Then he tried walking while trying to maintain the diagonal orbit around his torso, and he began struggling again, but not for long. After pacing back and forth a few times, he was starting to get the hang of it."

"1349

Hector found that the initial difficulty with walking had come from trying to maintain the orbit independently around him, but when he visualized all of the motions and shifting angles of creation and destruction as relative to himself--as an extension of himself, even--it became much easier.

But it did require active concentration, still, and that was the real hump that he wanted to overcome. As enjoyable as it was to have a tiny satellite floating around him, he wasn't really any closer to figuring out this "binding" memory technique.

He supposed the only way forward was to simply continue maintaining its orbit as much as possible, and then eventually, it would become second nature to him. Like riding a bike. Probably.

At length, Garovel finally looked over in his direction again.

‘Hector, what the fuck?!’ the reaper shouted, still with the echo of privacy.

Hector had expected Garovel to be surprised, but even so, he was a bit taken aback by that reaction. He wasn’t sure whether he should laugh or ask if he’d screwed something up.

Garovel pointed at the cube as it moved. ‘What the hell is this shit?! Are you really doing that?!’

‘Uh... yeah?’

The reaper just gave him a look that Hector didn’t recognize.

Hector added a second cube, this time orbiting it along the opposite diagonal path over his other shoulder. ‘I was just, uh... I was just testing some stuff out. Why do you sound so upset?’

Garovel took his time answering. ‘...Are you repeatedly creating and destroying new cubes so quickly that they look like one object in continuous motion?’

‘Wha? No, I--that’s... hmm.’ Hector hadn’t even thought to try doing that. And why the hell hadn’t he? It sounded way simpler than the method he’d come up with. Maybe not easier, but definitely simpler.”
"1350 -- CXLV.

“‘Hmm?’” said Garovel. ‘What do you mean, “hmm”?’

Hector explained himself. It took some time. He had to go over his experimentation and thought process.

When he was done, Garovel just stared at him for a while.

‘Hector...’

‘...Yeah?’

‘I’ve never seen anyone do such a thing with materialization before,’ the reaper finally said.

And Hector was confused, because Garovel didn't sound like he was joking or trying to trick him. But then, maybe that was part of the trick.

Garovel turned and floated quickly back toward the others. 'I need to hear what Asad thinks of this immediately.'

For a brief time, Hector merely stood there, watching him go.

Huh.

Okay, well, maybe it wasn't a trick.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Five: 'The intervening calm...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The next four days passed with a degree of peace--and indeed, even enjoyment--that Hector had not been expecting. The Rainlords met with both the local government and the Akassu treasure hunters several times to negotiate terms, but despite wishing to attend these meetings, Hector had other things to do.

Most importantly, perhaps, he and Garovel needed to wait for Roman and Voreese at the location that they'd specified in their letter. Garovel said that Roman must have received it by now and could therefore show up at anytime, but unfortunately, even though they turned it into a new camping venture of their own, along with Asad's family and several Rainlords, Roman and Voreese never appeared.

But that was fine, according to Garovel. There was still the meeting place in Capaporo, and perhaps Roman and Voreese were already there. He instructed Hector to leave an iron message behind in case they appeared here later.

Beyond simply waiting for Roman, however, Hector also spent the four days practicing materialization with Asad and frequently Zeff, who came and went from the meetings, keeping them apprised of all new developments."

"1350 -- CXLV.

"“Hmm”?’ said Garovel. ‘What do you mean, “hmm”?’

Hector explained himself. It took some time. He had to go over his experimentation and thought process.

When he was done, Garovel just stared at him for a while.

‘Hector...’

‘...Yeah?’

‘I’ve never seen anyone do such a thing with materialization before,’ the reaper finally said.

And Hector was confused, because Garovel didn’t sound like he was joking or trying to trick him. But then, maybe that was part of the trick.

Garovel turned and floated quickly back toward the others. ‘I need to hear what Asad thinks of this immediately.’

For a brief time, Hector merely stood there, watching him go.

Huh.

Okay, well, maybe it wasn’t a trick.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Five: ‘The intervening calm...’

The next four days passed with a degree of peace--and indeed, even enjoyment--that Hector had not been expecting. The Rainlords met with both the local government and the Akassu treasure hunters several times to negotiate terms, but despite wishing to attend these meetings, Hector had other things to do.

Most importantly, perhaps, he and Garovel needed to wait for Roman and Voreese at the location that they'd specified in their letter. Garovel said that Roman must have received it by now and could therefore show up at anytime, but unfortunately, even though they turned it into a new camping venture of their own, along with Asad's family and several Rainlords, Roman and Voreese never appeared.

But that was fine, according to Garovel. There was still the meeting place in Capaporo, and perhaps Roman and Voreese were already there. He instructed Hector to leave an iron message behind in case they appeared here later.

Beyond simply waiting for Roman, however, Hector also spent the four days practicing materialization with Asad and frequently Zeff, who came and went from the meetings, keeping them apprised of all new developments."

"1351

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 1 of 5))

To put it mildly, Asad and Zeff had shown a keen interest in learning how Hector was keeping his iron in orbit. They had insisted on repeated explanations and varied types of demonstrations.

At first, they seemed to be having trouble wrapping their heads around the concept, and after a few hours, Hector had begun wondering if there was something else going on with this technique that he didn't quite comprehend himself yet.

But no. That wasn't the problem, he came to realize. The real reason they were having a hard time learning it was simply because he was so bad at explaining it. Ultimately, Asad and Zeff both figured it out and were soon making material orbit around themselves, as well--and much more impressively, too. Zeff managed to make an entire chair for Ramira to sit on and float around him--a feat which she seemed to enjoy greatly, even if it did begin melting rather quickly. Asad, meanwhile, put a dozen different glass swords into orbit, all of varying shapes and sizes.

Needless to say, seeing all of that took a bit of the wind out of Hector's sails.

Still, Hector didn't think he would be forgetting their initial reactions anytime soon. The looks of utter confusion and disbelief on their faces--a part of Hector was still reeling from those looks. He wasn't at all sure what to think.

These were two men whose skill with materialization he revered completely--and not just because of their reputations, but because he had personally witnessed what kind of incredible things they could do. And the idea that he could have anything to teach them? That he could've thought of anything that they didn't already know? Or been taught by someone else who was even more knowledgeable?

Hector was having a hard time accepting this as possible. As were several of the reapers, by the looks of it."

"1352

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 2 of 5))

With the way everyone was talking about it, Hector wondered if this discovery had truly been his own. Sure, it had felt like it was, but as more time passed, that feeling faded, and his mind searched for other possible explanations.

One in particular popped into his head, and it had bothered him enough that he decided to consult Garovel about it. '...I can't be the first person to have ever thought of this,' he'd said.

'Why not?' was all Garovel said.

'Wh--? What do you mean?! Because I can't! There's just no way! I mean, fuckin'... We're talking about everyone who's ever lived! It's just impossible that no one else has thought of this before.'

'Is that because you think you're not smart enough?'

'I... no, well... I mean. Kinda. Yeah. Pretty much. I mean, how many materializers have there been? Like, total? It must be, fuckin'... billions or something, right? '

'All throughout human history? Mm, probably not billions. Maybe millions. Maybe. Hard to say. Remember that the number of materialization users is a subset of the number of reapers. And there haven't been THAT many of us, comparatively. If we're including all reapers who've ever existed, I'd only estimate that number to be around fifty million, at most. And even that might be wildly optimistic.'

'Fifty million is a shitload.'

'Not really. Fifty million is one twentieth of one billion. And how many humans have ever lived? That number is in the neighborhood of a hundred billion. At least. So the overall pool of materialization "inventors" is probably a lot smaller than you've been thinking.'

Hector wasn't buying it. 'I still don't think it's possible.'

'Well, whether or not you think it's possible doesn't change the fact that it happened. Maybe you should stop being so hard on yourself.'

'...Or maybe I didn't really do anything.'

'Excuse me?'

'Maybe it was Rasalased who thought of it. Maybe he just planted the knowledge into my head or something.'

'Ugh, god, don't even start with that. Just take the fucking credit, please.'"

"1353

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 3 of 5))

Hector didn't know how to respond to that.

'Alright, fine, let's suppose for a minute that Rasalased DID give that knowledge to you somehow. What difference would it make? Would it change what you've accomplished?'

‘That’s... that’s not the point, Garovel. It’s not about getting the credit. It’s about... agh, it’s about understanding what the fuck is happening. With my own limitations. And--and with... just... the world itself. I mean, shit, Garovel. Trying to understand the world around us doesn’t suddenly stop being important just because it might be... inconvenient. Or unpleasant.’

‘Oho.’

‘What, am I wrong?’

‘Heh. Well, when you put it like that, it’s hard to argue with you.’ The reaper paused, perhaps thinking. ‘But no, I still think you came up with it yourself. True, the timing is a bit suspicious. We only met Rasalased a little while ago, and now you’re doing this. But you know who ELSE we only met a little while ago? Asad and Zeff. And THEY were the ones who actually bothered to teach you about materialization. Therefore, I submit to the committee of your pedantic brain that it was NOT a magical sand god granting you heretofore lost knowledge, and that instead, it was simply inspiration from your new teachers.

‘Also, if we approach the subject from a completely different angle, then perhaps someone in the past DID think of your idea and just didn’t tell very many people about it. Hell, perhaps someone out there right now already knows about this technique, but they’re keeping that information to themselves, because... well, that’s a smart thing to do. Knowledge like this could be very dangerous, and generally speaking, a wise teacher avoids teaching his enemies how to kill him.’

He had to admit that the reaper had made a few good points, but Hector remained dubious nonetheless.

For the most part, though, he tried to focus on his training for now. All other concerns could wait until they had made it safely to Warrenhold."
"1354

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 4 of 5))

When it came to instructing Hector, the Lords Elroy and Najir seemed somehow even more motivated than before. Hector found them sometimes competing to answer his questions first--which, frankly, wasn’t the most helpful thing in the world. He soon got into the habit of pointing at the one he wanted to explain whenever they started trying to talk over each other.

Importantly, he finally managed to get a full explanation of this “mapping” technique that he’d been curious about.

“Mapping is very valuable for accomplishing feats with your power which might otherwise be too difficult or sophisticated to perform at your current skill level,” said Zeff.

Needless to say, Hector was most certainly listening.

“The core idea,” Zeff went on, “is that we are able to ease the overall burden of concentration on ourselves by making use of simple, physical triggers.”

“We often do it unconsciously, to a limited extent,” added Asad. “I’m sure I have seen you do it already, as well.”

Hector squinted, trying to think back.

“Hand motions are the most common example,” said Zeff. “Strictly speaking, it is not necessary for us to move our hands at all when performing materialization.”

“Which is not to say that our bodies are not necessary,” said Asad. “Our bodies operate as conduits for the power from our brains, but movement itself is not required. It is, however, helpful for concentration. And mapping is simply a more advanced form of this.”

Zeff held up a fist and half-extended his middle and index fingers. “I, for example, have mapped my ability to create highly pressurized water drills to this hand sign.” And sure enough, a small water drill appeared above the knuckles on his fingers. “This particular skill requires constant creation and destruction, as well as a very strong velocity state. When I originally mapped it, it was quite difficult for me to perform. Now it is trivial and made even more so by the mapping.””
"1355

((The Saturday donation bonus: page 5 of 5))

“Hand signals are the most common in practice,” said Asad, “but you could conceivably use any manipulable part of your body to achieve the same result.”

“Words, as well,” said Zeff.

Hector cocked an eyebrow. “Words?”

The Lord Elroy nodded. “Yes, you assign your skill to a certain word. You name it, essentially. It can work very well.”

“However,” said Asad, “it must be said that in the heat of combat, speaking the name of your attacks before you do them can certainly give your opponent an edge, especially if they have good intel on you.”

“Yes, but it must also be said that such tactics can serve to intimidate or confuse them,” said Zeff. “There are pros and cons to it.”

‘Do you have any personal examples of named attacks?’ said Garovel, sounding somewhat amused.

“Not currently,” said Zeff, “but I have been trying to assign my newest skill to a name. I’ve found that it helps if the name itself is befitting, but that can also be... difficult.”

‘I think “Water Bomb Drill” sounds just fine,’ said Axiolis.

“I think it sounds a bit long and silly,” said Zeff.

“Just stick with movements,” Asad advised Hector. “Save yourself the trouble.”

Hector’s mind was sufficiently blown by all of these revelations. Immediately, new ideas began to stir in his head, and he wanted to spend every waking moment trying to completely revamp his skill set.

It seemed like Zeff and Asad felt similarly with their own powers, along with several other Rainlords who joined them later on, most notably Joana Elroy, and very briefly, Horatio Blackburn.

Hector had been concerned about House Blackburn and would have liked to know more about how they were doing, but Lord Horatio was not particularly talkative, and Hector didn’t want to pry. So again, he decided that could wait until Warrenhold.”

"1356

As for local politics, the Rainlords managed to negotiate an uneasy truce among the warring factions by using the food they'd captured as leverage. Zeff and Axiolis did not seem confident that the peace would last once the Rainlords left Babbadelo, but there was nothing for it, they said. There was only so much they could do for the people here, they said.

And Hector would have liked to say that they were wrong, but he couldn't. He was far from an expert on political matters. If Garovel agreed with them, then so did Hector, even if he didn't want to.

That being said, Hector certainly didn't believe the Rainlords were being negligent or lazy. They were even going so far as to take custody of several important political prisoners who--according to varied accounts by the government, militia, treasure-hunters, and citizenry--posed the greatest threat to a continued peace. The Rainlords would be bringing these prisoners with them to Capaporo, where more secure facilities awaited them.

And since Capaporo was also their own destination, that was as far as they intended to take the worm eggs as well. Custody of the eggs would transfer to the local government there, who would then deliver them to Ornamegir.

Hector hoped that would be enough for things to remain settled, but he was already thinking of when he might be able to return and check up on the state of things in Babbadelo. Probably not for quite a long while, he figured.

And of course, there was still the matter of the treasure, the Sosho'Diyu.

He would have been lying if he said he wasn't interested in finding it. It was hard not to be, what with how the reapers talked about it, about the potential it held. Moreover, he kept thinking about how useful it might be for revitalizing Warrenhold. Assuming it was money. The reapers seemed to think it was something else, though they didn't know what."

"1357

Diego Redwater, Carlos Sebolt, and a few others had been meeting with the Akassu hunters in order to keep everyone abreast of any and all developments on that front, but the news hadn't been encouraging. According to Diego, treasure hunters all over the city had been growing increasingly demoralized in their efforts, which was one of the reasons why the Akassu had sided with the militia in the first place. More and more, they were trying to find alternate means of making their fortunes, as most people now believed that either the treasure did not exist or that it was nowhere near Babbadelo.

It didn't help that there were conflicting accounts of how this treasure-hunting fever even got started in the first place. Diego said that they'd heard three separate tales now, the only shared trait among them being that it all began about a year ago when a foreigner came to town.

In the first tale, the foreigner boasted loudly to all who would listen that he had lain eyes and even his hands on the great treasure, Sosh'o'Diyu. As evidence, he flaunted a small cache that was full of precious gems, which he had supposedly plundered from it. Furthermore, he claimed that he intended to return for the remainder of the treasure soon, and no one had seen him since.

In the second tale, the foreigner was not alone. He had some sort of terrible partner, and the whole reason they were able to boast of their wealth was because they ran rampant through the city, stealing it from everyone. They pillaged whatever they pleased and even abducted women and children. Nevermind that no one seemed able to identify any of these abducted people. Diego and Carlos believed this story had the least credibility."

"1358

((The Monday Triple: page 2 of 3))

In the final tale, the foreigner was actually a revolutionary from Acacero who'd abandoned the cause. He claimed to have stumbled upon the treasure after fleeing a great battle, but he never provided any kind of proof. The only reason the fever took hold in the city was because so many fools and desperate losers were eager to believe him.

And perhaps even more worrisome than any of these stories was the fact nobody knew what this foreigner looked like. According to Diego and Carlos, many people claimed to have met and even spoken to the foreigner, yet none could describe him or provide any physical evidence of his existence. No videos. No pictures. Not even a name.

All in all, it didn't bode well for the treasure's existence, and it was no small wonder why the hunters grew more discouraged by the day. With no solid leads to go on and so much danger afoot, the hunters had begun transforming into little more than territorial gangs whom civilians hired for protection.

The few true hopefuls who remained would be traveling with the Rainlords. The prevailing thought among them seemed to be that the only place left to look was in the tunnel where only a handful had dared go before. The tunnel near a worm nest. The only tunnel that led to Capaporo.

Naturally.

And now, at the end of four quiet days of training and relative relaxation, Hector found himself waiting to board another train, this one more than twice the size of the last as it had to carry Rainlords, hunters, militiamen, prisoners, and three very large, very dangerous boxes full of eggs.

Twenty-six cubes orbited around Hector as he observed the efficient packaging line of Rainlords carefully loading up the many pods full of non-servants. He'd gotten into the habit of maintaining objects in orbit wherever he went, thinking of it as a kind of background practice. This many still required considerable concentration, though.

His gaze fell upon an approaching man whose face he recognized but only vaguely. When the name hit him, however, Hector's eyes widened, and he shifted uncomfortably.

That was Melchor Blackburn coming toward him. The one they called Darktide."

"1359

The man had been unconscious since Dunehall--and prior to that, he'd been unconscious since Luzo. Hector had never met him properly, let alone spoken to him.

Judging from the way Melchor was moving, the man was still coping with considerable soreness, though he didn't look terribly exhausted.

But maybe that was just because Hector was comparing him to Zeff.

"Hello," said Melchor. The man's reaper hovered silently behind him, but Hector couldn't recall his name.

Hector lowered the number of cubes around him down to eight. He tried not to let himself feel intimidated by one of his allies, but this man was the oldest Rainlord here by a good margin. "Hi..."

"I hear I have you to thank for my life."

Hector wasn't sure how to respond to that, so he decided to change the subject. "...I'm glad to see you on your feet again."

Silence arrived.

Maybe that was the wrong thing to say. Shit. Maybe he'd sounded too stiff or distant when he'd said it. Double shit.

Garovel came to his rescue. 'How's your family doing? We haven't heard much from them, and we've been worried.'

"Ah... I'm afraid I am not as knowledgeable on that subject as I would like to be."

'Oh,' said Garovel. 'Of course. You've been asleep. I apologize if I overreached.'

'Don't be silly,' said Melchor's reaper. 'What is your name, by the way? I never did learn it.'

'Garovel. And yours?'

'Orric. Pleased to meet you.'

'Likewise.'

Hector saw the expression on Melchor's face, the flat and hollow gaze at the ground. "...How are you doing?" he asked. "It must be a lot to take in."

Melchor exhaled a heavy breath. "Yes. Quite a lot."

Hector wanted to say something more, ask him... something, but he couldn't think of anything.

After a short while, however, Melchor turned to look at him. "How old are you, Lord Goffe?"

This question again. Somehow, he felt less prepared to answer it every time he heard it. "Uh..."

"1360

Garovel intervened again. 'Why so curious?'

Melchor's face became abruptly apologetic. "Oh. Forgive me. I merely wished to know if Hector is old enough to remember the Jungle Wars. I sometimes forget that age can be a sensitive subject where security and morale are of concern. If you would prefer not to tell me, I understand."

'Why do you bring up the Jungle Wars?' said Garovel.

Melchor eyed the young Atreyan lord. "The way they talk about you... There is a mythos growing around you."

Hector just returned the man's stare, waiting for elaboration.

"I know what that is like," said Melchor. "The Jungle Wars were when they first began to call me Darktide. It is a strange thing, is it not? Or am I mistaken in assuming that this is a new development for you?"

Hector needed a moment to consider those questions. He hadn't been expecting them, certainly. "Ah... yeah. I'm not, um... I don't know if..." He shut his mouth and clenched his jaw, wanting very much to not fumble over his own tongue right now.

Melchor seemed to take that as a hint. "Nevermind. It is none of my business." He didn't move, but he looked like he was ready to turn and walk away now.

And a surge of silent panic gripped Hector's chest. This wasn't what he'd wanted at all. "No," he said almost involuntarily as his mind grasped for a way to follow it up.

Something. Anything. Maybe it would be easier if he didn't talk about himself.

"...Tell me about yourself," Hector ended up saying. And after hearing his own words, he wanted to bury his face in his hands. That was way too broad of a thing to say, and it hadn't answered either of the man's questions."

"1361

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Melchor looked about as off kilter as Hector felt now. "Um... okay. What would you like to know?"

Oh shit. Hector racked his brain. 'What the hell do I say?'

'I don't know, but I can't wait to hear what you come up with.'

'Garovel, c'mon!'

'You can do it, buddy. I've got faith in you.'

It didn't sound like faith to Hector. The first thing that popped into his head was to ask about the Jungle Wars. But wait, no, he should ask about Melchor himself, shouldn't he?

Oh shit.

Oh fuck.

Oh no.

Now nothing was coming to him at all. This was torture. Why couldn't his concentration help him with this shit, too? He was still able to keep his eight cubes in orbit just fine, so what the hell?

Garovel finally deigned to intervene publicly. 'Did you ever work in the Vanguard?'

Goddammit, that was such a great question. Fuck.

"I did, yes," said Melchor. "Many years ago."

‘What is your opinion of it now?’ asked Garovel.

The man’s green eyes lingered on Garovel a moment before he answered. “Honestly? I have heard many people say otherwise, but personally, I do not think it has changed much.”

‘Oh?’

“The Vanguard has always been extremely interventionist. That is its entire purpose. Aggressive and preventative measures. Yes, certain things might be different, certain policies, certain kinds of mistakes, perhaps. But as a whole? I would say the Vanguard is essentially the same.”

‘That’s interesting,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ve not heard anyone else say that. But I feel similarly. I think the primary reason why it seems like so many people have begun to change their opinion of the Vanguard is actually just because of technology.’”

"1362

((The Wednesday Triple: page 2 of 3))

‘I agree,’ said Orric. ‘Everyone wants to blame aberrations for everything, but I would say their presence has only caused the Vanguard to grow--and not necessarily anything beyond that. It’s the ease with which information is spread nowadays that lets everyone learn about all of the mistakes that the Vanguard is making.’

Garovel nodded. ‘You’re absolutely right. In the olden days, it was so much easier to cover things up. Frankly, I’m surprised the Vanguard is doing as well as it is on that front. Did you know that there are still entire countries that barely know about the existence of servants?’

‘Ah, yes. There are quite a lot of them in Qenghis and Luugh, aren’t there?’

‘Even here in Eloa, there are a few.’

‘You’re kidding.’

‘Oh, no, I’m not. Hector’s home country of Atreya is one of them.’

Orric's empty eye sockets fell upon him. 'Is that really true?'

"Ah... yeah."

'I can hardly believe it. Granted, I've never been there, but even so...' Orric looked at Melchor. 'Did you know that?'

Melchor shook his head.

'All of the countries in that region are the same way,' said Garovel. 'Kahm, Rendon, Lorent, Mara, Ajax, Dante. Even parts of Intar, I think.'

'How have they remained so ignorant all this time?' said Orric. 'Is it really just the Vanguard's doing?'

'I'm not entirely sure, myself. I assume the Vanguard has been a big part of it, but in Atreya at least, the public DOES know that people with superhuman abilities exist elsewhere in the world. They just don't know where the power comes from. And they're afraid of it. Which is understandable.'

'So they only don't know about reapers, then?'"

"1363

((The Wednesday Triple: page 3 of 3))

'Yes and no,' said Garovel. 'From what I've seen, they do have a concept of us, at least. In their mythologies, religion, and entertainment, that is. But they don't think we're real or that we're connected to the superhumans that they've heard about. To them, we're these kind of phantom-creatures who exist in nightmares or some sort of imaginary hell-dimension, perhaps. Which isn't THAT far off, I suppose.'

'I see. That's very different from Sair, where we're seen as entirely one with nature.'

"I wouldn't say entirely one with nature," added Melchor. He turned to Hector. "But that makes me curious. What do you see reapers as?"

It took Hector a second to understand what he meant. "Oh. Ah... I see them as... scythe-wielding skeletons. And wearing a kind of... black shroud, I guess." He'd never told that to anyone but Garovel before.

Somehow, it felt a little embarrassing to admit, like telling someone his middle name or some other mild secret.

“That sounds very strange to me,” said Melchor. “Is it not unsettling to see such a thing all the time?”

Hector gave a small shrug. “I hadn’t really thought about it. Always seemed about right to me.”

“Hmm.”

“What about you? What do you see them as?”

“Blue jays,” said Melchor.

Hector’s brow furrowed in disbelief. “Birds? Really?”

Melchor chortled faintly. “Is that so strange to you?”

“Uh... kinda, yeah. I mean, that’s just so... normal. They really just look like birds to you?”

“Their eyes glow.”

“Huh. Do they flap their wings?”

“Sometimes.”

“Do their beaks move when they talk?”

“No.”

“Do they, like... perch on top of things?”

“Occasionally, but not often.”

Hector had to stop himself from asking if Melchor had ever confused them with real blue jays. After a few beats of silence, he instead said, “I have a lot more questions.”

That made Melchor laugh, a bit harder this time."

"1364

‘As much as I would like to hear more about your blue jays,’ said

Garovel, 'I'm interested to know what your thoughts on the Jungle Wars are. Since you brought it up earlier, that is.'

Melchor's amusement diminished somewhat. "Terrible business. Are you sure you want to listen to the ravings of an old man?"

'I'm sure.'

But Melchor was looking at Hector now, as if he'd really been asking him.

Hector wondered if it was something that Melchor didn't really want to talk about, but he also didn't want to pretend that he wasn't interested, either. So he just nodded.

"Very well..." Melchor scratched his chin with his thumb. "The Jungle Wars, as a whole, in my view, were inevitable. The diamond mines that everyone was fighting over, they were just an excuse. In truth, I would argue that those wars were cultural conflicts even more than they were economic ones. The Melmoorians were never going to live peacefully with the Cannites. Their belief systems were simply incompatible."

'You might be right, but what makes you say that?' said Garovel.

"The Cannites worshiped rocks and animals. As if that was all the world was. And they thought themselves inherently superior because of this. Closer to nature."

'Would I be correct in assuming that you fought on the side of Melmoore?'

"You would, but I lived among the Cannites for several years and knew many good people among them. I bore them no ill will. They were simply wrong. They should never have tried to invade Melmoore. Their government, if you could even call it that, had no respect for their fellow human being. Do I think they deserved to be wiped out for it? Of course not. But it was like one of their very own proverbs: you cannot throw stones at a wolf and then be surprised when it does not flee like a rabbit."

"1365

'You are just full of dissenting opinions, aren't you?' laughed Garovel. 'Usually, when I hear people talk about the Jungle Wars, it's about how the big, bad Melmoorians annihilated the peaceful, nature-loving Cannites and eventually consumed most of the region with their industrialist greed.'

'Yes, we have heard that many times as well,' said Orric. 'It really gets on Melchor's nerves.'

"Only when people who did not live through it speak as if they did," said Melchor.

Garovel laughed again. 'I know the feeling.'

"Many reapers seem to," said Melchor. "As I grow older, I find myself appreciating the work that the Archivers do more and more. If Orric decided to become one tomorrow, I would not be terribly upset."

'Maybe one day,' said Orric, 'when there is not quite so much work yet to be done.'

"I have my doubts that such a day will ever occur."

'If that is true, then perhaps my life as a glorified bookkeeper was simply not meant to be. What a terrible shame.'

Melchor gave the reaper a dry look.

Hector was curious now. "Archivers?"

"Have you not heard of them before?" The man seemed surprised.

Hector just shook his head.

'The grand historians of all humanity,' said Garovel. 'Paragons of impartiality, with integrity that is beyond reproach.'

"Yes," said Melchor. "In truth, I am not sure Orric would qualify."

'Hey.'

'No offense, but he probably wouldn't,' said Garovel. 'Anyone can start archiving independently, of course, but to receive recognition from the Prime Archivers as one of their own? I wouldn't get your hopes up, if I were you.'

"Yes, I have heard that they are notoriously reclusive," said Melchor.

'That is an understatement,' said Garovel. 'The Prime Archivers are all very old, very paranoid reapers. And unless something's changed with them recently, then it has been about fourteen hundred years since they allowed anyone to officially join their ranks."

"1366

Melchor turned his head slightly but didn't take his eyes off Garovel. "I have never heard that."

'Well, it's not something they like to advertise,' said Garovel. 'And there are a lot of "unofficial" Archivers out there who muddy the waters a bit. Which isn't to say that the unofficial guys are doing a bad job, necessarily. I just mean that there's some confusion involved, as well as some ego and obsession.'

"How do you know so much about it?" said Melchor.

Garovel paused. He glanced at Hector. 'Because I used to be one of the Prime Archivers.'

And if he was being completely honest, Hector still didn't quite follow all this talk about official and unofficial Archivers, but even so, that particular revelation was surprising enough to make him stare.

Melchor and Orric were briefly silent as well, until Orric asked, 'How long ago was this?'

'...About fourteen hundred years,' said Garovel.

'And are we to assume that number is a coincidence?'

'No. I had a falling out with them over their increasing sense of elitism and, in my view, cruelty. But I think if you asked them about it, they would argue that I simply lacked their vision and/or practicality.'

'And you are saying that they have not allowed any new members since you left their ranks?'

'Yeah. But it wasn't just me. My sister and two others were part of the exodus as well.'

"Was there a particular event that caused you all to leave?" said Melchor.

‘Yes. The rift between us and them had been building for a long time, but the straw that broke the camel’s back was a new set of rules regarding the treatment of our servants. You see, in order to actually write anything down and keep records, we of course required servants for that physical labor. But keeping servants also meant that our neutrality was not protected under the Old Law. And that was a problem.’”

"1367

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 1 of 3))

‘Ah,’ said Orric. ‘And therefore, you held divided opinions regarding how best to protect said neutrality, yes?’

‘Exactly,’ said Garovel. ‘Our opponents believed that we should be as non-threatening as possible. They thought that we would be able to operate unmolested as long as we mostly remained below everyone’s radar and didn’t accrue too much military power. Which wasn’t entirely insensible, in my opinion. On the grand stage, possessing enough power inevitably invites recruitment or conflict with others who have it. And on top of that, they also had guarantees from the world leaders at the time that our neutrality would be respected under those conditions.

‘But for one thing, we weren’t sure we believed those guarantees, and for another, there was still the matter of the servants themselves. In actual practice, our opponents were advocating for the early termination of servant lives. The new set of rules that we did not want to abide by were essentially designed to prevent any “inappropriate conduct”--or in other words, friendship. The logic being that if we grow attached to our servants, then we will be less inclined to release them when the time limit expires--which, by the way, was only five years.’

‘Wow,’ said Orric. ‘I knew Archivists had a rigid organizational structure, but I have never heard the details.’

‘Well, I don’t know if they still abide by those rules,’ said Garovel, ‘but yeah. I didn’t want to treat my servant like a slave--or worse than a slave, really. A disposable tool. And just so I could manage some books in peace? A peace which I didn’t even have faith in? It was moronic. But that being said, the fact that Archivists are still around after all this time suggests that they’ve been doing SOMETHING right. I just can’t imagine that it’s because of those rules. Or at least, I don’t WANT to imagine that it's because of them. Ugh."

"1368 -- CXLVI.

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 2 of 3))

'I must say, that is all very disappointing to hear,' said Orric. 'It sounds like they would not even accept a servant as old as Melchor, much less let me keep him.'

"You make it sound like I am your pet."

Orric ignored the comment. 'Perhaps it would be better to work independently as Archivers, then.'

'Or start your own group,' Garovel suggested. 'I've considered doing that a few times, myself.' He threw another look Hector's way. 'Only problem is that I would need a very large and very secure place to keep everything.'

Hector's expression flattened inside of his misty armor.

'And a bunch of like-minded friends wouldn't hurt, either,' Garovel went on. 'Maybe a servant I really trusted, too. Especially one who had demonstrated an interest in knowledge and learning and protecting things.'

Hector had a few different responses to that in mind, but he chose to let the awkward silence arrive instead.

Garovel shrugged. 'Oh well. I guess it's hopeless.'

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Six: 'Into the writhing den...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To put it mildly, Hector had a multitude of new questions for Garovel, but he decided that they could wait. It wasn't much longer before the Rainlords finished loading up the train and were ready to move out. He and Garovel said their goodbyes to Melchor and Orric, who ventured off to rejoin the rest of House Blackburn.

The atmosphere on the train was palpably tense, so even though he and Garovel had plenty more opportunity to talk, it just didn't feel like the time for it. Hector wanted to be ready in case anything happened, so instead, he decided to patrol up and down the train cars, getting a good idea of where all of the different factions were located on board."

"1368 -- CXLVI.

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 2 of 3))

'I must say, that is all very disappointing to hear,' said Orric. 'It sounds like they would not even accept a servant as old as Melchor, much less let me keep him.'

"You make it sound like I am your pet."

Orric ignored the comment. 'Perhaps it would be better to work independently as Archivers, then.'

'Or start your own group,' Garovel suggested. 'I've considered doing that a few times, myself.' He threw another look Hector's way. 'Only problem is that I would need a very large and very secure place to keep everything.'

Hector's expression flattened inside of his misty armor.

'And a bunch of like-minded friends wouldn't hurt, either,' Garovel went on. 'Maybe a servant I really trusted, too. Especially one who had demonstrated an interest in knowledge and learning and protecting things.'

Hector had a few different responses to that in mind, but he chose to let the awkward silence arrive instead.

Garovel shrugged. 'Oh well. I guess it's hopeless.'

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Six: 'Into the writhing den...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To put it mildly, Hector had a multitude of new questions for Garovel, but he decided that they could wait. It wasn't much longer before the Rainlords finished loading up the train and were ready to move out. He and Garovel said their goodbyes to Melchor and Orric, who ventured off to rejoin the rest of House Blackburn.

The atmosphere on the train was palpably tense, so even though he and Garovel had plenty more opportunity to talk, it just didn't feel like the time for it. Hector wanted to be ready in case anything happened, so instead, he decided to patrol up and down the train cars, getting a good idea of where all of the different factions were located on board."

"1369

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 3 of 3))

The Rainlords were dispersed at both the front and back of the train, while the Hun'Kui militiamen and hunters shared the middle.

However, Hector was quite surprised to find a small group of non-Hun'Kui among the hunters. At first, he'd thought they were Rainlords due to the climate suits they were wearing, but then he realized that the suits themselves were not identical, being slightly off-color and bulkier.

'Who the hell are they?' said Hector.

'Oh, those must be the guys from Boland,' said Garovel. 'I heard Diego talking about them a couple days ago.'

'They're really from the surface?'

'Yup.'

'What are they doing down here?'

'Hunting for treasure, what else? Though, from the way Diego talked about them, it sounded like they cared more about adventure than they did about money.'

Hector shook his head with disbelief. 'What a bunch of lunatics...'

'Hey, we're on this train, too.'

'Yeah, but... I mean, holy shit.'

They numbered only four, but at the very least, they did look prepared. He had never seen anyone carrying so many guns. Each man must have had six or seven different pieces of varying sizes, some of which were definitely ardor-fueled.

The subject of the ardor weapons had come up a number of times during negotiations between the Rainlords and the locals, and Hector knew that several of the Rainlords had been studying the weapons that they had confiscated very closely. In terms of design, the firearms themselves were not overly complex or otherwise difficult for the Rainlords to understand, but they had no idea how to get their hands on more ammunition--a problem with which the militia and government had agreed to assist.

Now, most of the Rainlords were carrying at least one ardor weapon of their own."

"1370

Hector had been able to try one out for himself--a compact handgun-version--but not having any prior experience or training with firearms, he didn't trust himself with it, even after being instructed in its general usage by Zeff, Asad, Jada, and even briefly Marcos and Ramira.

That left a lasting impression on him. The fact that such young children were already so disciplined with guns was certainly strange, but with everything else he'd come to know of Rainlords, he supposed he shouldn't have been that surprised.

All these firearms made his thoughts drift to Colt, as well. He felt mild regret that he'd never asked the man to teach him of weaponry during their training sessions. And he wondered how Thomas and Stephanie were doing, too. Better, he hoped. Everyone deserved to grow up safe and healthy.

Agh. There were so many things he wanted to check up on once he'd made it back to Warrenhold. For now, though, he had to focus on getting there.

The initial unease in the air began to lighten somewhat as the hours passed, but it never quite went away. Having walked the full length of the train multiple times, from engineer to engineer, Hector eventually found himself taking a seat with the Elroys again.

Zeff was looking slightly more rested than when they'd first arrived in the Undercrust. Hector had been surprised to learn that this mist armor maintained itself even while Zeff slept.

Asad was surprised by this as well. The Sandlord had been waiting for the mist armor to dissipate so that he could test his own hand at making a self-sustaining, temperature-controlled suit for Hector with quartz, and so when Zeff's work didn't go away, the tattooed man's face became filled with more disappointment and jealousy than Hector had yet seen from him.

Instead, Asad set about practicing on himself, with not-so-wonderful results. Now, the Lord Najir was looking almost as persistently dour as Zeff was.

And there could be no mistake--more rested though he was, Zeff's overall mood had not really improved. In fact, toward Hector in particular, it had most definitely worsened."

"1371

((The Wednesday Triple: page 1 of 3))

Hector knew why, of course. Zeff was not pleased that he was the only one who could use the Shards to talk to Emiliana. Even more than that, however, was the fact that Emiliana had simply not been talking very much. Not only could she not tell them where she was, but she was also apparently quite busy doing... something.

And as uncomfortable as it was, Hector couldn't entirely blame Zeff for being upset. That moment when they'd first discovered that they could talk to one of the missing Elroys--the man's face had lit up with shock and hope. But to then realize that it didn't matter? Zeff had been desperate for any kind of lead, and this was supposed to be it.

But it wasn't. Not yet, anyway. And after four days, Hector was beginning to think that it wouldn't be.

It did seem strange, though, that she would have no actionable information whatsoever. If she were stuck in a dark cell with no means of learning anything about her surroundings at all, then that might explain it, but if that were truly the case, then why hadn't she said so?

And more importantly, why didn't she have more opportunity to talk? What, exactly, was keeping her so busy?

The simplest explanation that Hector could think of was that she didn't want to tell them. Because of Gohvis, probably. She was afraid that her father would come for her and that Gohvis would kill him.

And seeing Zeff now, Hector wasn't sure that Zeff wouldn't do that. Sure, it seemed like certain death to Hector, but would Zeff and Axiolis see it that way? Were they even thinking clearly when it came to Emiliana? It was hard to tell, and Hector didn't want to broach the subject and make things even worse.

But shit. Maybe it didn't matter. With the way Zeff kept staring at him, maybe that conversation was inevitable. More and more, Hector found himself not wanting to avert his gaze when it happened. It was getting to the point where he'd just stare right back at the man, waiting for him to say something."

"1372

((The belated Wednesday Triple catch-up: page 2 of 3))

'Let's take another walk around the train,' Garovel suggested privately.

Hector supposed that was a good idea and got up to leave again. He'd been actively trying not to get lost in conversation with Garovel so that he could remain vigilant and keep an eye on everyone, and now here he was, letting himself get distracted by Zeff.

He had to remain focused. Even if nothing happened during this trip, that would be fine. He just had to think of it as an exercise in self-discipline. A learning experience.

Something was probably going to happen, though. Any minute now, he figured.

--+-+--+--

As he sat in his cell, listening to his chains clink in rhythm with every bump and jostle of the train, Royo Raju tried to keep his head clear and his wits about him. His stomach ached with greater ferocity than at any point since his capture two weeks ago, though it was not due to the fact that they had not been feeding him. In fact, even if they had offered him food, he would have refused it.

He was no stranger to not eating. Every penniless, parentless brat in the Higher West Layer knew what that was like and knew it well. That was why he had spent years of his life in the iron mines of Acacero, working himself to the bone so that he would never have to experience that kind of misery again.

Yet here he sat.

He'd earned enough money to not only pay for his education, but for several others as well. He'd gained enough wealth to start his own business without having to take a loan from one of those murderous banks and end up saddled with debt for the rest of his life. He'd been building his reputation as a consultant in socioeconomics, as someone who knew not just what the public wanted and needed, but what they thought they wanted and needed.

Yet here he sat."

"1373

((The belated Wednesday Triple catch-up: page 3 of 3))

He'd suppressed violent rebellions without firing a shot. He'd not only turned his enemies from their cause, but won their loyalty, their respect.

He'd done all of that, yet here he sat. A prisoner. A failed revolutionary. On his way to Akagokai, the Red Cage, one of the most infamous prisons in the Higher West Layer. A miserable hole where they meant to keep him for the remainder of his life.

The fools. They knew not whom they had crossed.

But they would. One day, they would. Every betrayal, every suffered indignity, and every fallen comrade--Royo would not forget a single one.

But how had it all gone so wrong so quickly? He knew the answer to that, of course. He had scarcely thought of anything else during his confinement.

It was that stranger's doing. The Foreigner. Everything had been proceeding in lockstep with the revolts in Acacero and Poppeyo until this treasure-hunting hysteria arrived. After that, it was like everyone had lost their minds. All sense of caution vanished in pursuit of some unknown fortune, and chaos upended the entire city.

And he had not been immune to it, either. Royo remembered winding his own men up over a few baseless rumors and leading them to their doom. His goals, forgotten. His small group of loyalists, captured or killed.

It made no sense at all. How could he have been so blind? So lacking in forethought?

In retrospect, he couldn't have. Not without some kind of fell sorcery distorting his mind. The Foreigner had twisted his thoughts, somehow, along with all the rest of Babbadelo.

Yes, it sounded like a far-fetched and desperate excuse, but it was also the only explanation for something that was otherwise inexplicable. Why else could he not remember the Foreigner's face? Royo was absolutely certain that he had spoken directly to him."
"1374

He scowled. The more he thought about it, the more his chest bristled with rage.

He shut his eyes and controlled his breath. He had to remain calm. Rage's only purpose was as a motivator, and he did not require more motivation right now.

The Foreigner was never going to do that to him again. Royo would not allow it. The one thing that he had always been able to trust was himself, his own mind. It was the only difference between him and all of the other wretches in the dirt. Sorcery or not, there was no excuse for befalling such base trickery.

As much as he did not want to accept it, there was no sense in ignoring the truth of the matter. A man of genuine fortitude and guile could never be manipulated. His mind had simply not been strong enough to resist the Foreigner.

But it would be. No matter what it took, it would be.

Because he aimed to rule the Higher West Layer--and rule it well. The rest of the world just hadn't accepted it yet.

Nothing in all of creation would prevent Royo Raju's ambition. Certainly not these militiamen.

They didn't seem to like it when he stared at them through the vertical bars. One of them was even bothered enough to open his cell and gut-punch him until he stopped. That one's name was Dorgot.

Dorgot was going to be the first to die.

Royo knew that he had to be patient, though. If he didn't wait until the train was sufficiently far enough from Babbadelo, then everything would be for naught.

Oddly enough, despite his current circumstances, Royo had hardly been able to believe his luck when he'd heard that he was being transferred to Capaporo. And the fool guards should certainly have not told him that he might be eaten alive by a worm along the way. But then again, they couldn't have known that they were practically sealing their own death warrants."

"1375

The only caveat was all of these superpowered interlopers aboard. He'd caught glimpses of them, most notably that one who had been wandering around, the one the militiamen had dubbed the Senmurai--or "Knight of the Mist" in Hunese.

It was going to be a very delicate balance, getting out of this alive, but not only was it his best means of escape, but there was the Soshō'Diyu to think of, as well.

Therein lay his path to greatness. It was clear to him now. Foreigner be damned. Royo would find that treasure. Even if it wasn't real, he would find it anyway. Because this was the Hand of Shukumei, of Destiny, reaching out to him. He had to but grasp it and pull himself up.

...What? No. Royo's glowing eyes squinted, and he shook his head. Had those really been his own thoughts just now? Or were they what the Foreigner wanted him to think? The Soshō'Diyu... did he truly care about finding it? Did it even exist?

He rubbed his forehead with both of his chained hands. He could feel the fury rising in his chest again, but he didn't have a direction for it and so decided to just push it back down. Fortunately, it was soon overshadowed by another bout of stomach pain anyway.

Enough time had passed, he decided. The train must have traveled far enough into the tunnel by now. He had endured this humiliation long enough.

His ash-gray skin tingled with both anticipation and dread. He clenched his jaw as he began to regulate his breathing even more heavily than before. Deliberately slow and long inhales. Then he forced his abdominal muscles to contract and release, contract and release--hold--contract and release. And repeat. And distort the pattern to further upset his stomach. And concentrate. On his goal. Provoking disgust in himself. Mind over matter."

"1376

He had performed this technique many times. It wasn't easy and had required months of regular practice to learn, but this variation eliminated the need for his hands. True, the militiamen had not completely removed his ability to use said hands, but Royo had always preferred to be overprepared.

At length, his stomach responded. A small, metal jar lurched upward through his throat, and he vomited it into his waiting palms.

"Hey!" someone said in Hunese. One of the militiamen had taken notice. It was Dorgot. Of course it was. "What are you doing in there?!" The oaf banged on the bars of Royo's cell with his blackjack.

Hunched forward as the post-nausea relief washed through his body, Royo just stared at him with glowing eyes that had grown slightly bloodshot.

"Answer me!" said Dorgot. "You think I won't come in there and make you tell me what you're doing?!"

At this point, it didn't really matter whether Dorgot opened the cell for him or not, but Royo hoped he would. He gripped the jar more tightly, preparing to unscrew the top.

Even now, though, a part of him was hesitant. And for good reason, he knew. The moment that the sludge inside this container made contact with the air, the accompanying pheromones would escape, and then it would only be a matter of time until all hell broke loose.

There was a very real chance that he would die along with the rest of these simpletons.

A risk worthy of himself, Royo Raju decided.

He twisted the cap free and heard the vacuum seal pop.

“What was that?!” said Dorgot, banging on the bars still.

Royo did not answer him.

The big militiaman growled as he moved toward the door and fiddled with the keyring on his belt.”

"1377

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 1 of 3))

Royo glanced at the six other militiamen in the room, then at the prisoner in the cell across from him. The militiamen were all seated at a table together, looking confused or annoyed by their loud-mouthed comrade, but the prisoner was clearly paying close attention.

Good.

When Dorgot opened the door, Royo stood, raising his hands in front of him.

“Sit back down, you--!” Sludge from the jar splattered onto Dorgot’s face, and the man began screaming as its flesh-eating properties went aggressively to work.

Royo caught Dorgot’s holstered sidearm as the man stumbled back. His fingers unbuttoned the strap and pulled the weapon free in less than a second. He flicked the safety off and fired right into Dorgot’s neck, putting an end to his insufferable howling and his life.

The other militiamen were scrambling now, and Royo just kept pulling the trigger until it was out of ammunition. Four of them dropped instantly, stone dead before they even hit the floor, and the remaining two militiamen were wounded in multiple places.

Royo tossed his spent weapon aside, found the keyring on Dorgot's body, and unlocked the chains around his ankles. Then he stepped over to the nearest dead man, looted a replacement firearm, and finished off the remaining militiamen with one shot each to back of the head. There was no sense in leaving any loose ends.

Time was not on his side, Royo knew. The noise of the train should have muffled the sound of gunfire, but anyone could still walk in at any moment.

The first thing he had to do was become a militiaman himself. Green hat, green scarf, green belt and trousers.

Ah, and some black-rimmed goggles, too.

Excellent.

He had never personally seen one before, but he had heard the rumors. The ghosts of the supermen. Invisible scouts and spies. If they really did exist, then these goggles would be invaluable."

"1378 -- CXLVII.

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 2 of 3))

The next thing he had to do was free the other prisoner.

And so he did.

No words were exchanged, partly because none were needed and partly because Royo could only see the potential for conflict if the wrong thing was said. And right now, nothing else mattered. Royo didn't even know the other man's name, much less why he was here, but in this moment, the two of them were the closest of comrades.

Anything else could wait until after they escaped.

The other prisoner moved to disguise himself as a militiaman as well, but he had a difficult time with it, since Royo had already taken most of the clothes that didn't have blood on them. Combined with the fact that Hun'Kui generally didn't wear much in the first place, and the nameless man ended up with only a green sash and a pair of goggles to help conceal himself.

It would have to do.

Now they just had to move the bodies. Hiding them was out of the question, but putting them into the prison cells was just as good, if not better. With any luck, it would look like the two of them had been killed, and they would be able to avoid a manhunt. Well, a manhunt specifically for them, at least.

After that was done, it was time to leave the cabin and put as much space between them and the crime scene as possible--and hopefully, also find a safe place to brace themselves for the storm that was coming.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Seven: 'O, colossal tyrant...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As they were making their way toward the back of the train, passing through another cabin full of comatose Rainlords, Hector felt Garovel shift abruptly on his back. The reaper had of course attached himself to Hector while the train was in motion."

"1378 -- CXLVII.

((The belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 2 of 3))

The next thing he had to do was free the other prisoner.

And so he did.

No words were exchanged, partly because none were needed and partly because Royo could only see the potential for conflict if the wrong thing was said. And right now, nothing else mattered. Royo didn't even know the other man's name, much less why he was here, but in this moment, the two of them were the closest of comrades.

Anything else could wait until after they escaped.

The other prisoner moved to disguise himself as a militiaman as well, but he had a difficult time with it, since Royo had already taken most of the clothes that didn't have blood on them. Combined with the fact that Hun'Kui generally didn't wear much in the first place, and the nameless man ended up with only a green sash and a pair of goggles to help conceal himself.

It would have to do.

Now they just had to move the bodies. Hiding them was out of the question, but putting them into the prison cells was just as good, if not better. With any luck, it would look like the two of them had been killed, and they would be able to avoid a manhunt. Well, a manhunt specifically for them, at least.

After that was done, it was time to leave the cabin and put as much space between them and the crime scene as possible--and hopefully, also find a safe place to brace themselves for the storm that was coming.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Seven: 'O, colossal tyrant...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As they were making their way toward the back of the train, passing through another cabin full of comatose Rainlords, Hector felt Garovel shift abruptly on his back. The reaper had of course attached himself to Hector while the train was in motion."

"1379

((The very belated Monday Triple catch-up: page 3 of 3))

Hector stopped walking. "Something wrong?" he said aloud, since there was no one conscious around to hear.

'...Not sure. I thought I sensed the aura of death just now.'

Hector's brow lowered. "Where?"

'Back the way we came, on the other side of the train. But it's not there anymore.'

"Hmm." He turned around and started walking again, this time at a brisker pace. "Is it where the Blackburns are?"

'Not quite that far, but close. At this distance, I almost missed it, but their reapers would've noticed it for sure, especially with how alert everyone is right now.'

Hector quickened his pace even more. First, he had to pass back through three more cabins full of sleeping Rainlords, but before he even made it to the end of the third one, Garovel spoke up again.

'Hold up.'

He stopped. "What?"

'Hector. Right now, everyone in these pods has the aura of death around them.'

Hector looked around with wide eyes. Each and every pod was already covered in the shields he'd made earlier. "What--? Why?!"

'I don't know, but--' There arrived a pause, and Hector waited without breathing for Garovel to continue. 'I sense a worm. About half a kilometer to your right and closing.'

Hector's expression turned grim.

He knew the plan. The militiamen and Rainlords had made sure that everyone did. Each cabin had a compartment where the train's defenses could be accessed. Hector was not trained in their uses, of course, but he knew that people who were would be arriving momentarily. His job would be to protect them.

Hector searched for the emergency lever in the floor and soon found it in the center of the cabin. He removed the metal screen in his way and yanked the lever in a hard clockwise motion."

"1380

A heavy thunk and metallic shifting noise followed, and two doors slid open, one on each wall of the cabin, both situated within a quite small space between all of the podded Rainlords that lined the entire cabin.

Hector entered the door to his left and found a very slender chamber therein. In size, it was little more than a narrow hallway, but it had windows and guns mounted into the wall.

Militiamen and Rainlords began to arrive and crammed into the chamber with him. Every gun found a gunner, and Hector was relegated to a far corner, standing in a space that was probably not meant to be stood in, judging by his uneven footing.

He had a view through a window, though, and that was the most important thing, he supposed. The gunner in front of him probably did not appreciate his presence very much, as he was practically hugging her.

Unlike most of the others, however, this gunner was not Hunese, probably because no Hun'Kui wanted to be so close to his misty armor. Hector had not had occasion to confirm it, but he was virtually certain that Zeff's handiwork would hurt any Hun'Kui who touched it.

Instead, this gunner was a Rainlord, and one he could recognize without even seeing her face, too, because she was wearing one of the sleek, climate-controlled suits. There weren't many Rainlords who'd been given one of those.

Sure enough, when she turned and looked at him through her illuminated visor, Hector saw the face of one Selena Elroy.

Or, wait, no. Zeff's sister wasn't an Elroy, was she? Her name was Joana Cortes. And that meant that her daughter here was Selena Cortes. Not an Elroy, but kind of.

He needed some kind of pamphlet to keep track of all these people."
"1381

"Hello, Lord Darksteel," the young woman said with a smile. She seemed to be about his age, maybe even a bit younger, but she did have a reaper clinging to her shoulder.

Hector frowned, however. "Why aren't you with your family?"

"Oh, you know who I am?" said Selena. "I am flattered, Lord."

Hector only looked at her.

"If I stayed with my mother, I would never see any action," she said. "And besides, you will protect me, will you not?"

Hector was not amused. Now was not the time for this. And indeed, a sudden bout of turbulence reaffirmed him of that notion.

'It's close,' said Garovel publicly. 'No more than a hundred meters. Can you see it through the window yet?'

Selena flipped a switch on her right, and a floodlight above the window knifed through the darkness outside. The Hun'Kui militiamen followed suit, as did everyone else along the full length of the train, and they soon saw more light than darkness outside.

Only a distant wall of solid rock was revealed, however.

Selena pivoted with her mounted gun, and her floodlight pivoted with her. Every light searched up and down, left and right.

And through the weighted silence, Hector felt something. An increased pressure in the air. All too familiar.

More shaking arrived, stronger this time.

'It's here,' said Garovel.

And he was not wrong.

A hulking figure exploded out of the rock wall, and every floodlight went to it at once. Sludge and shattered earth flew toward the train, and every gun opened fire at once. It was the loudest thing Hector had ever heard as a wall of flaming bullets shredded the debris into gravel and convened on the monster."

"1382

The creature squirmed through the cloud of dust and smoke, still scarcely visible even as it kept pace with the train.

Then it leapt up and over the mayhem, followed by some of the floodlights but not all, and for a second, Hector got his first clear look at the worm.

It was spinning like a drill, and smoldering sludge splattered in all directions around it. Its gaping mouth was full of debris and crackling electricity as the giant worm dove headfirst toward the train, a few cabins behind Hector's own.

But Hector was ready, and so must have many of the Rainlords been, because it was far more than just his iron that arose to counter the beast. He'd used the same flying technique that he'd developed a few days ago and attributed to an iron boulder, as large as he could make it--which admittedly, was not that large. It hit, to little effect, but combined with all of the many explosions, a moving wall of glass, and yes, a tidal wave, the worm was completely prevented from ramming the train.

That did not, however, stop it from reaching the train.

At first, it looked like the flurry of attacks cut deeply into the worm with deadly impact, but that was not the case, Hector realized. Instead, the worm simply split. Dozens of times. And suddenly, there was not one large worm, but a hundred smaller ones, and they all came spiraling toward the train like missiles, landing with an audible thud and splat. Gunfire managed to keep a few of them off, but once they were on the train, they were beyond the range of the guns.

One of the worms slammed into the side of their cabin, right against one of the gun windows, and Hector saw the metal and glass of the train begin to distort."

"1383

They all filed out of the narrow gunner hall, and Hector was the last to exit, so he got a good look at the worm's acidic sludge eating through the train.

That was going to be a problem, he knew. But on the bright side, at least it wasn't anywhere near as potent as, say, the Seadevil's acid had been.

Tremors ran through the length of the train. He heard the screech of metal-on-metal and felt the train beginning to slow.

'They're gumming up the tracks,' said Garovel. 'If we don't stop them--'

The whole train lurched downward briefly, as if an enormous mass had just fallen on top of it, but the train kept going.

‘What’s happening?’ he asked.

‘It reassembled itself,’ said Garovel.

Hector didn’t understand. ‘Wha--?’

‘It’s all one worm again,’ the reaper said.

Hector was still confused. Just like that? It was already--?

The cabin train heaved again, this time to the side and more violently than ever. Hector had a split second to brace not only himself but also all of the militiamen in the cabin.

They were the priority, obviously.

A network of iron harnesses materialized in an instant around every Hun’Kui in the room.

The cabin rolled, and Hector and Selena both went sailing into the wall, then back into the opposite one, then up into the ceiling, the floor, the wall again, over and over, until the train finally eased to a stop again.

A stop, he realized. The train was no longer moving.

That was extremely bad.

His arm, leg, and spine all needed time to realign, but he forced himself to sit up anyway. Things were only going to get worse if he didn’t move his ass, he knew."

"1384

The cabin was on its side, Hector realized, and the wall of podded Rainlords was above them, threatening to fall and crush all of the militiamen in the room if not for his complex array of iron keeping everyone and everything in place. He reinforced his work along the top with thick iron pillars and freed the militiamen as well. They were slow, but Hector was glad to see that they were moving. He helped Selena onto her feet and hurried out of the cabin with the Hun’Kui militiamen following.

With the vigor from Garovel pumping through his veins and muscles, Hector jumped up onto the side of the fallen train in order to get a better view of things.

A literal train wreck. Many of the floodlights were still working, at least, and they offered limited illumination of the surrounding environment. More people were appearing from the wreckage, but he didn't see the worm. Not yet, anyway. He doubted that it had left them alone.

Someone was already trying to turn one of the cabins over, he noticed, and someone else was yelling. Oh, at him, apparently. And it was Asad, too.

"Hector!" the Sandlord was saying, while pointing with both arms. He was saying more than that, but Hector could barely make him out over the defeated train's metallic groans. And the growing rumbling.

Rumbling?

Yeah.

There it was. That gargantuan silhouette, slightly lighter than the rest of the darkness in the distance.

Hector jumped down and tried to prepare himself. To concentrate. Against an enemy like this, it was difficult to imagine what he should do, what he could do. If there was anything at all, it had to be related to the recent breakthrough he'd made. That was the only thing going through his head."

"1385

He concentrated. The largest flying object that he'd made was a modestly-sized boulder, no bigger than himself, and throughout his testing over the last few days, he hadn't been able to supersede that limit. But here and now? When it really mattered? Could he demand more of himself?

The answer was no, he discovered. As much as he focused, he couldn't make the boulder larger. And he couldn't make two boulders, either--not without decreasing the size.

He didn't know what he'd been expecting, really. That would have certainly been too easy.

As soon as the worm became more than a silhouette, Hector pitched his boulder forward at cannon speed, along with a host of other projectiles from the other Rainlords.

The beast leapt up and over the assault, spinning through the air again and flinging sludge in all directions.

The Lord Dimas Sebolt was there to meet it, and the air in front of the man distorted it visibly as a gravity well caught the worm in midair, halting even its centripetal motion and suspending its acidic sludge as well.

Wide-eyed and mouth open, Hector just stared at the scene before him.

Electricity stirred in the beast's mouth, crackling and bristling with power before it spewed out at Dimas, but the man avoided it easily enough.

Or seemed to.

The lightning arced around in a flash and caught Dimas in the shoulder, causing him to falter but not release his hold. Smote and smoking, Dimas circled around to the worm's side, farther away from its mouth. It spewed more lightning, but it was entirely ineffectual this time.

Hector breathed again. For a moment, he even allowed himself to wonder if the threat had been neutralized.

Then the worm split apart."

"1386

The sheer force of it was enough to knock Dimas back, a shock wave that sent the man toppling through the air, and a hundred smaller worms spiraled after him like heat-seeking rockets.

Hector and the others intervened, and a storm of projectiles came to the man's rescue. A cluster of explosions was the result, and smoke clouded the aftermath.

Worms began dropping like rain, splattering on the ground in blackened piles.

More and more fighters were coming out of the wreckage of the train now, and Hector could hear Asad shouting again.

“Hurry!” the Sandlord was saying, as entire cabins were being lifted up and realigned via platforms of quartz or other material that Hector didn’t immediately recognize. “To the tracks! Keep everyone in the train!”

And Hector saw what the man was doing, what he had pointed at before. The train tracks that they’d strayed so very far away from. Asad meant to get them back there, to get the train moving again.

Hector didn’t know how feasible that plan really was. The train was in pretty bad shape. But for the moment, he was more concerned with making sure that the worm really was dead. He rushed closer, only to see Dimas smashing the many worm husks into dust with gravitic pulses.

Yeah, they looked pretty dead, Hector decided. They? It? He still wasn’t sure what to think of everything he’d just witnessed, but he figured he should worry about it later and go help everyone with the train.

“Dimas!” Hector shouted over the noise of the man’s work.

And Dimas apparently heard him, because he stopped.

Hector was about to tell him that he should help with the train, too, since his power would potentially be more helpful than anyone else’s in that regard, but he didn’t get to. Because even though Dimas wasn’t stomping the worms into paste anymore, the accompanying tremors had not ceased.”

"1387

‘I sense two more worms approaching,’ said Garovel.

‘As do I,’ said IzioI, who was attached to Dimas’ back. ‘Straight ahead. They’ll be here in under a minute.’

Hector might have complained if there was time for it. Instead, he and Dimas rushed back to regroup with everyone else.

Zeff had joined Asad in shouting out orders for everyone. When he noticed Dimas and Hector, he had a few words for them as well. "Dimas, focus on restoring the train. We will provide cover."

"I should be defending," said Dimas.

"No, our priority is getting out of here. Even after we kill these next two, more could show up. Understand?"

Dimas gave a nod of affirmation and flew off again.

"And you," Zeff went on to Hector, "help with the train, too."

'Nonsense,' came Qorvass' voice. 'The boy is one of the best distractions I have ever seen. Stay close to us, Hector.'

Hector supposed that was a compliment, but he honestly wasn't sure how to feel about it.

Zeff looked as if he wanted to argue, but the increasingly violent earthquakes deterred him.

'They're here,' said Garovel.

Hector saw someone launching attacks before he even saw the worms. It was Darktide, he realized, already using pan-rozum to propel mercurial javelins off into the darkness. They exploded on impact, illuminating both beasts momentarily.

They were bigger than the first one, Hector noticed, and different in skin texture as well. Where the first had been a bundle of wrinkles, these looked smoother, and he even thought he saw teeth this time as well.

The explosions kept coming as Darktide maintained his attack, apparently keeping the monsters stunned, and everyone else took the opportunity to hurl some of their own projectiles as they all moved up together, wanting to put more distance between themselves and the train but also not wanting to get too close."

"1388 -- CXLVIII.

Both worms erupted with bellowing roars, and all attacks against them ceased when the force of the shock wave knocked almost everyone off their feet.

Hector hit the ground and skid for a while before catching himself with an iron dagger in the rocky dirt. He'd nearly lost his grip on his shield and so was not surprised to see that many others around him had lost their grips on theirs.

As a result, he was one of the first to get back up, but what he saw next was not something he felt very privileged to witness.

Instead of two giant worms, now there was one, twice as large. Still in the midst of amassing, its skin crawled and writhed over itself, like a million glistening snakes all squirming in a pool of black tar.

His eyes widened as he began to comprehend the new creature's size. 'Garovel, you said they could only get as big as a blue whale.'

'Well, to be fair, that's two worms in one,' the reaper said privately.

'Garovel.'

'Look, I didn't know they had goddamn fusion powers. I've never actually hunted worms before.' After a beat of silence, he added, 'I'm sure we'll do great, though.'

That did not fill Hector with confidence.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Eight: 'The Battle with a Behemoth of Old...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector learned very quickly about how important distance was when fighting a building-sized opponent--and not just from the worm, but from one another, as well. As soon as he saw that first group of Rainlords get alternately flattened into the ground or swallowed by the ensuing avalanche of sludge, Hector started moving, not needing to hear the shouts from the others, ordering everyone to spread out before reengaging.

As his legs carried him and his full suit of endlessly misting armor around to the monster's flank, he tried to think. Certainly, this was an enemy unlike any he had ever faced previously. He couldn't just let his instincts take over. If he wanted to be of any use here, he needed to take a measured approach.

And given how much mass and apparent speed the beast had at its disposal, the sheer amount of momentum that it could generate was unreal. Trying to stop or even just deflect its smothering body seemed completely out of the question, as Melchor Blackburn was currently demonstrating. Even a controlled explosion from Darktide himself couldn't throw the worm's enormous bulk off course.

Not in a direct collision, at least, but maybe--

The thought went unfinished as Hector was fortunate enough to be the next one to acquire the worm's attention. With scarcely more than a twitch of its head as a warning, it lurched suddenly in his direction and became briefly airborne in a flying leap.

Hector reacted with the only thing that he could think of and used an iron platform to launch himself sidelong and out of the way. The monster came crashing down with the force of a hundred thousand bricks."

"1388 -- CXLVIII.

Both worms erupted with bellowing roars, and all attacks against them ceased when the force of the shock wave knocked almost everyone off their feet.

Hector hit the ground and skid for a while before catching himself with an iron dagger in the rocky dirt. He'd nearly lost his grip on his shield and so was not surprised to see that many others around him had lost their grips on theirs.

As a result, he was one of the first to get back up, but what he saw next was not something he felt very privileged to witness.

Instead of two giant worms, now there was one, twice as large. Still in the midst of amassing, its skin crawled and writhed over itself, like a million glistening snakes all squirming in a pool of black tar.

His eyes widened as he began to comprehend the new creature's size. 'Garovel, you said they could only get as big as a blue whale.'

‘Well, to be fair, that’s two worms in one,’ the reaper said privately.

‘Garovel.’

‘Look, I didn’t know they had goddamn fusion powers. I’ve never actually hunted worms before.’ After a beat of silence, he added, ‘I’m sure we’ll do great, though.’

That did not fill Hector with confidence.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Eight: ‘The Battle with a Behemoth of Old...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector learned very quickly about how important distance was when fighting a building-sized opponent--and not just from the worm, but from one another, as well. As soon as he saw that first group of Rainlords get alternately flattened into the ground or swallowed by the ensuing avalanche of sludge, Hector started moving, not needing to hear the shouts from the others, ordering everyone to spread out before reengaging.

As his legs carried him and his full suit of endlessly misting armor around to the monster’s flank, he tried to think. Certainly, this was an enemy unlike any he had ever faced previously. He couldn’t just let his instincts take over. If he wanted to be of any use here, he needed to take a measured approach.

And given how much mass and apparent speed the beast had at its disposal, the sheer amount of momentum that it could generate was unreal. Trying to stop or even just deflect its smothering body seemed completely out of the question, as Melchor Blackburn was currently demonstrating. Even a controlled explosion from Darktide himself couldn’t throw the worm’s enormous bulk off course.

Not in a direct collision, at least, but maybe--

The thought went unfinished as Hector was fortunate enough to be the next one to acquire the worm’s attention. With scarcely more than a twitch of its head as a warning, it lurched suddenly in his direction and became briefly airborne in a flying leap.

Hector reacted with the only thing that he could think of and used an iron platform to launch himself sidelong and out of the way. The monster came crashing down with the force of a hundred thousand bricks."

"1389

When Hector's feet caught the ground again, he found it cracked and shifting up and down, making him struggle for his balance. Worse still, he discovered sludge all over his right arm and leg, hissing nastily against his armor.

He didn't have time to worry about any of that, however, as he noticed the worm was still in pursuit, snaking toward him this time and tearing up the earth in all directions.

There wasn't much choice but to keep launching himself away, he felt. His trajectory wasn't the best, what with everything shaking nonstop, but he at least managed to stay narrowly ahead of the beast--so narrowly, in fact, that he got an all too clear view of an electrical storm brewing in its huge maw.

That wasn't going to be good.

He tried making larger and larger platforms each time he launched himself, but as expected, the worm just barreled through them without the slightest show of concern.

Thankfully, however, help arrived in the form of a giant, bladed pendulum. It swung down from the cavernous darkness and caught the monster just behind the head, cutting close to halfway through its body before getting stuck.

The worm seized up, and its bulk shuddered visibly. It roared again, and the pendulum snapped in half, letting the embedded chunk be absorbed deeper into it.

Hector took the opportunity to gain some distance again. He watched Melchor leaping in overhead as he was falling back. The man was dragging another pendulum along with his bare hands. The thing must have been four times the size of his own body, and yet he swung it upward with the ease of a simple fire axe.

The blow landed cleanly, catching the worm right in the mouth and cleaving diagonally up through its head and eyespots. The severed chunk of meat and sludge flew off, and the worm abruptly stopped its rampage in order to convulse and shiver.

Then the electricity from earlier surged out of its torn mouth in blindingly bright arcs, making the previously dim cavern suddenly light up in its entirety. Hector had to shield his eyes as his feet finally found stable ground again and returned to running.

Through the brilliant flashes, Hector saw the discarded hunk of the worm's head still moving, and indeed, squirming its way back toward the main body. He also saw Melchor get sent flying by a rogue spark that was the size of a bus, leaving only a trail of smoke behind.

The other combatants seemed to take that as their cue to provide relief, and a storm of gunfire and servant-made projectiles exploded toward the beast all at once. They must've been holding back until now for fear of hitting Melchor. Or himself, Hector figured.

However, instead of contributing what would probably be a minuscule amount to the collective assault, Hector decided to turn around and check on the train while he could.

The first thing he noticed was that it was not there anymore. Then he saw that it was high above his head, floating slowly upward, the front tip of it having already reached the edge of the gaping hole in the tracks where it had fallen."

"1390

It was Dimas' handiwork, Hector knew, though it looked like a few others were helping him support the train's weight, too. Hector decided to add a few quick pillars of his own while he was here.

Abruptly, the sound of a maniac laughing in his ear drew Hector's attention, and when he looked over, he saw one of the treasure hunters from earlier standing there, draped in a multitude of firearms and apparently having the time of his life.

This was one of those non-servants from the surface. Apart from the helmet, his climate-controlled suit was mostly hidden beneath all the ardor-fueled weaponry and ammunition the man was carrying.

All in all, Hector supposed he shouldn't have been surprised by this scene.

The man stopped firing to reload, then seemed to change his mind and holstered his weapon in order to exchange it for another, much bulkier one. He pulled what looked like a giant egg out of the ammo bag at his feet and slipped it into the loading chamber. Then he smiled and yelled, "Try this on for size, you overgrown shitpile!"

He pulled the trigger, and there came a deep shunk as the now-flaming egg launched out of the barrel.

When it hit the worm, the entire cave shook as an explosion ripped into the monster's side. The resulting fireball was so bright that Hector had to shield his eyes again, but he was still able to see several defensive walls go up simultaneously as everyone tried to brace themselves against the impact.

But it wasn't just one impact, Hector discovered. It was a chain of explosions, and each one only made the resultant earthquake even worse, until rocks began falling from the distant ceiling.

The beast was down for the count, though. The explosions had torn it in two, and both gigantic pieces were struggling to find each other again.

The crazy guy just laughed even louder than before.

The Rainlords closed in on the worm, no doubt hoping to finish it off, but they also had to worry about the falling rocks, which didn't seem to be letting up. Hector rushed forward to help them out with that, adding a thick layer of iron to the dome that they were building.

As he worked, he spotted Selena Cortes a few yards away, only then realizing that he'd kinda just left her behind.

She didn't look like she was doing so well, either. Her reaper floated over her, seemingly trying to talk to her while she sat there on her knees, eyes shut, hands over her ears. After another moment, Hector also noticed tears streaming down her face.

He wanted to go help her somehow, but he was still trying to be mindful of everything else going on.

Then Garovel, perhaps sensing Hector's hesitation, said, 'The worm's not dead.'

Another roar arrived, as if to prove the reaper's point, and the beast lunged back up, fully reformed. It rammed headlong into the dome that the Rainlords had been making and clobbered it, sending car-sized chunks of metal or mineral toppling overhead. Hector and every other builder scrambled to dematerialize their work before someone ended up flattened."

"1391

Through the ensuing chaos, the worm didn't let up. And since the Rainlords had unfortunately gathered a bit closer together while the worm had been downed, the beast now had the opportunity to come bulldozing through the loose crowd that they had formed.

And Selena Cortes was still not moving, Hector noticed, even as the worm turned in his and her general direction.

No time to deliberate.

Hector materialized a sloped platform on the other side of Selena and used it to launch her into his waiting arms. "Grab on!" he shouted to her unnamed reaper, who made no argument.

With the worm bearing down on them and everyone around scattering like startled birds, Hector decided to go upward. Iron materialized below his feet and flung the four of them into the air, high enough so that the worm would be able to pass harmlessly below.

Or at least, that had been the plan.

Instead, the worm decided to chase after them specifically and arched up to meet Hector in the air, and suddenly, its slobbering, sludging jaws were closer than ever.

Well, shit.

Even less time to deliberate.

Had to be simple. No thought required. Something he could make in an instant.

A giant iron bowl, of all things, materialized right in front of him in midair. He'd pointed the concave side at the worm's face.

Its huge mouth fit almost too perfectly into it, and--for a few vital seconds--the bowl became a kind of muzzle. So instead of Hector, Garovel, Selena, and her reaper all being swallowed, they slammed against an iron wall with Hector's shield.

Not that much of an improvement, but an improvement nonetheless.

The impact was enough to punt the four of them all the way across the cavern and into a far wall, cracking it and loosening a few stalactites from the ceiling.

Hector wondered how many bones in his body had just broken, but his armor and regenerative vigor were doing their jobs, and he managed to create another iron platform to catch everyone before they peeled off the wall and fell.

Rather than lowering them all back down to the ground, however, he looked for the train and tracks, which he discovered were not quite as far away now as he might've expected. He started growing his platform in its direction, adding tall support pillars as needed.

Selena sounded like she was trying to say something, but Hector couldn't make it out. A part of him wanted to ask what was wrong, but something told him that was a question for later. Or possibly never.

Right now, with everything still as confusing as it was, he should probably just try to say something comforting, right? Something like...? Uh...

Well, maybe saying nothing at all was okay, too.

'God, you're so useless!' the girl's reaper said aloud. 'I can't believe I ended up with such a--!' But the reaper cut herself off, leaving the thought unfinished.

The following silence became suddenly uncomfortable.

Hector found himself blinking as he worked on his mobile staircase. He had to consult Garovel. 'What the hell was she saying just now?'

"1392

Garovel took a few moments to respond. 'Unfortunately, we don't have time to worry about that right now,' he said privately. 'I'll look into it later. You just stay focused.'

Hector couldn't argue with that, though he wanted to. When he neared the train, a group of Hun'Kui militiamen slid a door open for him and helped Selena inside.

"I'm sorry!" she was saying through choked breaths. "I just wanted to--! I couldn't--! I'm sorry--!"

Hector was at a loss for what to say, not even really understanding why she was apologizing.

'It's okay,' Garovel told her. 'This sort of reaction to worms is actually quite common. Don't be too hard on yourself. We have to go now, but we'll talk to you later, Selena.'

She looked at Hector with tear-filled eyes for some reason.

Still, he didn't know what to do. So he just gave a kind half-nod and then pulled away on his bridge of iron.

As he headed back toward the fighting, he couldn't get what just happened out of his head. 'Garovel...'

'Not everyone adjusts to combat as easily as you do, Hector. But I won't forget about her, so for now, just put it out of your mind and concentrate.'

Really, Hector wanted to ask about Selena's reaper, but he knew Garovel was right. There would be time for that later. Assuming they lived through this battle, that was. He did have confidence in the Rainlords' ability to take the monster down, but as he got closer to the mayhem again, it did not look like much progress had been made.

The worm still thrashed wildly around, occasionally catching servants out and sending them flying or just chomping them down. Perhaps most incredibly of all, Hector saw Darktide and Zeff come bursting out of the worm's backside in a maelstrom of mercury and ice. Apparently, they'd gotten eaten during Hector's absence.

One might have expected such a gaping back wound to slow the beast down, but it paused for hardly more than a shiver before continuing its rampage.

From his midair vantage point on his bridge, Hector tried to find an opportunity to reenter the fight, but seeing so many familiar faces charge in and get swatted away or be forced to dodge... well, it was a little disheartening.

Evangelina Stroud and Diego Redwater attacking in unison. Then a group of Blackburns, led by Horatio. A group of Delagunas, led by Salvador. A group of Sebolts, led by Carlos. And even the Najirs.

Everyone was struggling to do any kind of real damage. So what the hell did he think he was going to accomplish?

He knew that he was better suited to taking defensive action, but that didn't seem to be the problem now. The remaining fighters looked like they were avoiding major hits well enough. But any time someone appeared to land a solid blow, the worm either brushed it off or its wounds simply reformed.

It wasn't long before Hector was beginning to feel everyone's frustration. 'Garovel, how do we kill this fuckin' thing?'"

"1393

'Uh...'

'Really, Garovel? Nothing?'

'Hector, honestly, buying time might be the best we can do here. I mean, if the Rainlords can't kill it, then...'

Not exactly the keen insight that Hector had been hoping for, but he supposed he couldn't really blame Garovel.

'...That is, unless those non-servants from the surface have something else up their sleeves,' said Garovel. 'Which it seems like they might.'

'How can you tell?'

'Their souls are all gathered together, right now. Seems like they're working on something. They're to your right. Do you see them?'

He did. And just as the reaper said, they were huddled up in a circle. 'Ah. They're standing over a pile of guns.' He squinted. 'And it looks like they're taking them apart.'

‘Well, let’s go talk to--’

An interruption arrived in the form of yet another earthquake, and Hector found his bridge crumbling beneath him. He caught himself with an iron slide and curved it toward the group of gunmen. A few sideways tumbles and unintended front flips later, and he managed to find his balance and stick the landing right next to them.

They all turned to give him startled looks before relaxing again.

‘Ask them what they’re doing,’ said Garovel.

Before Hector got the chance, however, the quaking returned and so did the worm, thrashing its way alarmingly close.

Hector raised his hand flatly upward in front of his chest, and with it, iron appeared below the gunmen and their work, boxing them in instantly. Then Hector grew the whole box in his direction at launching speed, carrying the gunmen and himself out of the worm’s path.

The sudden motion knocked everyone over, apart from Hector, who kept his attention locked firmly on the sludge monster. Thankfully, it did not seem to have taken an interest in him for a third time. Yet.

“Thanks a bundle, Senmurai,” came a familiar voice, belonging to one of the gunmen. It was the crazy-sounding guy from earlier, Hector realized.

Senmurai? Hector wanted to ask what that meant, but there were more pressing matters. “Do you guys have a plan?” he asked instead.

“Oh, wow, you sound so young!” the man said with a laugh. “Couldn’t tell in all that crazy armor!”

“A plan,” repeated Hector. “Do you have one?”

“Son, don’t you worry. Good old-fashioned human ingenuity is here to save the day again.”

“Excuse me?” Hector could see the gunmen piecing something together from all the disassembled parts. Something quite large.

The guy gave another hearty laugh from inside his helmet. “There was never any problem so tough that it couldn’t be solved by a big enough gun!”

Hector’s eyes widened as he watched them continue working. At length, he couldn't stop himself and just had to ask, "Who are you guys?"

"We're with the West Intar Company. Search & Discovery Division. I'd shake your hand if mine weren't so busy right now."

"1394

Hector recognized the name. The West Intar Company. Or just WIC. It had something to do with international trade, as he recalled.

That was about the extent of his knowledge, but by now, Hector had come to realize that the mere fact that he had heard of it before was also somewhat informative. Because if he didn't need Garovel to tell him what it was, then this company was probably pretty damn famous already.

He was still going to ask Garovel about it later, though.

Hector observed the group in silence for a bit longer, not really knowing if he should ask them anything else. If they truly did have a way of killing the worm, then he didn't want to distract them with questions.

The same guy from before reengaged the conversation on his own, however. "The name's Robert Sheridan, by the by. What's yours, son?"

"Hector Goffe."

"Good to meetcha, Hector Goffe. Is this your first time down in the Undercrust?"

"Y-yeah..."

"Pretty wild, eh?" Another short quake punctuated his sentence as the worm slapped its tail down in the distance. Each of the WIC men had to pause before they could resume building.

The giant gun was nearing completion, from what Hector could tell. It must have been almost twice as big as he was. Certainly not something a non-servant could wield unaided.

'Oh god,' said Garovel. 'I'm sensing a lot more worms all of a sudden.'

‘Where?’ said Hector.

‘Everywhere. If we stay here, we’ll be overrun in a few minutes. Everyone needs to get back to the train right now.’

Already, Hector could see some of the other Rainlords pulling back from the fight with the worm, no doubt on the orders of their reapers.

Hector started moving the iron box again. “Hold on, everyone. We’re going back to the train.”

A few huffs of vague disapproval arose, but no one argued.

Then there came still another earthquake. But this one was different. Instead of going away after a moment, it persisted, and the ground began to shift and sink more violently than any time previously.

And then the ground was suddenly gone. The cavern floor splintered and heaved up all at once, becoming a hundred thousand tiny rocks suspended in midair, and Hector had nothing beneath his feet, save his own iron.

The box was falling, and he had to react. He grew iron hooks out of the box’s side and dug them into the nearest wall--which, unfortunately, was not as near as he would have liked. The box tipped over as it caught in the air and swung down, and Hector had to complete a barricade before anyone fell out. Now it really was an entire box of solid iron, with everyone inside thrown upside down with gun parts clattering around.

And if that wasn’t enough, there was no light inside, either.

So Hector breathed deep and visualized the outside of the box. The side was scraping against a cliff of unstable rock--the same unstable rock from which the box was also suspended, by way of the ten hooked spears he’d materialized."

"1395 -- CXLIX.

Hmm.

Now this was a problem.

He had to be careful here. He couldn't just add iron to the box in a blind panic. If he did, then its weight would also increase, making it more likely to lose its already tenuous grip on the wall.

But he couldn't very well just not do anything, either. There was a good chance the box was going to fall on its own soon, anyway. And of course, the worm was still stomping around up there.

'Where is the worm?' he asked Garovel.

'At your ten o'clock, roughly.'

'How far? Can you tell?'

'Only about six or seven meters,' said Garovel.

Agh, that was too close. He didn't want to just launch everyone up and out of the hole at once, not when the worm could turn on a moment's notice and snatch someone out of the air.

So he went to work on a trio of iron ladders, instead, hooking them over the top of the hole in order to avoid adding any unnecessary weight to the box. Then he motioned through the dimness and said, "Up we go. Hurry."

Hesitant, the company men did as they were told. Robert Sheridan waited with Hector while his three companions went first.

A man's poorly lit face appeared over the edge of the cliff above. "Need some help down there?!" said the voice of Horatio Blackburn, who didn't bother waiting for a reply as he helped the three climbers up, carrying them with an apparent materialization ability.

"Thanks!" Hector shouted up at him, then motioned for Mr. Sheridan to follow.

But before the man could reach a ladder, the worm came crashing down in quaking fury. The impact sundered the hole, and the iron box snapped off the crumbling wall and started to fall.

Hector spiked his iron out in all directions, hoping in blind desperation that it would catch onto something--anything. The box's descent slowed but didn't stop, until it abruptly caught on something. In the increasing darkness, Hector couldn't tell what, but for an instant, when he looked up, he saw another silhouette at the top of the hole and thought he heard Zeff's voice shouting something.

Then the rocks gave way all around them, and the iron box started plummeting again.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Nine: 'O, gathering Deep...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He had to slow them down. Whatever it took. More iron. Everywhere. If he projected it far enough, it would find something to latch onto. More. Farther. Nothing else mattered. This guy next to him was going to fall to his death if he didn't do this. Right now.

The box shifted and shook, then began to slow. Gradually. But it didn't stop, even as Hector kept envisioning and adding to the gigantic network of iron spikes and hooks and spears and nets that must have been surrounding the box by now.

The bumpiness came and went as the descent continued for quite a while. Robert Sheridan tried to speak, but with the grinding and groaning of metal in all directions, Hector couldn't hear him--nor did he try to, until finally, after what felt like an hour, the box came to a stop." "1395 -- CXLIX.

Hmm.

Now this was a problem.

He had to be careful here. He couldn't just add iron to the box in a blind panic. If he did, then its weight would also increase, making it more likely to lose its already tenuous grip on the wall.

But he couldn't very well just not do anything, either. There was a good chance the box was going to fall on its own soon, anyway. And of course, the worm was still stomping around up there.

'Where is the worm?' he asked Garovel.

'At your ten o'clock, roughly.'

'How far? Can you tell?'

‘Only about six or seven meters,’ said Garovel.

Agh, that was too close. He didn’t want to just launch everyone up and out of the hole at once, not when the worm could turn on a moment’s notice and snatch someone out of the air.

So he went to work on a trio of iron ladders, instead, hooking them over the top of the hole in order to avoid adding any unnecessary weight to the box. Then he motioned through the dimness and said, “Up we go. Hurry.”

Hesitant, the company men did as they were told. Robert Sheridan waited with Hector while his three companions went first.

A man’s poorly lit face appeared over the edge of the cliff above. “Need some help down there?!” said the voice of Horatio Blackburn, who didn’t bother waiting for a reply as he helped the three climbers up, carrying them with an apparent materialization ability.

“Thanks!” Hector shouted up at him, then motioned for Mr. Sheridan to follow.

But before the man could reach a ladder, the worm came crashing down in quaking fury. The impact sundered the hole, and the iron box snapped off the crumbling wall and started to fall.

Hector spiked his iron out in all directions, hoping in blind desperation that it would catch onto something--anything. The box’s descent slowed but didn’t stop, until it abruptly caught on something. In the increasing darkness, Hector couldn’t tell what, but for an instant, when he looked up, he saw another silhouette at the top of the hole and thought he heard Zeff’s voice shouting something.

Then the rocks gave way all around them, and the iron box started plummeting again.

Chapter One Hundred Forty-Nine: ‘O, gathering Deep...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He had to slow them down. Whatever it took. More iron. Everywhere. If he projected it far enough, it would find something to latch onto. More. Farther. Nothing else mattered. This guy next to him was going to fall to his death if he didn’t do this. Right now.

The box shifted and shook, then began to slow. Gradually. But it didn't stop, even as Hector kept envisioning and adding to the gigantic network of iron spikes and hooks and spears and nets that must have been surrounding the box by now.

The bumpiness came and went as the descent continued for quite a while. Robert Sheridan tried to speak, but with the grinding and groaning of metal in all directions, Hector couldn't hear him--nor did he try to, until finally, after what felt like an hour, the box came to a stop."
"1396

Hector allowed himself to stop concentrating on his iron and relax somewhat.

'Hector,' came Garovel's voice through the pitch darkness. The reaper sounded rather annoyed.

'W-what?'

'Oh, did you finally hear me? I've been trying to talk to you for a while, you know.'

He, in fact, did not know that, but Mr. Sheridan interrupted before Hector could answer.

"Thanks for saving my bacon there, son." A rustling noise was also coming from his direction, as the man was perhaps trying to stand up. Then a small lamp flicked on in the palm of Mr. Sheridan's glove.

At last, Hector could see again. He started annihilating some of his iron so that they could get a look outside. The meager lamplight didn't extend very far, though.

'Hector, I can sense Zeff and Axiolis down here, along with a few other people.'

That was a surprise. 'You mean they fell down the hole after us?'

'No, I think there were more holes than just ours. From what I was able to tell, things got pretty crazy up there.'

'Where's Zeff?'

The reaper detached himself from Hector's arm and pointed in the direction opposite to the one that Hector had been looking. 'About two hundred meters that way. Seems like they're already headed toward us. I suggest we go meet them halfway.'

'No argument here.' Hector made a doorway in the box.

"H-heh, uh, son," said Mr. Sheridan, causing Hector to pause and look back. "Would you mind helping me carry some of this?" He eyed the many, many gun parts strewn all over the box's floor.

Oh right. Hector supposed all that stuff was pretty damn valuable. Not to mention, the big gun that they had been building was still there, too.

Hector stepped out of the box and motioned for the man to follow. When they were both clear, Hector annihilated all of the haphazard iron that he had created earlier while also remaking the box. Then he materialized an iron track for it and grew the box slowly along it.

"Hey, that's pretty convenient," said Mr. Sheridan as they started walking. "You interested in a job?"

Hector was hardly listening, however, as he had a more pressing question for Garovel. 'Where are the worms?'

'All over the place.'

Not what he wanted to hear. 'Should we be running?'

'Not as of yet. Fortunately for us, the worms seem to be going after the train.'

'Oh, so the train got away?'

'Yeah. It started moving a while ago, and now I can't sense it anymore. All these worms must still be able to, though.'

At that news, Hector allowed himself to relax a little more.

"--chances are, huh?"

Hector realized that Mr. Sheridan had still been talking. "Sorry, what did you say?"

"I asked what you thought our chances are," the man said, less jovial than before. "Of getting out of this alive, I mean. You've got one of them reaper phantoms, right? And they can sense stuff, right?"

“Uh...”

"1397

‘He doesn’t seem like he’ll panic,’ said Garovel. ‘Just answer him honestly.’

“Well, ah,” said Hector, “we’re safe for now.”

“That so?”

“But there are still worms everywhere.”

“Figures.” The man frowned and smacked his lips together. “Guess I have to ask you to look after me for a bit longer, then. Sorry for the trouble.”

Impulsively, Hector almost said that it was no trouble, but he stopped himself. Because, well... honestly? It was. It really was. And Mr. Sheridan would probably know he was just saying that to be polite or whatever.

Hector didn’t actually mind, of course. This was the kinda shit he lived for. But it was definitely trouble. In fact, that was kinda the point.

But then again, maybe he should’ve said it anyway, even if it was just to be polite. Being polite was a good thing, after all, wasn’t it?

Shit, he was putting way too much thought into this.

And perhaps Mr. Sheridan had grown uncomfortable by Hector’s deliberating silence, because then the man said, “I promise I’ll make this up to you.”

Crap, he was being rude, wasn’t he? He hadn’t been talking nearly enough. Thinking back, he’d kinda been ignoring or otherwise not responding to a lot of the things that this guy had been saying so far. Sure, he’d been preoccupied with bigger concerns, but still...

And now he really didn’t know what to say. How was he supposed to respond to a promise like that? Just say “cool”? No, that would be stupid. He didn’t give a shit if this guy ever paid him back or not. That wasn’t important at all. So maybe he should just say “okay”? Eh, it was more neutral, but not much better, really...

Argh, why was this so difficult? Where'd all the worms go? Wasn't there at least one who wanted to come fight him, right now? He wouldn't mind.

A faint, red-orange light caught his attention. With only the tiny lamp in Mr. Sheridan's hand, they'd been walking through an all-encompassing wall of darkness up to now, so he had to wonder where this new light was coming from. It seemed to be emanating from around a corner.

'Is that Zeff and the others?' he asked Garovel.

'No, they're still a ways away. I think that's probably just lava.'

Hector's brow lowered from behind his misty helm. 'JUST lava?'

'You've never seen lava before?'

'Not up close, no. Not sure I want to, either.'

Sure enough, when they were close enough, a rocky corner revealed itself to their lamplight, and they peeked around it to find a rushing river of lava in their way. It burned so intensely bright and was such a harsh contrast to the darkness everywhere else that Hector couldn't look directly at it without his eyes beginning to hurt.

'Hmm,' hummed Garovel. 'We'll wait for Zeff here.'

'You sure? I could build a bridge over it, no problem.'

'Big problem, actually. Heat convection is a bitch, Hector. And you still haven't mastered temperature manipulation with your iron yet, have you?'

'Ah...''

"1398

'You're free to give it a go, if you want,' said Garovel, 'but let's not gamble with this poor guy's life, eh? Because even with how advanced that suit he's wearing is, I highly doubt it will protect him from the heat rising off that lava over there.'

Hector's mind went to his studies. He'd been meaning to work on temperature manipulation, and Asad and Zeff had even told him to do so on his own as homework, but he'd been neglecting it in favor of practicing other things--other, purportedly more difficult and, in theory, more valuable things.

But now he felt like he'd been slacking.

So while they waited for Zeff to show up, Hector took the opportunity to get in some extra practice.

--++--++--

Zeff was in no mood for any of this, right now. It was all he could do to keep himself from lashing out at any of these people tagging along with him and Axiolis. A handful of Hun'Kui militiamen, along with Diego Redwater, Manuel Delaguna, and one of the non-servant Garza girls whose face he recognized but name escaped him.

He knew they didn't deserve his ire. He knew that. But he was so frustrated that he could hardly think straight.

Because he'd allowed himself to get separated from his children again. Again.

It just kept happening. In spite of his best efforts, it just kept happening.

After everything... what would Mariana think? She would chastise him, surely. That woman never held back her criticism. And she'd be right, too.

First his parents. Then his cousins. Aunts and uncles. Grandparents and great grandparents. Then Gema. Then Mariana. Then Francisco. Then Emiliana.

And now, even Marcos and Ramira.

It just kept happening.

He couldn't stop it. No matter what he did.

What a fool and a failure he was. In every way that mattered. A terrible excuse for a father and a husband.

Perhaps this was just meaningless. This struggle. Endless. Fruitless. Doomed to be repeated as he inevitably proved too weak or too stupid in the future, as well. What if this path just kept going and never got any better, regardless of his every effort? Even regardless of how he tried to change or improve?

Was this what going mad felt like?

He wondered if that wouldn't be for the best. If he went mad, would that not make things easier? He could just let go. Stop caring so much.

Could he choose that? Could he choose to go insane? Because he wanted to. In this moment, he couldn't imagine a more appealing idea.

Except.

That other thought was still there. The one that wouldn't stop bothering him no matter what. That one that kept telling him it wasn't about him anymore. It didn't matter what he wanted. It didn't matter what would make him happy or sad or anything else.

And choosing to go mad, if such a thing were even possible, would be exactly that. Selfish. It wouldn't solve anything. It wouldn't make up for anything. And it certainly wouldn't help his children.

So, no.

There was no easy way out. Not now. Not ever.

He'd known that all along, really. It was no great epiphany.

Mariana would have been disgusted with him if she knew that he had even been humoring such thoughts.

God, he missed her."

"1399

Zeff tried to steady his thoughts, knowing he shouldn't allow himself to get too distracted. Axiolis was here to warn him of any incoming danger, of course, but even so, it never hurt to be vigilant. And besides, there were few things more terrifying than being lost in the deep darkness of the Undercrust. Any of these people following him were liable to start panicking if he didn't fulfill his role as the apparent leader.

Even Diego, potentially.

It wasn't likely, sure, but Zeff had known even more brazenly confident men than him who had broken down in similar circumstances. There was perhaps no clearer example than in Lyste, some twenty years prior, during what would later be known in that country as the Great Right Turn.

It had been a quiet war for public opinion, until the very end, when all hell broke loose. They had faced overwhelming odds for five days straight, fighting such famous names as the Bloodeye, the Man of Crows, the Raider, the Liar, the Silver Devil, and even the Mad Demon himself.

That was the battle in which Field Marshal Kent and many other Vanguardians lost their minds and began attacking their own allies, including one another.

It was also the battle in which Field Marshal Lamont earned the name Iceheart, for killing Kent, his closest friend, in addition to every other broken traitor.

Zeff might not have believed that story if he hadn't been there to witness it with his own eyes, if he hadn't gotten to know Kent a little beforehand and seen the man acting seemingly normal up until then... and if Kent hadn't been mere seconds away from killing him and Axiolis both.

It was doubtless to Zeff's mind that in those few short days of fighting, the entirety of Lyste would have been consumed by Abolish were it not for Lamont. The man's reputation had suffered from it, as he'd previously been more widely known as the Judge of Intar, but having been there himself, Zeff could never truly fault the man for what he had done.

And now it was strange, because as much as he hated the Vanguard, there were still those within it whose strength, both of body and of mind, he aspired to.

In a way, though, that made him even angrier. At the Vanguard and himself.

'Zeff,' came Axiolis' echoing voice. 'We're almost there.'

As they walked, the increasing incandescence all around their small party was a welcome change, even though the magma from which it came was less so. He could finally make out the rough silhouette of the cavernous passage that they were using, as well as various branching paths along the way.

When the young Lord Goffe came into view, Zeff stopped. The boy was apparently practicing his materialization over a broad river of magma. And not doing very well, it seemed, as parts of his iron bridge were already white hot and beginning to bend downward.

What a ridiculous sight. With everything he'd seen the boy do, this should have been child's play by now. Had he not been doing as Zeff and Asad had instructed?

How irritating. Zeff really did not need anything else to be annoyed by, right now."
"1400

Much as he would've liked to scold the boy and maybe smack him until he started doing it correctly, this wasn't the time or place for that.

Zeff flicked his wrist and set about the task of cooling the molten river safely. If he simply materialized an iceberg on top of it, the extreme temperature difference would cause the ice to explode and probably kill someone--if not everyone. A suitable application of soul-strengthening, however, prevented that problem, and then Zeff was able to quickly blacken and settle the magma flow as his continual supply of ice melted harmlessly over it.

He noticed the Hun'Kui behind him take a few steps back, perhaps able to feel an uncomfortable gust of cooler air wash over them. He knew he had to be mindful of their presence, too. If he put too much oomph into his ice and turned this place into a little winter wonderland, the Hun'Kui would almost certainly freeze to death within seconds.

It required a strange and delicate balance, this little entourage. Ice was as deadly to the Hun'Kui as magma was to the non-servants from the surface.

Garovel was the first to venture over the calmed river and strike up a conversation. 'Glad to see you all in one piece.'

'Likewise,' said Ax. 'So where to next? Time is short, and every direction but southwest will likely lead us into a fight with more worms.'

Diego stepped forward. "If that's the case, then what's there to think about? Southwest it is."

His reaper, Yangéra, floated by his side. 'The train went northeast,' she said.

"Oh."

'There's also the concern of WHY southwest is so empty,' said Garovel. 'Call me suspicious, but it seems a little too good to be true.'

'Perhaps, but do you see any other options?' said Ax. 'Because I am struggling to.'

'Unfortunately, no, I don't.'

'The longer we stand here, the more likely the worms will notice us,' added Yangéra. 'I suggest we at least START going southwest, for now.'

'Agreed,' said Ax.

'I, as well,' said Lorios, the reaper to Manuel Delaguna.

'Guess I do, too,' said Garovel.

The group began walking again, Axiolis and Garovel leading the way. Zeff noticed the large iron box that Hector was having follow them, and when asked, the boy stiltedly explained that it contained valuable firearms.

Hector opened the top of it, allowing his companion, Mr. Sheridan access while they were moving. Diego, Manuel, and a couple of the Hun'Kui gave it a look as well, and it wasn't long before Hector was dragging half the party along in his iron box while they toiled away with guns.

Yet another ridiculous sight. Had the boy become a pack mule, now?

Zeff adjusted his pace in order to walk next to Hector. "You should be practicing your temperature manipulation," he said, still trying to keep a lid on his annoyance level.

"Ah, oh yeah," said Hector. And then he started doing exactly that. While still pulling the others along, the boy began making spheres appear and disappear repeatedly in front of himself.

Somehow, that was even more irritating."

"1401 -- CL.

Zeff could hear a few of the others chatting, including the reapers, but he wasn't done with Hector. An important question had occurred to him. "Do you still have the Shard that Asad gave you?"

Hector threw Zeff a look, paused from his practice, and reached through the misty armor's gap in the armpit to whip out the Shard. He held it out for Zeff, but the Rainlord didn't take it.

"As long as it is safe," said Zeff.

Hector said nothing, only recoiled his hand.

And maybe this wasn't the appropriate time, but Zeff still felt compelled to ask, "Can you contact her now?"

The young lord's expression was unreadable beneath his helmet. "I'll try." Hector closed his eyes and fell silent again.

Zeff waited. Impatiently, perhaps, but he waited.

When Hector opened his eyes again, he said, "S-sorry, it's... it's still not working."

"Why?" growled Zeff, more at the universe than at Hector specifically.

Hector didn't seem to interpret it that way, though. "I don't know..."

It probably wasn't the boy's fault. Zeff knew that. Hector had no reason to lie that Zeff could think of.

Unless Emiliana was telling him not to say anything, of course. That was certainly possible. And it wasn't difficult to imagine what her reason would be.

The Black Scourge. That bastard. What did he want with her? If he was hurting her in any way... it didn't matter how powerful he was. Zeff would find a way to kill him.

If all of that was true, however, then Hector would be at fault. For listening to Emiliana over Zeff. For thinking that Zeff wouldn't do what was best for his own child.

That was what was bothering him. That possibility.

But it was only that, he knew. A possibility. And an unlikely one. The boy was probably telling the truth. Probably.

Probably...

He scowled and heightened his pace in order to put some distance between Hector and himself.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty: 'O, hidden Liege...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Royo Raju listened silently. The surface-dwellers seemed to be under the reasonable impression that none of the Hun'Kui here knew Mohssian, and he didn't see much point in correcting them.

Certainly, his life was currently depending on these people--and in fact, the one apparently named Manuel had already saved him from falling to his death--but Royo didn't think that reason enough to give up a potential advantage.

Primarily, though, that was not his motivation. It was not the superhumans that he was truly concerned about. They seemed like they could be effectively lied to and/or reasoned with. It was the other Hun'Kui he needed to be careful of. If they realized that he was not, in fact, a real militiaman, then they would either tell the supermen or try to kill him themselves.

And those were far from desirable outcomes.

So he decided to stay quiet, to not draw any unnecessary attention to himself."

"1401 -- CL.

Zeff could hear a few of the others chatting, including the reapers, but he wasn't done with Hector. An important question had occurred to him. "Do you still have the Shard that Asad gave you?"

Hector threw Zeff a look, paused from his practice, and reached through the misty armor's gap in the armpit to whip out the Shard. He held it out for Zeff, but the Rainlord didn't take it.

"As long as it is safe," said Zeff.

Hector said nothing, only recoiled his hand.

And maybe this wasn't the appropriate time, but Zeff still felt compelled to ask, "Can you contact her now?"

The young lord's expression was unreadable beneath his helmet. "I'll try." Hector closed his eyes and fell silent again.

Zeff waited. Impatiently, perhaps, but he waited.

When Hector opened his eyes again, he said, "S-sorry, it's... it's still not working."

"Why?" growled Zeff, more at the universe than at Hector specifically.

Hector didn't seem to interpret it that way, though. "I don't know..."

It probably wasn't the boy's fault. Zeff knew that. Hector had no reason to lie that Zeff could think of.

Unless Emiliana was telling him not to say anything, of course. That was certainly possible. And it wasn't difficult to imagine what her reason would be.

The Black Scourge. That bastard. What did he want with her? If he was hurting her in any way... it didn't matter how powerful he was. Zeff would find a way to kill him.

If all of that was true, however, then Hector would be at fault. For listening to Emiliana over Zeff. For thinking that Zeff wouldn't do what was best for his own child.

That was what was bothering him. That possibility.

But it was only that, he knew. A possibility. And an unlikely one. The boy was probably telling the truth. Probably.

Probably...

He scowled and heightened his pace in order to put some distance between Hector and himself.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty: 'O, hidden Liege...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Royo Raju listened silently. The surface-dwellers seemed to be under the reasonable impression that none of the Hun'Kui here knew Mohssian, and he didn't see much point in correcting them.

Certainly, his life was currently depending on these people--and in fact, the one apparently named Manuel had already saved him from falling to his death--but Royo didn't think that reason enough to give up a potential advantage.

Primarily, though, that was not his motivation. It was not the superhumans that he was truly concerned about. They seemed like they could be effectively lied to and/or reasoned with. It was the other Hun'Kui he needed to be careful of. If they realized that he was not, in fact, a real militiaman, then they would either tell the supermen or try to kill him themselves.

And those were far from desirable outcomes.

So he decided to stay quiet, to not draw any unnecessary attention to himself."

"1402

"How did you manage to get your hands on this kind of firepower, anyway?" the one called Manuel was saying.

"Oh, it's all about makin' the right friends," said the one called Robert Sheridan.

Royo observed from a distance as they armed themselves to the teeth. He'd been tempted to join them in their work, but they'd even been kind enough to toss an extra weapon his way. He'd already had one, of course, and this new piece required some reassembly, but he appreciated the gesture.

What he did not appreciate was the way that the one called Diego was looking at him. Pointed and semi-frequent stares. A suspicious man, it seemed. Perhaps he suspected. More likely, he was just being cautious around an abundance of firearms and strangers.

The reapers were doing the same thing. Looking around constantly. Surveying both their surroundings and themselves. He supposed the rumor that they made for excellent scouts was true, after all.

But what an unsettling sight, they were. Without his ardor-infused goggles, he would not have been able to see them, and he was considering taking them off for that very reason.

To his eyes, they were himself. They each had his own face, save the eyes, which cried blood, and the mouth, which dripped it as well. Their bodies, too, were mangled and twisted, at times ghostly and ethereal, and at others, slashed to ribbons and full of holes.

Horrific as it all was, and even though he wasn't at all accustomed to it, it did make him wonder. Surely, everyone could not see them as such. The other Hun'Kui were wearing goggles, too. Perhaps they were hiding it like he was, but they did not look nearly as disturbed as he felt.

No, their appearance had to have been specialized in some way. Otherwise, it made no sense how they could all have his face without anyone else noticing.

Two of the other Hun'Kui were speaking to each other now, he noticed. But he couldn't hear them, because they were speaking too lowly. He did, however, catch sight of them glancing in his direction.

That could prove problematic.

The only other Hun'Kui present was walking right next to him. This one, at least, was his ally--the still-nameless prisoner with whom Royo had escaped.

Ideally, this was a good thing. Ideally, the man would be helpful to their shared cause rather than a burden to it.

He was still waiting on proof of that.

And perhaps the man had read his mind, because his ally chose that moment to speak to him for the very first time. “How is your shoulder, Eleyo?” the man said in Hunese.

His shoulder? Eleyo?

Ah.

Royo understood. The man was pretending they already knew each other and had made up a name for him. Likely, he was worried that the two of them were the only ones not talking at all. And if they acted familiar with one another, their facade as militiamen would appear more credible to the others.

Smart."

"1403

If nothing else, Royo could at least be relieved that he hadn't allied himself with a slack-jawed idiot.

"It's a little sore, still," Royo answered, also in Hunese, "but don't worry, Lenos. I'm fine."

"Glad to hear it. We might make it out of this after all."

"We might. But don't relax just yet."

A lull in their intentionally bland conversation arrived, and Royo was more concerned with hearing what the others were saying than in keeping it alive.

The lone woman of their group was talking to the one called Manuel. "I am sorry for causing you so much trouble." She was wearing a suit similar to the one called Robert Sheridan, which told Royo that those two were different from the other surface-dwellers, more fragile perhaps.

"It is not your fault," said the one called Manuel. "I am just glad you are not hurt. My brother would have never forgiven me."

"I..."

"Ah--apologies. I didn't mean to bring up--please forgive me."

"You need not apologize," she said. "You were as close to him as I was. If not more so."

What was going on there, Royo wondered? Though it piqued his curiosity, it didn't sound immediately relevant to his current predicament, so he tried to focus his attention elsewhere.

The Senmurai had been largely quiet so far, but it looked like the one called Diego had struck up a conversation with him.

"--don't think so? Well, I do. In fact, I think we're closer to it now than anyone has ever gotten. I mean, it would make sense, wouldn't it? All these worms in the way? It's no wonder no one else has ever returned. The slimy bastards are guarding it."

"...I guess," was all the Senmurai said.

"You're telling me you're not curious? Just think about the possibilities. The potential. This could be our big chance. Yangéra thinks so, too."

There came a noticeable pause.

"...She's just saying that because she's embarrassed. She doesn't like people to know how much she loves and agrees with me."

"I'm sure that's it," said the Senmurai.

"And I'M sure that I'm right about this. You guys should listen to me. I have great instincts when it comes to finding treasure. That train wreck was a blessing in disguise. You'll see."

Another pause.

"Lhutowë, of course. His will be done."

Still another pause.

"That's not true at all. I've always believed in Him when it benefits me."

The more he listened, the more Royo thought the one called Diego sounded like a buffoon. But he could see the man still throwing glances back in his direction fairly regularly. Regardless of how he talked, that man hadn't stopped being vigilant.

Royo had known a few men like that in his time. Men who acted one way while thinking another. They were often the most dangerous people he'd ever met."

"1404

Lenos spoke up again, interrupting Royo's silent ruminations. "Thank you for saving my ass back there, by the way," he said, again in Hunese. "I doubt I would have made it if not for you."

Royo gave him a look. "Yes, well, if you get the opportunity to return the favor--and it seems like you might--then I hope you do."

"Of course."

Now that he was thinking about it, there was a good chance that Royo could recognize or otherwise identify this man. There had been no lack of prisoners back in Babbadelo, yet Royo had only seen a handful aboard the train. Logic would dictate, therefore, that the local government had chosen the prisoners that they found the most problematic. A few possible candidates came to mind. He'd always tried to be aware of notable individuals whenever he traveled, and Babbadelo had been no different.

He needed more information, though. He couldn't ask for Lenos' real name, obviously, but maybe he could get a hint. "Do you have any hidden talents that might come in handy? Anything that you've been keeping from me, perhaps?"

"Ah..." Lenos rubbed his neck with his hand as he took a moment to think. "Not especially..."

No good. Lenos couldn't tell what he'd been getting at? Or perhaps he was just reluctant to say. Royo tried again. "That reminds me. What was keeping you so busy back in Babbadelo? I didn't see you around very much."

"Oh, you know. The usual..."

Ugh. Come on. "So you were causing problems, then?"

Lenos squinted at him briefly, then smirked. "You know me. Just can't keep my hands to myself, sometimes."

Was that a clue? The look on Lenos' face suggested as much, but Royo didn't understand what he was getting at. "I hope you weren't doing anything unwelcome or otherwise disrespectful. It would reflect poorly on the rest of us, you know.”

“Never. I am always the perfect gentleman. Though, I admit, this time I could have been more discreet. But what can I say? I was enraptured. Not feeling myself.”

Royo’s expression flickered. Was he describing the same thing that had happened to himself?

“Normally, I never get caught,” Lenos went on. “I consider it a matter of professional dignity.”

Professional? That one had to be a clue.

The man made it sound as if he were talking about a habit of promiscuity, but as far as Royo was aware, there were no laws in Babbadelo that would have imprisoned him for such behavior. Lenos had to be talking about something else.

Thievery? If he considered it a matter of professionalism, that made the most sense to Royo. And a thief who took pride in not getting caught must have also been a thief who had been doing it for a while. One who would have earned a name for himself.

And Royo had recently heard such a name. That of Kogibur, or the Roach.

A particularly unflattering name in the Undercrust, because as far as benign pests went, cockroaches were arguably the most reviled. But that was also because they were so resilient and difficult to get rid of. So in a way, perhaps it was a kind of compliment.”

"1405

Royo figured he should reciprocate and give Lenos a hint toward his own identity. “When will you learn? I’ve always tried my hardest to set a good example for you. And everyone else, too. That’s why, unlike you, when I speak, people listen.”

“Don’t lecture me, Eleyo. I know all about your reputation.”

Ah. So he’d already known. Royo was flattered but not terribly surprised.

Royo observed a change in the way the superhumans were carrying themselves, and the reapers all appeared to close ranks. Rumbling beneath his feet confirmed his fears, and moments later, a worm tunneled out of the ground ahead of them.

It was comparatively small, however, and did not prove to be nearly so grave a threat as their previous encounter. As quickly as it had appeared, the one called Zeff slew the beast whilst shouting at the top of his lungs. A single, glistening spear skewered it through the mouth, and a tower of ice erupted up out of the worm's body, exploding it into frozen pieces.

The Senmurai raised a metal wall in defense of the Hun'Kui, but Royo still ended up taking a bead of ice on the arm.

It burned unlike anything he'd ever felt. Royo howled in agony and dropped to the ground.

Fortunately, the pain soon abated. Lenos helped him to his feet.

The bead of ice was gone, but his arm was numb, and Royo could see it twitching. As he steadied his haggard breath, he was made to wonder how something so small could have felt so torturous and debilitating. Ice truly was as terrifying as the rumors said it was.

There was little time to recuperate, however. The superhumans were ushering the group onward at an increased pace.

As they ran, the one called Zeff ventured closer and gestured with his hands. He even made a poor attempt to apologize in Hunese. He was not very familiar with the language, apparently. No surprise. Perhaps his reaper was feeding him words to say.

Royo accepted it as silently and as graciously as he could manage. As humiliating as it was, Royo understood that it had not been intentional. There would be no need to seek retribution from the one called Zeff. Royo knew the damage was most likely not permanent, and an accident was an accident, after all.

The cavernous passage they were using opened up as completely as Royo's vision would allow, and suddenly there were no more walls, only pitch darkness.

Pitch darkness and a kind of... mist. Faint, but there. Squinting, he removed his goggles, and the mist vanished completely. He put them on, and the mist returned. Which told him that the mist was infused with ardor, if not entirely constituted from it.

The group slowed their run to a walk, then stopped altogether. He searched the superhumans' faces for answers, but they were looking as confused as he was.

He rummaged through a rucksack that he'd procured back on the train, and he was pleased to find a directional lamplight. He pointed it ahead and switched it on.

A cone of light cut through the murky blackness, revealing large shapes in the distance.

Buildings, he soon realized. In quite poor condition. Crumbling, many of them. Very old architecture, as well.

As he moved his light to and fro horizontally, and as the others joined him in switching on their own lights, more and more structures came into view, and their discovery became more and more apparent.

They had found a city in ruins."

"1406 -- CLI.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-One: 'What remains of a Falling...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'So the worms have given up?' Hector asked, still not entirely clear on what seemed like an ever-changing situation.

'Uh, I'm not sure,' said Garovel privately. 'They've slowed down or stopped chasing us, but I don't know if that means they've genuinely given up. My knowledge of worms is a bit spotty, in case that wasn't already obvious.'

'Then ask one of the others about it,' said Hector.

'Aww, but--ugh, fine.' He switched over to a public voice. 'So do you think they've left us alone or what?'

'No,' said Axiolis. 'Judging from the movement patterns, they still seem agitated to me.'

'Why are they keeping their distance, then?' asked Yangéra.

'Probably because they are hesitant to enter this area for some reason,' said Axiolis. 'It would make sense if this area was the territory of a rock golem. In which case, we have lucked out.'

Hector's pessimism was doubting that.

'Have we, though?' said Garovel, perhaps feeling similarly. 'We're still both surrounded AND stranded. Doesn't seem like the greatest luck to me, even if the worms have given up. Which, by the way, you're also saying they might not have?'

'Mm, indeed,' said Axiolis. 'They may just need to cluster up in order to overcome their anxiety. They are not exactly the brightest creatures in the world, so that may take them a while.'

'Then let's make use of that time,' said Yangéra. 'We should put some more distance between us and them while we can.'

'Agreed.'

'Yeah.'

'Alright.'

And the group began walking again, though at a more cautious pace than even before they were being chased.

Hector had the opportunity to observe the various crumbling structures all around them. He'd never seen the like before. Most windows were longer horizontally than they were vertically, and whatever the faintly foggy material was that occupied them couldn't have been simple glass, as it would have surely melted at this temperature.

He tried to recall if he'd seen material like this in Babbadelo, but if he had, it was escaping him. He thought about asking Garovel if he remembered, but the reaper had never seemed to give too much of a crap about architecture, so he probably wouldn't. That, and he didn't want to distract Garovel from his observational duties, right now.

Regardless, he wished they had more light. Even with all of their lamps probing around, the thick darkness still made it difficult to see very much at one time. And of course, pretty much every building was in shambles, too. That made it considerably harder to spot the architectural differences between here and the surface.

What a shame. He would've liked to get a look at an intact roof, but he couldn't find one.

Still, it was interesting to him that this place even had buildings to begin with--or at least this many. Babbadelo had so few by comparison. Everything there had been carved out of the natural rock formations."

"1406 -- CLI.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-One: 'What remains of a Falling...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'So the worms have given up?' Hector asked, still not entirely clear on what seemed like an ever-changing situation.

'Uh, I'm not sure,' said Garovel privately. 'They've slowed down or stopped chasing us, but I don't know if that means they've genuinely given up. My knowledge of worms is a bit spotty, in case that wasn't already obvious.'

'Then ask one of the others about it,' said Hector.

'Aww, but--ugh, fine.' He switched over to a public voice. 'So do you think they've left us alone or what?'

'No,' said Axiolis. 'Judging from the movement patterns, they still seem agitated to me.'

'Why are they keeping their distance, then?' asked Yangéra.

'Probably because they are hesitant to enter this area for some reason,' said Axiolis. 'It would make sense if this area was the territory of a rock golem. In which case, we have lucked out.'

Hector's pessimism was doubting that.

'Have we, though?' said Garovel, perhaps feeling similarly. 'We're still both surrounded AND stranded. Doesn't seem like the greatest luck to me, even if the worms have given up. Which, by the way, you're also saying they might not have?'

'Mm, indeed,' said Axiolis. 'They may just need to cluster up in order to overcome their anxiety. They are not exactly the brightest creatures in the world, so that may take them a while.'

'Then let's make use of that time,' said Yangéra. 'We should put some more distance between us and them while we can.'

'Agreed.'

'Yeah.'

'Alright.'

And the group began walking again, though at a more cautious pace than even before they were being chased.

Hector had the opportunity to observe the various crumbling structures all around them. He'd never seen the like before. Most windows were longer horizontally than they were vertically, and whatever the faintly foggy material was that occupied them couldn't have been simple glass, as it would have surely melted at this temperature.

He tried to recall if he'd seen material like this in Babbadelo, but if he had, it was escaping him. He thought about asking Garovel if he remembered, but the reaper had never seemed to give too much of a crap about architecture, so he probably wouldn't. That, and he didn't want to distract Garovel from his observational duties, right now.

Regardless, he wished they had more light. Even with all of their lamps probing around, the thick darkness still made it difficult to see very much at one time. And of course, pretty much every building was in shambles, too. That made it considerably harder to spot the architectural differences between here and the surface.

What a shame. He would've liked to get a look at an intact roof, but he couldn't find one.

Still, it was interesting to him that this place even had buildings to begin with--or at least this many. Babbadelo had so few by comparison. Everything there had been carved out of the natural rock formations."

They found an apparent road, inlaid with long and flat stones, some of which reflected the light of the party's lamps, illuminating pieces of the dark path and thereby making it mildly more clear where they were going. It was only so useful, however, as the path was regularly interrupted by large piles of rubble that needed to be cleared. Diego and Manuel made short work of such tasks while Zeff and Hector kept watch over the party's front and rear, respectively.

And maybe it was just Hector's mind playing tricks on him, but as they continued slowly onward, he could feel a heavy silence among the group, a kind of unspoken discomfort. But then, perhaps that was just because of the reapers. If recent experiences were anything to go by, having so many reapers in close proximity to one another without any of them speaking very much... that just didn't bode very well, Hector felt. Like a bad omen, of sorts.

At length, the Lord Elroy was the one to break the atmosphere. "What is this strange aura?" he asked.

'Ah,' said Garovel. 'You can sense that, too, can you?'

Hector didn't know what they were talking about.

"I can," said Zeff. "But only just. What is it? Do any of you know?"

'It is ardor,' said Axiolis. 'It covers this entire area like a blanket, so dense that it's become a kind of mist.'

"Is that bad?" said Diego, while Manuel Delaguna was busy explaining the half-silent conversation to the non-servants in the group. "Because it doesn't sound so great."

'It is hard to tell,' said Axiolis. 'It could be nothing, but regardless, let us not disturb the mist if we can help it.'

Somehow, Hector doubted that it was nothing and so had to speak up, "Supposing it's not nothing, uh... then what would it be? Hypothetically, I mean."

The reapers hesitated visibly.

'Hypothetically,' said Axiolis slowly, 'it could mean that a rock golem is slumbering here. Which would be wonderful. Golems are quite docile and friendly toward humans.'

'It might even help us fight the worms, if they decide to follow us into this area,' added Garovel.

'Indeed.'

Diego had the same question that was occurring to Hector. "If it's so wonderful, then why should we avoid disturbing the mist?"

'Because,' said Axiolis, again slowly, 'it could also be a feldeath.'

No one said anything. Even Manuel stopped translating for the non-servants.

Manuel's reaper picked up the slack. 'We should clarify that, while it is yet unclear at this point, a golem is the more likely case,' said Lorios.

'Of course,' said Axiolis. 'I have been able to sense particularly strong ardor from much of the rubble around here. And rubble is made from rocks. Which is what golems are.' The reaper didn't sound as confident as Hector would've liked.

Garovel helped him out. 'Or it could be nothing, like Axiolis first said. In fact, I know of a fascinating theory regarding the seemingly pointless accumulation of ardor.'

"1408

Hector tried to intervene privately. 'Garovel, is this really the time?'

'I'm just trying to keep everyone from freaking out,' the reaper said, also privately.

Diego grew impatient as the group kept walking. "Well, go on, then. Tell us your magnificent theory."

'Oh, well, it's not MY theory, per se. Just one I've heard, like I said.' Garovel allowed a beat to pass. 'But anyway, yes, it has to do with golems, too, actually. And how they're created.'

'Oh?' said Axiolis. 'I've not heard this before.'

'Neither have I,' said Lorios.

Before continuing, Garovel looked to Yangéra, doubtless wondering if she knew what he was talking about. When she shook her head, Garovel's next words sounded positively delighted. 'Well, the idea is simple enough. Whenever ardor accumulates in one place like this, it begins to bleed into the environment, and then, over a period of decades or possibly centuries, sentience is achieved, and the very land itself comes to life in the form of a golem.'

As he listened, Hector laughed through his nose, quietly enough that it must have blended into the muted hiss of his armor. He couldn't help thinking about how much Garovel must have been enjoying himself.

'Or in other words,' Garovel went on, 'all of this mist that we're sensing here could, in truth, be nothing, for now. But ten years from now? Or a hundred? Perhaps a golem will arise.'

'Interesting,' said Axiolis. 'But what causes the ardor to accumulate in one place like this?'

'That's not, um, well--that's not entirely clear. It just seems to occur naturally. But I know some have argued that this gap in our understanding of how or why it happens makes for a compelling case that the planet is indeed sentient, and that it decides such things according to its whims or what have you.'

'Mm, I see.' Axiolis did not sound terribly convinced.

"That's great 'n all," said Diego, "and, uh, I'm glad we're safe from the worms 'n everything, so I don't want this to sound like I don't appreciate what a spectacular job you reapers are doing, but, um... Do we know where we're going, right now?"

Hector appreciated that question.

'...Not entirely,' admitted Axiolis.

"Not entirely," echoed Diego, nodding with feigned understanding.

"How 'bout partially, then? If we don't entirely know, then what are the parts that we do know? Could we focus on those, maybe?"

'Could you please not sound so condescending?' said Yangéra.

"Oh, this isn't condescension. I assure you, my tone is one of humbleness and admiration."

Impressively, Diego earned a snicker from Yangéra with that one.

‘We do sense something else,’ said Garovel, ‘which is what we’re heading toward, currently. But unless I’m mistaken, I think we’re all a bit confused about what it actually is.’

“Bein’ pretty vague,” said Diego.

Garovel sighed publicly. ‘Alright, well, below us and still quite a ways ahead, it seems like there are a lot of plants there. That’s what I’m sensing, anyway.’”

"1409

‘I sense them as well,’ said Lorios.

‘As do I,’ said Axiolis.

‘Same here,’ said Yangéra.

“Okay,” said Diego, who’d apparently become the spokesperson for every non-reaper in the group. “So what’s the big deal? I mean, I know plants are fairly uncommon in the Undercrust, but is that all we’re going off of?”

‘No, the thing is,’ said Garovel, ‘these are plants that we recognize. By their “soul-signature,” if you will. And I don’t think any of us have ever sensed these types of plants anywhere but the surface.’

Another chorus of agreement arose from the other reapers.

“What in the world?” said Diego. “You’re saying that there are plants down here that shouldn’t be able to survive in this environment? How is that possible?”

‘That is a very good question,’ said Garovel. ‘And it is why we are going to investigate.’

A few more beats of silence passed.

Then Diego, as if realizing something, said, “So we have no idea how we’re going to reach Capaporo and reunite with everyone.”

‘Correct.’

“Meanwhile, they’re probably freaking out, worrying that we’re all dead.”

‘Probably.’

“And without you there to guide them, they won’t know where to go, so they’ll be stuck in Capaporo.”

‘Mhmm.’

“This plan bites,” said Diego.

‘Never said it didn’t,’ said Garovel.

“Ugh...”

Hector didn’t disagree with the man. He wondered how the other Rainlords would react to this development. Things must’ve looked really bad from their end, but would they simply give up on them? Hector hoped they would. With the way the reapers had been describing the sheer volume of worms here, trying to fight their way here... even with as much strength as Asad, Dimas, Salvador, Darktide, and all the others had at their disposal...

It seemed like a terrible idea. One of the worst Hector could imagine, in these circumstances.

But then again...

These were Rainlords.

Hector honestly didn’t know what they would do. And he wanted to pose the question aloud, but he caught a glimpse of Diego’s face. And Zeff’s.

They were probably even more worried about it than he was. Bringing it up now wouldn’t change that, nor would it improve their own predicament.

‘On the bright side,’ said Garovel, making everyone perk up ever so slightly, ‘our companions, Roman and Voreese, the ones you haven’t met yet, should also be in Capaporo. So if they all meet up together, then even without us there, there’s a good chance that they will make it to Warrenhold safely.’

True enough, Hector supposed. He found it difficult to imagine Roman and Voreese hitting it off with the Rainlords and everything going as smoothly as Garovel was suggesting, but again, he kept that to himself. If nothing else, he could appreciate Garovel’s attempt to maintain morale.

As they continued on, Hector tried to think of a new topic of conversation, preferably something that wouldn't instigate the same feeling of helplessness as the last subject.

The ruined buildings gave him an idea, at least. "...Does anyone know what this city was called?"

"1410

~~Thanksgiving Special (Page 1 of 4)~~

No one answered him.

Well, that was a bust. It surprised him, though. He thought for sure that at least one of the reapers would've had some idea what this place was. It made him further wonder precisely how old this city was. If it were relatively new, then it would make sense that these reapers from the surface didn't know about it at all, but as he stared at the crumbling infrastructure all around him, that didn't seem particularly likely.

They arrived at a monument of some sort, and the first thing Hector noticed about it was that it seemed to be perfectly intact, unlike every building he'd seen so far.

It was an enormous flame, as big as a house and eternally still, being carved from pale gray stone. Around it flowed multiple streams of lava, all of which appeared to be factored into the design of the foundation.

'Oh my god,' came Axiolis' voice, and everyone who could hear him turned to look.

Yangéra was the one to ask it. 'What's the matter?'

'Do you not recognize this flame?' he said, looking over his fellow reapers. 'This is Enkir, also known as Rathmore's Flame. It was a famous marker of Hun'Sho royalty.'

Hector had multiple questions all of a sudden.

'Wow, so this was a Hun'Sho city?' said Garovel. 'I suppose that would explain why it's in ruins.'

Hector had to ask a private question. 'Who're the Hun'Sho?'

Garovel floated closer but didn't have the opportunity to answer him.

'Uh-oh,' said Lorios aloud. 'I'm not the only one sensing that, am I?'

'No,' said Axiolis. 'It seems the worms have decided to come in here after us.'

'Time to start run--'

A tremor cut Garovel off, and it was strong enough that Hector and everyone else had to fight to maintain their footing. The tremor did not dissipate, either, and indeed, seemed to only grow stronger with each passing second.

Hector reached out for an explanation. 'Garovel, what's happening?!'

'Remember how we said not to disturb the mist?!' said Garovel privately. 'Well, the worms are disturbing the mist!'

And then Hector saw the monument from earlier come alive with molten light. Lava flowed up from the base of the stone and through the curves of the flame, igniting it in its entirety and glowing with such increasing intensity that Hector had to shield his eyes.

Magma gushed forth like a geyser, and crystalline ice materialized over the party, protecting everyone but the cluster of Hun'Kui, who did not look terribly fazed by the sudden bath of lava.

The pool of liquid hot rock kept growing, and the group began to slowly move out of its path while they were either shielded from it or swimming through it.

That was when Hector saw something that he would not soon be forgetting.

The magma began to move against its own flow. It began to grow upward. And it began to take form. Two broad pillars connecting at the top--legs to a torso. Bulky and hunchbacked. Then came the arms. Then the head."

"1411

At such close range, the sheer amount of light coming off the creature was blinding. Once the group was clear of the amassing lava, they started running again. Hector was surprised to find his iron box unharmed, save only a melted corner. He increased its pace as well but honestly didn't have high hopes that any of the weapons therein would survive whatever the hell was going to happen next.

'A molten rock golem,' marveled Garovel privately as they ran. 'Never seen one of those before.'

Was that what that was? Hector hadn't made that connection, but he supposed it made sense. 'Does that mean it's on our side?' he asked.

'In theory, yeah.'

Hector looked back and saw the whole city being illuminated. The previously black expanse of cavern above them was suddenly alive with the burning reds and oranges of the golem's molten glow. And maybe it was the light playing tricks on him, but Hector thought he saw something else there, too, moving among the giant stalactites above.

'Wait!' came Axiolis' voice. 'Everyone, stop!'

Hesitant, they all still did as he said.

Axiolis explained himself. 'The worms surround this entire city, directly ahead of us as well. We should not venture too far away from the golem, else the worms will swarm.'

'True enough, but we shouldn't stay too CLOSE to the golem, either,' said Garovel.

'Then we may already be at the optimal distance from it,' said Yangéra.

And no one looked pleased, but no one argued, either.

With that, the party stayed put, torn between bad and worse circumstances.

The reapers kept talking to one another, trying to brainstorm seemingly, but it didn't sound like they were making much progress to Hector.

As he listened, his gaze returned to where it had been before, to the stalactites far above the golem's still-expanding bulk.

And that was when Hector saw a second thing that he would not soon be forgetting.

At first, it was just a kind of murky darkness hanging high in the air, noticeable because of how undeterred by the golem's light it was, unlike the rest of the fleeing shadows around it.

Until it took form.

It became a skeleton--not terribly unlike every reaper he'd ever seen. But it was so much larger. Impossibly gigantic. The equal of the molten golem. It had flames of its own, as well, but these were black as night and grew to cover its skeletal body in a way similar to a reaper's shroud.

'Oh hey,' laughed Garovel, though he sounded rather nervous to Hector, 'I guess we were wrong. The mist wasn't for a golem OR a feldeath. It was for both. How wonderful.'

That was one explanation that Hector had not needed. He'd certainly never seen a feldeath before, but he'd still been able to recognize what it was almost immediately.

The feldeath began to descend, and four colossal scythes materialized into its skeletal hands--of which there were somehow now four as well."

"1412

~~Thanksgiving Special (Page 3 of 4)~~

The golem met the feldeath's four blades with two fists, and the impact was so immense that Hector saw the air distort around them before realizing a shock wave was imminent.

He raised a defensive iron wall for their group, and Zeff's ice joined it.

The force pushed the paired walls back, pressing right up against the group, so Hector kept adding iron to the front and sides, hoping to distribute more of the blow. Debris flew by in elephant-sized chunks, several of which slammed into their barrier, denting and cracking it in multiple places.

But it held. And when they annihilated their wall so they could see the continuing battle, Hector was relieved that the subsequent blows were not nearly as devastating as that first one. They only made the ground tremble and waves of briefly hotter air wash over them.

Hector could only wonder how hot that air really was if he was able to feel it even through his cooling armor.

The two giants did not battle on their own for much longer, however, because the worms arrived in force and swarmed them both.

What followed was probably the biggest clusterfuck of pure chaos that Hector had ever witnessed, and he was only too grateful to be standing at a relatively safe distance away from it.

Fire, lightning, and darkness all collided amid hulking figures.

A scythe wreathed in black cut right through the golem's torso, bisecting it horizontally along with a dozen worms--and none on the receiving end of that blow so much as flinched. All body parts, including the golem's, reattached within moments, so quick that Hector questioned whether anything had even happened.

The golem punched a hole right through the feldeath's midsection, and the skeletal monster's whole body lost its form, only to turn into black goo and fly around the golem's extended arm, reconstituting itself at the golem's exposed backside.

And the worms. They dropped like flies, but they didn't stay down. They kept swarming back up, almost always bigger than before, not that it seemed to matter as they were sliced and smashed and roasted and--Hector couldn't even tell what else.

He had to wonder if such a fight would ever actually end.

Unfortunately, the worms did not focus solely on the giants, and boy, were there plenty more to go around. Soon enough, there were worms bearing down on them from every direction.

Before they were completely swarmed the servants all formed a square around the non-servants. Zeff, Diego, Manuel, and Hector each took one side while most of the non-servants laid down covering fire as they saw fit.

These worms were much smaller than what he'd seen previously, which made it a simple enough task to swat them away and keep his side clear, but there were just so many. It was a writhing sea before him, angry and seemingly endless. There was scarcely time to think or even breathe.

And worse still, he knew from experience that, at any moment, all these worms could fuse into one enormous monstrosity and become a very big problem.

Which they did."

"1413

~~Thanksgiving Special (Page 4 of 4)~~

In a blink, the worms were amassing, already the size of a school bus and still growing.

No swatting that one away.

He needed to think bigger. In fact, what was he doing? He should've already been thinking bigger to begin with. He dropped to one knee and slammed his palm against the ground.

An iron plateau filled the entire road before him. He'd given it a slope, too, so it sent every single worm in his line of sight flying away from him, even the big one.

Yeah. That was more like it. There was no need to feel intimidated, he realized. Even if he couldn't put them down for good, he didn't have to.

They were still coming, of course, slithering over the top of his iron, but that wasn't a problem. Rinse and repeat. He annihilated his work, letting the worms drop, and then remade it, launching them even farther into the distance. When they came still another time, they had combined to about the size of the one that had brought down the train.

So what? Hector sent that one flying, too.

That bought him a significant amount of time to breathe, and he looked over to see how the others were doing. Zeff and Diego were doing just fine, unsurprisingly, but Manuel seemed to be having a rough time, so Hector helped him out and flung a few clusters of worms away for him. The man spared him a nod.

Hector saw his own worm returning, again bigger than before and this time barreling toward the group at the speed of a freight train.

All that momentum could prove difficult to simply launch backward, he felt. He was considering creating a ramp for it instead when Robert Sheridan stepped into his line of vision.

Apparently, the man had finally finished building his gun. And the thing was massive. More like a cannon than anything, Mr. Sheridan had it mounted on his shoulder as he took aim. The man pulled the trigger, and a volley of projectiles launched in rapid succession, leaving a visibly hot trail in their wake.

The first projectiles didn't explode--at least not immediately; instead, they dug into the beast's bulk. Then the rest of the projectiles hit, and triggered a chain of explosions--but not through combustion, as Hector had expected. Instead, the explosions were all lasers, and for a couple seconds, the worm looked like it was at the center of some kind of deadly disco ball, getting diced into thousands of tiny pieces.

And then Mr. Sheridan shot a volley of more conventional explosives, too. In the end, the beast was reduced to a smear on the road.

A bit awestruck, Hector heard the man laughing that same crazed laugh again. But when he saw Mr. Sheridan reload the cannon and point it at the feldeath, Hector coated the trigger in iron and grabbed his arm.

"Do NOT shoot the feldeath!" Hector shouted over the noise of the swarm around them."

"1414 -- CLII.

Mr. Sheridan looked confused for a moment, but then seemed to realize. "Ah! Yeah, probably wouldn't even hit at this range, eh?! I'll get closer!"

"No, just--!" There wasn't time to explain properly. "Just focus on the worms! Don't attack the feldeath, no matter what!"

"Roger that!"

More worms arrived, and Hector resumed his defensive duties. Thankfully, the others seemed to be making genuine progress. Zeff in particular was dealing with thinner and thinner crowds of worms each time Hector looked over in his direction.

At length, however, their battle was interrupted. A strange sound rang out, like one long musical note, the likes of which Hector had never heard before. It made every worm in sight shudder and curl up into a ball.

The group stopped and exchanged confused looks with one another. After a second, though, Zeff began skewering dozens of worms at a time with icy stalagmites.

‘Someone’s there,’ said Axiolis, pointing toward Zeff’s side of the street, which made the man stop again.

Sure enough, a figure appeared, carefully stepping around or over the balls of worms. The same sound continued to ring intermittently, and Hector became fairly certain that it was coming from whatever was in the figure’s left hand.

As the figure drew closer to Zeff, it became clear that it was a man in a climate-controlled suit.

The Lord Elroy spoke first. “Hello...”

“Ah, you speak Mohssian!” the stranger said. “How unexpected! Greetings!”

“Who are you and what are you doing here?” asked Zeff.

“Perhaps the explanation should wait,” the man said, motioning to the battle between the molten golem and the feldeath still raging in the background. “I have a place where we can talk at our leisure. It is not far from here.”

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Two: ‘To thine scorching heart...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It hadn’t taken much more convincing to get the group to agree to follow the stranger, who soon identified himself as a biologist, anthropologist, historian, and “generally curious individual” by the name of Carver.

“How did you end up here?” Diego asked as the man led them to wherever they were going.

“Oh, it’s a rather long story, but the unfortunate point of it is that my companions and I were separated during an exploratory venture. Not to worry, though. My companions and I were eventually reunited. But at that time, I decided to stay, as I had grown quite fond of this place.”

Hector, and perhaps everyone else present, found that difficult to comprehend.

Zeff posed the next question. “How long have you been down here?”

“Ah, I would wager that it is going on five years or so now,” said Carver. “It has been quite the educational adventure. Full of more thrills than I care to remember. But from the looks of your lot, I somehow begin to think that my own tales would fail to impress.””
"1414 -- CLII.

Mr. Sheridan looked confused for a moment, but then seemed to realize. “Ah! Yeah, probably wouldn’t even hit at this range, eh?! I’ll get closer!”

“No, just--!” There wasn’t time to explain properly. “Just focus on the worms! Don’t attack the feldeath, no matter what!”

“Roger that!”

More worms arrived, and Hector resumed his defensive duties. Thankfully, the others seemed to be making genuine progress. Zeff in particular was dealing with thinner and thinner crowds of worms each time Hector looked over in his direction.

At length, however, their battle was interrupted. A strange sound rang out, like one long musical note, the likes of which Hector had never heard before. It made every worm in sight shudder and curl up into a ball.

The group stopped and exchanged confused looks with one another. After a second, though, Zeff began skewering dozens of worms at a time with icy stalagmites.

‘Someone’s there,’ said Axiolis, pointing toward Zeff’s side of the street, which made the man stop again.

Sure enough, a figure appeared, carefully stepping around or over the balls of worms. The same sound continued to ring intermittently, and Hector became fairly certain that it was coming from whatever was in the figure's left hand.

As the figure drew closer to Zeff, it became clear that it was a man in a climate-controlled suit.

The Lord Elroy spoke first. "Hello..."

"Ah, you speak Mohssian!" the stranger said. "How unexpected! Greetings!"

"Who are you and what are you doing here?" asked Zeff.

"Perhaps the explanation should wait," the man said, motioning to the battle between the molten golem and the feldeath still raging in the background. "I have a place where we can talk at our leisure. It is not far from here."

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Two: 'To thine scorching heart...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It hadn't taken much more convincing to get the group to agree to follow the stranger, who soon identified himself as a biologist, anthropologist, historian, and "generally curious individual" by the name of Carver.

"How did you end up here?" Diego asked as the man led them to wherever they were going.

"Oh, it's a rather long story, but the unfortunate point of it is that my companions and I were separated during an exploratory venture. Not to worry, though. My companions and I were eventually reunited. But at that time, I decided to stay, as I had grown quite fond of this place."

Hector, and perhaps everyone else present, found that difficult to comprehend.

Zeff posed the next question. "How long have you been down here?"

"Ah, I would wager that it is going on five years or so now," said Carver. "It has been quite the educational adventure. Full of more thrills than I care to remember. But from the looks of your lot, I somehow begin to think that my own tales would fail to impress.'"

"1415

They arrived at a ruined structure that looked like it might've once been something quite spectacular, judging from the long, flat steps leading up to it and the empty grounds all around it, perhaps where one or more courtyards had been.

Had it been a castle of some kind, Hector wondered? Axiolis had mentioned something about royalty, hadn't he? Maybe this was some sort of palace.

A sobering thought, he felt. He could hardly imagine how much time, effort, and resources would have gone into construction. And to think that it could be reduced to a state such as this? Little more than knee-high walls and a pile of rocks?

As if he needed any more reason to feel small and powerless in the grand scheme of things.

Carver led them up the steps and through the vibrating rubble. The distant battle between the two giants had not ceased or even shown any signs of doing so. Hector was not the only one who was still trying to keep an eye on it, partially out of wariness and partially out of simple awe. When would they ever get another chance to see something like this?

The feldeath loosed a burning beam of black light that cut through the golem and tore into the cavern ceiling. A half-dozen building-sized stalactites crashed down on a section of the city that was much too close for Hector's liking. Dust and wind rushed past the group, disturbing the broken castle grounds and unsettling more debris.

After that, everyone's pace quickened noticeably, and they soon arrived at a large door in the floor of a blown-out chamber. Carver set to work opening it--a process which apparently involved inserting a key into a hole beneath a hatch in the floor, then flipping a series of adjacent switches.

It took several attempts. Carver threw the group a few embarrassed looks and apologized after finally getting it open. "I have not done this in quite a while," he said. "The mechanism is rather old and could do with a bit of maintenance, it seems.”

At last, he led them down a short ladder and then a spiraling staircase. A very long, spiraling staircase, Hector discovered. He had fun changing his iron box into appropriate shapes so that it could continue following the group--so much fun, in fact, that he would've left the damn thing behind if not for Mr. Sheridan's pleading.

He did finally manage it after reassessing the problem and treating it like a new form of training. Making the iron box grow and shrink as necessary, becoming less like an iron box and more like an iron caterpillar. Or worm, perhaps. Squirming its way down the hole, the ladder, the narrow and curving steps.

Garovel seemed to get a kick out of the whole ordeal.

Hector was the last to reach the bottom of the staircase, and they'd apparently been asking Carver more questions while they waited for Hector to catch up.

“You’ve really been down here for five years all by your lonesome?” Mr. Sheridan was saying.”

"1416

“Yes and no,” said Carver. “It has been years since I have seen another ‘normal’ person like myself--if these servants and Hun’Kui gentlemen will excuse the term. Yet I have not been alone. But rather than telling you, would it not be better to show you?”

The group exchanged uncertain looks as they started walking again, this time down a long corridor with the only light being at the end of it.

‘He’s not lying,’ said Garovel privately. ‘I’m sensing a lot of... souls on the other side of this tunnel.’

Hector noticed the reaper’s hesitation. ‘Why the pause?’

‘I just... well, they’re not quite “souls” in the traditional sense.’

‘There are traditional souls now?’ said Hector. ‘How complicated does this shit get, Garovel?’

‘That’s not what I mean. Just... geez, I can hardly believe what I’m sensing, right now. Maybe it really would be better to just to wait until he shows us.

‘Shows us what?’

‘Exactly.’

Hector had lost his ability to be surprised by Garovel’s intentional crypticity. He hadn’t lost his ability to be annoyed by it, though.

They soon reached the end of the corridor, but none of them were prepared for the view that awaited them.

Carver kept walking while everyone else stopped to gawk. Then he turned and gestured widely with both hands. “Welcome to Himmekel, the Paradise Vault.”

The very first thing that drew Hector’s eye was the sky-high lavafall. It wasn’t particularly wide, but it was so tall and so intensely bright that it became the main source of light for the area.

But not the only source of light. And that was the second thing Hector noticed: how many other, smaller lights there were. And what they were.

They were people.

The lights were people.

They glowed. Red and orange and yellow. Molten beings. Not unlike the golem he’d just seen.

Or, wait a minute, were these golems, too? They were the size of regular humans, but maybe that didn’t matter?

He needed some answers and so reached for the only question he could think of. ‘Garovel, what the fuck am I looking at?’

The reaper was slow to answer. ‘Hector,’ he said privately. ‘Meet the Hun’Sho. A branch of humanity that I thought went extinct a thousand years ago.’

Hector’s eyes widened. He had no idea what to say to that.

The group started inching forward with Zeff in the lead, and Hector just kind of mindlessly followed, still too dumbstruck to do much besides listen and observe.

"Now, I'm sure you all have many questions," said Carver, "but first, let me assure you that, whatever you've heard about their kind, these Hun'Sho here are very gracious, magnanimous, and welcoming. So long as you do no violence upon them, none will be done upon you. Trust me. I have been studying their ways for five years." Then he turned to the Hun'Kui specifically and began speaking Hunese, perhaps repeating himself in order to make sure they understood."

"1417

Hector couldn't take his eyes off the Hun'Sho. There must have been fifty of them, at least, all looking down at the group from various interconnected bridges above.

'Lava people,' he thought, still incredulous. 'There are fucking lava people...'

'Yup,' was all Garovel said.

'How do--?' He struggled for an appropriate question. 'I mean... how can they even EXIST? How can you have a body made out of fucking lava?!'

'Well, technically, their body isn't made of lava. The lava is a coating which they naturally secrete. Like clothes are to you. If your clothes were made out of your own sweat, drool, piss, and shit.'

'What.'

'It's much more hygienic when they do it, though. I know the thought is tempting, Hector, but don't cover yourself in your own excrement. You'll get someone sick.'

He was genuinely lost for words now.

Carver started talking to the group again. "Now, if you would please continue following me, I will show you to a place where you can all get some rest. I doubt I am the only one who is tired, yes?"

A few grumbles of acknowledgment was all he got in response, and they began walking again.

Carver led them down the central path, right into a waiting crowd of Hun'Sho, which parted for them as they got closer. Carver began speaking to them, perhaps trying to allay their concerns. The Hun'Sho were not shy about answering the man, but Hector had no idea what any of them were saying.

'Do you know their language, too?' Hector asked.

'Sure do,' said Garovel. 'Ancient Hunese. Quite a bit different from the Modern Hunese that I've been hearing the Hun'Kui speak.'

'What are they saying?'

'Well, they are expressing their confusion, for obvious reasons. There are a few comments about how weird you all look. Especially you. Wow, they're really curious about you in particular. Your armor has them a bit spooked, I think.'

Not too surprising, he supposed. 'They're not gonna attack us or anything, right?'

'Doesn't seem like it.'

As they continued, the street grew noticeably more polished and reflective, and so did their black-and-gray buildings, which Hector couldn't help ogling somewhat. What were they made of, he wondered? Obsidian, maybe? He didn't know much about volcanic rocks, but he was growing more interested in the subject by the second.

And that architecture. He recognized the horizontal window shapes from the ruined city they'd just come from. The doorways were different from what he was accustomed to seeing, as well. Double doors were everywhere, but instead of being rectangular, they formed elegant, half-moon shapes.

In fact, he didn't see any sharp edges, whatsoever. Every structure had a smoothed or rounded look to it, and combined with that omnipresent, marble-like polish, the entire settlement managed to achieve a kind of gentle glistening effect.

'Alright, Garovel, I'm ready for my next history lesson.'

The reaper laughed. 'Okay, um. Gee. Where do I begin?'

Hector had a notion. 'How about the names? Hun'Sho and Hun'Kui? It's not a coincidence that they sound similar, is it?'

'Ah. Yes, well. You are not wrong. Where the name Hun'Kui literally translates to "people of the ash," the name Hun'Sho literally translates to "people of the fire." And there is considerable history there.' The reaper spared a glance at the Hun'Kui in their party. 'Rather gruesome history, unfortunately.'

Hector caught the implication. 'Is that... going to a problem here?'

'Well, it was a thousand years ago, so I'd like to say no, but...'

'I should keep it in mind?'

'Wouldn't hurt.'

'What happened, exactly?'

'In short? The Hun'Kui were slaves. And the Hun'Sho were their masters.'

'Oh.'

'And the reason I thought the Hun'Sho had gone extinct, was because I thought the Hun'Kui had killed them all.'

'Oh...'

'The Hun'Sho did some pretty monstrous things. But they did some pretty incredible things, too. During their peak, they were the brains behind almost every major technological advancement in the Undercrust--and a few on the surface, as well.'

'Really? Like what?'

'Metallurgy was probably the biggest thing. The most famous blacksmiths on the surface only became such because of Hun'Sho knowledge.'

'Huh.'

'It was a bit unfair, really. If you had access to the Undercrust, you could probably gain a significant technological advantage over your adversaries. It might be the primary reason why holes that lead to the Undercrust are still largely kept a secret, even today. Historically speaking, they were priceless.'

Hector's mind went to the ardor-fueled weaponry that he'd seen so much of during his time in the Undercrust. Garovel's explanation was sounding pretty spot-on.

Carver stopped in front of a tall structure, one that looked somewhat dilapidated by comparison to those around it. Then he turned to the Hun'Kui and began speaking to them while motioning toward it.

'What's he saying?' Hector asked.

'...“I believe you will be most comfortable here. Apologies for its current state. It has been abandoned for a few years now, but there should be ample room for the four of you. Let me know if there is anything else you need.” Hmm.'

After that, the Hun'Kui and surface dwellers split up, and Hector wasn't sure why, until Carver led the rest of their group around a corner and down another street, where they arrived at a decidedly unique building. A dome.

Carver brought them inside, sealed the heavy door behind them, and began removing his climate suit.

The other two who were wearing suits looked rather reluctant to do the same, but Hector could feel the difference right away. He was suddenly freezing his ass off. The misty armor was doing far too good of a job in this place.

He had to tap the Lord Elroy on the shoulder. “Hey, Zeff, uh, you're turning me into a popsicle now...”

For a time, the Lord Elroy just looked at him."

"1419

“...Z-Zeff?” said Hector. His teeth had started chattering.

The man folded his arms and kept staring. “Warm yourself.”

Hector was confused. “What?”

“Warm yourself,” Zeff repeated. “Use temperature manipulation and warm yourself.”

Aw, shit. He had an inkling where this was going, but it was difficult to even think straight, and talking was even harder than usual. “But, uh-- your armor is way too s-strong. I c-can't--”

“Fine,” said Zeff, and he raised his arm.

The misty armor became suddenly lighter but didn't go away. Hector could still feel himself getting colder and number by the second.

“I've weakened it for you,” said Zeff. “Try now.”

Hector dropped to his knees, finding it difficult to maintain his balance.

He could hear people saying things. He could hear them in his head, too. Reaper's words. Shouted, maybe. But he couldn't actually listen to them, anymore. It was all just background noise.

Whole thoughts were escaping him now. What was happening? Freezing. Right. A way to neutralize servants. Probably gotten to his brain, then. That was why it was difficult to. To. To...?

Whatever.

Had to materialize. Not even sure why. Just had to be done. Something. Anything. For the head.

A helmet.

Hey, he could feel it. Warm metal. What a familiar sensation. Probably just room temperature, though. Warm only by comparison to how insanely cold he was.

Good but not good enough.

Annihilate and try again. Make it warm. How, though? Didn't matter. Couldn't think. Just make it warm. No, make it burn. Make it hurt.

Holy shit, pain. Something was definitely hurting. All around his... head? Yeah. His head.

But pain was good. Pain was not numb. Numb was bad.

Story of life, eh, Garovel?

Garovel?

Oh shit. Needed more pain. To bring everything back.

And there it was. More pain. More burning. More heat.

Hey, what was that? Hissing? Oh, the sound of steam. He could hear again. It was working. It was working so well that he could smell burning flesh.

Oh, wait.

Hector spasmed back into control of his faculties. He was on the floor, and his face was melting.

Wow, this was painful. Not so much because it hurt any worse than the sort of pain that he'd felt previously and often. Rather, it was extra painful just because it was sustained. It hurt sharply and kept hurting sharply. No diminishing so that he could catch his breath or rethink his life choices.

Just a continual, searing pain.

He was still thinking, though, he realized. Despite being able to feel it. What was this, anyway?

It was like he had a spare compartment in his mind, just for appreciating how awful things were, right now.

Shouldn't he be doing something with this knowledge?

Oh, good, he was already screaming in agony. How long had that been going on for? He should probably do something else now.

Hector dematerialized the red hot iron from around his head. Cool relief immediately washed over his face--so immediately, in fact, that it hurt in its own, new way, and he couldn't stop his whole body from shaking.

'--ector?! Hector!'

'Ah, hey, Garovel,' said Hector, perhaps calmer than he should've."
"1420

‘Are--are you okay?’ said Garovel, sounding surprised. The reaper was on the other side of an icy dome.

‘Of course I’m okay,’ said Hector. ‘I’m undead.’ He said that, but the right side of his face still felt like it was on fire. Not quite as on fire as it had been a moment ago, but still on fire nonetheless.

‘I--well, I know that, Hector. I just meant...’ The reaper growled and looked at Zeff. ‘Would you please get rid of this ice, now?’

The icy dome vanished into nothingness, and Garovel reached for Hector’s shoulder.

The young man recoiled away from the reaper’s grasp. “I’m fine,” he said.

‘Are you serious? That looks like it hurts A LOT.’

It did. Sweet goddess, it did. But that was kinda the point.

“I’ve had worse,” said Hector. He looked over at Zeff, who seemed to be in the middle of a silent argument with Axiolis.

‘Hector, c’mon. Let me numb the pain for you. That burn looks awful.’

“Just the regen, then. Don’t numb the pain.”

‘Hector...’

“It’s fine, Garovel. The pain will just come back later, anyway. I can deal with it right now.”

The reaper still looked reluctant but said, ‘If you say so.’

He was still shaking, Hector realized. His head was fine, more or less, but the rest of his body was still pretty damn cold, even with the misty armor gone.

He could probably fix that now.

Hector clapped a fresh suit of iron armor around himself. Sure enough, it was as warm as he’d intended it to be.

Well, maybe this was a little warmer than he’d wanted. Okay, it was kinda too hot, actually.

He nailed it on the second try.

That was better. Nice and toasty. Like a cozy metal blanket. That didn't make much sense, he supposed. Iron was not at all soft, much less cozy. Yet that was still an accurate representation of how he felt. Somehow, his iron seemed more like his than ever before.

It was a familiar and altogether welcome sensation, wearing his own armor again. He planned to leave it on, even after his body warmed up completely.

Zeff finally looked over at him, and Hector was ready to meet the Lord Elroy's stern gaze through the visor of his iron helmet.

"I will not make that armor for you again," said Zeff. "From now on, protect yourself from the heat of the Undercrust."

'Are you fucking kidding?' said Garovel. 'You're really not going to apologize for what you just did?'

"He doesn't need to," said Hector. "Zeff was just trying to give me the push I needed. And it worked, didn't it?"

'Bullshit. That was way out of line.'

Zeff snorted. "You expect your enemies to be more considerate than I?" He glared at the young man harder than he ever had before. "Do you even realize how many people look up to you now? All of my kin. They don't see your weakness. They think they can depend on you."

Hector just listened."

"1421

"What a joke," Zeff went on. "My kin all look at you and think that you can handle the same level of responsibility as I. Or Asad. Or Dimas or Salvador or Melchor. They look at you and see our equal. Hell, they may even see our superior!"

Hector frowned but kept his expression otherwise steady. Zeff was just spouting nonsense now, Hector felt. Surely, none of the other Rainlords actually believed that.

The Lord Elroy turned and began walking away. "Grow or die, Hector."

Axiolis lingered.

Hector thought the reaper might apologize on the servant's behalf, as he'd seen other reapers do several times in the past, but Axiolis surprised him.

The reaper only observed him in silence for a moment longer before following Zeff.

Well, that was fine. Hector didn't really think Zeff had done anything to apologize for, anyway.

Garovel seemed to feel differently, however. 'What an ungrateful piece of shit,' he said in the echo of privacy.

'Garovel...'

'What? You're gonna defend that guy's behavior?'

Hector sighed. Right now, he really just wanted to go catch up to everyone else. He was still standing here in the entryway like a jackass while they were all off exploring the facilities and probably asking Carver all sorts of interesting questions.

As he finally started to progress deeper into the building, he found himself wondering if any of the others had witnessed any part of that incident just now. He hoped not. That would be pretty humiliating.

'But y'know,' said Garovel, 'the more I think about it, the more I find that man's behavior hilarious.'

'What?'

'Weren't you listening to what he said? He feels THREATENED by you, Hector. Maybe even jealous.'

'THAT was your interpretation? Garovel, you couldn't be more wrong.'

'Psh. Of course you'd say that. Let me guess. You think he's just trying to be a good teacher or whatever.'

'...Yeah, maybe I do think that.'

'You're too nice for your own good, Hector.'

'And you're too patronizing for everyone else's good.'

‘Really? You’re gonna insult ME now? I’m on your side, you prick.’

‘So is Zeff. We’d both be worm food by now if it wasn’t for him.’

‘Ugh.’ The reaper sounded genuinely disgusted.

The next room over had multiple new doors to try, and Hector decided to go through the one on his right before Garovel had a chance to continue that conversation.

Now there was a sight he hadn’t seen in a while.

Plants. A whole lot of them, too. The chamber extended much farther than he’d expected, and the entire thing was filled.

Hector blinked when he realized. ‘These are the plants from the surface that you were sensing earlier.’

Garovel floated among two rows of fully grown apple trees. ‘Yeah,’ was all he said.

Hector was more than ready for the new subject, however. ‘How do they grow so far underground like this?’

The reaper pointed at the lamps in the rather low ceiling. ‘Artificial sunlight. It’s impressive technology. I’ve never seen results as good as this.’”

"1422

Hector struggled for another plant-related question, wanting to keep up the conversational momentum, but no further ideas were coming to him besides just being amazed by all the fruits and vegetables.

Dammit, weren’t there a bunch of other questions that he’d wanted to ask Garovel just a little while ago? There absolutely were. What the hell were they?

Hold on.

Garovel was being suspiciously quiet all of a sudden, Hector felt.

“...Something wrong?” Hector asked aloud since it was just the two of them.

The reaper did not answer him, only floated slowly through a cluster of green corn stalks.

“Garovel? Are you... are you sulking over what happened? I thought you’d just keep complaining, not get all weird on me.”

‘What? Oh, no, that’s not it. Sure, Zeff acted like a horse’s ass, but if you don’t care, then I don’t care. I’m over that already.’

“Oh,” said Hector, a bit taken aback, because it didn’t sound like the reaper was being sarcastic. “Well, uh... Really? I mean, I wouldn’t mind if you were still a little not over it.”

Garovel floated closer and kept his voice private. ‘Hector, um. Before we rejoin the others, there’s something we should discuss. And I’m sorry if this seems like it’s coming out of nowhere.’

Hector took the hint to stop talking aloud. ‘...What is it?’

‘Remember the Sosho’Diyu? That treasure everyone was going on about back in Babbadelo?’

‘Of course.’

‘There is an almost one hundred percent chance that it is somewhere here in Himmekel.’

Hector paused to acknowledge that thought. ‘That... would make sense, I guess.’

‘And also... I need to tell you about one of the oldest mysteries in the history of the planet.’

Hector blinked. ‘Uh. Okay?’

‘It’s most commonly referred to as Rathmore’s Materials.’

‘Oh, yeah. I wanted to ask about that before, but there wasn’t time. Why does the name “Rathmore” sound so familiar?’

‘Do you remember Rathmore’s Gate?’

‘Uh...’

‘Where you, Roman, Harper, and the Queen fought Abolish back in

Atreya?’

‘Oh! Yeah, it was a rock formation! Rathmore’s Gate.’ Hector tilted his head as he tried to remember in greater detail. ‘Come to think of it... YOU were the one who first mentioned it, weren’t you? You asked if Voreese knew of it so that we could regroup there.’

‘Good memory. Do you happen to remember anything else about that particular rock formation?’

‘Um... no, should I?’

‘I suppose not. Curious as you are, I remember waiting for you to ask me more about it, but you never did.’

‘Why would I have asked you more about some seemingly random rock formation?’

‘You didn’t notice? Ah, I guess you were pretty busy at the time, weren’t you?’

‘Notice what?’

‘That, despite how brutal and devastating to the local environment that battle was, Rathmore’s Gate was still standing after it was over.’”
"1423

Hector’s brow lowered as he tried to recall what Garovel was talking about. The only other thing he remembered about Rathmore’s Gate was smashing into it after taking a hit from Harper.

But Garovel was right. That was strange, wasn’t it? With as hard as he’d hit the damn thing, it hadn’t so much as cracked.

‘So what are you saying?’ said Hector. ‘I mean, it’s weird ‘n all, but what’s the big mystery about, exactly?’

‘You see, Rathmore was one of the most famous integrators in history. Or infamous, depending on who you talk to. And one of the reasons he became so well-known was because of his “Materials.” Which was actually a bit of a con job on his part.’

‘Con job?’

‘Rathmore’s Gate. Rathmore’s Flame. Rathmore’s Looking Glass. Rathmore’s Knife. Rathmore’s Light. And so on and so forth. He named all of these monuments after himself because of all the weird shit he did to them--like infusing a molten rock golem into one of them, apparently. But the fact of the matter was, all of those monuments existed BEFORE him. He just modified them.’

‘So... they used to just be normal monuments?’

‘No, see, that’s the point. They weren’t normal at all. Rathmore was only able to modify them the way he did because they were already abnormal.’

‘Abnormal in what way?’

‘They were indestructible by any known method.’

Hector cocked an eyebrow beneath his helmet. ‘If they were indestructible, then how was he able to modify them at all?’

The reaper shrugged. ‘I didn’t say it wasn’t impressive, what he did. I just wanted to make it clear that his so-called Materials were never really HIS to begin with. That was the con job, in my opinion.’

‘Hmm. So where’d all these indestructible monuments come from, then?’

‘That’s the big mystery. Nobody is quite sure.’

‘Seriously? Does that mean they’re even older than you are?’

‘As far as I am aware, they pre-date the existence of reapers entirely.’

‘Whoa. By how much, exactly?’

‘Dunno.’

Hector’s eyes widened as he thought more about it. So that was why Garovel had called it one of the oldest mysteries in the history of Eleg. ‘Why didn’t you ever tell me about this before?’

‘Didn’t come up.’

‘We were literally AT Rathmore’s Gate! You didn’t think I’d be interested in its history?!’

‘Well... okay, I’m sort of... lying a little bit, actually.’

Hector’s brow lowered again. ‘Excuse me?’

‘Sorry. It’s a force of habit when it comes to this subject, I suppose. See, this mystery... Rathmore’s Materials... well, it’s something that I’ve been keeping to myself for a very long time now.’

‘What do you mean? Keeping it to yourself? You just said it’s one of the oldest mysteries in the world.’

‘Yeah...’

‘What, were you lying about that, too?’

‘No, no. That was the truth. What I’m saying is... despite its incredible age, there are very few people who know of it. And I kinda prefer it that way, Hector.’

‘Oh...’

"1424

‘This is what I need you to understand,’ said Garovel. ‘This mystery... this is something that I have discreetly been trying to solve for around two millennia now. So it’s rather important to me that you not tell anyone else about it.’

‘O-okay...’

‘I’m serious, Hector. Not anyone. Not Roman. Not Lynn. Not the Queen. Not even Ramira giving you puppy dog eyes.’

‘Aha... yeah, I get it. I won’t mention Rathmore to anyone. But, uh... you still haven’t explained WHY you want to keep it a secret. Is this knowledge somehow dangerous?’

‘Of course it is. Rathmore’s Materials have all sorts of absurd powers that even I still don’t know about. If other people start studying them or otherwise trying to unlock their secrets... well, that’s the sort of thing that entire nations go to war over.’

‘I see...’

‘But it’s not just about preventing war for me, either. I’ll admit that a part of me is still hoping to harness their power for myself, one day. Or for yourself, that is.’

Hector wasn’t sure how to respond to that. As ridiculous as it sounded, he could still understand the basic sentiment. The desire for power. For strength. He’d been feeling it more and more, lately, for obvious reasons.

He did come up with a question, though. ‘You say you want to keep all this stuff a secret, but wasn’t Axiolis the one who recognized Rathmore’s Flame? And doesn’t that mean he already knows about it?’

‘Not necessarily. Lots of people know the name Rathmore and nothing else. The name has become famous even among non-servants. All the monuments saw to that.’ Garovel allowed a beat to pass. ‘But yeah, it’s totally possible that Axiolis knows more about it than he let on. We should be careful around him.’

‘Garovel, you’re starting to sound really paranoid. I thought you liked Axiolis.’

‘I do. He’s great. But hiding beneath that greatness could be the cold, black heart of a treacherous bastard.’

‘Wow.’

‘I’m not kidding, Hector. That’s how reapers are. We’re lying, power hungry, duplicitous sons of bitches. And we’re good at hiding it, too.’

‘...I’ll have to take your word on that one.’ Hector scratched his head and looked over all the plants another time. ‘Can we rejoin the others now? I want to see the rest of this place.’

‘There’s still more I should tell you, but fine. That was all of the most important stuff, I think.’

They left the verdure behind, and Hector let Garovel lead the way back to everyone. En route, however, another question occurred to Hector and began getting the better of him.

‘...Hey, what about Rathmore? If he was such a big deal, then what happened to him?’

‘The Vanguard happened to him.’

‘They killed him?’

‘Yeah. He was a nice enough guy when he was younger, but he became more and more of an asshole as he got older. Provoked a few wars. Ethnic cleansings. Human experimentation.’

‘Wait, did you... know him personally?’

"1425

‘...As a matter of fact, I did,’ said Garovel.

Hector waited for Garovel to elaborate, but when it seemed like that wasn’t going to happen, he decided to ask the pressing question.

‘...Was he your servant?’

‘No. But he was the servant of a good friend of mine. A good friend who also went mad and died with him.’

‘Holy shit, Garovel. I’m so sorry that, uh... I mean, I’m sorry that you went through that.’

‘Yeah...’

And Hector was abruptly reminded of just how old Garovel really was, how much the reaper must have seen and experienced and endured. It was sometimes all too easy to forget that. Hector got the sense that Garovel preferred it that way, even now, with how little emotion the reaper was showing.

‘Sometimes, people just go crazy, Hector. Even normal, everyday people. And in our line of work? Reapers and servants? All the madness that we see? It’s more common than most of us care to think about.’

Was it really that simple, Hector wondered? Could people really just snap? For no reason at all? Hector wasn’t sure he believed that. But Garovel was speaking from experience, and Hector didn’t have much cause to challenge him on it. Not right now, anyway. Maybe some other time, he would.

At length, they encountered Carver again, sitting alone in some sort of small drawing room. He stood when he noticed them.

“Ah, I was worried you might have gotten lost.” He craned his neck as if confused. “You are the same armored gentleman from earlier, no?”

Oh, right. He must have looked completely different in his iron armor now. “Yes.”

“I have already showed the others to their rooms. Please allow me to do the same for you.”

“Thank you...”

Carver took two big steps to his right and motioned toward the door there. “Aaand I’m done! Your room’s right here! Aha! Hope that walk wasn’t too exhausting for you!”

The man seemed to be fishing for a laugh, so Hector tried to give him one.

Carver cleared his throat. “Sorry. That was funnier in my head.”

Hector followed him through the door, still dragging his iron box of gun parts along. Thankfully, there was just enough space for it in the corner by the bed. He finally sat down with a sigh of relief and wondered what kind of material this weird, rubbery mattress was made from. The clamor of his armor was also rather loud in this confined space, but he didn’t quite feel like removing it yet.

Then he noticed that Carver was lingering in the open doorway, observing him.

Hector racked his brain, worrying that he’d forgotten some sort of important courtesy. “...I appreciate your hospitality,” he tried.

“Oh, think nothing of it,” said Carver.

And that was all he said.

And he still did not leave.

And everything became abruptly awkward.

“...Was there something else?” said Hector.”

"1426

Carver chewed on his upper lip for a second. "Look, um... Lord Darksteel, was it? That's, ah, what the others said your name was when I asked."

"You can just call me Hector."

"Ah. Okay. Splendid. But, ah, as I was saying... um..."

This guy was suddenly almost as bad with words as he was, Hector felt. "...Y-yes?"

"L-look, I'm just gonna level with you, Hector. I've been starved for normal human interaction for YEARS now. S-so, I'd like to go ahead and apologize ahead of time, in case anything I say or do comes across as really weird or... o-or... perhaps... clingy."

'Garovel, what is happening right now?'

'I don't know, but I'm enjoying it.'

Carver wasn't done. "The thing is, with the rest of your group, um... I think I've already poisoned the well in that regard, if you know what I mean."

Hector did not.

Carver sighed. "I'm sure they think I'm super weird now..."

'Hector...'

'What?'

'Console him or something!'

'How?!'

'Tell him he's wrong!'

"I, uh... I'm sure they don't think you're that weird, Mr. Carver."

"Thanks, but you weren't there. You didn't see what I did."

"...What did you do?"

Carver hesitated. He glanced back through the doorway, as if to check if anyone else was listening. Either that, or he was considering running away. "I told everyone... um... you see, I told them... that... I... loved... them."

Hector took a breath in order to respond, but his brain didn't have anything for him. And neither did Garovel, it seemed.

"Look, it just kinda slipped out, okay?! I used to think I was a loner-type, but my god! This is just ridiculous! I haven't seen another normal human being in I-don't-know-how-long! This place is a barren wasteland when it comes to satisfying social interaction!"

"I thought you said you liked it here," said Hector. "Educational or whatever."

"I do like it here! And the Hun'Sho are fascinating! But--! They're also just--! Agh...!"

"...Are they not very good company?"

"No! I mean, they're great! They're wonderful! So kind and considerate! You won't find anyone more courteous and polite!"

Hector heard a "but" coming and waited.

"...But they're so stuffy! Ugh! You have no idea! And they're kinda weirdly arrogant, too. They're not really human as you and I understand the term. Half the time, they treat me like I'm some kind of pet. They've taken such good care of me that I don't wish to complain, but... agh..."

Hector felt bad for the guy, but this was also new information. He couldn't help being curious. "Uh... what else can you tell me about the Hun'Sho here?"

Carver perked up a little. "Well. Just about anything you want me to tell you, I suppose. What would you like to know?"

Hector glanced at Garovel. 'Ideas?'

'Ask him how long they've been down here.'

Hector did so.

"About twelve hundred years, if what they've told me is true," said Carver."

"1427

‘Sounds about right, I guess,’ said Garovel. ‘Ask him if any of them ever leave this settlement.’

“Do any of the Hun’Sho ever leave this place?” said Hector.

“No, they do not,” said Carver. “They are generally quite fearful of venturing outside the Vault. As am I, of course, but that is mainly because of the feldeath and the golem. And all those worms, too, I suppose. And the possibility of earthquakes and falling rocks. And the notion that my lamp might die on me, stranding me in the darkness with basically no hope of making it back here safely.”

“...And the Hun’Sho aren’t afraid of those things?”

“Not all of those things, no. And certainly not as much as me. Because, well, they are somewhat immortal.”

That was news to Hector. “Excuse me? What does that mean?”

“They do not age.”

“...Huh.” Hector glanced at Garovel, who gave an affirming nod.

Carver raised an eyebrow. “You seem far less surprised than I was when I first found that out. In fact, I am still not quite sure that I believe it. It is true that I have not seen any Hun’Sho show signs of aging, but I have only been here for five years, and perhaps that is simply not long enough.”

Hector supposed he didn’t have much room to be too shocked by that particular revelation, given his own status as a servant.

It still felt really weird when he thought about it like that. Immortality.

Better to just not think about it that way then, he decided.

‘Ask him how the hell he ended up in this place to begin with.’

‘Didn’t he say he was part of an exploration team or something?’

‘Yeah, but ask for details.’

“...So, uh. How did you end up down here all by yourself, again?”

"I was part of an expedition that went horribly awry, essentially. Not so unlike you and your friends, actually. Diego described some of the details of your misfortune for me. What charisma, that guy. I have to admit, I'm envious of him. I really hope I can be friends with him. He was so nice, even after I made a fool of myself and started acting like a blustering idiot. If I had those kinds of social skills, why, my whole life would have gone so much more smoothly. Maybe I could have even convinced Janice Greenwood to go out on a date with me back when we were--"

Hector kind of stopped listening. 'Garovel, this guy is all over the place...'

'Can you blame him? Think about it. Sure, he said all that stuff earlier about scholarly work and studying the Hun'Sho, but you have to remember, he's also been stuck in a hole of molten death with a bunch of fiery weirdos for the past five years.'

Not an inaccurate summation, Hector supposed.

'Honestly, I feel bad for the guy,' said Garovel. 'And I'd find it suspicious if he didn't seem at least a little crazy by now.'
"1428 -- CLIII.

Carver was still going. "--and then, we could go to an amusement park and get ice cream and go on a roller coaster ride. I'd probably vomit, but it'd be okay, because of the recently-eaten ice cream, see? That's a trick my uncle taught me when I was a kid. Good god of fire, I miss processed sweets like that. I wonder if there've been any big technological breakthroughs with sweets and other foods from the surface. I feel like there must have been. The world is so full of--"

"I'm sorry." Hector held up a gauntleted hand. "Could you, ah, go back to telling me about your expedition?"

"Oh, um. Certainly. What would you like to know about it?"

"Mainly... I'm curious about your companions. They must have been strong to make it all the way here, right?"

Carver's expression tightened somewhat. "Yes, I suppose they were."

Hector merely waited for elaboration, which was slow to arrive.

“...They were like yourself. Servants of reapers. Very reliable as bodyguards, certainly, but I’ve known them since I was just a sprightly Melmoorian lad. Ettol, in particular, has always been like an uncle to me. So strong, yet so persuasive, too. I swear, he could convince a pack of hungry wolves to play fetch with him, if he wanted. Why, there was this one time when I was twelve--”

‘Ettol?’ said Garovel.

‘You know of him?’

‘No. But that name is peculiar.’

‘How so?’

‘In Ancient Melmoorian folklore, Ettol is a kind of trickster deity. The God of Impulse. It’s not a normal name that someone would give their kid--or even a name that many people would recognize in this day and age.’

‘...So you’re saying this guy’s uncle is some kind of ancient god?’

‘No, Hector,’ the reaper laughed. ‘I’m saying it’s probably an alias. Or Carver is lying to us. That’s always a possibility.’

‘Or it’s an ancient god.’

‘I highly doubt that.’

‘Look, Garovel, I just found out that lava people exist. I’m open to the possibility of ancient gods existing, and I think you should be, too.’

‘Okay, Hector. Whatever you say.’

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Three: ‘Countenance in greed and fury...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Two days transpired as the group tried in vain to work out their next move. According to the reapers, the titanic battle above Himmekel had not ceased, and according to the various Hun’Sho they spoke to, it would not be ceasing any time soon, either.

“Enkir and Dunikei have been locked in a stalemate for generations,” a Hun’Sho by the name of Torveis had told them.

Hector had been surprised that any of the Hun’Sho could speak Mohssian at all, much less modern Mohssian, but all was explained when Carver revealed that he had taught them several of the surface world’s languages.

“It may be many years before they decide to take another break,” Torveis had said. “The worms are a more recent threat, though I imagine they may prove an even bigger obstacle if you all wish to leave Himmekel soon.””

”1428 -- CLIII.

Carver was still going. “--and then, we could go to an amusement park and get ice cream and go on a roller coaster ride. I’d probably vomit, but it’d be okay, because of the recently-eaten ice cream, see? That’s a trick my uncle taught me when I was a kid. Good god of fire, I miss processed sweets like that. I wonder if there’ve been any big technological breakthroughs with sweets and other foods from the surface. I feel like there must have been. The world is so full of--”

“I’m sorry.” Hector held up a gauntleted hand. “Could you, ah, go back to telling me about your expedition?”

“Oh, um. Certainly. What would you like to know about it?”

“Mainly... I’m curious about your companions. They must have been strong to make it all the way here, right?”

Carver’s expression tightened somewhat. “Yes, I suppose they were.”

Hector merely waited for elaboration, which was slow to arrive.

“...They were like yourself. Servants of reapers. Very reliable as bodyguards, certainly, but I’ve known them since I was just a sprightly Melmoorian lad. Ettol, in particular, has always been like an uncle to me. So strong, yet so persuasive, too. I swear, he could convince a pack of hungry wolves to play fetch with him, if he wanted. Why, there was this one time when I was twelve--”

‘Ettol?’ said Garovel.

‘You know of him?’

‘No. But that name is peculiar.’

‘How so?’

‘In Ancient Melmoorian folklore, Ettol is a kind of trickster deity. The God of Impulse. It’s not a normal name that someone would give their kid--or even a name that many people would recognize in this day and age.’

‘...So you’re saying this guy’s uncle is some kind of ancient god?’

‘No, Hector,’ the reaper laughed. ‘I’m saying it’s probably an alias. Or Carver is lying to us. That’s always a possibility.’

‘Or it’s an ancient god.’

‘I highly doubt that.’

‘Look, Garovel, I just found out that lava people exist. I’m open to the possibility of ancient gods existing, and I think you should be, too.’

‘Okay, Hector. Whatever you say.’

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Three: ‘Countenance in greed and fury...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Two days transpired as the group tried in vain to work out their next move. According to the reapers, the titanic battle above Himmekel had not ceased, and according to the various Hun’Sho they spoke to, it would not be ceasing any time soon, either.

“Enkir and Dunikei have been locked in a stalemate for generations,” a Hun’Sho by the name of Torveis had told them.

Hector had been surprised that any of the Hun’Sho could speak Mohssian at all, much less modern Mohssian, but all was explained when Carver revealed that he had taught them several of the surface world’s languages.

“It may be many years before they decide to take another break,” Torveis had said. “The worms are a more recent threat, though I imagine they may prove an even bigger obstacle if you all wish to leave Himmekel soon.'"

"1429

Without any clear objective or direction, everyone in the group spent most of their time mingling among the Hun'Sho. The four reapers practically insisted on it, though their servants didn't require much convincing, save perhaps Zeff.

Unsurprisingly, the Lord Elroy seemed the most anxious to leave and expressed little interest in the Hun'Sho or Himmekel or even the Sosho'Diyu.

That last one was almost certainly what was on everyone else's mind the most, Hector felt. They all seemed convinced that it was here, somewhere, which made him rather dubious about the sincerity of their attempts to "learn about Hun'Sho culture," as Diego Redwater had put it. Without a doubt, that man seemed the most determined to stay, though Hector did notice the Hun'Kui behaving somewhat similarly. In particular, it was in the way they followed Diego around. They probably figured that if anyone was going to find it, it would be him.

But still. As unsavory as Hector found their behavior, he knew that he was not so different himself. When he thought about what he might be able to do with such an apparently valuable treasure... When he thought about Warrenhold and all the money it would need... not to mention all the people who would be staying there...

Assuming it really was money. He'd been starting to wonder what really qualified as treasure. There were certainly other things in this world that could be considered far more valuable than gold or gems or whatever. He was carrying one such item already, he knew. And he hadn't forgotten all those weird names that reapers had rattled off not so long ago.

Garovel, at least, seemed certain that the treasure was something along those lines.

'Do you have any specific theories about what it could be?' Hector had asked him.

'One or two, maybe,' Garovel had said. 'But I'm not prepared to share them yet.'

'Why not? You're always trying to tell me about your dumb theories.'

'Hey. You're hurting my feelings.'

'If I apologize, will you tell me?'

'Maybe.'

'Then maybe I'm sorry.'

'Sheesh. I'm thinking that the treasure might have something to do with Rathmore. Since his Flame is so near, then it would stand to reason.'

'That doesn't tell me much, Garovel. Or anything, really.'

'Yeah, well, I don't want to make a specific prediction and then turn out to be completely wrong later.'

'Oh, come on. I don't care if you're wrong.'

'Yeah, but I do. I hate being wrong.'

'Believe me, I've noticed.'

'Oh, shut up and go back to your meditation or practice or whatever you're doing over there by yourself.'

With everyone else on the job, Hector didn't feel the need to socialize with the Hun'Sho as much. He did, however, feel the need to keep up with his training, especially now that he could use temperature manipulation."

"s and Whatnot

Couple important announcements for you.

First, I've been posting two new pages to my Patreon page every day for the last few weeks. And because of that, I've been able to build up a very helpful backlog of new pages compared to the main site here. Currently, that backlog consists of 23 extra pages, and it will continue to grow. If you'd like to get these pages early, the price is one dollar per month. If not, however, I completely understand. I don't like to spend money, either. Which brings me to my second announcement.

Here on the main site, I'm going to post an extra page every Monday. One at midnight and one at noon. I figured that everyone seems to dislike Mondays, so I should do something to make them better, if possible. I'll call them Double Mondays, 'cuz that sounds catchy. In time, as I continue to build up my backlog, I plan to start throwing out more free extra pages, but we'll see.

Oh, and super secret third announcement: expect some extra pages on Christmas Day.

Anyway, thanks for not giving up on me, everyone. Your support means the world to me. In fact, if I had a choice between the world or your support, I'd choose your support. Yeah, that's right. I'd blow up the Earth. For the sake of my readers or something. I'd like to see some other writers compete with that shit."

"1430

Just being outside of Carver's biosphere afforded Hector ample opportunity for practice. Zeff had not been kidding when he said that he wouldn't be making armor for him anymore, so that was what Hector had been doing for himself: creating freezing cold iron armor.

Over and over and over again.

It tended to heat up pretty damn quickly, so he constantly had to annihilate and remake it. At first, he struggled just to make it not crack and shatter immediately. That was a thing, apparently. These sorts of extreme temperature differences caused instantaneous and even explosive structural damage to his iron.

Garovel had been more than happy to explain that lovely little aspect of thermodynamics after Hector nearly tore his own head off.

In time, though, he managed to stabilize his work. Adding his soul to his iron helped, though not by much. Really, his most significant breakthrough was simply deciding to give his armor layers. The outermost layer was the hottest and therefore least likely to crack or break under the Undercrust's heat, while the inner layers were progressively colder, providing degrees of both insulation and structural support.

It worked surprisingly well, even if it was a bit bulky. Whenever he started feeling too warm, he simply annihilated the outermost layer and then added a new innermost layer. This way, he could maintain a relatively cool temperature around himself at all times, rather than having to deal with sudden flashes of flesh-melting heat and bone-chilling cold like he'd been doing in the beginning.

He ended up quite pleased with the result, but his new armor also had a secondary effect which he did not expect.

It made him more approachable.

He still had streaks of steam rising off of his armor--a fact which he found quite interesting--but it was nothing like it was before. To the Hun'Kui, Zeff's misting armor must have made him look like a walking cloud of freezing death, whereas this armor looked much more solid and humanoid.

Eventually, one of the Hun'Kui decided to come talk to him while he was trying to meditate in front of Himmekel's massive lavafall.

Unfortunately, the Hun'Kui man was speaking Hunese, and Garovel was off somewhere with Diego.

He thought he heard the word "Senmurai" again, but that was about all he caught. He tried to explain that he didn't understand, and eventually, it seemed to sink in. The Hun'Kui nodded furiously and left him alone again, but he occasionally still spotted one or two of them watching him from afar.

It was a bit unsettling, but he figured they didn't mean any harm.

He tried to focus on his meditation. It was more difficult than it had ever been, since he had to constantly maintain his armor, but he enjoyed the added challenge, even if he didn't see much in the way of success. It was like trying to achieve a new level of concentration. Clearing his mind of all obfuscating thoughts, while at the same time materializing new layers of his armor at regular intervals.

He felt like it was possible. He just had to keep trying."

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

Toward the end of the first day of training, however, there had been another important interruption. He hadn't recognized what it was, at first, as he'd nearly forgotten what this strange, pulsing sensation meant. As soon as he remembered that it was the Shard calling out to him, he scrambled to find it among his scant belongings.

He'd decided to stow it among the spare clothes that he was borrowing from Carver, since the climate-controlled environment of the dome was probably safer than carrying it around everywhere. On the one hand, he didn't really think that the Undercrust's heat would melt one of the Shards created by Rasalased, but on the other, he doubted the heat would be good for it, either. And he did recall Qorvass mentioning that there used to be a lot more Shards, suggesting that they were, in fact, not indestructible.

As soon as he had the Shard in hand again, he reached out with his mind. 'Emiliana?'

'...Yes, I am here.'

He had about a thousand questions for sure, but just hearing her response was a relief in itself. At least now he'd be able to tell Zeff something about how she was doing. Maybe that would be enough to make the man stop looking at him like he wanted to choke him.

'Hector, before I say anything further... please, you mustn't tell my father that I am contacting you.'

Well, shit.

'It is not that I want him to worry. It is just that... I...'

Hector more or less got the picture. 'You're worried FOR him.'

'Yes...'

He rubbed his forehead as he sat down on the edge of his bed. 'Look, uh... I have to tell him that you're okay, at least. Whatever else is going on with you right now, he deserves to know that much, doesn't he?'

'...He deserves much more than that. But he... well, you...' She paused for a sigh. 'You are still with him, are you not?'

'Yeah.'

'How is he?'

'...Better than I would be, if I were in his shoes.'

'...A non-answer.'

Hector took a curt breath. 'He's... persevering.'

'So, then... you think that if you were to tell him that I do not wish him to know where I am, he would take that news well?'

Abso-fucking-lutely not. But from her tone, the question sounded rhetorical, so Hector decided not to answer it directly. Instead, he chose to take a different approach. 'However he takes it, it's not really your problem, is it?'

'...Excuse me?'

'I mean... even if he gets super pissed off, his reaction will be MY problem to deal with, not yours. Because he won't know where to find you unless you tell us.'

There came a rather long pause. 'I suppose you have a point. I had not thought of it that way.'

'So you don't mind if I tell him you're okay?'

More silence."

"1432

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

A terrible thought occurred to Hector. 'You ARE okay, aren't you?'

'Yes, I am fine. Gohvis is not mistreating me, if that is what you are implying.'

'You're sure? You can tell me. I won't...' He won't what? He won't tell Zeff? Ugh. This whole situation was quickly becoming a conversational nightmare, Hector felt.

‘I am sure,’ said Emiliana. ‘Gohvis may not be... well, I do not know what to think of him. He has not harmed me nor Chergoa, however, nor do I get the impression that he intends to.’

Good news, certainly, but it still left Hector with the million tra question. ‘Why did he kidnap you, then? He even went against his own allies.’

‘He wants to study my mutation ability. Even I do not quite understand. He has yet to fully explain himself. I’m not sure he ever will, either.’

‘Huh...’

‘But none of this is why I wished to talk to you right now.’

He took a long breath, as if to prepare himself for whatever crazy new shit she was about to tell him. ‘O-okay. I’m listening.’

‘I want you to... ask me questions about various subjects.’

Not nearly as crazy as he’d been expecting. Way more confusing, though. ‘I don’t follow.’

‘Agh...’ She broke for another small sigh. ‘How do I explain without giving too much away...?’

Hector was lost as he waited in silence.

‘Let’s just say... that for the foreseeable future, it appears as though I will have considerable free time on my hands. Free time which I will be using... in order to conduct various types of research.’

‘Uh...?’

‘So... I was thinking that I would prefer to focus my research into things which might be beneficial to you and my father and everyone else.’

Hector’s brow lowered as he processed what she had told him.

‘Do you understand?’ she asked.

‘I... think so.’ So in other words, Hector gathered, wherever she was, she had easy access to a large amount of information. Like some kind of Abolish database? He supposed that would make a certain degree of sense, given Gohvis’ status.

‘So ask me something,’ she said. ‘It does not matter how old the information you're looking for is. There is a good chance I'll be able to find something about it.'

'H-hold on,' said Hector. 'Isn't this incredibly dangerous? What if someone catches you?'

'Oh. No. It's not like that. I do not have to hide my research. In fact, Gohvis is... encouraging me to pursue whatever interests me.'

What the hell? Hector would've liked to ask more about that, but he felt as though she would recoil from the conversation entirely if he started trying to figure out what she was clearly intending to keep secret from him and her father.

That didn't mean he wouldn't still try, though. It just meant that he didn't want her to realize he was doing that."

"1433

But trying to suss out her secret could wait, he supposed. Right now, it sounded like she was just trying to be helpful however she could, and considering his own circumstances, he could probably use a little help. 'Uh... okay, but I'm still not sure what sort of questions you want me to ask,' he said.

'Just. Anything that you think might be useful. About science. Or history. It could be almost any subject, I think.'

Hector wondered if Zeff would approve of this, but he also didn't see any point in turning the offer down. And hell, maybe she would be able to find something that would help them get out of this place. Or... find the treasure?

Wouldn't that be nice. And way too good to be true.

Regardless, he tried to think of a question that would be relevant to their most immediate problems.

'...I don't suppose you could tell me anything about worms, could you?'

'Worms?' said Emiliana.

Oh right, she probably thought he was talking about normal, tiny worms on the surface.

‘Do you mean worms from the Undercrust?’

Or maybe not. ‘You know about them?’ he said.

‘It just so happens that I recently heard quite a lot about them. From Ibai, actually.’

Hector blinked. Somehow, he’d forgotten about Ibai Blackburn. ‘So Ibai is with you, then.’

‘Ah. Yes, he is. There have been a few times when I thought Gohvis would kill him for sure, but they seem to be getting along now. Somewhat.’

Hector still wasn’t entirely sure how he felt about that guy, but after working together with him at Dunehall, he found it hard to think badly of him. If not for Ibai’s actions, Hector was sure that the Rainlords would have suffered far more casualties than they did--or simply been wiped out completely.

Which put a very difficult question in Hector’s mind. The few times that he’d managed to actually talk to Emiliana for any real length of time, that topic had yet to come up. The casualties at Dunehall.

Should he tell her, he wondered? She had a right to know, certainly. Ibai, as well. But would they be better off not knowing? They were in a precarious position, no doubt. Perhaps telling them about their murdered kin would only make things worse.

He rubbed his forehead again. Between this and trying to figure out what he was going to tell Zeff later, Hector felt like he was seeing a sudden spike in impossible decisions.

Emiliana wasn’t done talking, however, and Hector tried not to become so distracted that he stopped listening. ‘Ibai wouldn’t stop going on about worms and greatworms the other day. He spoke with such enthusiasm that I probably absorbed more of it than I intended to. Is there anything in particular that you would like to know about them?’

‘...Their weaknesses, if they have any.’

There came a pause. ‘Why do you want to know that, might I ask?’”

He grit his teeth at that question and hesitated. He felt like he should just come right out and tell her. He felt like she'd probably figured it out already, anyway. But still, he hesitated.

'Hector, just tell me. And please... please don't lie. Because, right now, it's just... Chergoa, Ibai... and you. You're the only ones I can trust, so... please, just...'

Hector had no defense against her words or her pleading tone. 'Okay,' he finally said. 'The truth is... we're in the Undercrust right now, trying to avoid the Vanguard. We're on our way back to Warrenhold, and yeah... we've been fighting a lot. Worms are really... annoying and hard to kill.'

She paused again. 'Has anyone gotten hurt? Or...?'

He knew what she was really wanting to ask, but he didn't actually know if the worms had killed anyone.

But he did know about Dunehall. And if there was ever a time to bring it up, now was it. He had to make a decision, he knew. Putting it off wouldn't be avoiding anything. That would be a decision, too. And his gut was telling him that he shouldn't keep it from them. They deserved to know. Especially Ibai. The man's father had been killed, after all.

He took a deliberate breath.

'...It's been pretty chaotic, so I'm not sure if the worms have killed any of us. However... I should tell you that... back at Dunehall, after you left... there were many casualties.' He allowed a beat to pass, in case she wanted to say anything, but when she didn't, he kept going. 'Ismael Blackburn was among them. He and his reaper... were murdered by Ivan.'

'How horrible...'

'I'm sorry. I didn't want to bring it up, but... I thought Ibai should know.'

'I-I understand. Thank you for telling me. I will relay it to him.' She paused another time, perhaps considering her next words. 'Who... who else was killed? And, and how many casualties were there, exactly?'

Both of those were questions he had trouble answering--partly because he simply didn't want to and partly because he wasn't sure he could remember everyone. He didn't want to suddenly reach out to Garovel with such awful questions, but in the end, that was exactly what he did. The reaper handled it with more grace than surprise, and Emiliana mostly just waited and listened quietly.

It took a while.

'...Thank you for telling me,' she eventually said, once Hector and Garovel had finished going down the list. She remained quiet for a while longer after that, perhaps talking to Ibai, perhaps just processing everything.

Hector didn't know how to revive the conversation. Or even if he should.

But he could tell that she was still there. It was more obvious than ever. He could feel something from the Shard that he never had previously. Some sort of... intensity in his head and in his heart. A heaviness that seemed not to be his own, somehow.

It was her sorrow, he eventually realized. He could actually feel her sorrow."

"1435

This was a first.

He'd never been able to actually sense her emotions before. Why was that, he wondered? Why now? It wasn't like she didn't have emotions any of the other times they'd communicated via the Shard like this.

Perhaps it was simply because of how strong this particular emotion was. Perhaps normal feelings couldn't make the telepathic trip or whatever. He might've asked Garovel about it, but the reaper had made it abundantly clear that he didn't understand how the Shards worked, so he didn't see much point.

A sudden wetness around his eyes made Hector squint and blink, and he found himself wiping tears away.

'Holy shit,' he thought explicitly.

'What's the matter?' said Garovel.

‘What is it?’ said Emiliana.

‘Uh, ah, n-nothing,’ Hector floundered. He’d accidentally talked to both at once when he hadn’t meant to say anything to either of them.

‘Just tell me,’ said Emiliana.

‘Didn’t sound like nothing,’ said Garovel.

They couldn’t hear each other, Hector knew, and he didn’t want to try to explain whatever the hell was happening, right now. So he spoke to Garovel first. ‘Sorry, I meant to say that to Emiliana, and I, uh... got my wires crossed, I guess.’

‘Ah,’ was all the reaper said, seemingly satisfied.

Then he tried to give the reverse excuse to Emiliana. ‘Sorry, I meant to say that to Garovel and just accidentally said it to you...’

‘Is something happening over there?’ she asked.

That was not the response he’d been hoping for. ‘N-no.’ How was he supposed to explain this? Tell her that she’d made him cry? Somehow, that seemed like the worst thing he could say to her right now.

‘...Are you lying to me?’ She sounded a little annoyed. ‘Didn’t I just ask you not to lie to me?’

He could feel himself losing composure. Anxiety welling up. He thought he’d been getting better about this, yet here it was again, strong as ever, paralyzing his thoughts, squeezing breath out of his lungs.

He had to tell her something. It was just going to get worse, if he didn’t. And if he told her the wrong thing, the conversation would spiral out of control, and she would start to hate him or perhaps just begin to realize how pathetic he really was beneath this desperate facade that he’d been trying so hard to--

‘Are you alright?’ she asked.

He couldn’t answer that.

‘Hector?’

His eyes widened with horror.

She’d felt his anxiety just now, hadn’t she?

Fuck fuck fuck fuck--

‘Hect--?’

He let go of the Shard.

This was not okay.

He held his hand tightly over his mouth and shut his eyes, trying to steady his breathing and hopefully his mind.

Letting someone hear his intentional thoughts was one thing. That was fine. He could control that. More or less. But letting someone sense whatever stupid, panicky, humiliating feelings he was having?

No. That was a bridge too far."

"1436

It wasn't like he even knew this girl all that well, either. He was supposed to just show her all the worst parts of himself, now? Parts that he didn't even want himself to see?

That was just impossible.

But...

His conversation with Emiliana was not yet done, he knew. She hadn't gotten around to telling him what she knew about worms.

And that was important, goddammit. Certainly more important than all his stupid insecurities.

He opened his eyes, grit his teeth, growled to himself, and then scratched his brow hard enough to leave marks. He stared at that damn red crystal lying there on his bed, able to sense its calling pulse again.

He sighed angrily and picked it back up.

‘--there?’ came her voice again. ‘Ah! You're back! What happened? Where did you go?’

He figured he should apologize first, even though a rather large part of him didn't want to. 'S-sorry, I, uh... I dropped the Shard accidentally.'

She took a while to respond. '...Is that really true?' she said, taking that irritated tone with him again, this time more strongly. 'Hector, I just--I feel like you're not telling me something, and I don't appreciate--'

'Stop,' he said, perhaps more firmly than he'd intended. 'Just. Stop.'

And she did.

His anxiety from earlier was still there, though it had been significantly lessened by his mounting frustration. And he figured out what he wanted to say to her now. 'If you want to keep your location and circumstances a secret... and if you want me to lie to your father about you... then fine. I get it. But you don't get to do all that and then chastise ME for keeping a few things to myself. Okay? You just--' He sighed through his nostrils. 'You don't get to do that.'

Emiliana made no response.

As the silence drew out, he began to worry that he'd upset her. But he didn't regret what he'd said. He tried to sense what she was feeling again, but there was nothing. He supposed it didn't work like that. He decided that his theory from earlier was probably correct after all. Her feelings must have needed to be extraordinarily strong in order for him to sense them, and right now, they simply weren't.

Perhaps he needed to say more.

'Look,' he tried, 'I... I don't mean to be rude. And you CAN trust me. I want to help your family however I can. Okay? I really do.'

Still, she remained quiet.

He wasn't sure what else he could say without backpedaling completely. And he refused to do that.

Eventually, however, she finally said, '...Okay.'

And then he sensed her let go of her Shard. He waited to see if she would come back right away like he had. He tried calling out to her through the Shard, wanting her to at least come back and finish whatever she was going to say about worms.

But she didn't.

"Shit..." He was beginning to see a family resemblance."

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Four: 'Hark! And unravel...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At first, Royo Raju had spent the majority of his time following the one called Diego, but when it did not prove nearly as fruitful as he had hoped, he began wandering about on his own more. It certainly would've made things easier if he could speak or at least understand Ancient Hunese, but even with as prepared as he always liked to be, he'd never thought he would have much use for a dead language, especially when there were still so many other, living ones to spend his time on.

An oversight, apparently. And an extremely annoying one.

Now, he only knew what the superhumans deigned to tell him, which was not very much.

Of course, it was also quite possible, and indeed likely, that these Hun'Sho were simply not revealing very much. They had every reason not to want their treasure discovered.

Royo wondered what the one called Diego would do if he actually found it. Would he take it from the Hun'Sho by force? He doubted that the man had such conviction. Perhaps his curiosity was purely that. Curiosity.

Then again, he supposed that it would also depend on what the treasure turned out to actually be.

Ah, but he was twisting himself into knots over this blasted treasure again. Yes, it would be nice to get his hands on, but he couldn't let it distract him from everything else. That was a good way to end up dead, he knew.

The more pressing matter, of course, was dealing with the worms. Potentially, the golem and feldeath could be snuck past--at great risk, of course, but it was an option. Instead, however, Royo had hoped to learn more about how the one called Carver had apparently been able to subdue all of the worms just prior to their encounter with him. The man was obviously not a superhuman like the others, given his need to wear one of those suits, so there must have been some other reason for it.

And eventually, he did learn that reason, though it was not nearly as helpful as he'd wanted it to be.

"Oh, that was because of this," the one called Carver had explained, presenting a small, mechanical box in the palm of his hand. "It is what we call an EWE, or Enhanced Wave Emitter. You see, worms have a particular frequency at which they are vulnerable, and if you are able to strike that frequency with perfect precision, you can effectively put them to sleep."

"Fantastic," said the one called Zeff. "Then let's use that to get out of here right now."

"Uh, it would still be quite a hike to Capaporo," said the one called Diego.

"Indeed," said the one called Carver, "but there is a bigger problem to address, first. As I'm sure you are aware, worms are highly resilient, and perhaps the primary reason for that is their adaptable anatomy and biochemical makeup. You mentioned seeing them fuse and split apart multiple times, yes?"

"1437 -- CLIV.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Four: 'Hark! And unravel...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At first, Royo Raju had spent the majority of his time following the one called Diego, but when it did not prove nearly as fruitful as he had hoped, he began wandering about on his own more. It certainly would've made things easier if he could speak or at least understand Ancient Hunese, but even with as prepared as he always liked to be, he'd never thought he would have much use for a dead language, especially when there were still so many other, living ones to spend his time on.

An oversight, apparently. And an extremely annoying one.

Now, he only knew what the superhumans deigned to tell him, which was not very much.

Of course, it was also quite possible, and indeed likely, that these Hun'Sho were simply not revealing very much. They had every reason not to want their treasure discovered.

Royo wondered what the one called Diego would do if he actually found it. Would he take it from the Hun'Sho by force? He doubted that the man had such conviction. Perhaps his curiosity was purely that. Curiosity.

Then again, he supposed that it would also depend on what the treasure turned out to actually be.

Ah, but he was twisting himself into knots over this blasted treasure again. Yes, it would be nice to get his hands on, but he couldn't let it distract him from everything else. That was a good way to end up dead, he knew.

The more pressing matter, of course, was dealing with the worms. Potentially, the golem and feldeath could be snuck past--at great risk, of course, but it was an option. Instead, however, Royo had hoped to learn more about how the one called Carver had apparently been able to subdue all of the worms just prior to their encounter with him. The man was obviously not a superhuman like the others, given his need to wear one of those suits, so there must have been some other reason for it.

And eventually, he did learn that reason, though it was not nearly as helpful as he'd wanted it to be.

"Oh, that was because of this," the one called Carver had explained, presenting a small, mechanical box in the palm of his hand. "It is what we call an EWE, or Enhanced Wave Emitter. You see, worms have a particular frequency at which they are vulnerable, and if you are able to strike that frequency with perfect precision, you can effectively put them to sleep."

"Fantastic," said the one called Zeff. "Then let's use that to get out of here right now."

"Uh, it would still be quite a hike to Capaporo," said the one called Diego.

"Indeed," said the one called Carver, "but there is a bigger problem to address, first. As I'm sure you are aware, worms are highly resilient, and perhaps the primary reason for that is their adaptable anatomy and biochemical makeup. You mentioned seeing them fuse and split apart multiple times, yes?"

"1438

"Yeah," said the one called Diego. "Oh! Are you saying they'll adapt to your little whatchamacallit, too?"

"That is exactly what I am saying. In order for this EWE to work a second time, it must be retuned."

"Hmph. How do we retune it, then?"

"...Trial and error, unfortunately," said the one called Carver. "On the bright side, it can be done from a... relatively safe distance away, provided you can see them in the dark. Which I have another device for. But, um, ah--I was hoping one of you fine gentleman would do it for me, this time. I must admit, it has always terrified me beyond measure."

"Fine." The one called Zeff took the box from him. "I'll do it."

"Oh, thank god!" The one called Carver suddenly hugged the other man. "You have no idea how happy it makes me to have such a dependable companion! Please never leave me!"

Everyone involved in the conversation just kind of stared, and the one called Zeff slowly peeled the man off of him.

The one called Carver was red in the face, though Royo did not understand what that meant. "I, uh--please, I apologize--ah, it was just a joke, you see--aha--um--"

The one called Zeff kept holding him at arm's length. "How long will this take?"

"Oh, um, well..." The one called Carver bit his lip. "A few days, most likely. Perhaps shorter. Perhaps... longer. It sort of depends on your luck, I suppose. Just cycling through all of the potential frequencies. In theory, you could nail it perfectly on the first try. That would be amazing! But then again, you ARE amazing, aren't you?! Aha!"

No one else laughed with him.

Royo had only pity for the poor bastard.

In the end, the one called Zeff did not nail it on the first try, as Royo had not even seen the man since. Though that was no great loss, to Royo's mind. He did not much care for that man's presence. He seemed perpetually on edge. And irritable, to boot. And with as much power as that superhuman had at his fingertips, Royo could all too easily imagine him simply snapping and going on a killing spree after someone said the wrong thing to him.

Given a choice, Royo much preferred the company of the other superhumans, and so he'd decided to use this downtime in order to learn more about them.

The most problematic on that front proved to be the Senmurai, who quite easily spoke the least and frequently went off on his own. He'd changed his armor, too, as if to compound the mystery further.

Difficult as he was, though, Royo had to admit, the Senmurai was the one who most intrigued him. More so than the Hun'Sho, even. Though, perhaps that was not saying much. What Royo had thus far learned of them, he did not like."

"1439

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

They had resided here in Himmekel for over a thousand years, according to the one called Diego. And yet, these "people of the fire" showed no sign of wanting to escape this place. None of the Hun'Sho they spoke with seemed interested in leaving... or even just wanting to know about the outside world all that much.

These people demonstrated a lack of curiosity. Of ambition.

The one called Diego seemed to think it was due to their inability to age, that the Hun'Sho lacked any sense of urgency in their desires because they had all the time in the world to pursue them. Perhaps one day, they would leave and explore the world, but for now, they were content to remain here, where time was all but standing still.

Royo could see the logic in that interpretation.

But he did not trust it.

An entire society which lacked curiosity? Or the pursuit of betterment?

That was disturbingly unnatural. It was hardly even human, to his mind.

The only way Royo could rationalize the existence of a culture of such willful ignorance was by means of some coping mechanism. Perhaps the Hun'Sho had been prisoners in this place for so long that they had grown to love their imprisonment.

They had given up, in other words.

But that made sense. The Hun'Sho were a defeated people. Maybe not quite extinct as had been believed, but certainly broken in spirit.

In the ancient tales passed down by his Hun'Kui ancestors, the Hun'Sho were portrayed as a wicked and terrifying people, monstrously cruel and intelligent. Something to be feared and hated. Yet as he observed them now, beings that should have been legends brought to life, Royo found himself not only disappointed but also hating them for an entirely different reason.

They were pathetic. Shameful.

These people were blessed with immortality, yet what were they doing with it? Nothing. They whiled away the days down here as if time was of no value or consequence to anyone.

He could not imagine a greater insult to mortals like himself.

The superhumans at least seemed to understand that much. While Royo did not necessarily like them much more than the Hun'Sho, he did still have respect for them. They clearly possessed values. Principles. Dreams. Goals of their own. There was sentiment to be admired there.

The most maddening thing, however, was certainly the way that the Hun'Sho did not speak directly to him or any of the other Hun'Kui present.

At first, Royo had thought that they simply did not understand Modern Hunese in the same way that he did not understand their Ancient Hunese.

But then he remembered that the one called Carver was fluent in Modern Hunese. And the man had mentioned teaching several languages to the Hun'Sho over the course of his last five years here.

"Did you not teach them our language as well?" Royo had asked him.

"Ah--I did, yes."

"Then why do they not answer when we speak to them?"

"Ah, yes... that is rather strange, isn't it?"

"1440

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

However, even after watching the one called Carver confront multiple Hun'Sho with that same question in Ancient Hunese, a definitive answer was never achieved.

But that was informative enough, in its own way.

His ancestors had driven their brethren to the brink of extinction, after all. And given their agelessness, it was highly likely that many of these Hun'Sho, if not all, had actually lived through it. When he realized that, Royo was no longer surprised by their behavior. Only annoyed.

Pure petulance. Refusing to speak to them would resolve nothing.

And so it was that, eventually, Royo ceased his futile and irritating attempts to cultivate a relationship with the Hun'Sho, instead deciding to focus on the Senmurai.

He was not the only Hun'Kui to want to do so, however. He observed one of the others attempt to make contact with him, but the Senmurai apparently did not speak Hunese. Royo wondered if his ghost could not translate for him, or if perhaps said ghost was simply preoccupied at the time. Unlike the other superhumans, the Senmurai spent more time on his own, away from his ghost, leaving Royo to wonder why. And at length, his curiosity could bear it no longer.

Standing in the middle of Himmekel, before its towering lavafall and beneath an archway of glimmering black rock, Royo Raju approached the Senmurai.

“Hello,” said Royo in Mohssian.

The Senmurai was expectedly surprised, judging from his delayed response. “...Hello.”

Royo waited for the obvious question to arrive.

“...You speak Mohssian?”

“Yes,” said Royo. “I apologize for keeping it a secret. I was not certain I could trust any of you.”

“That’s... understandable.”

“I am glad you think so.”

Silence arrived.

This, too, was as expected.

“...If I might ask,” said Royo, “why do you keep coming here alone?”

The Senmurai’s armor shifted visibly and sizzled. “This is a good place to train. The extra heat makes it more difficult.”

Training? Truth be told, Royo did not know much about the powers that the superhumans possessed. For some reason, the thought had never entered his mind that they, too, should have to hone their abilities.

How curious.

“If that is the case,” said Royo, “then why do the others not train with you?”

“...They don’t really need to. Not as much as I do, anyway.”

“They are more concerned about finding the Sosho’Diyu than you are, it would seem.”

“I don’t know about that...”

“Oh? You are interested in it as well?”

"Of course. Kinda hard not to be."

"Heh. I was beginning to think that the Senmurai was immune to such worldly desires."

The Senmurai paused. "I keep hearing that word. S-Senmurai? What does that mean?"

"Ah..." Royo had to stop and think about it. The meaning of the name had always been clear to him, but trying to impart that meaning into a different language was not so easy. "In Mohssian... it would roughly mean Knight of the Mist."

"1441

The Senmurai made no response.

"Do you dislike the name?" asked Royo.

"...I'd rather you just call me Hector."

Hector? What an odd name. Royo had never heard the like before. But then, he did not know very many names from the surface. "Very well, Hector."

"What should I call you?"

The prideful part of him wanted to say Royo Raju, but he needed to keep his story straight. "You can call me Eleyo. It is a pleasure to make your formal acquaintance, finally."

"Ah, likewise."

More silence arrived.

Royo had another question prepared, but then Hector surprised him with one of his own first.

"Do you believe in a god?"

Royo blinked. That question had certainly come out of nowhere.

"I mean, uh, Hun'Kui in general," Hector clarified. "Do you guys have... some kind of religion? I'm just... curious about Hun'Kui culture."

“Yes, we have a few religions. There is Cushin’Sekai, the religion of the Heart of the World. There is Avarita, the religion of Avar, the God of Fire. And there is Secho’ta, the religion of Secho, the God of Growth. And probably others of which I am not familiar.”

“Hmm... Do you believe in any of them, yourself?”

“Not as such, no,” said Royo. And when Hector didn’t say anything, Royo decided to add, “But if I were religious, I think I would be most partial to Secho’ta.”

“Why do you say that?”

“Because of the story behind Secho. He was not always a god, you see. He was a mere mortal who ascended after a long and perilous journey.”

“Oh. I guess that’s why they call him the God of Growth.”

“Indeed.”

“How did he actually ascend to godhood, exactly?”

“That is the part I like best. In the story, he embarks on a quest to save his beloved wife, who has fallen ill. Along the way, he endures many dangerous trials and tests of both honor and morality. At the end of it, he encounters Avar.”

“The same God of Fire?”

“Yes. When Secho and Avar meet, Avar claims that Secho has failed one of his tests and so refuses him entry into the Sanctum of the Heart of the World, where the secret to curing his wife awaits.”

“Are all religions in the Undercrust linked like this?”

“No, it is only the biggest three. For those who are devout in them, it is less a matter of what they believe to be true and more a matter of who they believe to be correct. But not just according to this tale of Secho’s ascension, of course. There are many other stories, and they usually include a moral dilemma or diverging sense of ‘wisdom’ between the three religions.”

“Huh... But, anyway, uh... what did Secho do next?””

"1442

“He flew into a rage and attacked Avar. Yet, Avar was the God of Fire, and Secho was only mortal. Avar subdued him without difficulty and spared his life, believing Secho to be of no threat. However, instead of quitting himself of his quest as Avar told him to do, Secho waited four days, until Avar fell asleep, and then snuck into the Sanctum without waking him.”

“Gods need sleep?” Hector asked.

Royo smirked. “So it would seem.”

“Hmm. What happened next?”

“Secho met with the Heart of the World, who--”

“Ah--sorry to keep interrupting, but... what is the Heart of the World, exactly?”

“The answer to that would depend on whom you ask. In this particular story, it is depicted as a sentient presence encased in a giant orb.”

“That’s... strange.”

“Mm. Shall I continue?”

“Please.”

“Secho met with the Heart of the World, who already knew that Secho had entered the Sanctum when he was not supposed to. Rather than killing or banishing him, however, the Heart of the World gave him a choice. Secho was presented with two goblets. If he drank from the left goblet, his wife would be cured. If he drank from the right goblet, he would be granted godlike powers, but his wife would die.”

“How would him drinking from the goblet cure someone else?”

Royo snickered. “You are a stickler for details, I see.”

“I’m just... trying to understand.”

“The veracity of these tales is not why they have survived for millennia, I feel. They were meant to impart wisdom via the means of a constructed narrative. It may be better to think of them as a manner of... primitive thought experiment. An early mechanism of hypotheticality by which the illiterate masses might be taught a sense of morality or wisdom--and hopefully, improve civilization as a whole thereby."

"Ah... Okay, sure, that's... that's a really good point. But, I mean... if the writers wanted me to believe this stuff, then they should've worked harder to make it more believable, don't you think?"

"Perhaps you are being a bit too hard on said writers. They did not have the benefit of a thousand extra years of accumulated knowledge as you and I do."

"...A likely excuse."

That earned a laugh from Royo. "Would you like me to continue with the story? Or have you grown too weary of it?"

"...Sorry, go on."

"Very well. Where was I?"

"The Heart of the World gave Secho a choice between godlike power or his wife."

"Ah. This is the part of the story I find most appealing. The decision. Secho was an ambitious man. And indeed, it was that very ambition which had caused him to 'fail' one of his tests, according to Avar. But after his encounter with Avar, Secho realized this about himself. And perhaps even more importantly, he had heard over the course of his journey about the capriciousness of the Heart of the World. Therefore, he did not trust this choice as it was presented to him and believed it to be some form of trickery.""

"1443

"So what did he do, then?" said Hector.

"Secho worried that the Heart of the World had lied to him about the placement of the goblets, but he did not know for sure. So before he decided, he asked the Heart of the World a question: 'Why have you presented me with such a terrible choice?' 'To show you your truest self,' the Heart of the World told him. And based on that answer, Secho decided to drink from both goblets at the same time."

Hector breathed half a laugh. “And that actually worked?”

“His wife was cured, yes, but the Heart of the World explained that there had been no goblet which would grant him the power of a god. That had been a lie, as Secho expected. Instead, that goblet had been simple poison.”

“Oh.”

“As Secho lay dying, the Heart of the World chastised him for his greed, telling him he was fool for thinking he could have both his wife and power. Rather than despairing, however, Secho laughed in the god’s face and said that he’d known all along he couldn’t trust the Heart of the World’s words, so drinking from both goblets was the only way to ensure that he drank from the one which would cure his wife.”

“Hmm.”

“Then a miracle occurred, and Secho ascended to godhood truly.”

“Wha? How?”

“It is explained thus: Secho, due to both his intention and ultimate decision, had effectively rendered the Heart of the World’s entire ‘game of choice’ meaningless. He completely avoided making the difficult decision between love and power, which was what the Heart of the World was trying to force him to do. Or in other words, he had ‘defeated’ a god. And in doing so, he became a god himself.”

“That’s... convenient.”

“I enjoy this story, because while it at first appears as though Secho will be granted the power of a god by another, that does not happen. Ultimately, he ascends to godhood independently, as a result of his own actions.”

“What difference does that make?”

“The entire ending of the story is about the temptation and promise of power. It is about how these things can be illusions and dangerous. The ‘goblet of power,’ for instance, was never even real. It was poison all along. And yet, the story does not wholly dismiss the notion of obtaining power, either. It simply provides an alternate explanation for it.”

“Eh... was it really explained, though? Seemed like it kinda just came out of nowhere, to me.”

Royo bobbed his head. “It certainly depends on one’s perspective. For me, I find the explanation to be not only interesting but also an important lesson--relevant even to this day.”

“Really?”

“Oh yes. A lesson in the natures of power, greed, and heroism. I should admit, however, that my opinion is generally considered to be one of dissension.”

“Why’s that?”

"1444

“Many people,” said Royo, “when they hear the tale of Secho’s origins, view Secho as a martyr. They see his decision as an act of self-sacrifice for his wife, and they opine that it is this sacrifice which ‘earns’ his ascension to godhood.”

“But you don’t think that?”

“Of course not. How could it possibly be considered an act of self-sacrifice when, at the time of drinking, Secho does not know that one of the goblets is poisoned? The parable even describes his thoughts on the matter. He is concerned that the goblets have been swapped, perhaps in some manner of cruel irony, but never does he worry that he may die as a result of drinking from them.”

“Hmm. You have a point. What do you think the lesson of the story is, then?”

“As I said, it is about the natures of power, greed, and heroism--specifically, in regard to how they can be linked. Secho is a heroic figure. There is no doubt of that. He saves his wife, along with various others whom he encounters during his journey to the Sanctum. But he is also portrayed as ambitious, perhaps even greedy. We can infer that he did want to become a god. He simply did not want it more than he wanted his wife to live.”

“Okay...?”

“If all of that is the case, then Secho’s heroism is not truly ‘pure,’ which further demonstrates that it is not some vague notion of 'moral worthiness' that allows him to ascend to godhood. Rather, it is simply his ability to defeat a god. His ability, as an individual."

"But he still would've died, if not for that last minute miracle, right? Which, uh... I mean, where did that come from? A different god? Or just nowhere? I don't really..."

"It came from himself," said Royo. "That is the ultimate lesson of the story, in my view. Simply put, power cannot be granted to you. True power cannot. Certainly, lesser power can be bestowed upon you, as by that of a king, but in such cases, you will always remain beholden to the granter's will, which makes the granter inherently more powerful than you. True power, as that of a god, must be seized for oneself. And perhaps most frighteningly of all, true power does not discriminate based on any sense of morality. Whosoever has the ability--the will--can achieve it, be they for good or evil."

Hector fell quiet.

Royo wondered if he had perhaps said too much. It had been some time since he had last engaged in a conversation so passionately. He had grown so accustomed to never truly speaking his mind to anyone that he now felt somewhat embarrassed, as if he'd revealed a part of himself that he had not meant to. "I must apologize," he said. "I did not mean to rant at you."

"Ah," said Hector, "don't worry about it. I was... I was the one who kept asking you questions."

"1445

Rather than responding, Royo merely looked at the armored young man and listened to the ambient noise of Himmekel around them--the thick sloshing of falling magma, the slight and ever-present trembling of earth, and of course the muted hissing of Hector's visibly shifting armor.

Royo felt as though he should bring up a new topic, keep the conversation alive, but something made him hold his tongue. Something about this person standing next to him.

Certainly, when he had first heard how young the Senmurai sounded,

Royo had been surprised, but he had also heard tales of how the immortal supermen could appear deceptively young. Yet now, after listening to all of his questions and his manner of speaking, Royo had the distinct impression that Hector was indeed as young as he sounded.

Young. And perhaps... impressionable?

Mm, perhaps not. After having actually listened to what Hector had been saying, the young man did seem to be amusingly stubborn in his way of thinking. And sure, Royo had molded more difficult personalities to his will, but there was also the ghost to consider.

Best not to wade into that territory, he decided. A valuable ally or friend was likely the most he could hope for here, despite how much he would have loved to have a loyal superhuman at his beck and call. And even that might be overreaching, if he didn't watch his words.

At length, Hector was the one to speak again. "...I can't say I disagree with your view of power."

"Is that so?" said Royo.

"I've... I've seen a lot of power, lately. And... it's exactly like you said. Power doesn't discriminate against good or evil. Power is just power. Whoever has it, has it."

"Indeed." Royo couldn't help smiling a little, feeling as if the young man wished him to continue his rant after all. "And I believe that is also why evil--or what we perceive as evil, at least--seems so prone to obtaining power."

Hector turned his gaze away from the lavafall to look at Royo. He didn't say anything, but that strange, sunken gaze beneath his armor told Royo that he was waiting to hear more.

"Imagine it," Royo went on. "When an opportunity arises for an individual to seize power of any sort, what will that person do? A good man will hesitate. A good man will think, 'Is this wrong? Am I being greedy? Will this power hurt someone?' But an evil man will not think such things. An evil man will not hesitate. He will take that power as soon as he is able."

Hector looked away again, perhaps thinking on those words.

Royo still had more to say. "What, then, are we to make of a circumstance in which a good man has an opportunity to seize power before an evil man does? If that good man hesitates in his goodness, and in so doing, allows the evil man to take that power from him?"

"1446 -- CLV.

"I don't think people can be broken up into such easy categories as good and evil," Hector finally said. "If they could, the world would be a lot simpler."

"And that is exactly the point," said Royo. "Actions are good or evil, not men. And yet, perhaps some acts that many would consider evil are not truly so--the seizure of power, being the relevant example to this conversation."

"Hmm..."

"I think, therefore, that more good people should realize: if you have the opportunity to seize greater power without incurring too great a cost, then you should take it. Because certainly, if you do not, then someone else will."

"...I suppose I agree," said Hector, "but it's the 'without incurring too great a cost' bit that worries me. Who's to say what too great a cost is, really?"

"Who's to say, you ask? Why, the only ones who can say, obviously! The fortunate or unfortunate ones who find themselves confronted with the choice! They are the ones to say. And do not fool yourself--they will have their say. They will make that decision. To the boon or cost of everyone around them. Such is the way of the world."

Hector fell quiet again.

Royo felt as if he could go on, perhaps more specifically about the virtue of ambition and the far-reaching benefits to be gained from a culture which fosters it in their youth, but in the end, he reminded himself of his concerns about overreach and decided to hold his tongue.

Then he noticed the ghost wander up behind the young man. That ghastly visage still turned his stomach, but he tried to not let it show on his face. The ardor-infused goggles hopefully helped with that.

"I shall take my leave," said Royo. "It was a pleasure speaking with you."

"Ah--same here."

And he walked away. A part of him had wanted to ask about the ghost, among other things, but Royo thought it was too early to probe for that sort of information. Moreover, he worried what the ghost would think of him, what the ghost would tell Hector of him.

They unsettled him, those intangible phantoms. He almost didn't want to know more about them, and instead wondered if it wouldn't be better to simply avoid them as much as possible.

Probably not, he eventually figured. Remaining comfortable in ignorance was not how he preferred to live his life.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Five: 'O, attentive Hunter...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Boy, these Hun'Sho were an odd bunch. The more he talked to them, the more perplexed Diego Redwater became. Even Yangéra could agree with him on that count.

"Could you perhaps show us a dance from your homeland?" asked a very slender Hun'Sho woman by the name of Hirkosa. Her Mohssian was quite good--but then, such seemed to be the case with every Hun'Sho to whom Diego had spoken. "We would be more than happy to do the same in return."

"1446 -- CLV.

"I don't think people can be broken up into such easy categories as good and evil," Hector finally said. "If they could, the world would be a lot simpler."

"And that is exactly the point," said Royo. "Actions are good or evil, not men. And yet, perhaps some acts that many would consider evil are not truly so--the seizure of power, being the relevant example to this conversation."

“Hmm...”

“I think, therefore, that more good people should realize: if you have the opportunity to seize greater power without incurring too great a cost, then you should take it. Because certainly, if you do not, then someone else will.”

“...I suppose I agree,” said Hector, “but it’s the ‘without incurring too great a cost’ bit that worries me. Who’s to say what too great a cost is, really?”

“Who’s to say, you ask? Why, the only ones who can say, obviously! The fortunate or unfortunate ones who find themselves confronted with the choice! They are the ones to say. And do not fool yourself--they will have their say. They will make that decision. To the boon or cost of everyone around them. Such is the way of the world.”

Hector fell quiet again.

Royo felt as if he could go on, perhaps more specifically about the virtue of ambition and the far-reaching benefits to be gained from a culture which fosters it in their youth, but in the end, he reminded himself of his concerns about overreach and decided to hold his tongue.

Then he noticed the ghost wander up behind the young man. That ghastly visage still turned his stomach, but he tried to not let it show on his face. The ardor-infused goggles hopefully helped with that.

“I shall take my leave,” said Royo. “It was a pleasure speaking with you.”

“Ah--same here.”

And he walked away. A part of him had wanted to ask about the ghost, among other things, but Royo thought it was too early to probe for that sort of information. Moreover, he worried what the ghost would think of him, what the ghost would tell Hector of him.

They unsettled him, those intangible phantoms. He almost didn’t want to know more about them, and instead wondered if it wouldn’t be better to simply avoid them as much as possible.

Probably not, he eventually figured. Remaining comfortable in ignorance was not how he preferred to live his life.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Five: 'O, attentive Hunter...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Boy, these Hun'Sho were an odd bunch. The more he talked to them, the more perplexed Diego Redwater became. Even Yangéra could agree with him on that count.

"Could you perhaps show us a dance from your homeland?" asked a very slender Hun'Sho woman by the name of Hirkosa. Her Mohssian was quite good--but then, such seemed to be the case with every Hun'Sho to whom Diego had spoken. "We would be more than happy to do the same in return."

"1447

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 1 of 14))~~

It wasn't the first time that Diego had heard the Hun'Sho talk to him about dancing. It seemed to be a big thing with them. "Sure," he said. "Not to toot my own horn 'r anything, but back in Agquarey, I was known as the Red Typhoon in all the night clubs."

Hirkosa's molten face looked more confused than impressed. "A typhoon is a type of surface world storm, no?"

"Yeah."

"What does a storm have to do with dancing?"

"I could tell you," said Diego, "but wouldn't it be better if I showed you?"

Another Hun'Sho woman by the name of Lerinki leaned over the table. "Please do!" She touched his hand with her magma-covered one.

In his head, Diego screamed in agony. Even through his passive soul-defense, it felt like he'd just spilled boiling coffee on himself. But he didn't let it show on his face at all. He was a transfiguration user. Pain was second nature to him.

He still found it difficult to respond immediately, however.

To her credit, Lerinki realized her mistake after a second and recoiled. "Oh! I am so sorry! I forgot myself for a moment! Did that hurt?!"

He laughed it off. "Don't worry! I'm fine! Though I appreciate the concern!"

Both of the Hun'Sho women were staring at his charred and half-melted lump of a hand.

Yangéra invoked the regeneration for him. 'Diego is fine, but you should be more careful around regular surface-dwellers,' she said. 'You could very easily kill one of them. They're quite fragile.'

When Diego and the others had first discovered that the Hun'Sho could both see and hear reapers, it had come as quite the surprise. None of them were servants, as far as he knew, but apparently that didn't matter. The explanation that the reapers had provided was that the Hun'Sho were a race of people who had ardor fused into their very beings. And as such, a Hun'Sho's "soul" was considered quite different to that of other races. Somehow.

Diego hadn't gotten much clarification on that point. Not that he'd cared all that much in the first place. Their culture interested him more than their biology or whatever it was.

"I am so, so sorry!" said Lerinki. "I will be sure to be careful in the future!"

"Lerinki, you fool!" said Hirkosa. "Why did you not remove your coat first?!"

Diego cocked an eyebrow at that.

"Oh, you are right!" said Lerinki, and she continued to apologize, even as her molten hands began to peel back. The magma, that had thus far maintained the impossibly smooth contours around her hands without dripping at all, suddenly flowed back up her arm to reveal the much more familiar gray skin beneath.

She touched Diego's hand again, and this time it felt quite cool--cooler, even, than the Hun'Kui women he had met back in Babbadelo. "Wow," he marveled, "I didn't know you could do that."

"I am so sorry," Lerinki was still saying. "I hope you will still show us the dances of your people."

"Oh, why, I'd be--"

'I am afraid that Diego and I have other matters we must attend to now,' said Yangéra. 'Perhaps he can show you his dance moves another time.'

"Aww!"

"Please come see us later!"

"I will, of course," said Diego. He had no idea what "matters" Yangéra was talking about, but he figured he should go along with it and NOT try to make her look like a jackass, for the time being.

They exited the small... hangout? He wasn't sure what the structure was, because even though it looked like a place where people would normally gather to enjoy a meal, he had yet to see any of the Hun'Sho actually eat anything.

Regardless, on the open street again, Diego was feeling quite pleased with himself. 'I think they liked me,' he thought with a smile.

'Um,' said Yangéra privately, 'just so you know, those women were not flirting with you. I'm pretty sure they don't understand the concept of flirting to begin with.'

'Wasn't the vibe I was getting.'

'Diego. The Hun'Sho reproduce asexually. And very rarely.'

He thought about that for second. 'So in other words... those two back there were probably virgins?'

'Ugh! That is the worst thing you've ever said!'

'What?! It was a joke!'

'I thought you were hunting for treasure, not pussy!'

'Whoa, hey! Don't make me out to be some kind of sleazy piece of shit!'

I never said anything about having sex with them!

‘Oh, yeah, I’m sure your intentions back there were entirely pure.’

Diego took a breath. ‘I’m just trying to get to know the local color so that, yes, I might discover some treasure. But there is more than one kind of treasure in this world, Yangéra.’

‘Oh, here we go...’

‘An encounter with a lovely lady of refinement and virtue, for example. That is one the most precious treasures I can imagine.’

‘Sure it is, you horndog. Aren’t you at all worried that one of these women would burn your dick off?’

‘Hold on. Where the hell is this coming from? You should know better than anyone that I’m not some manwhore.’

‘Of course you aren’t.’

Diego didn’t much care for her tone. ‘You really see me that way?’

‘You’re really trying to tell me that you don’t jump into bed with any woman who will let you?’

He furrowed his brow at her. ‘As a matter of fact, yes. I’ve never slept with a woman I wasn’t in love with, thank you very much.’

‘Is that right?’

‘It is!’

‘What about Erica Torres, then?’

‘Okay, that did get intense pretty quickly, but it was just heavy petting.’

Yangéra gave him a look.

‘VERY heavy petting, I’ll grant you. But never actual sex.’”

"1449

‘Uh-huh,’ said Yangéra. ‘How about Anna Casal, then?’

‘I never had sex with Anna,’ said Diego. ‘We were just very close, for a while.’

‘I literally found you in the same bed together.’

‘Yes! We slept in it! As in, actual sleep! No sex! She was going through a rough time, needed a shoulder to cry on, and then fell asleep in my arms!’

‘You were both naked.’

‘The rain soaked through our clothes! And we didn’t have any others to change into that night! AND we kept our underwear on, by the way!’

‘Mhmm. Hey, do you hear that? It’s the sound of me not believing you.’

‘Look, I don’t need to explain my relationship with Anna to you. She is a special woman, but she and I were simply not meant to be. Someone with a filthy mind like you wouldn’t understand the platonic bond we shared.’

‘Right. What about that one chick I saw all over you a few months ago? Did you ever even learn her name?’

‘That was Bernice, and yes, while she was very forward, she was a foreigner who was only in town for the weekend, so the relationship didn’t last beyond that.’

‘But you did have sex with her, is my point.’

‘No, I didn’t.’ Diego hesitated, not entirely certain he wanted to elaborate. ‘In fact... things got a little awkward when I told her that I didn’t want to take things that far. I instead suggested trying a long-distance relationship first and seeing how things went. Her response was to kick me in the balls.’

That information seemed to give Yangéra pause, perhaps because of how tragically believable it was. ‘...What about that bimbo supermodel you were with just a few weeks back?’

‘She was NOT a bimbo! Her name was Marissa, and she was very nice! I only went to a couple ritzy parties with her as a favor. She was worried her friends would give her a hard time for showing up alone, so

I played the role of studly arm candy. And maybe... sorta-kinda pretended to be her boyfriend a little.'

'...You did all of that for her, yet never slept with her?'

'She was just coming off of a bad break up and was obviously feeling very vulnerable. I didn't want to take advantage of her.'

Yangéra allowed a few beats to pass. 'Nah, I still think you're full of crap. What about Elena Salamanca?'

At that name, Diego stopped walking and looked at Yangéra.

The reaper stopped as well. And perhaps she realized what she'd done, because she floated closer. 'Ah--uh--I'm sorry, sweetie. I didn't mean to bring her up. I wasn't--'

Diego's expressionless face scanned his surroundings. There was a narrow alley to to his right.

He went for it.

As soon as he was out of public view, he found a wall, and he leaned against it while hanging his head forward.

He wasn't gonna cry. He wasn't. He definitely was not."

"1450

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 4 of 14))~~

Dammit, he could already hear the tears hissing as they evaporated in the heat of the Undercrust. Now he needed to focus on not devolving into a blubbering mess like last time.

'Ooh, I really wasn't thinking,' tried Yangéra, still wrapped in the echo of privacy. 'That was very low of me. I'm sorr--'

'Why didn't she love me back?!' said Diego.

'Well, it probably had something to do with the fact that she was a gold digging whore and an all-around ungrateful bitch,' said Yangéra.

Even through his extremely manly weeping, Diego had to breathe a short laugh. 'No!' he said, though only halfheartedly. 'She wasn't like that!'

'She was, Diego. She absolutely was.'

He sniffled and rubbed his eyes.

'There, there. It wasn't your fault, sweetie. She betrayed your trust. I'm very sorry for bringing her up, okay? And you know what? I think it's great that you're still putting yourself out there like you have been. Sure, sometimes it rubs me the wrong way a little bit and makes me want to give you a hard time, but ultimately, I think it's healthy.'

'...Really? You don't think I'm a stupid asshole who'll never find a woman who loves me?'

'Of course I don't think that. If anything, I'm just preemptively jealous of whoever that woman turns out to be. Because I just love you so much myself. Alright?'

'Alright...'

'There we go. Now straighten yourself up. We can't have other people seeing the big, bad Lord Redwater like this.'

He started slowly shuffling his way back out into the street. 'But what's a lord without a lady...?'

'Oh, god...'

'We were gonna get married...'

'I know, sweetie. But she didn't deserve you.'

He stopped walking again. 'Wait a minute. Did she...? Did she think the same thing that you were thinking just now? That I'm some sort of disgusting playboy?'

'Ah. Well... um...'

His eyes widened. 'Oh my god...!'

'Mm,' was all Yangéra had for him.

He just stared at the reaper with his mouth slightly open.

'...So you genuinely didn't sleep with any of those women?' said

Yangéra.

‘NO!’

‘Okay! I’m sorry! I--it--you...’ She seemed to be lost for words.

And so was he.

‘But if that’s the case, then you’ve seriously gotta stop being so friendly with strange women. I’m pretty sure that most of the family thinks that you’re a huge slut, too.’

‘What?! Since when?!’

‘Since, oh, maybe... you were about twenty-two, twenty-three?’

‘That was fifteen fucking years ago!’

‘Yeeeeeaaahhh...’

‘Why didn’t you tell me this sooner?!’

‘I... I mean, I made jokes about it pretty regularly. And so did other people.’

‘I thought those were just jokes!’

‘Well, they were. Mostly. I-I didn’t want to criticize you for your lifestyle, sweetie.’

‘That wasn’t my lifestyle!’

‘I am now realizing that, yes.’

‘AGH!’”

"1451

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 5 of 14))~~

Yangéra tilted her avian head at him. ‘You’re surprisingly oblivious when it comes to this sort of thing, aren’t you?’

‘Oh, shut up!’

‘If it makes you feel any better, Elena Salamanca really was not good enough. Especially after what I’ve just learned.’

Diego just palmed his forehead.

‘Think about it. If she thought you wouldn’t be loyal and yet still went as far as becoming your fiancée, then she was obviously just after your money in the first place.’

Another horrible thought occurred to him, and he looked up at Yangéra. ‘Did you have something to do with her leaving me?’

‘Of course not.’

He didn’t stop staring, however. To his eyes, the reaper was a deceptively sweet-looking dove, glowing with a gentle white light, save her eyes, which smoldered with tiny black flames.

‘Diego, I would never do that to you.’

Still, he kept looking at her.

‘She couldn’t even see me. How would I have possibly been able to sabotage your relationship?’

His gaze narrowed. ‘By convincing someone else to do it for you.’

‘Diego, sweetie. You’re talking crazy. Your happiness is too important to me.’

That statement could be taken two different ways, he felt. ‘Yangéra,’ he told her. ‘I am going to look into this later. And you know me. I will find the truth, one way or another. So if you did do something, I’ll be much less upset with you if you tell me right now.’

Her beak twisted as if it were human lips being pursed together.

He tried one more push. ‘Yangéra?’

‘...Okay, it was me.’

‘I FUCKING KNEW IT!’

‘You were too smitten to see what a mistake marrying that woman would’ve been! I had to do something!’

‘You insane asshole!’

‘She didn’t even know how to cook!’

‘Lots of women don’t know how to cook, Yangéra!’

‘Yeah, well, not in MY day! It’s shameful and unbecoming of a proper wife! And she wasn’t even willing to learn, either!’

His anger was only matched by his utter disbelief. ‘That’s it?! Is that the only reason?! Because she couldn’t cook?!’

'Of course not! That was just the example that epitomized the greater problem!'

'Which was?!'

'She treated you like shit! She had no respect for you as a boyfriend or potential husband!'

'What?! YOU have way less respect for me than she ever did!'

'Yeah, but the difference is, deep down, I still love you! She was just an ungrateful harlot!'

"Um, excuse me," came a new voice, and Diego turned to see a Hun'Sho gentleman standing there.

"Yes?" he said almost too calmly, though he shot one last glare at Yangéra. 'This conversation is NOT over.'

'Oh, believe me, I can't wait to continue it!'

"You are the one they call Diego Redwater, no?"

"That's me. And to whom do I have the honor of speaking?"

"My name is Jasirok."

"What can I help you with, Jasirok?"

"Forgive me if you have no idea what I am talking about, but I was wondering if you would like to discuss something called the Sosho'Diyu with me."

Diego's brow rose."

"1452

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 6 of 14))~~

The Hun'Sho man looked at the ground. "Or... what would it be called in your language? The... 'Grave of the Underworld?' Yes, I think that is it."

Diego was glad that the man seemed not to notice his surprise, because he was very much reluctant to just come right out and admit that he definitely wanted to discuss that subject. Thus far, he had not mentioned that name a single time to any of the Hun'Sho, nor had he heard it mentioned by anyone else. In the likely event that the Hun'Sho wanted to keep the treasure to themselves, Diego had felt it would be beyond imprudent to simply ask about it directly like some simpleton.

Yet here this man now was, this Jasirok, ready to offer him information out of nowhere.

Diego didn't trust the coincidence.

But it wasn't like he could just flatly refuse the guy, either. This was the first lead he'd found. Of course he had to learn more.

He needed to measure his next words carefully.

"I would be happy to talk about any subject you please," said Diego. "But why is it that this Sosho'Diyu seems to interest you so?"

'Good,' said Yangéra privately.

"Ah, it is just--you see, the last group of outsiders to visit us were very keen on the subject, so I thought you might be as well."

A rational explanation for the coincidence, Diego supposed. He allowed himself to relax, somewhat. But it did bring up another string of questions. "When did this last group of outsiders visit you, exactly?"

"Oh, it must have been a couple years ago now."

"Hmm. You're sure about that? You don't have trouble keeping track of the days down here? On the surface, we've got the sun to go by."

"The sun?" said Jasirok, almost laughing. "Ah, yes, I seem to recall reading about that method of timekeeping. Very quaint, but not at all necessary when one can feel the rotation of Eleg in one's chest."

Diego blinked. "Your brethren kept telling me about how 'close' they were to the planet, but I didn't think it extended that far."

"Indeed. It is about midday now, if you were wondering."

"Heh, I guess I'll have to take your word for it."

Yangéra decided to interject. "This previous group of outsiders--are these the same people whom Carver arrived here with?"

“Yes, they are. Why do you ask?”

‘It’s just, didn’t Carver come here five years ago? Not two?’

“He did, yes. But his companions returned for him two years ago. I was surprised when he did not leave with them. I suppose he simply found the Vault of Paradise to be exactly that, hmm?”

“Why is it called the Paradise Vault, by the way?” said Diego. “Not that this place isn’t wonderful, of course. I just find the name curious.”

Jasirok opened his mouth to answer but stopped himself before glancing around and trying again. “Ah... I sense that this conversation may become quite long. Would you like to come with me to my home? I feel we would be able to speak more comfortably there.”

"1453

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 7 of 14))~~

Diego gave the man a smile. “How could I possibly turn down such a generous invitation?”

Jasirok nodded and took the lead.

They followed him down the next side street and came to a towering, pitch black staircase that spiraled both up AND down, Diego noticed. This rocky ground that he’d been walking on was the same level on which they’d first arrived in Himmekel, so he’d been thinking that the town didn’t go any lower. Apparently, that was not the case.

He and Yangéra followed Jasirok downward, through the narrow hole that soon branched out into a multitude of hallways, several of which they simply passed by as they continued their descent. Jasirok exited at what Diego counted to be the eighth floor below Himmekel’s ground level.

The corridor was much larger than he expected as well, gradually widening out enough so that four or five people could have walked abreast in relative comfort. But he couldn’t tell how far it extended, because only darkness lay ahead.

In fact, there was no light anywhere down here, save that which Jasirok and the other Hun'Sho emitted. Diego supposed that made sense. These people probably didn't have much need for light sources of any kind, and if they were really as 'close to the planet' as they'd been saying, then Diego further suspected that they might also have something akin to a reaper's extra senses.

He decided to ask about it. "Hey, Jasirok, can you sense where this hallway ends?"

"Of course," the molten man said, as if it were the most obvious thing in the world. He looked like he wanted to ask a question of his own, perhaps wondering why Diego had asked such a thing, but Jasirok held his tongue.

'If you don't mind my asking, how old are you?' said Yangéra.

"I am only seven hundred and twenty-one," said Jasirok.

'Ha. You say "only," but you are even older than I am.'

"Truly?"

'Yes.'

"Oh my. But then, I am almost certainly not older than you in terms of genuine life experience, I should think."

"Does that mean you were born here in Himmekel?" said Diego.

"Yes, and I have never yet left it."

Diego exhaled silently through his mouth as he tried to imagine that. Growing up here of all places? In such confinement? He decided to ask a question that he'd asked of almost every other Hun'Sho he'd met. "Do you wish to leave this place?"

"Eventually, yes. I must admit, your presence here has sparked my curiosity a bit."

"But you don't intend to leave anytime soon," Diego surmised.

"Certainly not."

It was an easy conclusion to reach, considering every other Hun'Sho had told him much the same thing. "Why not?"

"The time is not yet right."

That, too, was the answer he'd been expecting. Despite how many times he'd brought the subject up previously, he had yet to receive any real elaboration on that point. He decided to give it another try, though. Perhaps Jasirok would be more forthcoming than the others. "How will you know when the time is right?"

"1454

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 8 of 14))~~

"I will know," said Jasirok.

"Y-yeah, but how?" said Diego.

"I simply will."

Diego frowned but was not surprised. Was this just another one of their "close to the planet" things? Perhaps the Heart of the World or the God of Fire would tell them when the time was right. He'd heard those two mentioned frequently enough when asking the Hun'Sho about their beliefs.

But if that's all it was, then why didn't they just say so?

As they walked, Diego saw several other Hun'Sho coming and going, some of whom he even thought he recognized. It was hard to tell, though. He hadn't gotten to the point where he could suss out the subtle distinguishing features between different Hun'Sho faces yet, and he was starting to worry that he never would. At most, he was beginning to see slight differences in the overall brightness with which some of the Hun'Sho glowed, but that was about it. Not to mention, looking directly into their faces for too long could be a bit hard on the eyes, like staring into a dim flashlight.

At length, they finally reached their destination when Jasirok stopped in front of a door and opened it for them. It had not been locked, Diego noticed, nor did it appear to have any sort of locking mechanism. It simply slid open with nothing more than a push.

Curious, Diego felt. "This is your home?" he asked.

"Indeed," said Jasirok. "Please make yourselves comfortable."

Diego wondered if he should add 'privacy' to the growing list of things that the Hun'Sho seemingly did not care about.

And perhaps 'spaciousness' also deserved to be on there.

The whole apartment, if it could even be called that, was little more than two rooms. Diego spotted a small shelf full of knickknacks, a tall stone cabinet, a few chairs, a large mirror, and a bed--which, after everything else he'd learned, he found somewhat surprising. So they really did need sleep.

Noticeably missing was a bathroom. He wondered if there was a communal one elsewhere in this apparent dormitory. Certainly, running water wasn't really an option down here, so he was curious about what sort of facilities they did use. Carver's biosphere had proved surprisingly well-equipped and even surface-like, sporting a functional sink and bathtub, though the water had been quite limited until Zeff intervened.

Diego had yet to broach that particular subject with anyone else, and by now, his curiosity was just about boiling over. He decided to just go ahead and ask the question that he most wanted an answer to. "Hey, do you poop?"

"Poop?"

'Diego!' said Yangéra privately.

"I am unfamiliar with that word," said Jasirok. "What is poop?"

"Uh... like... excrete waste?"

Jasirok merely returned a quizzical look.

'Why did you ask him that?'

'I wanted to know!'

Diego scratched his head. "Heh, ah... well, it doesn't matter. If you don't know what I'm talking about, then I guess that answers my question."

"1455

Jasirok seemed to not know what to say.

“Ah, um, anyway.” Diego decided to take the seat nearest the door. “You wanted to discuss the Sosho’Diyu with me, didn’t you?”

Yangéra perched herself on his shoulder. ‘And you were going to tell us why this place is called the Paradise Vault.’

“Yes, of course.” Jasirok took a seat by the mirror on the other side of the room, which was still well within leisurely speaking distance. “I know only of the story, as I had not been born yet, but my elders have told it to me many times. It begins with Guong Seyos of Himmestat.”

‘Oh,’ said Yangéra, ‘is Himmestat the name of that city we found on the way here, then?’

“Yes,” said Jasirok. “The City of Paradise.”

Diego was still a bit lost. “Ah--sorry. Guong Seyos? What does that mean?”

‘Guong is the Ancient Hunese title for a king,’ said Yangéra. ‘Or at least, a certain type of king. One of divine appointment, as I recall. A normal king would’ve just been called a Guo. And “Seyos” was the name of that king, yes?’

“You are very knowledgeable,” said Jasirok.

‘I try my best.’

“Don’t compliment her too much,” said Diego. “That’s pretty much the only thing she’s good for.”

‘I’m also good for preventing my loved ones from making life-ruining mistakes.’

Diego shot her a look. Oh, how he wanted to dive back into that argument. But for now, there was something else he wanted to know. “So... this guy called Seyos was some sort of ancient king of the Hun’Sho?”

“Correct.”

The reason Diego found that interesting was because of something he’d previously learned about the Hun’Sho here in Himmekel. One of the very first things he had asked about was who their leader was. But all of the Hun'Sho had said that no one was. They had said that Himmekel was a "community of equals." A few of the Hun'Sho hardly even seemed to understand what he was talking about, as if the entire concept of leadership was foreign to them, somehow.

Yet now Jasirok was saying that they previously had a king.

Of course, a thousand or so years left a lot of opportunity for a regime change, but he still found the discrepancy interesting. He wondered now if some of the Hun'Sho who'd acted the most ignorant had just been playing dumb with him. If Jasirok had heard this story many times, then surely, the other Hun'Sho would have as well, right?

Jasirok continued. "Seyos was a powerful Guong, supposedly the most powerful of his time. He had accumulated such vast wealth that even other Guong came to him, asking to share his fortune with them. Which he did. And he used that fortune as leverage over them, growing his influence even more. But the other Guong did not like this, as they were full of pride; and so, over many years, resentment slowly built between Seyos and the other Guong.

"Eventually, this resentment led to Seyos demanding all of his treasure back. But of course, the other Guong refused and even claimed that they would take everything else he had, too. So Guong Seyos built a grand vault to keep his remaining treasure safe. He made it much larger than necessary, because he planned to attack the other Guong and retrieve his borrowed wealth, but alas, this never came to pass.""
"1456

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 10 of 14))~~

Diego waited for Jasirok to elaborate, but when it seemed like he wasn't going to, he asked, "Why not? What stopped him from getting his treasure back?"

Jasirok opened his mouth, then shut it again.

'Is that when the Hun'Kui rose up?' said Yangéra.

Jasirok looked at her. After a moment, he gave a solemn nod.

'So the Paradise Vault, which was meant to save mere treasure, ended up saving hundreds of lives, instead.'

"Yes. In here, I am told, the Surajj'Byok could not reach us."

That caught Diego's attention. "The what could not reach you?"

"Ah..." Jasirok looked up at the ceiling, then at Yangéra. "I do not know how to translate that word."

She seemed at something of a loss as well. 'Uh... some sort of sickness? Byok means sickness, doesn't it?'

"Yes," said Jasirok. "That is right. The great blight could not reach us in here."

Diego tilted his head. "This is the first I'm hearing of any illness."

"It was the wicked tool of our ashen thralls," said Jasirok lowly. "In their madness, they unleashed it upon us and brought ruin to the world."

Diego wanted to ask more about it, but a specific question was eluding him. And moreover, Jasirok did not look especially receptive at the moment. This was the first time Diego had seen what looked like anger on a Hun'Sho's face. The molten man's glow had noticeably intensified, illuminating almost every corner of the apartment now.

Yangéra came up with a question, instead. 'What became of Guong Seyos and his treasure?'

Diego blinked. He definitely should've thought of that.

Jasirok's glow settled, though it took a minute. "...Guong Seyos survived, though he was Guong no longer. His treasure, however--I do not know what became of it, though I believe it may be the Sosho'Diyu that Carver and his companions were searching for."

Diego's heart sank. "Do you mean to say that the treasure never even made it to the Vault in the first place?"

Jasirok bobbed his head to the side. "Perhaps, but..."

Diego perked back up a little.

"Others may disagree with me," said Jasirok, "but I am of the opinion that the treasure is here. Somewhere."

'You sound confident,' said Yangéra.

“Would it not make the most sense?” the molten man said. “If Guong Seyos built the Vault of Paradise to protect his remaining wealth, then the very first thing he would have done upon completing it is move that wealth into it, no?”

Diego liked his logic. “Makes sense to me.”

‘You don’t think he might have removed the treasure afterward in order to make more room for your people?’

“That would... also be a possibility, yes.”

Yangéra allowed that stinging bit of rationality to sink in.

“But if it were here,” said Diego, “where do you think it might be?”

“I can hardly hazard a guess,” said Jasirok, “but I do think that there may still exist areas of the Vault that remain unexplored, even to this day.”

Yangéra gave a huff of obvious disbelief. ‘Really? Your people have been down here for a thousand years. How could you have not found every little nook and cranny by now?’

"1457

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 11 of 14))~~

At that question, Jasirok hesitated.

Uh-oh. Diego knew he had to help him out, lest this venture find itself dead in the water already. “...Maybe they just haven’t been looking hard enough,” Diego tried.

Yangéra’s beady, smoldering eyes squinted at him. ‘Even you can’t really believe that, can you?’

He really couldn’t. But that was beside the point. “I’m just saying, it wouldn’t hurt to take another look around. Or two or three more looks, maybe.”

‘Whatever. As long as it doesn’t delay us in reuniting with everyone.’

“No argument here.” By now, Diego could only imagine how worried Dimas and the others must have been. Two whole days without any contact? If he were in their shoes, he would be thinking the worst.

And certainly, Zeff Elroy was not going to let up, either. Diego doubted he would be able to convince that man to stay even a second longer than they absolutely needed to. As soon as that device of Carver’s was ready again, Zeff would probably show up like a tornado and try to sweep everyone out of here.

Diego didn’t entirely disagree with that sentiment, either. At this point, with how unlikely finding the treasure was beginning to seem, Diego mostly just wished that they had some way of getting around that feldeath more easily. He remembered it all too clearly, that giant beam of dark energy that it had shot out. Another one of those, at just the wrong moment, could probably obliterate their whole party in the blink of an eye, Diego felt.

“There is a reason,” came Jasirok’s voice.

Diego had lost track of the conversation. “Reason for what?”

Jasirok still looked reluctant to say more, but after a moment, he said, “There is a reason why I think there may be areas of Himmekel that even we do not know about.”

Diego’s expression brightened. He’d already given up on that argument.

The molten man seemed to need another push to get his explanation out, however, and Yangéra was the one to provide it. ‘Go on.’

“Before I do,” said Jasirok, “I feel I must confess something. This reason... is also why I wished to speak with you in the first place.”

“What?”

“The Sosho'Diyu does interest me, of course, but it is of secondary importance to what I am about to tell you.”

“Why all the build up, then?” said Diego. “If it’s the most important thing, why not tell it to us first?”

“Because...” Jasirok’s voice lowered to a whisper. “I was ordered not to speak of it.”

Diego's gaze flickered. "Ordered? By who?" And he stopped himself from saying anything further, but he wondered how the hell that coincided with Himmekel being a "community of equals," like he'd been told.

"By... my father," said Jasirok.

Ah. If it was a familial hierarchy rather than a broader societal one, then Diego could see how the discrepancy might be explained. But still, "ordered" had been an odd choice of word on Jasirok's part. Perhaps it could be chalked up to Mohssian not being the man's native language."

"1458

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 12 of 14))~~

Diego supposed they should just get to the heart of the matter already. "So what is it that he told you not to talk about, then?"

"Our missing brethren."

"Missing?" said Diego. "Your people have been going missing?"

"Yes. Ever since Carver's arrival five years ago, certain members of our community have begun to vanish without explanation."

Diego didn't understand. "Why would you guys want to keep something like that a secret from us?"

"...I do not know," said Jasirok. "On this matter, I find the others' behavior extremely irrational and worrisome."

"Hence why you're coming to me, I guess."

"Indeed."

Diego took a deep breath and scratched his neck, realizing where the conversation was headed. This was turning into a lot more than he had bargained for. "So you want us to help you find them, then?"

"Very much so, yes."

'Shit,' said Yangéra privately.

‘You want me to refuse?’ he asked her.

‘Oh, please. We both know you’re not going to refuse, no matter what I say.’

‘That’s because we both also know you don’t really WANT me to refuse.’

She just grumbled at him.

“In the beginning,” Jasirok went on, “I believed that they were merely leaving Himmekel entirely, perhaps having decided to venture out on their own for some reason I did not comprehend. However, I then decided to wait at the entrance and watch for anyone else leaving. I wanted to ask them why they were doing so, but I never found the opportunity, because I saw no one leave. And yet, during this same period, another person vanished.”

“Hmm,” Diego hummed.

‘You said it only started happening after Carver’s group appeared five years ago?’

Jasirok nodded. “I thought Carver might know something of the cause, but I have asked him many times, and he says he does not understand it, either.”

‘Could he be lying?’

“I suppose, but I do not think so. If he were truly behind the disappearances, then I imagine he would have left Himmekel with his companions when they visited two years ago.”

“What else can you tell us about these companions of his?” asked Diego.

“Oh, they were very charming,” said Jasirok. “Especially Ettol and his reaper. Those two befriended almost everyone in Himmekel.”

So there were servants among them. Diego supposed he should’ve expected as much. “What did this Ettol person look like?”

“Ah... I recall him having a distinct face, though I do not remember in what way.” Jasirok’s expression struggled. “I am sorry. Truthfully, you all look rather alike to me.”

How annoying. But then, Diego couldn't fault the guy much, either--not when he could barely tell the Hun'Sho apart, himself.

'What about his other companions?' said Yangéra. 'It was not just Ettol and his reaper, was it?'

"No, there were others," said Jasirok. He paused to think about it. "However... I am sorry. I cannot seem to remember much about them..."

Diego's brow twitched. This was beginning to sound familiar."
"1459

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 13 of 14))~~

'You don't seem particularly concerned about these strange people,' said Yangéra.

Jasirok merely tilted his head at her.

She exchanged glances with Diego. 'Are you not worried that they are behind the disappearances, somehow? I thought that was why you mentioned that the disappearances only started happening after they first arrived here.'

"No, no," said Jasirok. "That was only to give you a sense of chronology. I do not think Ettol and his comrades are to blame."

'Why not?'

"Because the disappearances began while they were away. Only Carver has been here all along, and... I mean no offense to him, but he is rather weak--in both body and spirit. I have no reason to believe that he could harm any of us by himself."

'Harsh,' said Yangéra privately.

'But not inaccurate,' thought Diego.

Yangéra returned to her public voice. 'Well, if you don't think Carver and his friends are responsible, then do you have some other theory?'

"I... do not," Jasirok admitted. Then he stood up from his chair.

“However, I did find this.” He moved toward his cabinet and opened it to retrieve a small object.

It was a pyramid, pitch black and perfectly shaped--apart from three stubby protrusions, one on each of the top sides.

Diego just waited for Jasirok to explain, but Yangéra got there first.

‘This is a Kag, isn’t it?’

“You recognize this object?” said Jasirok.

‘It’s a kind of ancient key. Do you know what it unlocks?’

Jasirok seemed confused. “Key? What does that word mean?”

The reaper struggled for an explanation. ‘It’s something that allows you to open something else.’

“I see...”

‘If you didn’t know what it was, then why were you showing it to us?’

“I found it in the residence of the first one who went missing. I had not seen the like before, so I decided to take it with me for study. I had yet to learn anything of it until just now.”

‘Hmm. Well, my question remains the same. Do you know what it unlocks?’

“I... I am still not quite certain I understand,” said Jasirok. “Unlocks?”

The reaper sighed. ‘Like a door? Or a box? This key should have an accompanying lock, somewhere.’

“I do not--”

“There are no locks in Himmekel,” said Diego.

They both looked at him.

He eyed Jasirok. “It was something I noticed earlier. You guys don’t have locks on any of your doors, windows, cabinets--anything. Pretty strange for a place that’s supposed to be a vault.”

“I... do not know what you mean.”

“Exactly,” said Diego. “You hardly even understand the concept of locking things up. In fact, privacy in general isn’t a very big concern among your people, is it?”

“I suppose not...”

“The only lock I’ve seen since coming here was at the very front entrance that Carver led us through, the one up in the ruins of Himmestat.”

‘Hmm.’”

"1460

~~((The 12 Pages of Christmas + Double Monday = Page 14 of 14))~~

Diego took the Kag from Jasirok in order to inspect it more closely. “So of course you can’t tell us what this key unlocks. You wouldn’t recognize the lock that it belongs to even if you saw it every single day for the last seven hundred years.”

“I...” Jasirok’s shoulders slumped a little, and he returned to his seat by the large mirror.

“Ah--I didn’t mean that as an insult,” said Diego. “It was just an observation. I wasn’t blaming you or anything.”

Still, the Hun’Sho man looked rather disheartened.

‘Nice going,’ said Yangéra privately.

‘Agh.’ Diego didn’t know what to say to him. ‘Could you help me out here?’

‘Uh, so this Ettol guy,’ said Yangéra publicly, ‘he wanted to know about the Soshō’Diyu, too, right? But do you know if he actually learned anything? Do you remember any of the specific questions that he was asking about it?’

Jasirok was quiet for a bit longer. “I... recall him asking about Guong Seyos quite a few times. He expressed an interest in meeting him.”

‘Oh, that’s right,’ she said, apparently trying to sound more optimistic, ‘you guys are all immortal, aren’t you? So if Seyos survived like you said, then he could still be alive! And if anyone knows where the treasure is, it would be him!’

“Indeed,” said Jasirok. “However, I do not know if Guong Seyos was a real person.”

“What?” said Diego.

“The elders appear to believe he was, and they lived through those events, so I do not wish to doubt them, but I have lived in Himmekel for my entire life, and I have never met anyone named Seyos, Guong or not.”

‘Hmm. Perhaps he changed his name.’

“If that is true, then I do not know how we will find him,” said Jasirok.

“We could ask one of your elders,” said Diego. “It sounds like they would know everything we need.”

Jasirok’s expression soured. “You will not find them cooperative. As I said before, I was ordered not to speak to you of this matter.”

“Maybe we can convince them. I can be pretty persuasive, when I want.”

The molten man shook his head. “You will fail. I assure you. Even Ettol could not sway them, as I recall, and they all seemed rather fond of him.”

Diego frowned.

“Additionally,” Jasirok continued, “when you do not succeed, the elders will know that someone spoke to you against their wishes. And they will likely realize that it was I, as they have heard me voice my dissent before.”

“Ah...”

The conversation all but died there. Jasirok was already looking defeated.

Diego couldn’t see a reason why the Hun’Sho would want to keep such a secret. But then, he still didn’t really understand the Hun’Sho themselves. Perhaps this was some sort of cultural thing. Pride or embarrassment, maybe.

Whatever it was, it was obnoxious.

‘C’mon, Diego,’ said Yangéra privately.

‘What?’

‘You’re weirdly good at figuring this sort of stuff out,’ she said. ‘Can’t you think of something?’

He actually could.

“...Who was the first person to go missing?” said Diego.

“Oh, that--”

Without warning, an enormous red-and-orange hand lunged out of the mirror on the wall. It grabbed Jasirok by the torso, yanked him out of his seat, and pulled him back through the mirror before Diego could so much as blink.

The mirror shattered, and Diego and Yangéra were left staring."
"1461 -- CLVI.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Six: ‘O, banneret of the Underworld...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“You see,” said the Hun’Sho man named Torveis with a hand over his open chest cavity, “as long as we have this, we do not require sustenance as you do.”

Hector stared with wide eyes as he listened. The man’s chest was largely hollow, apart from two dark, pulsing lungs and a small, glowing sphere suspended where the heart should have been. There were no bones or muscles. There wasn’t even any blood, unless a few streaks of dripping lava counted.

“And if I do this--” Torveis breathed in deeply, visibly inflating his lungs. The magma coating the outside of his body suddenly retracted inward, filling his open chest so completely that he had to close it again before it started leaking out of the front hole he’d made earlier. “--Well, you can see the result.”

Hector didn't know what to say. On the outside, at least, the man no longer looked like a being of molten rock. Torveis looked far more normal--relatively speaking, at least.

In fact, he looked uncannily similar to the Hun'Kui. The ashy gray skin tone, the glowing eyes. The only real differences that Hector could spot were that the glow was more orange than white and that it wasn't just the eyes glowing but also the mouth and several other porous marks all along the man's arms, legs, and chest.

He didn't think he should bring up the Hun'Kui, though.

"So that little round thing in there makes it so you don't ever need food?" Hector decided to ask instead.

"Yes," said Torveis. "As a matter of fact, I imagine that most of us here in Himmekel did not even understand the concept of food until Carver first appeared."

"That just seems crazy to me..."

"At times, however, we may choose to absorb extra rock in order to replenish any core magma that we may have lost. So perhaps you may find that similar."

"Hmm. How would you lose your, uh... core magma?"

"Overexertion or being wounded, perhaps."

"Huh..." Hector wondered what qualified as a wound, then. He noticed that the big hole that Torveis' had made in his chest had sealed back up already. And the man hadn't seemed particularly concerned about ripping his own skin open, either.

'This is the first time I have ever seen a Hun'Sho's core in person,' said Garovel, who had been hovering by Hector's side. 'It was quite bold of you to show us, was it not? And awfully trusting, too.'

"Trusting?" Magma began gradually accumulating all over Torveis' body again, oozing out of the holes in his skin--thankfully not through the eyes or mouth, though. "Ah, do you mean in the event that you decided to attack me?"

'Pretty much, yeah,' said Garovel. 'Not that we would do such a thing, of course.'

Torveis tilted his head. "I had not considered that, but I suppose you are right. All of the surface-dwellers whom I have met have struck me as quite trustworthy, and you are no different, I feel.""

"1461 -- CLVI.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Six: 'O, banneret of the Underworld...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"You see," said the Hun'Sho man named Torveis with a hand over his open chest cavity, "as long as we have this, we do not require sustenance as you do."

Hector stared with wide eyes as he listened. The man's chest was largely hollow, apart from two dark, pulsing lungs and a small, glowing sphere suspended where the heart should have been. There were no bones or muscles. There wasn't even any blood, unless a few streaks of dripping lava counted.

"And if I do this--" Torveis breathed in deeply, visibly inflating his lungs. The magma coating the outside of his body suddenly retracted inward, filling his open chest so completely that he had to close it again before it started leaking out of the front hole he'd made earlier. "--Well, you can see the result."

Hector didn't know what to say. On the outside, at least, the man no longer looked like a being of molten rock. Torveis looked far more normal--relatively speaking, at least.

In fact, he looked uncannily similar to the Hun'Kui. The ashy gray skin tone, the glowing eyes. The only real differences that Hector could spot were that the glow was more orange than white and that it wasn't just the eyes glowing but also the mouth and several other porous marks all along the man's arms, legs, and chest.

He didn't think he should bring up the Hun'Kui, though.

"So that little round thing in there makes it so you don't ever need food?" Hector decided to ask instead.

"Yes," said Torveis. "As a matter of fact, I imagine that most of us here in Himmekel did not even understand the concept of food until Carver first appeared.”

“That just seems crazy to me...”

“At times, however, we may choose to absorb extra rock in order to replenish any core magma that we may have lost. So perhaps you may find that similar.”

“Hmm. How would you lose your, uh... core magma?”

“Overexertion or being wounded, perhaps.”

“Huh...” Hector wondered what qualified as a wound, then. He noticed that the big hole that Torveis’ had made in his chest had sealed back up already. And the man hadn’t seemed particularly concerned about ripping his own skin open, either.

‘This is the first time I have ever seen a Hun’Sho’s core in person,’ said Garovel, who had been hovering by Hector’s side. ‘It was quite bold of you to show us, was it not? And awfully trusting, too.’

“Trusting?” Magma began gradually accumulating all over Torveis’ body again, oozing out of the holes in his skin--thankfully not through the eyes or mouth, though. “Ah, do you mean in the event that you decided to attack me?”

‘Pretty much, yeah,’ said Garovel. ‘Not that we would do such a thing, of course.’

Torveis tilted his head. “I had not considered that, but I suppose you are right. All of the surface-dwellers whom I have met have struck me as quite trustworthy, and you are no different, I feel.”

"1462

‘Kind words, thank you,’ said Garovel. ‘But I would still prefer you to exercise more caution in the future. Even if it is rather durable on its own, your core is still your greatest vulnerability. And let me assure you, there are plenty of surface-dwellers who are most definitely NOT deserving of your trust.’

Torveis laughed lightly. “My brethren have often berated me for my carelessness as well, but I shall try to take your words into consideration.”

Hector had a question now. "What is that thing, exactly? Y-your core, I mean. Like, what's it made out of?"

'Rock and ardor, no?' said Garovel.

"That is correct," said Torveis. "It is said that Avar himself bestowed it upon us, giving birth to the first of our people."

"Avar?" said Hector. "Not the Heart of the World? I mean, it's just--I would've guessed, ah... er... considering it's like your actual heart and everything..."

"Ah. Yes, I suppose now that you mention it, there are those who believe it was the work of the Heart of the World, instead."

"But you believe it was Avar?"

"I do," said Torveis.

"Why?"

Torveis laughed again. "Well, there are many reasons. For one, Avar is far more benevolent and righteous than the Heart of the World. Much more deserving of my belief, I feel. And for another, I have seen Avar in my dreams. I have even spoken to him there."

Hector didn't have a response for that.

Garovel did, though. 'Are you sure those weren't just, y'know, dreams?'

"Aha, perhaps they were," said Torveis. "But I see that it is as I have heard, regarding the cynicism of your kind."

'Sorry if that was rude,' said Garovel. 'But I won't deny that I'm very doubtful of religion in general. It's nothing personal, if that makes you feel any better.'

"It does not," said Torveis, though he was laughing again.

'Ah.' Garovel looked at Hector briefly before returning to Torveis. 'I've heard that your core is also how you keep track of time. Is that true?'

"Ah, indeed, it is," said Torveis. "I am sure it was simply moving too slowly for you notice when you were looking at it a moment ago, but my core spins in synchronicity with the planet."

‘Yeah, I’ve heard that as well. Glad to know I wasn’t lied to.’

Hector was having a hard time wrapping his head around that one. “How does it--? Ah... I mean, how does your core sync with the whole planet? That’s, uh...? I don’t understand...”

“We are close to the planet,” said Torveis.

That didn’t really help, Hector felt.

“I would tell you that this, too, is Avar’s blessing, but I fear that Garovel here would challenge me.”

That made the reaper chuckle. ‘So what does the God of Fire tell you in these dreams of yours, then?’

Torveis folded his arms. “I am not certain I wish to tell you.”

‘Oh, come on, I’m genuinely curious. And I may not believe you, but I’m sure Hector does. He’s super gullible.’

“Wow, Garovel, really?” said Hector.”

"1463

Torveis looked at Hector. “Jests aside, is that true? Do you believe me?”

Hector tried not to look like a deer in the headlights. “Uh, I... I don’t know yet. But, ah... I’m trying to keep an open mind, I guess.”

“And you would be convinced if you heard what Avar said to me?”

Hector bobbed his head to the side. “Depends on what he said. I shouldn’t promise to be convinced before I even hear it, should I?”

“Aha, I suppose not. Very well, I shall tell you.”

Truthfully, Hector was still mainly hung up on the whole “core of life that spins with the planet” thing, but it didn’t seem like Torveis was the one who would be able to explain that to him--at least, not in a way that he understood. Maybe it was something he would ask Emiliana about later. Assuming she ever intended to speak to him again.

“Avar’s message was one of great hope,” Torveis went on. “He said unto me that my people should take heart, for though we have struggled and been hurt for many long years now, He will return for us when the time is right.”

Not the most persuasive, Hector felt, especially that bit at the end. He could only imagine how Garovel’s doubt was growing.

Torveis had more. “He also said that the time is near, as He has already reawakened into this world.”

‘Mm,’ said Garovel. ‘How long ago did he tell you this?’

Torveis’ molten lips pressed together briefly. “...About three hundred years ago, I suppose.”

Garovel was at least considerate enough to keep his roaring laughter private.

“If I am to be completely honest,” said Torveis, “it has been almost as many years since Avar last spoke to me. Which, I admit, is somewhat disheartening, but I believe it may be caused by his reawakening. Perhaps the reason he no longer appears in my dreams is because he is himself no longer slumbering.”

That... kind of made sense, if Hector wanted to be generous. And maybe it was just the result of Garovel’s sustained and echoing guffaw, but Hector was starting to feel bad for Torveis. “Ah... d-do you know what Avar looks like? Or maybe what he will look like when he returns for you?”

“I do not know if He will retain the same form when he arrives, but in my dreams, he appeared before me as a great and majestic bird.”

Garovel’s laughter abruptly cut off. ‘You know what birds look like?’ he said publicly.

“...Ah, yes, one of the surface-dwellers described them to me. I am afraid I cannot recall which, but I remember them speaking of many of your animals from the surface.”

And Hector noticed Garovel’s brief silence.

‘But Carver only arrived here five years ago,’ the reaper said, ‘and you said the last time Avar spoke to you was around three hundred years ago.’

"Yes. I was only able to recognize His form in retrospect."

"1464

'I see,' said Garovel. 'Pretty strange how Avar would choose to appear to you in the form of an animal you'd never seen before.'

"Such is His vast knowledge and power," said Torveis. "Perhaps He thought I would be less moved by His presence if He took the form of an animal I had previously seen."

'That would make sense. But I was beginning to wonder--or dare I say, HOPE--that you had been to the surface, yourself. I would have been extremely interested to hear what your opinion of the surface world was after having seen it with your own eyes.'

For a moment, Torveis just looked at him. "I should like to go there, one day, but as yet, I am afraid I have not."

'Pity.'

And a suddenly heavy silence drew out.

'He's probably lying,' said Garovel privately. 'This man has been to the surface before.'

Hector had about a dozen questions, the first of which was, 'Hun'Sho can survive on the surface?'

'Yeah. Their magma lets them regulate their body temperature pretty efficiently.'

'Why would he lie about that?'

'I don't know, and that's what's bothering me.'

'Maybe Avar really did take the form of a bird in his dreams.'

'Yeah, sure.'

Torveis revived the conversation. "Perhaps you could tell me of more animals from the surface. I have heard that you have quite a large variety, compared to the Undercrust."

‘Heh, he’s a really good liar,’ said Garovel, still privately. Then he switched over to public voice. ‘That’s true. The environment on the surface is a bit more forgiving, though it can be dangerous in many other ways.’

“I am intrigued. Please do tell me more.”

And Hector just listened as Garovel did so. The reaper spoke of many different animals, some of which Hector didn’t know much about himself and therefore was almost as interested to learn of as Torveis appeared to be.

But all the while, Hector couldn’t help feeling as if a shadow had been cast over the conversation, as if it were mostly just an act now.

He wondered if Garovel was right, and Torveis really had been lying; or if that was just Garovel’s cynical bias, and Torveis really had seen the God of Fire in his dreams before ever knowing what a bird looked like. Of course, he was much more inclined to believe Garovel, if only because he barely even knew Torveis, but still, it was pretty obvious now that Garovel didn’t know everything. Even if the reaper liked to say otherwise.

At length, a new voice arrived.

“Lord Darksteel.” It was Manuel Delaguna and his reaper, Lorios. They were also accompanied by the non-servant woman from before, whose name Hector had since learned was Elise Garza.

Hector noticed the look on Manuel’s face first. “Is something wrong?”

Lorios floated forward and addressed Torveis. ‘We apologize for interrupting, but might we borrow these two from you for a minute?’

“But of course,” said Torveis, gesturing with one hand. “I feel I should apologize for monopolizing them to myself for quite some time now.””

"1465

Hector and Garovel excused themselves and followed Manuel out of the building.

Hector got to wondering about Torveis as they walked. Certainly, the man was not lacking in politeness. Most of the Hun’Sho were like that, it seemed, but Torveis in particular had struck Hector as even more so. Somehow, it made Hector not want to even humor the idea that the man had been lying to them.

But then, wouldn't that be what a liar wanted? Wouldn't that be a compelling reason for a liar to go out of their way to be polite in the first place?

Then again, Hector knew that he wasn't exactly a paragon of honesty, himself. He'd told plenty of his own lies, hadn't he? Some quite recently.

Whatever the case, Hector figured he shouldn't jump to any conclusions or rush to any judgments.

Manuel's group remained mostly quiet en route to Carver's biosphere.

'So why did you come to get us?' asked Garovel along the way.

"It was at Lord Diego's behest," said Manuel. "He also said to not go near any mirrors."

'...What?'

"I can't say I fully understand, either," said Manuel. "But he didn't seem like he was joking. He has gone to retrieve the Water Dragon. He said he will explain further once we have all gathered."

Hector needed a moment to remember who "the Water Dragon" referred to. The last time he heard someone call Zeff that was at Dunehall when Ivan, of all people, said it.

When they made it back to the biosphere, Diego was not there, so they decided to take a seat in the main room and wait for him.

Hector reworked his armor for the cooler environment instead of simply removing it. Heavy though it was, he was beginning to feel more comfortable with it on than with it off, perhaps because he had spent so much time learning to materialize it perfectly around his body. No longer did it feel too bulky around his torso, too tight around his neck, or too loose around his feet. Best of all, though, he had finally managed to curve and interweave the joints just right so that they stopped pinching him when they touched. Even with a thick layer of cloth for added protection, that had occasionally been a nuisance.

He still wanted to try out some different styles of visors for his helmet, though. Perhaps he could still improve his visibility in some way.

“Lord Darksteel?” came a feminine voice. It of course belonged to Elise Garza, who was staring at him. “Why do you keep your armor on? Are you afraid we will attack you?”

Oh shit. He hadn’t even considered what they might be thinking. What was he supposed to say here? ‘Garovel, help...’

‘Of course we aren’t worried about that,’ said Garovel. ‘But my “Lord Darksteel” here is ever vigilant, you see. We have had some rather nasty surprises in the past, and perhaps as a result of that, he has developed a habit of keeping his guard up even when things seem peaceful.’

She couldn’t hear any of that, of course, as she was not a servant, but Manuel was kind enough to relay it to her.

Hector breathed silently in relief."

"1466

‘You like that bullshit I came up with?’ said Garovel privately. ‘Pretty impressive, huh?’

Hector had to admit, the speed at which the reaper had answered her was surprising. ‘Am I crazy, or did you seem... prepared for that question?’

‘Heh. You’re really keeping that armor on because it gives you something to hide in, no?’

Hector wanted to deny it, but he couldn’t.

‘That’s what I thought.’ The reaper floated over to Hector’s other shoulder. ‘Don’t mind me. I’ll just continue being incredible over here, if you need anything else.’

“Lord Darksteel.” This time it was Manuel again. “Might I ask what you think of these Hun’Sho people so far?”

Okay, this “Lord Darksteel” business was getting a little out of hand, Hector felt. As awkwardly flattering as it was, he figured he should tell them--

'I would be interested to hear your opinion as well, Lord Darksteel,' said Lorios.

'Yeah, Lord Darksteel,' said Garovel, though he was still keeping his voice private. 'Go on. Tell them what you think. And don't tell them to call you Hector, either. I've had enough of that shit.'

'What? Why not?'

'They're showing you respect. Just accept it gracefully like a proper lord would.'

'But--'

'Better hurry and answer 'em. They're waiting patiently.'

Hector had to force himself not to groan in exasperation. "Ah..."

Manuel, Elise, and Lorios were all looking at him.

Slow and deliberate speech, Hector reminded himself. Careful, measured words. He'd done it before in front of total assholes. He could do it again in front of these nice people. Probably.

Oh god.

"I think," he heard himself say, "that... the Hun'Sho... are very polite." Why the hell was that simple-ass sentence so difficult to get out? Agh. He had to give them more of his thoughts than just that, he knew. "Almost... too polite, actually."

Manuel nodded. "I understand what you mean. I, too, have thought that they might be concealing something from us. Which is their right, I suppose, but given Lord Diego's behavior... I am growing more concerned about them."

"I have to agree," said Elise. "And their treatment of the Hun'Kui is troubling, as well. It's like the Hun'Sho are pretending they do not even exist."

'Sadly, I doubt there is much we can do to help them reconcile,' said Lorios. 'We should probably just be glad that they aren't trying to kill each other.'

Hector was more than happy to just listen. He hadn't gotten to know these three very well at all, which might have been why he found it more difficult to speak to them, compared to Zeff or Diego.

And after that conversation with Emiliana earlier, he supposed he was feeling even more self-conscious than usual. He really didn't want to fuck things up with these people, too.

Though, a strong part of him still didn't feel like he'd fucked up with Emiliana, either. He'd said what he'd wanted to say--and meant it. If she'd gotten mad at that, then, well...

Ugh.

There was one thing he knew for sure, at least. All this time, he'd been absolutely right to be terrified of social interaction."

"1467

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 1 of 8))~~

"I am also concerned about what our kin in Capaporo are doing now," said Manuel. "While a part of me is glad that they have not come for us in some haphazard fashion, I am also... surprised that they haven't."

'What do you mean?' said Garovel.

"Think of it," said Manuel. "We are talking about the likes of Darktide, Grayguard, the Yellow Tempest, the Blue Bull, the Lord of the Drowning Sky, and the Lion of the Desert. Knowing what we know of these people, I find it difficult to believe that, even if they did believe us dead, they would not at least come searching for our corpses."

Hector was beginning to notice a pattern with this Manuel fellow.

However, he had not heard a few of those names before. He didn't know who Grayguard or the Yellow Tempest referred to, but the Blue Bull? Given what Hector remembered of the siege of Marshrock, that name could have only belonged to Salvador Delaguna. The man's size alone accounted for the animal, and his cobalt transfiguration power accounted for the color. And the Lord of the Drowning Sky? That was a strange name, but he couldn't imagine that it belonged to anyone other than Dimas Sebolt. That man's aerial mobility was unmatched by any other Rainlord whom Hector had met--arguably any other servant he had met.

“So what are you saying?” said Elise. “Do you believe something is preventing them from coming after us?”

“Possibly,” said Manuel. “It has been nearly three days, yet none of the reapers have sensed them.”

‘I think you are worrying too much,’ said Lorios. ‘They could be searching for us right now and simply having trouble finding us. We fell a long way, remember? Not to mention all the monsters above us right now, making it more difficult to sense anything or anyone specific.’

“That is true,” Manuel admitted. “But even so, I imagine Bloodhound would have been able to locate us by now.”

Okay, who the hell was Bloodhound? Hector wondered if Manuel was just making some of these names up himself.

He did find himself agreeing with Manuel, though. Especially with regard to Asad. After witnessing the lengths that the man had gone to for Zeff back in Sair, Hector doubted that even a nest of giant worms would prevent Asad from coming to help him again.

Oh, hey, maybe that was a way he could contribute to this conversation. He gathered his composure, waited for an opening, and said, “...I don’t think Asad would ever leave Zeff behind.”

“Yes,” said Manuel. “If recent events have proven anything, it is that the Lion and the Dragon care even more for one another than most of us realized.”

Hector couldn’t help smiling meekly beneath his helmet. Social interaction certainly was terrifying, but it wasn’t all bad, either.

He probably shouldn’t have been getting such a strong feeling of accomplishment for making such a minor contribution to the conversation, though, he figured.”

"1468

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 2 of 8))~~

Maybe he was just in a weird mood. Somehow, he felt like he was back in school again, attempting the impossible task of making friends with normal people.

After that, Hector wasn't able to speak up much more, but that may have also been the result of the conversation simply not going anywhere else. It was mainly just the Rainlords expressing their worries more, and Hector didn't feel terribly compelled to say anything else, not when it might just further increase that worry.

Unsurprisingly, Garovel did a much better job of trying to comfort them than he could have.

At length, Diego finally arrived, though the Lord Elroy was not with him.

'Where's Zeff?' asked Garovel.

"I explained the situation to him, but he didn't want to stop his work," said Diego. "He's determined to get us out of here as soon as possible and doesn't seem to care about much else, right now."

Hector couldn't say he was surprised.

"Will you explain the situation to us now?" said Elise. "We have been wondering what is going on for some time."

"Of course." Diego took a seat next to Hector. He explained about his encounter with the Hun'Sho named Jasirok and presented the pyramidal key known as a Kag for the group to examine. Then he told them about what he had witnessed.

A period of incredulity passed as the group asked for clarification, of which Diego and Yangéra could unfortunately provide little.

A giant hand appearing from a mirror.

A mirror?

Apparently, Hector wasn't the only one to pick up on that coincidence, because Garovel was the first to ask, 'Was there anything strange about the mirror?'

"Not that we noticed," said Diego. "I didn't think to examine the mirror too closely when I first saw it, but it seemed normal enough. After it happened, though, the mirror shattered instantly. I brought one of the pieces, if you want to see it for yourself." He rifled through his pockets and retrieved a jagged mirror shard.

They passed it around, though Elise was kept away from it, in case it decided to do anything else unexpected. When Hector and Garovel got their chances to examine it, they didn't see anything particularly notable about it. It certainly didn't have the odd, foggy look to it that Hector recalled the Courier's mirror having.

But maybe that didn't matter. Maybe its power had left it after breaking.

Afterward, the group struggled to figure out their next move.

"It seems obvious enough that we should try to locate whatever lock this Kag goes to," said Diego, "but we have no idea where to start looking. And from the way Jasirok was talking, it sounded like asking the other Hun'Sho for help might be a bad idea."

"I agree," said Elise. "As nice as they have been to us, I simply don't trust them very much. They could decide to hinder our investigation rather than help it."

The three reapers all seemed to concur."

"1469 -- CLVII.

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 3 of 8))~~

"What about the Hun'Kui, then?" said Manuel. "They might be able to help us."

"Ah, and I highly doubt they will tell the Hun'Sho of what we are doing," added Elise.

On that point, Hector could agree. And those four Hun'Kui had been through hell with them, so there was at least a modicum of camaraderie to be had. His talk with Eleyo earlier had affirmed him of that much.

Still, he noticed Diego hesitating. And he wasn't the only one who did.

"...Do you not trust the Hun'Kui, Lord Diego?" said Manuel.

"I don't know," the man said. "But I suppose asking for their help would allow us keep an eye on them."

'That's true,' said Yangéra. 'Just don't turn your back on them, everyone. Remember that they're still strangers to us.'

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Seven: 'A glimpse of Madness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Francisco Elroy had to admit, the view from his room was stunning. The Omarest Mountain Range of Dante was known for its skiing even as far away as Sair, and now he could see why. The snow outside his window was unlike anything he'd seen in Agquarey.

Under different circumstances, he might have been able to enjoy visiting this luxurious, mansion-sized cabin in the middle of nowhere.

The question of why the hell he was here in the first place had still not been answered to his satisfaction. He understood that the crazy old guy named Damian Rofal was responsible, but beyond that, not much was clear.

The last thing he remembered before waking up here was fighting a group of Vanguardian jackasses in his school. And now he'd come to find that one of those very jackasses was here with him, not much more aware of what was going on than he was, apparently.

His reaper, Dennex, had advised him not to ask too many questions, however, and Cisco could see the wisdom in that, especially after what Dunstan Rofal, the Vanguardian jackass in question, had told him.

"My family is a bunch of criminals," he'd said. "I suggest you not trust any of them. And my grandfather in particular is... well, he's a lot more dangerous than I ever realized, it would seem."

They'd been here for a couple weeks now, so naturally, Cisco had been trying to find a means of escape--with Dunstan's help, surprisingly. But this place was much more of a prison than it looked. The building's three floors may have had an open-air layout to them, and the furniture may have been as ritzy as Cisco had ever seen, and the food may have even been pretty damn good, but there was some sort of high-level soul net preventing not just the reapers from leaving, but people, too.

From what Cisco had thus far gathered, it had something to do with the tall, rocky spires that stood all around the structure. They looked normal enough at a glance and as of now, were half-buried in snow, but when he'd touched them a few days ago, he could feel them humming in a way that was most certainly unnatural."

"1469 -- CLVII.

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 3 of 8))~~

"What about the Hun'Kui, then?" said Manuel. "They might be able to help us."

"Ah, and I highly doubt they will tell the Hun'Sho of what we are doing," added Elise.

On that point, Hector could agree. And those four Hun'Kui had been through hell with them, so there was at least a modicum of camaraderie to be had. His talk with Eleyo earlier had affirmed him of that much.

Still, he noticed Diego hesitating. And he wasn't the only one who did.

"...Do you not trust the Hun'Kui, Lord Diego?" said Manuel.

"I don't know," the man said. "But I suppose asking for their help would allow us keep an eye on them."

'That's true,' said Yangéra. 'Just don't turn your back on them, everyone. Remember that they're still strangers to us.'

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Seven: 'A glimpse of Madness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Francisco Elroy had to admit, the view from his room was stunning. The Omarest Mountain Range of Dante was known for its skiing even as far away as Sair, and now he could see why. The snow outside his window was unlike anything he'd seen in Aguary.

Under different circumstances, he might have been able to enjoy visiting this luxurious, mansion-sized cabin in the middle of nowhere.

The question of why the hell he was here in the first place had still not been answered to his satisfaction. He understood that the crazy old guy named Damian Rofal was responsible, but beyond that, not much was clear.

The last thing he remembered before waking up here was fighting a group of Vanguardian jackasses in his school. And now he'd come to find that one of those very jackasses was here with him, not much more aware of what was going on than he was, apparently.

His reaper, Dennex, had advised him not to ask too many questions, however, and Cisco could see the wisdom in that, especially after what Dunstan Rofal, the Vanguardian jackass in question, had told him.

"My family is a bunch of criminals," he'd said. "I suggest you not trust any of them. And my grandfather in particular is... well, he's a lot more dangerous than I ever realized, it would seem."

They'd been here for a couple weeks now, so naturally, Cisco had been trying to find a means of escape--with Dunstan's help, surprisingly. But this place was much more of a prison than it looked. The building's three floors may have had an open-air layout to them, and the furniture may have been as ritzy as Cisco had ever seen, and the food may have even been pretty damn good, but there was some sort of high-level soul net preventing not just the reapers from leaving, but people, too.

From what Cisco had thus far gathered, it had something to do with the tall, rocky spires that stood all around the structure. They looked normal enough at a glance and as of now, were half-buried in snow, but when he'd touched them a few days ago, he could feel them humming in a way that was most certainly unnatural."

"1470

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 4 of 8))~~

He'd never even heard of a soul net that could do something like this, but Damian Rofal had been full of such surprises. The old man's pet worms were probably the most notable in that regard. Even the other members of the Rofal family seemed to be uncomfortable around those things.

"Don't worry," Damian had told everyone gathered in the main room, "they don't bite. They will give you a nasty shock, but it probably won't be enough to kill you. And as long as you stay within the barrier, they'll leave you alone. So just relax, everyone! Everything will be just fine! You'll see!"

The listeners hadn't looked pleased, but none of them had voiced any objections, either--apart from Damian's apparent wife, whose loud and frequent questions the old man never bothered to answer. Instead, Damian would just sidle up to her, give her a quick kiss on the nose or the cheek, and then run away again.

And even knowing what Dunstan had told him, Cisco found it difficult to not feel pity for these people. None of them were servants, as far as Cisco could tell. Criminals or not, they were still normal human beings, trapped here along with him and Dunstan by their insane patriarch.

And no one seemed to know what Damian's plan was, either. Dennex and Rezamaar were going around, eavesdropping on everyone's conversations, but that critical question had remained unanswered.

Damian himself had also been curiously absent, much of the time. Cisco thought the old man might have been going out in order to find and retrieve more family members, but by all accounts, there were none. Dunstan had been the last family member to arrive.

Ultimately, Cisco found himself with an abundance of downtime on his hands. He tried to make use of it as best he could by meditating and practicing with his ability, but he found it difficult to concentrate on such things with so much uncertainty hanging around him. There wasn't any internet or even electricity for that matter, so catching up on the news was also impossible.

And that was perhaps the most worrisome thing.

Whenever he thought about his family, his imagination was left to run wild. From what little Dunstan had been able to tell him, the Vanguard had failed to capture his father or any of his other family members, but the Rainlords as a whole had still been dealt a massive blow.

Cisco wondered when he would see home again. Or if he ever would.

"Up for another game?" came Dunstan's voice.

Cisco turned from the window and saw him standing there, chessboard in hand. Honestly, he wasn't up for it, but there wasn't much else to do, so Cisco just nodded and followed him down the stairs and onto the main floor by one of the cabin's three fireplaces.

At least the extra warmth was nice.

A few of the other Rofals were enjoying it as well. As Cisco recalled, their names were Lucia, Jonah, and Elwood.

Dunstan didn't seem to appreciate their company very much, nor they his."

"1471

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 5 of 8))~~

No words were exchanged, but everyone kept throwing glances and glares in Dunstan's direction, and he wasn't shy in returning them, either. Perhaps they were trying to tell him to leave without actually having to tell him, and perhaps he was doing the same.

All in all, it made for an intensely uncomfortable atmosphere.

But not an unfamiliar one.

In fact, after two weeks in this place, Cisco had long since grown weary of this. Maybe Dennex was right and staying totally quiet was the wisest course of action here, but frankly, it was obnoxious. And besides, Cisco had always hated this sort of passive aggression. He much preferred proper confrontation.

"So I hear you're all a bunch of a criminals," said Cisco.

Dunstan just about drowned in the glass of water he was drinking from.

Cisco didn't avert his gaze from the other Rofals, though. He wanted to see their faces, their reactions.

Lucia laughed. Jonah glared. Elwood scowled.

"Is that what Dunc over there told you?" said Elwood. He was a tall man with a gravelly voice and a strong, clean shaven jawline. He was wearing silky red-and-gold pajamas, but that didn't inform Cisco of much, because everyone else was doing the same. There wasn't a whole lot of motivation to get properly dressed when everyone knew they weren't going anywhere. Not to mention, there wasn't much variety of clothing available here, either.

"You shouldn't put too much credence in what that loser says," said Jonah. Compared to Elwood, this guy looked pretty small, though he was probably around average weight and height.

And they all had the same dark hair and thick, arched eyebrows.

"Okay," said Cisco flatly. "So tell me what the truth is, then."

And perhaps they hadn't expected him to say that, because both men paused.

"Elwood here is an illegal arms dealer," said Dunstan, having found his composure again. "And Jonah--well, he's just a loan shark, but he gets his jollies from smacking kids around, probably to vent his frustration over how pathetic he is."

Jonah shot up out of his seat and stomped toward them. "You fuckin' little--!" He backhanded Dunstan hard enough to knock him out of his chair. "Cecilia shoulda taught you some fuckin' manners!"

'Kick his ass, Dunstan!' said Rezamaar, grabbing his shoulder to invoke the servant's vigor.

"That wasn't necessary, Reza," said Dunstan.

"What're you talkin' about, huh, bitch?!" said Jonah. "Get up so I can put your ass down again!"

And Dunstan did get back up.

Having fought Dunstan himself, Cisco knew this wasn't going to be pretty. But at the same time, Dunstan didn't look out of control. He seemed entirely calm. Cisco might have decided to step in, otherwise.

Jonah swung, and Dunstan caught his fist with one hand as if it were a tennis ball. Jonah barely got the chance to look surprised before Dunstan swept one of his legs, shoved him to the floor, and sat on him. He kept Jonah's hand, though, and twisted the wrist a little.

"You little fucker--agh!"

"1472

Dunstan grabbed the man's throat. "Not so tough now, eh, Jonah?" He squeezed. "Remember when you did this exact same thing to one of my friends? Hmm? Made him cry out for his mother, remember? Should I make you do that, too? Your mother's actually in the building, so maybe she'll show up."

Cisco noticed more Rofals coming out of their rooms on the second and third floors in order to see what the commotion was. Lucia had not moved from her curled up position on the couch, and Elwood was on his feet but not moving to help, perhaps because Dunstan was staring right at him while talking to Jonah.

'Nice going,' said Dennex privately.

The reaper had a point, Cisco knew, but he didn't mind this so much. At least it was more interesting than playing another board game.

"Oh, but wait a minute," said Dunstan. "You didn't twist my friend's wrist like this, did you, Jonah? That's my mistake." He let go of Jonah's hand. Then he further tightened his grip on the man's throat. "No, you just put a gun to his head, instead."

Cisco could hear Jonah struggling to breathe.

'You're killing him,' said Dennex publicly.

'Maybe that'd be for the best,' said Rezamaar. She didn't sound like she was joking.

Cisco felt he might need to intervene now and stood. "Stop," he said firmly.

But when Dunstan turned to look over at him, Cisco barely recognized him. The expression on the other young man's face was unlike anything Cisco had yet seen from him during these past two weeks.

Dunstan was smiling. He was enjoying himself.

"Let him go," said Cisco. "Didn't you tell me you weren't like them?"

Dunstan stared back at Cisco for a moment longer before his smile vanished. Then he released Jonah and walked away.

Rezamaar followed after him.

Cisco sat back down and breathed a silent sigh of relief. Maybe he regretted starting that whole thing, after all. Gathering information and amusement was one thing, but almost getting a man killed was quite another.

Not long after that incident, the front door flew open, and Damian Rofal came waltzing into the main room with a number of large shopping bags--several of which, he was not actually carrying. Instead, they hovered in midair around him, not terribly unlike his reaper, Feromas.

"Don't worry, everyone!" the old man said loudly for the whole cabin to hear. "Pappy's back, and he's brought gifts for all his good little boys and girls!"

The table in front of Cisco flew up suddenly and shook the chessboard off of itself, sending its marble pieces clattering across the hardwood floor in dozens of different directions. Then it slammed back down with a wooden thud that made Cisco's chair jump a little.

Damian began setting his many bags down on top of it.

'Was that really necessary?' said Feromas. 'There's a counter right over there, you know.'

"1473

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 7 of 8))~~

"Yeah, but how often do you get a chance to flip a table with a game board on it?!" said Damian. "It's a rare and precious opportunity that should be taken advantage of!" He threw Cisco a less-than-apologetic look. "You weren't still playing that were you, Mr. Ellis?"

"I guess not," said Cisco dryly. 'Ellis' had been Dennex's concoction, apparently considering it best not to chance anyone here recognizing the name 'Elroy.'

"I got you a present, too," said Damian. "I figured Dunstan's best friend could be an honorary member of our family, especially since you don't have one of your own."

'Agh, try to have a little more tact,' said Feromas. He turned his skeletal wolf's head toward Cisco. 'Sorry about him.'

"It's fine," said Cisco.

That, too, had been Dennex's doing, the logic being that they didn't want this Damian fellow to go check up on the non-existent Ellis family in an attempt to corroborate their story.

By the time Damian started pulling presents out, the Rofals had all gathered in the main room, even Dunstan and Rezamaar.

"Now, first, we of course have our snow globes," said Damian. He held out one in each hand, shaking them both to make the white flakes in the water begin floating. "When I saw these, I obviously had to buy all of them, so don't be shy now! I have enough for everyone! Go on, everybody take one!"

Despite saying that, Cisco somehow ended up with three globes in his hands. One was of a snowman and a candlestick-man punching each other. Another was of a dragon burning down a snowy village. And the third was of a lion roaring on a snow-capped mountain.

Cisco had no idea where he was supposed to put these.

Then Damian started pulling out firearms. He handed them out like they were candy.

"I was only able to get pistols, but that should be fine for now," said Damian. "They're not loaded, of course, but I'll show you all how to use them later."

"I think most of us here already know how, Father," said a middle-aged woman, who Cisco recalled as being Dunstan's mother, Cecilia.

"Oh, of course you do, sweetheart, but it never hurts to brush up on the basics. Wouldn't want any of you accidentally hurting yourselves. You, especially, Cecilia. I bet you haven't fired one of these since you were little."

"You might be surprised," said Cecilia darkly. "I wanted to be ready, in case you ever visited me again."

Damian gave her an unconcerned look. "And how well did that work out for you?" he said, wide-eyed and smiling.

She just scowled.

"If you're a good girl, maybe I'll tell you how you can actually kill me, one day!"

'Don't do that,' said Feromas. 'Oh god, please don't do that.'

Cecilia smacked her lips as she inspected her new pistol.

Cisco was surprised to receive a firearm, too. He checked to see if it really wasn't loaded, and indeed, the detachable magazine was empty."

"1474

~~((The 6 Pages of New Year's + Double Monday = Page 8 of 8))~~

"Oh, and I also got some coloring books," said Damian. "I remember how a lot of you guys liked those."

"When we were six, maybe," someone said.

Damian glanced over his audience again. "Okay, maybe I got those for me. I'm just saying--feel free to take advantage of them, if you want. I won't be upset."

Cisco heard Feromas sighing.

"Ooh! And here's the best part!" Damian rummaged through the last few bags and pulled out two armfuls of red leather with black stripes. "Matching jackets! Now we can be like a proper gang! Or a team! Yeah! Team Rofal!"

Cisco had to set his other gifts down in order to receive this one. The back had an elaborate and admittedly impressive design on it--silvery wings burning with red-and-black flames, all placed in front of two giant, menacing eyes, which also carried flames in their pupils.

It also had "C. Ellis" emblazoned on the front. It was even the right size.

And as much as he didn't want to admit it, Cisco actually kind of liked it.

The other Rofals gave various--though not necessarily unreceptive--grumbles as they examined their own jackets.

After that, Damian sat everyone down to explain a few things. Namely, he told them about the existence of reapers and servants. He informed them of the existence of the Vanguard and Abolish, as well as Sai-hee.

Cisco knew all of this already, of course, as did Dunstan, but most of the audience looked like they didn't believe him at all. Until he ripped off his own hand and grew it back right in front of them. Dunstan even spoke up at one point to say that Damian was, in fact, not just being his usual crazy self.

Once the pieces finally started to fall into place for everyone, perhaps realizing previous mysteries in their own lives were suddenly being solved, they began asking questions, chief among them coming from the eldest woman of the group, Damian's wife, a woman that Cisco had yet to get an actual name for, as everyone had just been calling her "Mother" or "Grandma."

"Why in the world have you waited so long to tell us all of this?!" she said, sounding equal parts furious and confused.

"Yeah, sorry about that," said Damian. "I didn't want you guys spreading all this information around and causing a stir. The whole reason I wanted to start this family was to lay low for a while, not draw attention. And let me tell you, it would've been very bad if either the King of the Fairies or the King of the Demons found out about us!"

'Aaand he's gone again,' said Rezamaar, though the Rofals didn't seem to know what to make of it.

Damian looked at the reaper. "I didn't go anywhere. And the Demon King is totally real. He's the Great Deceiver! The Stealer of Hopes and Dreams!"

'Oh, well, excuse me for doubting you,' said Reza. 'And the Fairy King? He's real, too, I take it?'

"Of course! He's the Goody Guardian! The Wings of Judgment!"
"1475

'I see,' said Rezamaar. 'And are you a king, too?'

Damian paused at that. "No, but perhaps I should be. I've never had a kingdom before, but that was the whole point to all this, wasn't it?

Because now I do!”

Feromas sighed. ‘Please don’t encourage him.’

‘But it’s so much fun,’ said Reza, laughing. ‘I would’ve thought that by now, you’d just roll with it like I am.’

‘Believe me, sometimes I wish I could,’ said Feromas.

“The King of the Humans!” said Damian. “That’s who I’ll be!”

‘That name doesn’t suit you in the slightest,’ said Feromas.

“The Trouble Master! The Builder of Bridges! Aha! That’s me!”

This old guy might have been even crazier than he had realized, Cisco felt.

Dunstan decided to speak up now. “Are you talking about Dozer and Morgunov, Grandpa?”

Cisco blinked, not having made that connection but suddenly seeing how it could make a certain degree of sense out of Damian’s ravings.

“Those two clods? Nah. They’re always a step or two behind. Though, yeah, it definitely would’ve been annoying if they found out I was still alive, too.”

Cisco observed Dunstan’s disappointed face. That had almost been clever. Cisco would’ve believed it.

“Well, anyway,” said Dunstan, “isn’t it about time you explained why the hell you’ve gone so far out of your way to gather us all together like this?”

“It’s a team building exercise!” said Damian. “I thought that would be obvious by now, given the jackets!”

Dunstan eyed his own again. “Yeah, but to what end? Why do you want us to be a team so badly? Hell, I still don’t know how you were even able to find me the way you did.”

“Heh, I have my ways,” said Damian.

‘And by “ways,” he means “associates who can handle all the hard stuff for him,”’ said Feromas.

“Hey, don’t give away my ways!”

Feromas ignored him. ‘Dunstan, the goal here is simple. We’re building a fourth servant empire.’

“No, a kingdom! Not an empire! Weren’t you listening?! I’m a king, not an emperor!”

‘Whatever.’

“You want to build an organization that can take on the Vanguard?” said Dunstan, almost laughing. “That’s great and all, but I think we might need a few thousand more servants on our side.”

“Silly Dunstan. It’s about quality, not quantity. Like my wife here. Sure, I could have like ten more, but even all put together, they wouldn’t be as good as her!”

Cisco and everyone else looked to Grandma, who oddly enough, did swoon a little bit as Damian kissed her on the cheek.

Well. Alright, then.

Cisco supposed he shouldn’t have been surprised. While it was true that she’d been acting normally enough up until now, she had been married to this lunatic for a very long time, presumably. She probably wasn’t a normal person at all, servant or not.

And the same could likely be said of all of these Rofals, Cisco figured.”
"1476

‘That’s a lovely sentiment,’ said Rezamaar, ‘but we don’t really have quality, either. Aside from yourself, our strongest fighter is my sweet baby Dunstan here. And he still needs time to grow.’

‘Don’t worry,’ said Feromas. ‘We’ve got recruitment plans in the works. And we’re also going to do a bit of aberration harvesting. Which reminds me. Damian, why don’t you give everyone their final gift?’

“Right!” said Damian, rummaging through his pockets. He retrieved a fistful of pearly white rings--identical to one he was already wearing, Cisco noticed. “Now, these are only rings, so they’re not as strong as they might otherwise be, but they’ll help keep you safe. And choose your finger wisely, because once you put it on, it's not coming off unless the finger comes with it. Everybody take one. Come on. Don't be shy now. I made sure there were enough for all of you."

When Cisco received his, he examined it more closely. It had a polished sheen to it on the outside rim, but the inside was much plainer. 'Is that... bone?' thought Cisco.

'I believe so,' said Dennex privately. 'This ring is the remains of an aberration. I can sense its sinister power.'

Cisco watched as everyone else was putting theirs on. 'Should I really wear this?'

'I don't think you have much choice, right now.'

'Ugh...' Cisco frowned as he stared at it. He'd wanted to become an aberration hunter, but was this the end result of that? Or was it just some twisted approximation? Would the Vanguard have made him wear this thing, too?

Maybe so. The Vanguard had certainly demonstrated that it wasn't nearly so noble as he'd hoped it was.

'You can cut your finger off later, if you really hate it that much,' said Dennex.

Cisco took a slow breath and put it on, choosing his middle finger on his right hand. It felt like any other ring would, at first. Then a sharp pain bit into his finger, and he could feel it go all the way to his bone, like it was attaching itself to him.

But there was no blood. And it didn't look like his skin had actually been broken. It just felt like he'd been cut into. But that, too, was fleeting. After a few more moments of agony, the pain was entirely gone.

The others were already manifesting shadows around themselves. A deep and dark red, each one was, which suggested to Cisco that all of these bone rings had come from the same aberration. Though, perhaps not. Surely, there were repeated colors among aberrations. Perhaps they'd all just come from the same type of aberration, assuming there were such classifications.

Regardless, as he began to see the red shadow melt out of his flesh and take form, began to feel its presence in his mind, began to control and mold it as he wished, Cisco couldn't help feeling entirely disgusted."

"1477 -- CLVIII.

Elwood looked pleased with his new shadowy toy. "So does this mean we'll finally get to leave this place?" he said.

"Hmm," was all Damian said.

"Some of us do have lives of our own, you know," said Lucia.

"Oh, yeah, about that." Damian gave her a toothy smile. "You actually don't, anymore."

Everyone just looked at him.

Lucia was the one to ask, "What does that mean?"

"I've had you all declared dead!"

Cisco heard a few groans.

"Plane crash is the official story," said Damian. "So don't worry. Your friends and associates won't miss you. Well, okay, poor choice of words. They won't be wondering where you are, is what I meant."

"What about the family business?!"

"It's alright," said Damian. "I liquidated all of your assets. Almost all, anyway. A good forty percent or so."

"That is NOT almost all!"

"Eh, it's just money, and we've got more than enough of that already. What's important is that we have each other!"

More groans.

"You've just gotta look on the bright side!" said Damian. "Now you're all free to do as you please! Nothing tying you down!"

"Aside from you, you mean," said Elwood.

"Yes, aside from me. But I know what's best, so that's no big deal, right? Come on, everybody! Don't look so down! This is the start of a new chapter in all of your lives! The funnest chapter! I'm gonna show you guys all sorts of neat stuff!"

"So does that mean you're going to let us leave after all?" said Elwood.

"Of course I will! Eventually. Maybe a few months from now."

That sparked the loudest chorus of groans yet.

"Just think of it as your important 'bonding time' with one another."

Damian let a beat pass, then set his gaze on Dunstan specifically.

"And if, for whatever reason, you guys don't start bonding soon, then that's fine, too. Rest assured! I won't give up on you! I'll keep you here for however long it takes! Years! Decades, even! I'm very patient!"

Cisco watched Dunstan's expression transform into one of exhaustion.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Eight: 'A search in spirit...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There were more places to look than Hector realized. While he didn't mind the opportunity to explore Himmekel more, it soon began to feel a bit hopeless, trying to find a keyhole in this giant place. That, of course, was why they had decided to split up during their search, but even still, Hector was left to wonder if they would really be able to find anything like this.

It seemed like the reapers should have been able to locate a hidden room behind a false wall or whatever, but that was not the case, apparently. If there was no soul for them to sense on the other side of said false wall, then the reapers had no way of knowing there was a hidden room there."

"1477 -- CLVIII.

Elwood looked pleased with his new shadowy toy. "So does this mean we'll finally get to leave this place?" he said.

“Hmm,” was all Damian said.

“Some of us do have lives of our own, you know,” said Lucia.

“Oh, yeah, about that.” Damian gave her a toothy smile. “You actually don’t, anymore.”

Everyone just looked at him.

Lucia was the one to ask, “What does that mean?”

“I’ve had you all declared dead!”

Cisco heard a few groans.

“Plane crash is the official story,” said Damian. “So don’t worry. Your friends and associates won’t miss you. Well, okay, poor choice of words. They won’t be wondering where you are, is what I meant.”

“What about the family business?!”

“It’s alright,” said Damian. “I liquidated all of your assets. Almost all, anyway. A good forty percent or so.”

“That is NOT almost all!”

“Eh, it’s just money, and we’ve got more than enough of that already. What’s important is that we have each other!”

More groans.

“You’ve just gotta look on the bright side!” said Damian. “Now you’re all free to do as you please! Nothing tying you down!”

“Aside from you, you mean,” said Elwood.

“Yes, aside from me. But I know what’s best, so that’s no big deal, right? Come on, everybody! Don’t look so down! This is the start of a new chapter in all of your lives! The funnest chapter! I’m gonna show you guys all sorts of neat stuff!”

“So does that mean you’re going to let us leave after all?” said Elwood.

“Of course I will! Eventually. Maybe a few months from now.”

That sparked the loudest chorus of groans yet.

“Just think of it as your important ‘bonding time’ with one another.” Damian let a beat pass, then set his gaze on Dunstan specifically. “And if, for whatever reason, you guys don’t start bonding soon, then that’s fine, too. Rest assured! I won’t give up on you! I’ll keep you here for however long it takes! Years! Decades, even! I’m very patient!”

Cisco watched Dunstan’s expression transform into one of exhaustion.

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Eight: ‘A search in spirit...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

There were more places to look than Hector realized. While he didn’t mind the opportunity to explore Himmekel more, it soon began to feel a bit hopeless, trying to find a keyhole in this giant place. That, of course, was why they had decided to split up during their search, but even still, Hector was left to wonder if they would really be able to find anything like this.

It seemed like the reapers should have been able to locate a hidden room behind a false wall or whatever, but that was not the case, apparently. If there was no soul for them to sense on the other side of said false wall, then the reapers had no way of knowing there was a hidden room there."

"1478

What was worse, from what Garovel was telling him, there was plenty of ardor in the rocks all over Himmekel, blocking his sight.

And all of that was assuming that the trick of it would be something as simple as a hidden room. Hector wasn’t so sure it would be, not after hearing about someone being pulled into a mirror. It seemed plausible to him that the only way to get wherever they were trying to go was through another mirror.

But what was the Kag for, in that case?

He tried to focus on his task, though. Diego had gone to inspect any other mirrors he could find, which meant entering more Hun’Sho quarters without alerting any of the other Hun'Sho. And Hector didn't envy that job. He'd never really been one for stealth. Maybe he could ask Roman to give him a few pointers, if they ever actually managed to meet up with the guy again.

And so, as they conducted their meandering search, Hector decided to make use of the downtime as he often did.

'Hey, Garovel.'

'What?' the reaper said privately.

'Is there anything else about the Undercrust you haven't told me?'

'Oh yeah. Tons.'

'No, I mean, like, any really important stuff that you've maybe not mentioned yet? Of the same caliber as lava people existing, for example?'

'Hey, I already told you that I thought they'd gone extinct.'

'Yeah, but even if you'd known they hadn't, would you have told me about them?'

'Of course.'

'You wouldn't have tried to keep it as another one of your surprises?'

Garovel paused. 'Well, who can really say for sure?'

'Garovel.'

'What?!'

'Are there any other big things left to tell me like that?!'

'Probably! The Undercrust has a lot of stuff in it, okay?!'

'Okay, so tell me some of them!'

'Agh! Don't just put it all on me! How about you ask a more specific question instead of making me think of everything, huh?!'

'Just fuckin'... tell me something, Garovel. I don't care what it is.'

'Oh, no, we're not doing that. I see that trap for what it is. I come up with something I think is super neat and cool. You end up incredibly bored and unimpressed. I end up feeling like a complete tool.'

'I wouldn't--'

'Uh-huh, sure. Now you listen here, Hector. You're my servant, alright? And this an order. Exercise those critical thinking skills of yours and come up with something good.'

'What the hell? You NEVER give me orders. You give instructions and advice, not orders.'

'Yeah, because I'm such a nice guy. You're welcome, by the way. But this time, it's an order. Go on. Consider it a new type of mental training. Critical thinking is hugely important, y'know.'

'Ugh, fine. Where do you think the Hun'Sho came from?'

'Well, I--hey, you came up with that way too quickly.'

'Well, I already had it in mind.'

'You were supposed to think long and hard before asking something. That's why it's called critical thinking. You're supposed to think about it as if your life depends on it.'

'But my life DOESN'T depend on it.'

'That's beside the point.'

'Would you please just answer the question, already? You're being even more obnoxious than usual.'"

"1479

'Where do I think the Hun'Sho came from?' said Garovel. 'What do you even mean by that? Be more specific, dammit.'

Hector stopped to rethink his question. 'I mean, like... well, okay, uh... Are they even considered human?'

'Ah. That's a question of some historical significance, actually. While I personally consider them to be human, I've known quite a number of people who would say otherwise.'

‘But... like... biologically, I mean. They’re so different from us. And, just... I mean, how did they become like that? They used to be normal, didn’t they? Or were WE the ones that changed?’

‘No, no, the Hun’Sho were definitely the ones who changed. It was just a very, VERY early instance of a successful mutation user. So early, in fact, that when it happened, most of us had no idea what it was. So you see, it’s not all that surprising that it came to be interpreted as the work of a god. Because at the time... it kinda was. In a sense.’

‘...How do you know all that, though? I mean, did you know the original Hun’Sho mutant yourself? And like, how were they able to use mutation in order to fuse ardor into their body like that?’

‘Alright, ease up with the interrogation, Detective Goffe. I can’t claim to have all the answers when it comes to this stuff. No, I did not personally know the mutation user who gave rise to the Hun’Sho, but it is widely known about in the reaper community.’

‘But doesn’t that mean it really could’ve been Avar or whoever?’

‘Oh, don’t start with that. The reaper community used to be very close with the Hun’Sho, because they could see and even talk to us, unlike basically every other race in the world.’

‘Wait. “Basically” every other race? Does that mean there ARE others?’

‘Well, there are the forest people of Jaskadan. They’re pretty friggin’ weird, too.’

‘Forest people?’ said Hector. ‘Like with plants growing out of their bodies or something?’

‘More or less, yeah.’

‘...And you think those people were the result of some ancient mutation user, too?’

‘Sure do.’

‘...Even though our understanding of mutation back then was really shitty?’

‘You’re not wrong about that, but the thing is, historically speaking, wildly exceptional servants have always existed. People who were so far ahead of their time that it almost defies belief. The builder of Warrenhold was one such example, you may recall.'

Hector did recall. 'Stasya.'

'That's right. Is it so unthinkable that someone managed to wield mutation as skillfully as she wielded integration? Someone who figured it out long before the rest of us did?'

'Why wouldn't they have shared that knowledge, then?'

'Any number of reasons. Maybe they thought it would be dangerous. Maybe they were just greedy. Hell, maybe no one wanted to listen. You have to remember that mutation users were often treated like they were either diseased or just monsters.'

'Hmm.'"

"1480

'Alternatively, it's possible that even the successful mutation users themselves didn't understand their own power well enough to be able to explain to anyone else. I've heard about that happening among their kind. Accidental breakthroughs and such.'

'...Then, isn't it possible that Avar himself was just a really powerful servant?'

'Of course.'

'So you agree that Avar could've actually existed, then?'

'In some form, sure. But not as a true god.'

Hector was abruptly reminded of his conversation with Eleyo. 'What would you consider to be a "true god," in that case?'

'As in, an otherworldly being with untold knowledge and power. Descended from a higher plane of existence, perhaps.'

'So you don't think Rasalased is a true god?'

'No. Powerful as he was--or IS, I guess--he still has pretty obvious limitations. Otherwise, he would've put a stop to that fight at Dunehall himself, don't you think?'

That was a pretty good point, Hector felt. But still, he wanted to keep prodding. 'So... a god can't have limitations?'

'Mm,' said Garovel. 'That's pretty much my whole problem with the term "god" in a nutshell right there. It's unscientific and not well-defined. By certain standards, I'm sure Sermung could be considered a god. But so what? What does labeling him tell us? That he's just really powerful? We already know that. If anything, all it would do is build up a weird, cult-like mystique around the guy--which is something I would find extremely dangerous and intensely creepy.'

'Hmm...' Hector was running out of arguments. 'I guess you're right...'

Garovel laughed. 'You sound so disappointed. Do you really want true gods to exist that badly?'

'Ah... I don't know if I'd say that I WANT them to. But I'm just... trying to keep an open mind, I guess.'

'Given the many, many fables I've heard about all these gods over the years, I'm quite glad that they don't exist, myself.'

'Really? There's not even ONE god you like?'

'Oh, sure. There are several I "like," as fictional characters. But I certainly wouldn't "like" it if they were running around out there, doing all sorts of crazy shit all the time.'

'Hmm. Who's your favorite god, then?'

Garovel hesitated. 'From a purely fictional standpoint, you mean?'

'Of course.'

'...Well, I'm quite partial to Cocora, I suppose.'

Hector blinked inside his helmet. 'Really? I... I wouldn't have guessed that.'

'Why not?'

'I... I don't know. I mean, why is she your favorite?'

'Mm, I guess I just find the whole "purity" and "goodness" shtick to be pretty appealing. In her stories, she's always very compassionate and so forth.'

'Huh.'

'Why do you keep sounding so surprised?'

'I just... I didn't picture you as a fanboy for the Goddess of Light.'

"'Fanboy?'" Really, Hector?'

'It's okay, Garovel. I understand.'

'Oh, you do, huh?'

'Hey, is that the real reason why you decided to go to Atreya originally? So you could hang out with all the other Cocora lovers?'"
"1481

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

'Atreya isn't the only place where people worship her, y'know,' said Garovel. 'She's been popular all over Eloa for thousands of years, especially during the peak of the Mohssian Empire. In fact, I'd say that was one of the major reasons why the Rainlords never really got along with the rest of the Empire very much. They refused to let go of Lhutwë and accept Cocora into their hearts like everybody else was doing.'

'Yeah, that sounds like the Rainlords alright.'

'Hector, why are you so interested in gods all of a sudden?'

'N-no reason.'

'You hesitated. That means you're lying.'

'N-no, it doesn't. I do that shit all the time. I can't help it.'

'Yeah, I don't believe you,' said Garovel. 'And if you're lying to me, then I'm guessing that it's because you're planning to do something that you know I won't like.'

'I... ah...'

'Something to do with gods, obviously.'

‘Now who’s the detective? Sheesh.’

‘Just tell me what it is and save me the trouble of guessing.’

Hector considered it briefly. ‘I thought you liked guessing games.’

‘You’re gonna be like that, are you? Alright, fine, I’ll play.’

‘You get three guesses,’ said Hector.

‘Oh, you’re giving me a hard limit? Seems a bit unfair.’

‘Wouldn’t be much of a game if I didn’t. If I let you have all the guesses you want, then you can’t lose. There would be no stakes.’

‘Heh, stakes, huh? This is getting serious, now. What do I get if I win, then?’

‘Hmm. What do you want?’

Garovel fell silent as he mulled it over. ‘I want you to ask Lynn out on a date the next time you see her.’

Hector stopped walking for a second to look at Garovel. ‘Well, so much for that game, then. You’re right, Garovel. We should just concentrate on finding that keyhole.’

‘Okay, okay, just hold on,’ the reaper said in hurry. ‘That was too much. Fine. I don’t want you to ask her out on a date. Instead, I just want you to give her a compliment.’ After a beat, he added, ‘Intentionally, that is. Accidental compliments don’t count.’

Hector took some time to deliberate, frowning inside his helmet as he tried to imagine it. ‘How...? I... agh, so I’m supposed to just shoehorn a random compliment into a conversation with her out of nowhere?’

‘Doesn’t have to be out of nowhere,’ said Garovel. ‘I’m sure you could figure out a sneaky way to work up to it. I’ve got faith in you, buddy.’

Hector grumbled to himself, wanting to call the game off again but not seeing much justification for it this time.

‘C’mon,’ said Garovel. ‘If you can talk Ivan down from killing everyone, then I’m pretty sure you can at least pay Lynn a compliment.’

Hector scowled. ‘Only if you win. You’ve gotta guess right, first.’

‘Of course. And for my first guess--’

‘Hold on. What do I get if I win?’”

"1482

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

That gave the reaper pause. ‘What do you want?’

Hector already had something in mind. ‘I want... you to tell me more about your past.’

Garovel met his gaze evenly for a moment. ‘My past, huh?’

‘Yeah.’

‘Could you narrow it down a little? I’ve got more than three thousand years’ worth, remember?’

‘Hmm.’ Hector folded his armored arms. ‘Alright. Then I want you to tell me something that you’ve never told any of your previous servants before.’

Garovel was quiet again.

‘And it has to be something significant, too,’ Hector added. ‘Not like... just a story about how you once ate a nice meal and went to sleep or some bullshit like that.’

‘...Alright,’ said Garovel. ‘I can agree to that.’

‘Okay, then.’

‘It looks like we’ve got ourselves a game.’

‘Yeah, it does.’

A briefly heavy intermission passed as they stared at one another, letting the ambient hissing and rumbling of Himmekel fill the air.

Hector had to break the silence for a confession, however. ‘...With all this build up, though, I’ve kinda forgotten what the game was even about.’

‘I have to guess what it is that you’re obviously trying to hide from me.’

‘...I’m trying to hide something from you?’

‘Yes! Something to do with your sudden interest in gods! Don’t try to act all innocent now, Hector! It won’t work!’

‘Oh, right, yeah. I remember what it was now. Sorry.’

‘Yeah, right. You’re a sneaky little bastard, you know that?’

‘Shut up and take your three guesses already.’

‘Alright, I will! For my first guess... I’m gonna say that you’re thinking of converting to a religion. And the reason you’ve been keeping it from me is because you think I’ll disapprove. Which I probably will, but that’s beside the point.’

‘Wrong.’

‘What?! Bullshit! You know this game doesn’t work if you lie, right?!’

‘I’m not lying, Garovel. I haven’t been thinking about converting to any religion.’

‘Then what the--? Gah... Fine. Hmm. For my second guess... I’ll say... you’re planning some sort of religious surprise party.’

Hector squinted. ‘...What the hell is a “religious surprise party?”’

‘Like a... celebration of something religious, I guess?’ said Garovel.

‘Isn’t that a little vague? I mean, it’s still wrong as fuck, but shouldn’t these guesses be more specific? I feel like it’s cheating if you can just say shit that’s too generalized or whatever.’

‘Oh, shut up. I’m on my last guess here.’

‘Yes, you are.’

‘Ugh...’

‘Don’t cheat now,’ said Hector.

‘Fuck yourself.’

Hector just laughed.

‘Alright, then,’ said Garovel. ‘Final guess. Hmm... What would you be trying to hide from me? Agh... shit. I’ll be honest. I really thought it was that first thing. Goddammit, Hector.’

‘Don’t look at me like that. You’re not getting any sympathy from me. There is some real shit on the line here.’

‘You’re a dick.’

‘And you’re a jackass.’”

"1483

‘Fine,’ said Garovel. ‘For my third guess... I’m gonna say that... uh... you... you plan on starting your own religion.’

Hector snorted into a full laugh. ‘Holy crap, no. Wow, Garovel...’

‘You’re gonna call it Hectorism. And you’re gonna use it to teach people all about the many types of dicketry that you’ve become a master of.’

‘This means I win the game.’

‘People will come from all over the world to learn about what a complete dick you are. I imagine you’ll have many followers, all trying to achieve the same pinnacle of dickness that you have.’

‘Are you done?’

‘I dunno. Are you sure you weren’t spouting a bunch of bullshit?’

‘What?’

‘I’ll concede my loss here, but now you’ve gotta prove that I really did lose. You have to tell me the truth about what you’re trying to keep from me.’

‘Oh. Hmm. Alright.’

‘Heh. You’re gonna tell me just like that? I thought you’d be more reluctant, considering what a big deal you made out of this whole thing.’

Hector saw his chance for a killing blow and decided to take it. 'It's fine. I kinda hate keeping secrets from you, anyway.'

Garovel fell quiet again.

Hector just waited, not sure what to think now.

'Hector, that was... That was sudden. And unfair. Right in my nonexistent heart.'

'You do that shit to me all the time,' said Hector. 'We'll be talking all normal or whatever, then you'll get super sincere and nice on me out of nowhere. And I'll get self-conscious and feel weird.'

'Yeah, but I'm allowed to do that to you, because I'm such a sincere and wonderful guy in general. I'm just being my natural, charismatic self. You can't take such a pure thing and... and weaponize it against me like that.'

"Weaponize it?" laughed Hector. 'Wow.'

'It's like a friendliness bomb. Which is too much power for one man, clearly.'

'Alright, whatever. We're getting sidetracked.'

'So tell me your secret already, then. I'm waiting.'

'It's nothing major,' said Hector. 'I was just planning on building some religious shrines once we get back to Warrenhold.'

'Wait a minute, what?' said Garovel. 'Religious shrines?'

Hector heard the surprise in Garovel's voice and hesitated somewhat. 'Yeah?'

'...What for? You said you weren't planning to convert to any religion, right?'

'They wouldn't be for me,' said Hector. 'They'd be for the Rainlords, mainly. But I'd also like to include some shrines for other religions as well.'

'Hold on. So you're telling me... you're gonna build these shrines as a gift to the Rainlords, and what? Keep the shrines a secret so that you can reveal them with one big celebration?'

‘Uh... maybe. I don’t know how I want to do it yet. Why do you ask?’

‘Because! Don’t you see?! That means my second guess was actually right! You ARE planning a religious surprise party!’

‘What?!’

"1484

‘You made me feel like an asshole for saying that, too! And I was right the whole time! You’re a cheater, y’know that?!’

‘A religious surprise party is not a real thing, Garovel! And a shrine is not a party!’

‘It could be! Depends on how you spin it!’

Hector was lost for words.

‘The nerve of this guy,’ huffed Garovel. ‘And to think, you even tried to make me feel like I was cheating, didn’t you? Was that because you knew that you were the one who was cheating all along?’

‘I wasn’t cheating.’

‘Seriously, how could you do such a thing?’

‘I didn’t.’

‘Hector, this is a betrayal of the highest order.’

‘No, it isn’t.’

‘I’m speechless.’

‘Oh, I wish you were.’

‘Y’know what? I take back all the nice things I said about you just now.’

‘You didn’t say any nice things about me.’

‘Well, maybe I was thinking them, then. I take back those thoughts.’

‘Okay? Ouch, I guess.’

'I'm glad you understand.' The reaper drifted over to the side of Hector's field of view. 'By the way, what made you want to build a bunch of religious shrines in Warrenhold?'

'Oh, uh... well, I've kinda been thinking about it for a while, really. Pretty much since we first got there, actually.'

'Why?'

'It was just, uh... Some of those rooms that we saw. They were in total ruins, but they looked like they used to be really pretty. The rainbow shrines in particular. I guess, ah... I guess ever since I saw those, I've been wondering what those shrines were actually used for. Because, I mean, all eight of Warrenhold's towers have one, so they were probably pretty important to someone, right?'

'Rainbow shrines...?'

Hector blinked. 'Do you not remember them?'

'Um. Sure I do. They were--ah--very colorful, weren't they?'

Hector laughed. 'You really don't remember?'

'Kind of? Not really.'

'Wow. This is the first time I've remembered something that you didn't.'

'Alright, don't get all cocky. Your little shrines probably just didn't impress me enough to make me remember them, is all.'

'I see.'

'Anyway, I don't think a shrine of the Rainlords' water god is typically supposed to be rainbow-colored. So are you gonna completely tear the shrines down and rebuild them?'

'Might have to, considering how destroyed they were. I'd kinda like to preserve the rainbow coloring, though, if I can. It seems like it could have some historical significance or something.'

'Hmm, maybe.'

'Do you know of any religion that used rainbow-colored shrines?'

'Can't say that I do. But that coloration might be all the clue we need. Perhaps Stasya built those shrines as a tribute to ALL religions, not just one.'

'I was thinking that, too, actually. It would make sense with what Voreese said about Stasya wanting Warrenhold to become a center of trade between the surface and the Undercrust. She could've wanted those shrines to be welcoming of all different faiths.'

'Well. The ones that can get along with one another, at least.'"
"1485

'Yeah, I suppose that could be a problem,' said Hector. 'And that reminds me, um... Well, maybe I should've asked this a long time ago, but does Abolish have, like, an official religion?'

'They have at least two, actually.'

'...What do you mean "at least?"'

'Well, the essential split is between the Morgunov faction and the Dozer faction, as you would expect. But each side also has its own degrees of extremism. So extreme, in fact, that they become almost unrecognizable from one another.'

'I don't, uh...? Give me an example.'

'Okay. On Dozer's side of things, the religion is called "Nualism"--or "the Way of None." It's rather grim, from what I've been hearing, but the variation in it comes from differing interpretations of "the Void's will."'

'The Void is like their god?'

'More or less. I think they'd tell you that the Void is actually not a god and instead just a silent, collective consciousness inside all of us, but I'm digressing again. Point is, the followers of Nualism are disagreeing about what they think the Void wants them to do.'

'In what way, though? Can I get some specifics?'

'Specifically... in regard to the killing of children.'

Hector stopped walking in order to look at Garovel. 'Oh...'

'I did say it was grim.'

'Yes, you did.' He looked out over the stone railing of the bridge he was on and absorbed the glimmering view of Himmekel for a moment. So far, this hunt for a keyhole hadn't been turning up much, and as he observed the branching pathway ahead of him, as well as the half-dozen bridges both above and below, he couldn't help feeling like it was pointless to keep searching.

But oh well. He decided to pick the center path and kept walking, trying to make sure that he was still paying attention to everything he was seeing while talking to Garovel.

'So,' Hector went on, 'does that mean that some of the... Nualists or whatever are actually against killing kids?'

'Yeah.'

'That's... good, isn't it?'

'Sure. Y'know, apart from all the ones who AREN'T against it, that is.'

'Ah--but they're fighting each other over it, right?'

'Mm, I dunno if they're actually "fighting." I just know they're disagreeing enough to consider themselves not part of the same religion.'

'Huh...'

'Degrees of extremism, like I said.'

'Right...'

'There are a lot more deviations like that, supposedly. More than I previously thought there were, even. I've been learning quite a lot about Abolish recently, thanks in no small part to all of the reapers I've been able to talk to during our travels.'

'Oh yeah. I always see you guys grouping up and talking to each other.'

'You make it sound like we don't want you involved in our conversations. You're always welcome to come listen, y'know.'

'I try to. It's just, I mean--you guys go on forever. It's hard to pay attention for that long.'"

'Ah,' said Garovel. 'What can I say? Talking is kind of all we've got goin' for us, so yeah, reapers tend to "overdevelop" our conversational skills a bit. It's one of the reasons why I said we're good liars. We get a lot of practice in.'

'Hmm.'

'In fact, that's a good rule of thumb for you: whenever you meet new reapers, expect them to talk a lot, and be wary of those who don't. There are really only three types of reapers who don't talk much. The young, the crazy, and the ones with a lot to hide.'

'Huh...'

'At our age, if you don't talk, the inevitable boredom will drive you crazy. And that may sound like an exaggeration, but it's not. Talking is an important coping mechanism for us.'

'That... explains a few things, I guess.'

'Someone like Tenebrach, though--he's an example of the third type. Of course, I only met him the one time, but he didn't talk much. As expected. A guy like that SHOULD have a lot to hide. It'd be weird if he didn't.'

'Wait, who are you talking about?'

'Tenebrach. Sermung's reaper.'

'Oh. Right.'

'But anyway, I've digressed from what I was talking about before.'

'Abolish's religions.'

'Right. The variation in Abolish's beliefs has been growing rather rapidly in recent years. According to the Rainlords, it's even gotten to the point where Abolish has become this weird melting pot of personality cults.'

'You mean for more than just Morgunov and Dozer?'

‘Yes. Apparently, there’s also been some very divisive rhetoric going around within their ranks. There’ve even been rumblings about a secret group of Abolish reformists. Though, maybe they’re not so secret anymore, if we’re hearing about them now.’

‘Is that... good? Because it sounds kinda good.’

‘Possibly. I mean, it sure would be nice if Abolish stopped going around trying to kill as many people as they can. But I don’t have confirmation that this reformist faction is actually trying to achieve that. And honestly, I doubt it is. More than likely, all this reformist stuff is just the result of a simple power struggle.’

‘Hmm. Politics isn’t exactly my strong suit...’

‘Well, you’re a lord now, so you better learn quickly.’

‘Ugh...’

‘A power struggle would also be pretty insane, though--especially now. Maybe not as ""simple"" a matter as I just suggested, now that I think about it.’

‘What do you mean?’

‘Morgunov and Dozer have been in power for close to three hundred years. And it’s not like no one’s been trying to take it from them. The gap in strength between them and everyone else is gigantic. So how would you go about trying to bridge that gap?’

‘Uh...’

‘At this point, if you’re a member of Abolish, and you want to seize control of it for yourself, the most obvious plan is to just wait for the Vanguard to kill one of them for you.’

‘I guess so. But if your plan is obvious, then it probably sucks.’

‘Exactly.’”

"1487

Hector wasn’t quite sure what the reaper meant. ‘So, what? You’re saying... someone in Abolish actually has a smart plan for overthrowing their own boss?’

‘Oh, I don’t know about that,’ said Garovel. ‘Maybe it’s a good plan. Maybe it’s not. Maybe it’s not a plan at all, and I’m completely misreading everything. All I’m really saying is that I think something big is happening within Abolish right now. Something that could threaten the status quo--or dare I say, even destroy it.’

‘You sound surprisingly optimistic.’

‘Is it so surprising, though? Abolish has been getting its ass handed to it, lately. You heard the news about Jackson taking down not just one, but TWO of Abolish’s biggest threats, didn’t you?’

Hector certainly did. He recalled Asad’s sister going around and telling everyone. ‘The Star of the West. Wonder what he’s like.’

‘I’ve heard nothing but good things about him. And now it sounds like he’s the de facto second-in-command for the Vanguard.’

‘I wonder what he would think of this whole Rainlord situation.’

‘Assuming he knew the whole story? Tough to say. But even then, I doubt he would side against the Vanguard.’

‘Hmm.’

‘Whatever the case, Abolish is gonna have a hard time dealing with him.’ Garovel broke for a laugh. ‘And YOU, apparently. Lest we forget how you made Abolish eat shit AGAIN when you took down Ivan.’

‘I definitely did NOT take him down.’

‘Completely on your own. No help needed. Made him look like a punk bitch.’

Hector sighed but couldn’t help laughing just a little.

‘At least, that’s what I’ve been telling everyone,’ said Garovel.

Hector’s eyes widened at the mere thought of that. ‘You’re just joking, right?!’

‘I am. Calm down. Hilarious as that would be, I don’t think I’d be laughing when Morgunov himself showed up to take revenge on you.’

‘Ugh...’

Hector turned a corner and found himself in an apparent park. It was small, but there was a walled off pool of lava in the middle with a tall, sharp monument rising out of it like a rocky needle. The area also boasted a cliffside view of Himmekel to Hector’s right, along with a few stone benches where a handful of Hun’Sho were seated.

Someone else was with them, Hector noticed as he got closer. Someone in a climate-controlled suit.

“--like you wouldn’t believe!” came a familiarly deep voice. “Why, in six months’ time, I could have quarterly shipments arriving here all the way from Boregard! There would be no need to leave! I could bring the wonders of the surface world directly to you! Convenience at its finest!”

“Boregard is the name of your homeland?” said one of the Hun’Sho.

“My hometown, actually,” said Mr. Robert Sheridan. “My homeland is a place called Intar. Quite lovely this time of year, if you can get used to the clamor. It’s the center of the world, you know! Busiest country on the planet! And the most productive, when accounting for quality.”

"1488

“Do you have many books in Intar?” said another of the Hun’Sho.

“Of course!” said Mr. Sheridan. “Though, ours are typically quite fragile--and flammable, specifically--so it would be quite the trick to transport them safely here to you, but for the right price, I think we can--ah! Hector! My young friend! What are you doing standing over there all by yourself?” Mr. Sheridan smiled wide and waved him over as he looked across his audience again. “Have I told any of you fine folks yet about how this young man saved my bacon?”

“Bacon?”

“What is bacon?”

“My life!” the man clarified. “He saved my life!”

“Ah, so bacon is life.”

“Yet another strange new Mohssian word. How interesting.”

"No, I didn't mean--! Ah--shoot! Uh--!"

Hector listened as Mr. Sheridan tried to clarify even further, but it didn't seem to go very well for him, and at length, the man gave up and addressed Hector again.

"How are you finding Himmekel? It is a majestic place, no?"

"Uh--yeah." Hector decided against telling him about the current quest to find a keyhole. Even assuming Mr. Sheridan could be trusted, there were too many Hun'Sho around who would overhear. "What are you doing here, by the way?"

"Oh, just enjoying some of the finest company that Himmekel has to offer!"

Hector would've given the man a dubious look if his helmet wasn't in the way. "Are you really trying to sell stuff to the Hun'Sho?"

"Aha. You overheard that, did you? Well, what can I say? I am an enterprising man. I hope you will not think less of me for it, because I do not plan to change any time soon!"

The man's sheer enthusiasm took Hector by surprise and pulled a small laugh out of him. "S-sure," said Hector, "but, uh--I mean, do these guys even have anything to pay you with?" He threw a quick look over the Hun'Sho listeners. "Um, no offense."

They merely returned curious expressions.

"Oh, don't be silly," said Mr. Sheridan. "Wealth is relative, and payment does not require currency. I'm sure these fine gentleman and I can reach an accord with just a bit of amicable appraisal and negotiation. Why, just a couple years ago, I made an arrangement to have fresh fish shipped all the way to a tiny little village that had nothing to its name but dirt. Dirt, I tell you! But am I sore about how that deal ended up? No sirree Bob! In fact, I'm more than pleased! And this other time, I arranged to have--"

'He's definitely planning to rip them off,' said Garovel privately.

Hector was getting that impression, too. 'Wouldn't that mean he's already got his eye on something?'

'It sure would. We need to talk to him alone. See if we can get any useful info out of him.'

'Okay.'

And it took a while, but at length, Hector managed to wrest the man away from the Hun'Sho--or free them from him. Hector wasn't quite sure which."

"1489

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

They moved to the edge of the park, where they could speak in private while overlooking much of Himmekel. There was a decent view of the lavafall here, blocked only by a couple of the Vault's many black bridges.

"Hoo boy, these Hun'Sho are somethin' else," said Mr. Sheridan. "When I tell the folks back home about these people, they'll flip. Or call me crazy. Probably the latter, actually, unless I'm able to bring proof with me."

Hector wasn't terribly interested in that subject, but he did see a way for it to lead into the subject which did interest him. "...Do you have some kind of proof in mind?"

"One of the Hun'Sho themselves would be best, obviously, but they don't seem too interested in leaving. Real shame. So I was thinking maybe that monument over there would be a good substitute. Only problem is how I would transport it all the way back up to the surface." He motioned toward the pointy stone that Hector had seen earlier.

"Why?" said Hector. "What would a rock prove?"

Mr. Sheridan gave him a smirk. "That ain't no normal rock, son. I don't rightly know what it is, but I know a shot from my lovely little .38 right here didn't leave so much as a scratch on it." He produced a handgun from the pouch on the side of his hip and gave it a showy twirl. "And this baby packs quite the extra kick, if you know what I'm sayin'."

Hector did. But he had a different question. "...Why were you shooting the monument?"

"Oh, it wasn't me. It was Hermeios. Those nice fellas were all curious about my weaponry, and I always love opening new minds to the wonderful world of advanced personal protection technology.”

“Right...”

“And credit where credit is due--the guy hit that monument dead on. Seemed like a real natural. Maybe a bit too eager, but I made sure to impart the importance of good trigger discipline.”

“...You weren’t concerned about letting a stranger hold your gun?”

“Not as long as I got my back up.” He returned the gun to his pouch and pulled out a second, slightly larger one. “Though, I wouldn’t call them strangers, exactly, either. I’ve gotten to know Hermeios pretty well, these past couple days. Swell guy. Real understandin’ and SO polite.”

Hector saw Garovel drifting toward the monument and decided to follow.

The reaper inspected it up and down. He pressed a skeletal hand against it. ‘I can’t phase through it.’

Hector was inspecting it now, too--though he had to keep a greater distance because of the pool of lava in the way. He scanned the rock for some sort of hole or indentation--anything that seemed like it might be related to the Kag--but he saw nothing. Just flat, smooth stone.

Well. Actually, no. Not perfectly smooth, Hector eventually noticed.”

"1490 -- CLIX.

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

There was a maze-like etching all over the body of the monument. The marks were so faint that even with the light being emitted by the pool of lava directly below, they were still almost invisible to the naked eye.

Mr. Sheridan was talking again, but Hector wasn’t listening.

‘What are these marks?’ he asked Garovel.

‘...They’re a signature,’ the reaper said privately. ‘Rathmore put them on all of his works.'

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Nine: 'Pursue thine bounty...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Their inspection continued for a while longer, but they had nothing to show for it. Despite Garovel's assessment, they found no apparent means of doing anything with the monument. No keyhole. No mechanism of any kind.

And though the reaper clearly did not wish to, they eventually decided to go meet up with Diego and tell him what they had discovered. He was the one in possession of the Kag, after all.

However, Garovel decided not to bring up Rathmore's name. As far as everyone else was concerned, it was just a strange monument of entirely unknown origin.

And indeed, it really was almost everyone else. They ended up bringing more than just Diego back to the park with them. Manuel, Lorios, Elise, Carver, Mr. Sheridan, and all four of the Hun'Kui came along as well. Only Zeff and Axiolis were left out, which seemed a bit of a shame, but the consensus in the group was that Zeff wouldn't come with them even if they went to go ask him.

Diego walked around the monument several times, rolling the Kag between his hands all the while, breaking only to scratch his chin or his temple intermittently.

'So?' said Yangéra. 'What're you thinking?'

Diego crouched down in front of the molten pool, then looked over at the reapers. "You guys really can't tell me anything else about this thing?"

The reapers all shook their heads.

Hector wondered if Garovel's choice of secrecy was truly the right one, but he figured he would just trust his judgment for now.

"Hmm." Diego smacked his lips. "Hey, Hector. C'mere for a sec."

A bit confused and curious, Hector ventured over and crouched down beside the man, in front of the pool.

“...Think you can safely move all this lava for me?” said Diego quietly.

Hector blinked. “Hmm...”

“I’d do it myself, but it’d probably be easier for a materializer,” said Diego.

“Ah... alright.” Hector rubbed his gauntleted hands together, gathering his concentration.

He’d never tried to materialize anything inside lava before, but as he feared, it proved impossible. It was still too close to a solid, it seemed, and therefore too dense for his iron molecules to accumulate. Pushing all the lava out on a simple platform would not work. He would have to be a bit more creative.

He started by adding iron to the stone wall that already existed around the pool, and from there, he began growing his material downward and into the lava.”

"1490 -- CLIX.

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

There was a maze-like etching all over the body of the monument. The marks were so faint that even with the light being emitted by the pool of lava directly below, they were still almost invisible to the naked eye.

Mr. Sheridan was talking again, but Hector wasn’t listening.

‘What are these marks?’ he asked Garovel.

‘...They’re a signature,’ the reaper said privately. ‘Rathmore put them on all of his works.’

Chapter One Hundred Fifty-Nine: ‘Pursue thine bounty...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Their inspection continued for a while longer, but they had nothing to show for it. Despite Garovel’s assessment, they found no apparent means of doing anything with the monument. No keyhole. No mechanism of any kind.

And though the reaper clearly did not wish to, they eventually decided to go meet up with Diego and tell him what they had discovered. He was the one in possession of the Kag, after all.

However, Garovel decided not to bring up Rathmore's name. As far as everyone else was concerned, it was just a strange monument of entirely unknown origin.

And indeed, it really was almost everyone else. They ended up bringing more than just Diego back to the park with them. Manuel, Lorios, Elise, Carver, Mr. Sheridan, and all four of the Hun'Kui came along as well. Only Zeff and Axiolis were left out, which seemed a bit of a shame, but the consensus in the group was that Zeff wouldn't come with them even if they went to go ask him.

Diego walked around the monument several times, rolling the Kag between his hands all the while, breaking only to scratch his chin or his temple intermittently.

'So?' said Yangéra. 'What're you thinking?'

Diego crouched down in front of the molten pool, then looked over at the reapers. "You guys really can't tell me anything else about this thing?"

The reapers all shook their heads.

Hector wondered if Garovel's choice of secrecy was truly the right one, but he figured he would just trust his judgment for now.

"Hmm." Diego smacked his lips. "Hey, Hector. C'mere for a sec."

A bit confused and curious, Hector ventured over and crouched down beside the man, in front of the pool.

"...Think you can safely move all this lava for me?" said Diego quietly.

Hector blinked. "Hmm..."

"I'd do it myself, but it'd probably be easier for a materializer," said Diego.

"Ah... alright." Hector rubbed his gauntleted hands together, gathering his concentration.

He'd never tried to materialize anything inside lava before, but as he feared, it proved impossible. It was still too close to a solid, it seemed, and therefore too dense for his iron molecules to accumulate. Pushing all the lava out on a simple platform would not work. He would have to be a bit more creative.

He started by adding iron to the stone wall that already existed around the pool, and from there, he began growing his material downward and into the lava."

"1491

Fortunately, Hector knew from the research he did all the way back in Atreya that the melting point of iron was around fifteen hundred degrees Celsius, and this magma didn't seem to be quite that hot. Less fortunately, it was still hot enough to make control of his iron more difficult, causing it to weaken and bend against Hector's wishes. Temperature manipulation helped, as expected, but he had to work quickly, because as per the First Law of Materialization, once his iron was created, he could no longer affect its temperature.

He grew his iron all the way to the bottom of the pool and then began making his platform in order to lift it all out. He created a funnel for it so that the magma could safely spill over to exactly where he wanted it to, and soon enough, he'd moved the entire pool into a large iron tub.

There'd been more magma there than perhaps anyone had expected, and once Hector annihilated all of his excess iron, he and Diego were both able to jump down into the now-empty moat around the monument.

"Hah!" came the exultation from Diego, and Hector looked over to see the man crouched down again, examining the bottom of the moat with a lamp in hand. "I do believe we've found our keyhole, boys and girls."

Even now, Hector almost couldn't see what the man was talking about. The keyhole in question blended into the dark rock so well as to be nearly invisible.

Diego readied the Kag with his right hand, then threw one last look up at all the faces staring down at the two of them. "I hope you won't think less of me, but if it turns out that this Kag actually doesn't fit in this little hole here, then I may need one of you to hold me while I have myself a good cry.”

‘Just hurry up and get on with it,’ said Yangéra.

Diego exhaled audibly. “Okay, here goes.”

He slid the Kag into place, and it appeared to fit.

But nothing happened.

‘Try turning it counterclockwise,’ said Garovel.

With noticeable strain and using both hands, Diego did so.

A deep shunk rang out, and Hector felt a sudden vibration in his feet.

But after a moment, it went away.

There was only silence as everyone waited, holding their expectations in check while they looked around, wondering if anything was going to happen.

Then the world bent in half.

Hector’s vision distorted like a smeared painting, and he lost all sense of direction or balance or footing. For a brief time, he felt as though he was floating through empty space.

A familiar feeling.

And for an even briefer time, he could see. Everything. Ethereal lights. In all directions.

As soon as he grasped what he was looking at, it was gone, and he was standing on his own two feet again, senses gradually returning to him.

He shook his head, as if to shake away the disorientation itself, and his hand searched for the wall of the moat, but it wasn't there."

"1492

((Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 2))

When he regained enough of himself to actually observe his surroundings, Hector realized that they were completely different. The others were standing beside him instead of above him, and it was pitch dark in all directions.

Save one.

Straight ahead.

A mountain of apparent jewels lay there, glowing and sparkling softly in the darkness.

'Holy lakefire!' said Lorios.

"That's it, isn't it?!" said Manuel. "The Sosho'Diyu?! It must be!" The man took a couple steps forward, but Diego extended a hand in front of him.

"Everyone," said the Lord Redwater, no longer even remotely jovial, "be exceptionally cautious. We currently have no idea where we are, what just happened, what we're looking at--or even whether any of this is real."

Manuel fell silent at that, as did everyone else, even the reapers.

Oddly enough, though, Hector did have an idea of what had just happened. Vaguely, at least. True, that briefest glimpse of so many ethereal lights suspended in space hadn't been much to go on--but it was enough.

“Just now,” said Hector, “I’m pretty sure that was teleportation. It was more disorienting this time, but I’ve seen it before.”

Diego looked at him. “That was--?” He stopped himself, gears turning in his head.

Garovel had some private words for him. ‘That’s what it was like when you were teleporting all over the place with Ibai?’

‘Yeah. Wait, you weren’t with me?’

‘No, I was quite busy cowering underground, remember?’

Hector did not. Large parts of that whole experience were simply a blur in his memory, especially the period immediately after their encounter with Rasalased.

“So what’s the plan, then?” asked Mr. Sheridan. Rather than looking at the apparent treasure, he was facing the opposite direction, using his small lamplight to cut through the murky blackness all around them.

The others seemed to realize in unison that the man had the right idea and so decided to join him in trying to illuminate their surroundings. Working in tandem, they were marginally successful.

It was a tremendous cavern, seemingly. The rock walls in each direction were so distant that everyone’s lamps were barely strong enough to reveal them.

Next, they followed Diego’s lead in illuminating the path to the treasure, and eventually, after they’d worked up enough nerve, they began inching toward it as a group.

It was farther away than it first appeared to be. A trick of depth perception. The vast majority of the jewels were much larger than they’d seemed. Where they’d previously looked pea-sized, now they were looking more like golf balls. And their individual glows began to reveal distinct colors as well--blue or white or yellow, mainly.

There was a whole lot more than just jewels, as well. As they grew nearer, a kind of cove in the side of the glimmering mound revealed itself, and within it, Hector spotted a number of golden chests and shelves with all manner of unfamiliar objects on them."

"1493 -- CLX.

((Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 2))

Hector still wasn't quite sure what to think. Even as he stared directly at that gargantuan pile of treasure before him, he didn't feel much amazement. It just didn't feel real--not yet, anyway--and he was wary of allowing it to.

Diego raised a hand for everyone to stop again.

They were close now--close enough to make out several of the items in the cove in more detail. A globe. A pair of gloves. A bejeweled sword. A doll posing mid-twirl. A painting of a temple or something. A statue of a man in a chair.

Wait. No.

That was an actual man, actually sitting there.

Hector blinked behind his visor. Were his eyes playing tricks on him? Hadn't he been gray as stone a second ago? Perhaps he was still a little disoriented from that weird teleport. Now the man looked as normal as normal could be, though maybe a bit strange in attire. He wore a white tunic, tied together with strings near the collar, and brown pants and shoes. And his chair--tall and featureless stone.

But he really was a normal man. Not a Hun'Sho or a Hun'Kui. Not wearing a climate suit, either. Blonde hair, average height, pale skin, mid-forties by appearance, maybe.

And he was staring right at them, too, while he rested his cheek on his right fist. He had something in his lap as well, with his left hand draped over it. Some kind of jar? Hector couldn't really tell.

"So you've come," the stranger said. He sounded profoundly uninterested in what he was saying, as if he were making a passing note to himself rather than actually speaking to someone.

Diego was bold enough to speak the question on everyone's mind. "Who are you?"

"I thought I sensed three of you," the man said. "Yet I only see two."

"...What are you talking about?" said Diego. And he tried again. "Who are you?"

"Oh well. Frankly, I'm surprised Ettol managed to get even one of you here, let alone two."

Diego turned to the person next to him for help, who just so happened to be Hector. "Am I talkin' to myself here?" said the Lord Redwater.

Hector just returned an armored shrug.

Diego turned back to the stranger. "Hey, you in the chair! Who the hell are you?!"

"Be silent," the stranger said with sudden weight in his voice.

And Diego tried to respond, but he couldn't. Hector saw him open his mouth as if speaking, but no words came out. Diego's expression turned to confusion, then to shock.

"You there," the stranger said, sounding wholly apathetic again. "Iron One."

Hector twitched, realizing whom he meant. "Y-yeah?"

"How would you like to become a god?"

Chapter One Hundred Sixty: 'He Who Sits...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"...Excuse me?" said Hector.

"Are you hard of hearing?" the unnamed man said. "I asked if you would like to become a god."

"...I don't know what that means. And what did you do to my friend?"

"I ordered him to be silent."

"Y-yeah, but how did you do it?"

The stranger gave him a puzzled look. "What do you mean? I ordered him."

"1493 -- CLX.

Hector still wasn't quite sure what to think. Even as he stared directly at that gargantuan pile of treasure before him, he didn't feel much amazement. It just didn't feel real--not yet, anyway--and he was wary of allowing it to.

Diego raised a hand for everyone to stop again.

They were close now--close enough to make out several of the items in the cove in more detail. A globe. A pair of gloves. A bejeweled sword. A doll posing mid-twirl. A painting of a temple or something. A statue of a man in a chair.

Wait. No.

That was an actual man, actually sitting there.

Hector blinked behind his visor. Were his eyes playing tricks on him? Hadn't he been gray as stone a second ago? Perhaps he was still a little disoriented from that weird teleport. Now the man looked as normal as normal could be, though maybe a bit strange in attire. He wore a white tunic, tied together with strings near the collar, and brown pants and shoes. And his chair--tall and featureless stone.

But he really was a normal man. Not a Hun'Sho or a Hun'Kui. Not wearing a climate suit, either. Blonde hair, average height, pale skin, mid-forties by appearance, maybe.

And he was staring right at them, too, while he rested his cheek on his right fist. He had something in his lap as well, with his left hand draped over it. Some kind of jar? Hector couldn't really tell.

"So you've come," the stranger said. He sounded profoundly uninterested in what he was saying, as if he were making a passing note to himself rather than actually speaking to someone.

Diego was bold enough to speak the question on everyone's mind. "Who are you?"

"I thought I sensed three of you," the man said. "Yet I only see two."

"...What are you talking about?" said Diego. And he tried again. "Who are you?"

“Oh well. Frankly, I’m surprised Ettol managed to get even one of you here, let alone two.”

Diego turned to the person next to him for help, who just so happened to be Hector. “Am I talkin’ to myself here?” said the Lord Redwater.

Hector just returned an armored shrug.

Diego turned back to the stranger. “Hey, you in the chair! Who the hell are you?!”

“Be silent,” the stranger said with sudden weight in his voice.

And Diego tried to respond, but he couldn’t. Hector saw him open his mouth as if speaking, but no words came out. Diego’s expression turned to confusion, then to shock.

“You there,” the stranger said, sounding wholly apathetic again. “Iron One.”

Hector twitched, realizing whom he meant. “Y-yeah?”

“How would you like to become a god?”

Chapter One Hundred Sixty: ‘He Who Sits...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“...Excuse me?” said Hector.

“Are you hard of hearing?” the unnamed man said. “I asked if you would like to become a god.”

“...I don’t know what that means. And what did you do to my friend?”

“I ordered him to be silent.”

“Y-yeah, but how did you do it?”

The stranger gave him a puzzled look. “What do you mean? I ordered him.””

"1494

Now Hector was confused. And more than a little unsettled. “Who are you, exactly?”

The stranger sighed. “Fine, I’ll ask the other one. You there.” He removed his right hand from his cheek in order to point. “The one in hiding. How about it? Would you like to become a god?”

“...Sure,” came Eleyo’s voice, “but not by any measure other than my own. What is a god to you?”

“To me?” the stranger said. “Nothing. A friend. A companion. It is you who have revered us as such.”

Having apparently heard enough now, Garovel decided to chime in. ‘Are you telling us that you’re a god?’

“Eh.”

What the hell kind of answer was that? Hector couldn’t decide if this man was terrifying or just kind of a weirdo. And he really hoped it didn’t turn out to be a combination of the two, because that would basically make him Ivan 2.0, and Hector was definitely not looking for a repeat of that encounter.

‘You’re a servant,’ said Garovel. ‘Where’s your reaper? I’d like to talk to them.’

The man gave a dull laugh. “I suppose it only makes sense that you would assume that. You are seeds, looking up and admiring the great trees that you wish to become. But I am no tree, little ones. I am a gardener.”

That gave everyone noticeable pause.

The stranger scratched his brow. “At least, I would be, if I cared a little more. Or at all, really. But I don’t, so... I suppose I’m more like the guy taking a nap under the trees while they flourish and grow wild all around him.”

‘Mm,’ said Garovel, his tone still thick with doubt. ‘Well, do you have a name, at least?’

“...Malast,” the man finally said.

‘Malast,’ echoed Garovel. ‘As in, “the Idle God,” Malast?’

“An unflattering name. Never cared for it much. I prefer the God of Boredom. Or the God of the Underworld, even if it is less appropriate-- and certainly too grandiose for my tastes.”

‘So you ARE claiming to be a god,’ said Garovel.

Malast gave another sigh. “I guess.”

‘Well, in that case, would you mind giving a little demonstration of your godly powers for the cynics among us?’

“Nah, I don’t really feel like it.”

‘Then I’m afraid I don’t believe you’re a god.’

“Okay.”

And that was it. Malast just sat there, not saying anything else.

Hector looked from Garovel to Malast, then back again, but neither budged, though Garovel looked much more annoyed.

Hector felt a push on his shoulder and turned to see Diego there, trying to get his attention. The man was still unable to talk, apparently.

“Oh, hey, uh, could you undo whatever you did to my friend here?” said Hector.

Malast looked over at him with flat eyes. “Nah.”

Hector didn’t know what to say to that.

“But, hey, wait a second,” said Malast, “doesn’t that count as a demonstration of my power?”

‘Pfft, no,’ said Garovel. ‘I know a guy who could do that, easy, and he’s not a god.’

“Oh,” said Malast. And he gave a yawn. “Oh well.””

"1495

‘Is that really all you have to say?’ said Garovel, able to sound less annoyed than Hector figured he was probably feeling.

And apparently, that was all Malast had to say, because he did not respond, instead choosing to simply close his eyes.

Hector thought the strange man might genuinely fall asleep until Eleyo stepped forward in the sparse light.

“Pardon me, but what did you mean when you said that I could become a god?”

Malast sighed another time but still didn’t open his eyes. “This is why I could never take interest in you like the others could. You always need everything explained to you. It’s exhausting, you know that?”

“What ‘others’ are you talking about?” said Eleyo.

“See? It’s always more questions with you people. I’d feel bad for you, if I could bring myself to care a little more.”

That response seemed to give Eleyo pause, and Hector couldn’t blame him. What the hell were you supposed to say to something like that?

Eleyo managed to find something, though. “Perhaps you would like to ask us some questions, instead.”

That got the eyes open. “Hmm.” Malast looked them over. “Normally, I would say that you have no answers that would interest me, but alright. You. Iron One.”

That was him, Hector knew. “Y-yeah?”

“Have you met a god before?” said Malast.

Oh, boy. Hector considered how to answer that. He eyed Garovel.

‘Say whatever you like,’ the reaper said privately.

“...Sort of,” Hector decided to say. “It’s, ah... tough to say without knowing exactly what you consider to be a god.”

“And did you receive a blessing from this sort-of-god?”

“Ah-ah,” intervened Eleyo again, “he answered one question of yours, so now you must answer one of ours. I believe that is only fair.”

Yet another sigh from the God of Boredom. “Fine, go ahead.”

Eleyo didn’t wait to consult anyone else about what they should ask.

"Why are you here?" he said.

"Why wouldn't I be?"

"You cannot answer a question with another question," said Eleyo.

"I'm pretty sure I can," said Malast.

"Then we will do the same for yours," Eleyo countered. "Is that what you want?"

"No, it isn't. There. I have answered one of your questions properly. Now I can ask a second."

Hector heard Eleyo growl, but Malast had won that round, it seemed.

"Iron One," said Malast. "Did you receive a blessing from this god of yours?"

"...What does 'blessing' mean?"

"You are not allowed to answer with a question," said Malast, eyeing Eleyo. "Answer to the best of your understanding."

Hector exhaled. "Right... uh." He supposed he had some idea of what Malast meant. "I believe he did bless me, yeah. I mean, he even said as much, so..."

"What is this 'blessing' you speak of?" reiterated Eleyo, having apparently decided that Hector's question was worth asking next."
"1496

((Double Saturday -- Page 1 of 2))

"A blessing is a gift granted upon one's very soul," said Malast. "Although, it may not always be quite as pleasant as it sounds, depending on who the gift-giver is and why they are giving it."

Malast allowed a beat of silence to pass, even though it was now his turn again. Hector wondered why. Maybe he wanted someone to ask another question so that he could proactively ignore them.

"My turn," said Malast. "Iron One."

Agh. Why was he getting all the questions? It was like being called on by a school teacher who was trying to humiliate him in front of the whole class.

“What was the name of this sort-of-god you met?”

Well, at least that question had an easy answer. “Rasalased.”

“Hmm,” was all Malast said.

And Hector very nearly asked if Malast recognized the name before stopping himself. He didn't want to waste their next question--especially when he didn't know how much longer this would go on for. He was getting the impression that once Malast ran out of his own questions to ask, they wouldn't be able to get anything more out of him.

But dammit, if he still didn't want to know the answer to that.

Eleyo posed the next question. “Who are these ‘others’ you mentioned before?”

“My peers,” was all Malast said.

“That is not descriptive enough,” said Eleyo.

“I believe you have made up enough rules for this game already,” said Malast. “It is my turn again. Iron One.”

Hector had been waiting to hear that.

“Where is this Rasalased now?” said Malast.

Oh shit. There were a couple of different ways he could answer that, but Hector didn't know if he even should. And somehow, it seemed like an especially bad idea to tell this guy that Rasalased was right there with them, sleeping in the Shard beneath his armor.

He'd made a special trip to go back for it, not wanting to leave it there, just in case something crazy happened while they were hunting for the treasure. The concept of being teleported to an unknown location hadn't entered his mind, but he was glad he'd decided to bring it, nonetheless.

But perhaps it would've been better to leave it in Carver's biosphere after all. He had no idea what would happen if he allowed this guy to take the Shard from him, and he wasn't too keen to find out, either.

He had to answer the question somehow, though. And he didn't want to lie unless he had to. He decided to just leave a few things out.

"Rasalased is not in one place," said Hector. "He was split apart and fell dormant."

"Hmm."

Hector held his breath while he waited to see if that was a good enough answer.

Apparently, it was.

'Well done,' said Garovel privately.

'Garovel, who the fuck is this guy?'

'I don't know. I'm not sensing anything special from him. And that worries me.'

"1497

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

Now that he was thinking about it, Hector wasn't feeling any kind of oppressive presence, either. This Malast guy didn't seem to have that insane level of field density to his soul like Ivan and Gohvis. Or even Darktide, Xuan, or Abbas, for that matter. Did that mean he wasn't as strong as them? Or did it simply mean that one's field density was adjustable? Hector recalled Ivan implying as much, actually.

As much as he would've liked to ask about it, he didn't think it was the most pressing question.

And the others were hesitating now as well, even Eleyo. They were probably all mulling over what to ask, if not simply waiting for someone else to take the initiative.

Hector's gaze fell to Carver. The poor lighting made it too difficult to decipher the expression on the man's face, but Hector did find himself wondering: had Carver known about this Malast guy all along?

Through all the confusion and disorientation, it had nearly escaped

Hector's notice when Malast mentioned the name Ettol, which meant there was only one degree of separation between Carver and Malast.

Hector was gathering questions by the second, but he was having trouble solidifying them in his mind, let alone actually choosing which to ask Carver about.

Then Elise Garza broke the silence and stepped boldly into the conversation. "Excuse me, but can we--?" She stopped. "...I would like to know more about the enormous amount of treasure around you."

Good point, Hector felt. And no doubt, Malast would've counted that as their next question if she hadn't caught herself.

"Then ask me about it," said Malast.

At that, Elise lost a bit of her fervor, and looked around for help. Her eyes fell to Manuel who, in turn, looked to Hector.

Aw, shit.

'Help?' he asked Garovel.

'Eh, I'm sure you've got this,' the reaper said privately.

'Garovel, is this really the time to be--?'

'Whining? Why, no, it isn't. So just hurry up and ask this "god" whatever you want.'

Everyone was looking at him now, Hector realized.

He really wished Diego could still talk.

Okay.

He could do this. There were only about six billion questions to choose from. He just had to pick one that wasn't completely fucking stupid.

"...Will you try to kill us if we take some of this treasure?" he heard himself say.

Well, that was either the stupidest possible question or the most important one. He wasn't quite sure which.

"Nah," said Malast. "Take what you like." Then he seemed to think about it a bit more. "But you should probably be wary of Seyos. I'm sure he wants to kill you, right about now.”

‘Seyos?’ said Yangéra. ‘The same Seyos who had Himmekel built?’

“It’s not your turn,” Malast reminded her.

‘Ugh.’

Hector braced himself.

“Iron One.”

There it was.

“How might I be able to contact this Rasalased?”

Yikes.”

"1498

Impulsively, Hector wanted to ask why Malast wanted to contact him, but he knew that wasn’t going to get answered. Then Hector started trying to work out the best lie he could tell here.

But wait a minute.

How could Malast contact Rasalased? Hector didn’t actually know the answer to that. What, would the two gods be able to start chatting away as soon as Malast touched the Shard? Probably not, considering Asad hadn’t been able to talk to Rasalased yet.

Though, maybe Malast had some weird power that would make it work.

But Hector didn’t want to assume that.

And more importantly, he didn’t want to throw away his excuse for being able to honestly say, “...I don’t really know. The circumstances that led me to meeting Rasalased were, uh... kind of an accident.”

“Mm,” said Malast. “That is disappointing. But if you are unable to answer the question, then I should get another one, no?” He looked over his audience for approval.

Hector would’ve liked to refuse him, but as he thought about it, he realized that Malast would be able to just say “I don’t know” to all of their next questions if they didn’t follow this new rule.

And perhaps Eleyo came to the same conclusion, because Hector heard him say, “Very well. Ask again.”

“What was this Rasalased like?” said Malast.

All these questions about the Dry God were beginning to form a rather obvious pattern. Clearly, Malast was interested in meeting Rasalased, but this question in particular was surprisingly... mundane, Hector felt.

“Well, he was, uh... he was very...” Shit. Not easy to describe was what he was, but Hector tried his best. “Rasalased was very... wise. And thoughtful. And considerate. And maybe a little scatterbrained. And kinda scary. Uh...”

“I see,” was all Malast said.

‘So this Seyos, then--’ tried Yangéra, but Eleyo interrupted her, doubtless because he couldn’t hear her.

“Why does this Seyos person want to kill us?” the Hun’Kui man said.

“Because he has long wanted to become a god, though he is an unsuitable vessel,” said Malast. “He would therefore see the two of you as a threat.”

‘What the hell?’ said Garovel. ‘So these two here are “suitable” vessels? Why? What makes them more suitable than anyone else?’

“It’s not your turn.”

‘Fuck this guy,’ said Garovel privately.

That nearly made Hector laugh openly. If he was pissing Garovel off so much, maybe Malast really was a god--or at least as much of a god as Rasalased had been.

Malast took his time asking his next question. “What will you do with this treasure, Iron One?”

And Hector was surprised, because that had nothing to do with Rasalased. He looked around and found everyone watching and waiting on him again.

Great.

At least he more or less knew what he wanted to say, this time.

"I will try to... build a strong link between the surface and the Undercrust. And then... use that link... to help and protect as many people as I possibly can."

Holy crap, it was embarrassing to admit all of that. He felt like everyone had just seen him naked. He was again glad to have his armor to hide behind."

"1499

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

There was a long bout of silence as everyone waited for Malast to respond in some way, but the self-proclaimed God of Boredom merely continued to appear exactly so. Bored.

Malast's expression didn't change at all. He didn't shift in his seat. He didn't stop resting his cheek on his hand. He hardly even looked like he was paying attention.

But at length, he finally deigned to say, "...That's nice."

'We're losing him,' said Garovel privately. 'This might be our last question, unless we can regain his interest somehow. Ask him if--'

Eleyo wasn't waiting for anyone's permission, though. "Would you like it if I became a god?"

Malast looked at him. "I would. What would you do if you became a god?"

"I don't know," said Eleyo. "It would depend on the exact nature of my godliness, I suppose. The precise limits of it."

Malast narrowed his gaze at him. "That's a lie. You already have a very good idea of what you would do, don't you? Your answer doesn't count if you lie, you know."

"I am not lying," said Eleyo.

"Even if that's true, then you still have not answered my question," said

Malast. "Which means I get to ask a different one."

Eleyo took a step forward. "Go on and ask, then."

"Are you reconsidering my offer?"

"I never turned you down." Eleyo took another step. "What must I do?"

Malast grabbed the jar in his lap with both hands. "You need merely to accept this of your own free will." He held the jar up, grasping the lid but not opening it. "Do you understand that you will cease to be yourself, by doing so?"

'Hector,' said Garovel, suddenly urgent.

'Somebody stop him,' said Yangéra.

But Eleyo stopped himself. "No, I do not understand that. What do you mean? I will cease to be myself?"

Malast sighed again and brought the jar back down to his lap. "You will be a vessel, like I said--a conduit through which an otherworldly being may experience this one."

Eleyo took a step back now. "No. You said I would become a god. Not be replaced by one. Those are two very different things."

"He will not replace you," said Malast. "He will transform you, and you will transform him. Together, a new being will emerge. A new god, as some would describe it."

But Eleyo was still taking steps back.

Malast smacked his lips and gave still another sigh. "Yeah, that's about what I figured..." He slumped down in his stone chair. "I knew that Ettol was just getting my hopes up again. The wily bastard."

As Eleyo shrunk back toward the group, Carver stepped up to replace him.

"How do you know Ettol?" said Carver.

Malast eyed him a moment and sniffed absent-mindedly. "It's not your turn."

Carver was undeterred, however. "Ettol is my uncle. I have known him my whole life, but I must confess that he has always been something of an enigma to me.””

”1500

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

“You believe you are related to him?” laughed Malast, which was perhaps the most emotion he had yet shown. “As in, by blood?”

“That’s right,” said Carver. “And that was your question, so now you must answer mine. How do you know Ettol?”

Malast blinked a couple times, then gave another laugh. “Your ‘uncle,’ you said? That is frankly impossible, I regret to inform you. Ettol has no siblings. At least, not in the traditional sense. If you believe he is your uncle by blood, then you are mistaken.”

“That does not answer my question,” Carver insisted. “How do you know Ettol?”

“Hmm. If he never told you, then I imagine he would be upset if I did.” Malast allowed a beat to pass. “But he’s kind of a dick, so I don’t care. He and I are very old comrades. One might even call us the oldest of comrades.”

Carver, along with everyone else, waited for more. In vain, apparently. “And?” said Carver. “You didn’t answer my question.”

“Sure I did.”

“No, you didn’t! How do you know my uncle?!”

“Excuse me, but it’s my turn again.”

“No, it isn’t! You’re breaking the rules of the game! You have to--”

“Be silent,” said Malast, invoking the same heaviness that he had used on Diego.

And sure enough, Hector observed Carver’s mouth moving in his climate suit without any words escaping.

“I do not care for people,” said Malast, “but I especially do not care for noisy people.”

That was enough to render everyone else silent of their own volition again.

‘Garovel, what the hell is that ability?’ thought Hector.

‘Not something I’ve seen before,’ said Garovel in the echo of privacy. ‘The closest thing I can think of is the oppressive soul power of someone incredibly strong. I’ve heard rumors that it’s possible to bend people to your will, if your soul power is sufficiently stronger than theirs, but this--I don’t know. If he were doing something like that, you’d think I’d be able to sense the enormous strength of his soul, but I can’t.’

‘Maybe he’s suppressing his soul.’

‘Even WHILE using his power? That’s pretty much impossible.’

‘...Not if he really is a god.’

‘Ugh.’

“Anyway,” Malast finally said, “it’s my turn again.” His eyes went to Eleyo. “Hidden One.”

Eleyo just waited.

“Are you afraid of me?” was all Malast asked.

Eleyo shifted his feet. “No.”

“You’re not lying again, are you?”

“I wasn’t before, and I am not now.”

“Hmm.” Malast’s eyes seemed to glaze over. “Alright, then. Final question. Ask away.”

And again, everyone fell quiet.

The threat of this being the final question made even Eleyo reluctant to say anything, it seemed.

‘...What do we ask?’ thought Hector.

‘Fuckin’... I don’t know! Ask him why he’s such an asshole.’

‘Real helpful, Garovel.’

‘Oh, who cares? Not HIM, apparently. Rasalased was way cooler than this douche.’”

"1501

Hector didn't necessarily disagree, but that hardly seemed like the most beneficial attitude to have, given the circumstances. ‘What can you tell me about Malast? Or at least, the folklore around him. You called him the Idle God before, didn't you?’

‘Yeah,’ said Garovel. ‘Ancient stories, those. Malast was a god who never took an interest in humanity, no matter how much they pleaded for him to. He had all sorts of names. The Idle God. The Worthless God. He Who Sits. He Who Does Nothing. The God of Despair. The God of Boredom. But I didn't know he was called the God of the Underworld, too.’

‘Hmm. What do the stories say about him?’

‘Not much, really. His whole deal was that he simply didn't engage with us lowly humans. Some stories portrayed him as outright hating us, but even in those, he never actually takes action against humans. He usually just lets us fend for ourselves and occasionally die in some horrible manner that he presumably could have prevented.’

‘That's it? The stories are just about him doing nothing the whole time?’

‘Basically, yeah. But the stories weren't about him. He was usually just in the background, being super unhelpful. I don't know if he even has a definitive origin story.’

‘That... all kinda lines up with this guy's general attitude and weirdness, right now, doesn't it?’

‘Oh, believe me, I've noticed. It's been annoying the ever-living crap out of me.’

He supposed that explained why the reaper seemed even more irritated than he might have expected.

Still, the more Hector thought about what their final question should be, the more he supposed they already knew the most immediately relevant things. Malast was not hostile. Malast was not going to prevent them from taking the treasure. Certainly, there were still many things he would've liked to know, but he couldn't tell if any single question was more important than any of the others.

That was, until Manuel Delaguna decided to speak up for the first time since they'd arrived. "How do we get out of here?"

The group looked at him.

Yeah. That was a pretty good way to spend their last question, Hector felt.

Malast, however, just shrugged. "I don't know."

What?

How could he not know?

Did that mean they were all trapped here now?

Hector had to stop himself blurting any or all of those questions out, and judging from the distorted expressions on the reapers faces, they were doing the same.

Eleyo spoke next. "How funny that a 'god' could end up trapped in a place like this."

The man had been careful to avoid framing his words as a question, Hector noticed.

Hector wondered if that actually would work, though.

Apparently not, judging from Malast's complete lack of a reaction. "It's still your turn."

Hector tried to think everything through rationally. If this Ettol guy had come and gone, then they probably weren't trapped here. It was just a matter of figuring out how to leave."

"1502 -- CLXI.

Of course, that didn't explain why Malast didn't know how to get out of here, but there were a lot of things about Malast that were not making much sense, so Hector just added it to the list and tried not to worry about it for the moment.

A different question occurred to him, one of similarly pressing relevance, and Hector felt suddenly as if he should ask it quickly before anyone else used up their last question.

"This person who wants to kill us," said Hector, "this Seyos--where is he, right now?" He figured that if there was someone who wanted them dead, as Malast had said, then that was a problem which should probably take precedence over all others.

Malast shrugged again, however. "I don't know. He was here earlier, but he didn't tell me where he was going."

Hector frowned.

"Then we get another question," said Eleyo.

"Boy, you're really milking this, aren't you? Fine. But this next one is the true final question, even if I don't know the answer to it."

Once again, Eleyo seized the initiative. "Why do you want to make one of us a god?"

Malast leveled a dull stare at the Hun'Kui man and made everyone wait a bit more for an answer. "...A very long time ago, I had a friend. He was--and still is, I suppose--the only thing in all of Creation that I can confidently say I liked." He ran his hand along the top of the jar in his lap. "His name was Secho, and this here is all that remains of him."

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-One: 'A trial of gods...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector blinked a couple times.

Malast wasn't yet done talking, however. "I would like for Secho to be reborn in a new vessel, even if it means he won't quite be the same as I remember him. He deserves that much."

Hector detected a softness in the man's voice that hadn't been there before.

‘Secho, huh?’ said Garovel privately. ‘That’s another god, by the way.’

‘The God of Growth,’ said Hector.

‘The--yeah. Hey, how do you know that?’

‘Eleyo over there told me all about him.’ Hector noticed the Hun’Kui man looking back at him.

It was difficult to tell in the poor light and the goggles on Eleyo’s face, but Hector abruptly felt as though he could read the man’s face-- maybe even his mind. There was just something in that look. The timing of it. The lingering of it.

Hector knew at once what Eleyo was about to do.

Eleyo was going to accept Malast’s offer.

That one name, Secho, had just changed Eleyo’s mind completely.

It was madness. Hector knew that. To just suddenly agree to be transformed into a “god” when there was still so much left unexplained. But everything that he recalled from their conversation earlier was informing him of Eleyo’s state of mind, right now.”

"1502 -- CLXI.

((Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 2))

Of course, that didn’t explain why Malast didn’t know how to get out of here, but there were a lot of things about Malast that were not making much sense, so Hector just added it to the list and tried not to worry about it for the moment.

A different question occurred to him, one of similarly pressing relevance, and Hector felt suddenly as if he should ask it quickly before anyone else used up their last question.

“This person who wants to kill us,” said Hector, “this Seyos--where is he, right now?” He figured that if there was someone who wanted them dead, as Malast had said, then that was a problem which should probably take precedence over all others.

Malast shrugged again, however. "I don't know. He was here earlier, but he didn't tell me where he was going."

Hector frowned.

"Then we get another question," said Eleyo.

"Boy, you're really milking this, aren't you? Fine. But this next one is the true final question, even if I don't know the answer to it."

Once again, Eleyo seized the initiative. "Why do you want to make one of us a god?"

Malast leveled a dull stare at the Hun'Kui man and made everyone wait a bit more for an answer. "...A very long time ago, I had a friend. He was--and still is, I suppose--the only thing in all of Creation that I can confidently say I liked." He ran his hand along the top of the jar in his lap. "His name was Secho, and this here is all that remains of him."

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-One: 'A trial of gods...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector blinked a couple times.

Malast wasn't yet done talking, however. "I would like for Secho to be reborn in a new vessel, even if it means he won't quite be the same as I remember him. He deserves that much."

Hector detected a softness in the man's voice that hadn't been there before.

'Secho, huh?' said Garovel privately. 'That's another god, by the way.'

'The God of Growth,' said Hector.

'The--yeah. Hey, how do you know that?'

'Eleyo over there told me all about him.' Hector noticed the Hun'Kui man looking back at him.

It was difficult to tell in the poor light and the goggles on Eleyo's face, but Hector abruptly felt as though he could read the man's face--maybe even his mind. There was just something in that look. The timing of it. The lingering of it.

Hector knew at once what Eleyo was about to do.

Eleyo was going to accept Malast's offer.

That one name, Secho, had just changed Eleyo's mind completely.

It was madness. Hector knew that. To just suddenly agree to be transformed into a "god" when there was still so much left unexplained. But everything that he recalled from their conversation earlier was informing him of Eleyo's state of mind, right now."

"1503

((Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 2))

Hector also felt in that moment as if Eleyo knew that he knew. How could the man not? It hadn't even been half a day since Hector had listened to him go on about how much he admired Secho. Eleyo had to know what Hector was thinking, right now, too.

And indeed, when Eleyo took a step toward Malast, and Hector raised an iron wall in front of the man, Eleyo did not look surprised.

"What are you doing, Senmurai?" said Eleyo.

"Didn't I tell you to stop calling me that?" said Hector.

"I will do as I please, Senmurai."

Somehow, it didn't sound like a term of reverence or respect anymore. "You don't know what you're doing. We don't know anything about this Malast guy." He shot a glance at Malast. "No offense."

The Idle God gave a shrug.

"I understand the risk involved," said Eleyo. "Now let me pass. It is my choice."

Hector clenched his jaw as he deliberated. Honestly, he had no idea what to do now. This was all too sudden and crazy. Should he stop this guy? His gut was telling him that he absolutely should, but what actual justification was there? If Eleyo wanted to gamble with his own life like this, shouldn't he have been free to do so?

There was just something wrong. Something about Eleyo that was bothering him right now. Something in that conversation they'd had. Something in the way the man was now acting in front of Malast. Almost like a different person. Suddenly fearless, where before the man had been so cautious that he waited two entire days to reveal he spoke Mohssian.

And there was that thing Malast had called him. Hidden One? What the hell was that about?

Not to mention, what even made Hector and Eleyo "suitable" as a god's vessel in the first place? That was arguably the most important question of all, and it had still not been answered.

There were just so many unsettling things, all coming together as one formless, unspecified concern in the pit of Hector's stomach. He didn't have the luxury to think about each one of them, much less the time to do so, and he certainly didn't know how to put any of that into words, but right now, that uneasy feeling remained strong enough that he wanted to listen to it, no matter what.

Before the tense silence could draw out for too long, however, Malast intervened. "You wish to become Secho's vessel, after all, Hidden One?"

"Yes, I do."

"Why do you call him that?" said Hector. "Hidden One? And why do you call me Iron One? How did you know that I can use iron, huh?"

"You only get one question at a time," said Malast.

"If you really want one of us to be Secho's vessel," said Hector, having had just about enough of their game, "then you should be willing to answer all of our questions. Unless there's something you're hiding from us, of course. Something that might make us refuse.""

"1504

"Always so suspicious," said Malast. "Another reason I've always avoided you. So bothersome to deal with."

Eleyo started walking around the iron wall in front of him, so Hector made it wider.

Malast sighed again. "You have no reason to stop him, Iron One. It is his choice to make. That is, unless you wish to become a god, yourself. In which case, I suppose you have every reason to stop him."

Hector was at a loss. 'Garovel, what do I do?'

'Oh, uh--well, I agree with you. But I don't think you should piss off Malast. If worse comes to worst, just give in and let Eleyo have it.'

"Well, Iron One?" said Malast, holding up the jar in Hector's direction. "Do you wish to become a god? If not, then the choice here is simple."

Hector grit his teeth. "...What will you do if I say yes?" he said, mostly just trying to buy more time to think.

"Ah. In that case, I would have to hold--"

A clinking and shifting sound cut him off, and Hector saw the mountain of treasure begin to move slightly. There were several slow and mild avalanches in the glowing jewels, clattering all the way down to the stony floor around Malast, who was looking around with the same level of disinterest as he always seemed to have.

Then a cluster of giant, red-orange hands exploded out of the treasure pile. Jewels went flying everywhere as the hands stretched and grew and bent aggressively toward the group.

Hector reacted with a wall for everyone. The collective impact from all the hands nearly toppled it immediately, but Hector added foundational support in time to stabilize it, so instead of it merely falling on top of them, it started slowly pushing everyone back. Within seconds, Hector could see the red-hot, hand-shaped spots in his wall, where they were doubtlessly trying to push through.

Hector had something for that, though. He materialized freezing cold spikes of solid iron on the other side of the wall, skewering as many hands as he could at once.

The pushing stopped. The glowing spots on the wall began to diminish.

Hector was wary of annihilating his work, however. Manuel and the still-silent Diego each moved to opposite ends of the wall in order to peek around the corner. When they both gave him a nod, Hector destroyed his iron.

As they closed the distance back toward Malast, Hector didn't see any traces of the hands that had presumably just tried to kill or capture everyone, but he did notice something different about the mountain of treasure in each of the spots where the hands had originated from.

There were mirrors. They must have been buried beneath the jewels before, but now they were mostly visible.

Before anyone could ask Malast about what the hell had just happened, however, a booming voice arrived.

"Invaders, begone from this place! You are not worthy to be in the presence of the God of the Underworld!"

"1505

Hector didn't recognize the voice, but fortunately, he didn't have to.

"Seyos!" yelled Malast. "I have not finished speaking with these people! Cease this foolishness and reveal yourself!"

There came a pause as everyone waited.

Then the treasure pile shifted again, and a molten light emerged from one of the mirrors nearest Malast. First a hand, then a shoulder, head, torso, and so on. A Hun'Sho man, quite clearly, climbed out of the mirror as if it were a window, pushing jewels out of his way as he arrived and finally stood before them.

He looked radically unlike the other Hun'Sho Hector had met, primarily because he was wearing clothes. The billowing black cloak was the most noticeable addition, as it did not stop moving even when Seyos did. The tall staff in his hands was perhaps the next most obvious thing, adorned at its tip with a spinning and glowing jewel.

Then there were the gloves--assuming that was what they were.

Unlike the other Hun'Sho, Seyos' forearms were the only things covered in magma, while the rest of him appeared more or less Hun'Kui-like, but those forearms were much larger than the other Hun'Sho's had been. And they were lined with something, too, as if to help hold all that extra magma in place. Ultimately, they had the effect of making the man look like he had the hands of a giant--perhaps even that molten golem that they'd seen a couple days ago.

There were a few other oddities on the man's body as well, but Hector only had enough time to take in those few large things before Seyos started talking.

"Do you wretches even comprehend the sheer magnitude of greatness sitting before you?" said Seyos. "This is a being as old as humanity itself! Yet you speak to Him with the irreverence of a common dreg!"

Eleyo took the opening. "You seem knowledgeable. What else can you tell us about Malast?"

Seyos regarded the Hun'Kui man with obvious disgust. "Ashen dross. How dare you speak to me."

Eleyo threw up his hands and looked toward the surface-dwellers. "One of you try."

Carver seemed to volunteer, until he remembered that he couldn't speak. Then he turned to Hector, along with just about everyone else.

'Go get 'em, champ,' said Garovel privately.

Hector was more than a little sick of all this attention by now, but he didn't see any recourse. "Why do you sound so convinced that this guy here really is a god? I mean, all he does is sit there." He again threw another glance Malast's way. "No offense."

Malast returned another shrug. "It's kinda my thing."

"Oh, but of course you do not know," said Seyos. "Malast has never intervened in human affairs. That is the reason why he alone remained, while the others became little more than stories we tell one another."

Everyone looked to Malast, who had nothing to say--and had even shut his eyes. It was again questionable as to whether or not he was even paying attention."

"1506

"What 'others' are you referring to?" said Hector.

"The Choro'Tachi, of course," said Seyos.

'The Primordials,' translated Garovel privately. 'Or simply Elders. It's an umbrella term that refers to pretty much all the gods you've already heard of--and probably a few others.'

'Uh, ah--what should I ask him next?' said Hector.

'Ask him what happened to the others.'

Hector much preferred this calmer, less annoyed-sounding Garovel backing him up. "...What exactly happened to the other, uh, Ch-Choro'Tachi?"

"They were taken by the God of All That Is Not, so that humanity might be allowed to flourish."

This Seyos guy was a hell of a lot more forthcoming than Malast, at least. Hector did have to grant him that, even if he had been trying to kill them a moment ago--and probably would again anytime now, Hector felt.

Perhaps Hector was misreading the situation, but he was getting the impression that the only thing stopping Seyos from attacking them with whatever other crazy shit he had at his disposal was that "god" sitting over there with his eyes still closed.

"Do you understand?" said Seyos, perhaps having grown tired of Hector's uncertain silence. "You stand in the presence of unimaginable power. You would do well to show respect."

That made Malast open his eyes, though he still didn't say anything.

Hector took the opportunity to address the Idle God directly. "Is any of that true?"

Malast didn't answer him.

Seyos did, however. "Of course it is true! How dare you question me!" His staff began to glow, as did a pendant around his neck that Hector hadn't noticed before.

He braced himself for whatever the hell was about to happen, but Malast held up a hand.

“What did I just say about foolishness and ceasing, huh?”

Seyos growled. “Let their deaths finally prove to you that I am worthy of your gift!”

“Killing them seems a little excessive,” said Malast.

“You deem them worthy, yes?” said Seyos. “Then by defeating them, I too shall become worthy!”

“It doesn’t work like that.”

Seyos struggled for words for a second. “Y-yes, it does!”

“No, it doesn’t,” said Malast.

“N-no, listen, I have been researching this subject,” said Seyos. “It is a matter of the Saiko’Ishiryoku, no?”

Malast didn’t answer him.

‘Garovel?’ said Hector.

‘Oh, ah--something like “Supreme Will,” I guess?’ the reaper said privately.

Seyos continued anyway. “That is what makes a vessel suitable, is it not? It must have a soul which can withstand the given power. And the Saiko’Ishiryoku is achievable by all! Even the unworthy, such as I!”

Malast sighed. “That’s technically true, yes, but how is killing them going to help you achieve it?”

“There is no better proving ground than that of mortal peril! But perhaps it is impossible for a god to understand such things. You do not have to worry about struggling to change or improve yourself.”
"1507 -- CLXII.

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

Malast didn’t respond. He looked down at the jar in his lap, running his hand along the lid.

Seyos turned back toward Hector and the others, and the jewel on his staff began to glow again.

"You may be right," the Idle God said. "Perhaps you will surprise me."

"Excellent!" said Seyos.

"To me," said Malast with that sudden weight behind his words again.

The staff flew from Seyos' hand and into Malast's waiting one. It stopped glowing, as did the pendant around Seyos' neck.

"What are you--?!"

"Any among you could surprise me, I suppose," said Malast. "I should not dismiss your potential so easily. Very well. I shall give you all an opportunity to achieve beyond yourselves, as the Hidden One and the Iron One have."

Hector didn't quite follow most of that, but the time for questions was past, it seemed.

The staff in Malast's hands lit up with renewed vigor, far brighter than before--so much so, in fact, that after a few moments, it sparked to life with glaring electricity. Light filled the whole chamber in intensifying waves, and Hector had to shield his eyes so as not to be blinded.

The prior darkness all around melted away, revealing the distant rock walls that they had only been able to glimpse previously with their meager lamplights.

Jagged blue bolts erupted from Malast's staff and leapt out across the chamber, arcing toward four separate corners, where Hector noticed familiar stone monuments waiting to receive them. They had blended in so seamlessly with the rock behind them that only now could Hector tell they were there, somehow coated with a visible electric charge.

"We shall have a tournament," announced Malast in a voice that boomed even over the crackling lightning. "The winner, if they be suitable by the end of it, shall be Secho's vessel."

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Two: 'Embrace thy turmoil and observe...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To say that Diego did not appreciate being unable to speak was an understatement, but it currently made no difference, as he was genuinely speechless.

"There is only one rule," Malast continued, still not even standing up from his stone seat. "You win when your opponent either dies or admits defeat. All else is acceptable on the path to victory."

They were not given an opportunity to respond.

Light distorted and consumed Diego's vision, and he felt Yangéra grab his shoulder to make sure they didn't get separated.

It was the same sensation he'd felt during their previous teleport, so it wasn't as disorienting this time, but it still wasn't exactly a joy ride, either. When his vision steadied itself again, he discovered a sight which he was not at all expecting.

Gold. Piles and piles of it. Chests spilling over with gems and gold and artifacts of presumably tremendous value, judging by everything around them.

This was a completely different room, Diego realized, which meant this treasure was also completely different from that which had surrounded Malast."

"1507 -- CLXII.

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

Malast didn't respond. He looked down at the jar in his lap, running his hand along the lid.

Seyos turned back toward Hector and the others, and the jewel on his staff began to glow again.

"You may be right," the Idle God said. "Perhaps you will surprise me."

"Excellent!" said Seyos.

"To me," said Malast with that sudden weight behind his words again.

The staff flew from Seyos' hand and into Malast's waiting one. It stopped glowing, as did the pendant around Seyos' neck.

“What are you--?!”

“Any among you could surprise me, I suppose,” said Malast. “I should not dismiss your potential so easily. Very well. I shall give you all an opportunity to achieve beyond yourselves, as the Hidden One and the Iron One have.”

Hector didn't quite follow most of that, but the time for questions was past, it seemed.

The staff in Malast's hands lit up with renewed vigor, far brighter than before--so much so, in fact, that after a few moments, it sparked to life with glaring electricity. Light filled the whole chamber in intensifying waves, and Hector had to shield his eyes so as not to be blinded.

The prior darkness all around melted away, revealing the distant rock walls that they had only been able to glimpse previously with their meager lamplights.

Jagged blue bolts erupted from Malast's staff and leapt out across the chamber, arcing toward four separate corners, where Hector noticed familiar stone monuments waiting to receive them. They had blended in so seamlessly with the rock behind them that only now could Hector tell they were there, somehow coated with a visible electric charge.

“We shall have a tournament,” announced Malast in a voice that boomed even over the crackling lightning. “The winner, if they be suitable by the end of it, shall be Secho's vessel.”

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Two: ‘Embrace thy turmoil and observe...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

To say that Diego did not appreciate being unable to speak was an understatement, but it currently made no difference, as he was genuinely speechless.

“There is only one rule,” Malast continued, still not even standing up from his stone seat. “You win when your opponent either dies or admits defeat. All else is acceptable on the path to victory.”

They were not given an opportunity to respond.

Light distorted and consumed Diego's vision, and he felt Yangéra grab his shoulder to make sure they didn't get separated.

It was the same sensation he'd felt during their previous teleport, so it wasn't as disorienting this time, but it still wasn't exactly a joy ride, either. When his vision steadied itself again, he discovered a sight which he was not at all expecting.

Gold. Piles and piles of it. Chests spilling over with gems and gold and artifacts of presumably tremendous value, judging by everything around them.

This was a completely different room, Diego realized, which meant this treasure was also completely different from that which had surrounded Malast."

"1508

The treasure was arguably not what surprised him most, however. The sunlight was. And the grass. The temperature, too. Wherever this room was, Diego knew that he was suddenly much closer to the surface than he had been a second ago.

He searched the ceiling for the source of the sunlight and found many small ones. The rock above his head was porous, and he considered trying to break through it in order to get a better idea of his location, but the sight of Elise Garza standing there, looking confounded beyond belief, changed his mind.

"Diego!" she said upon noticing him as well. "What in the world is happening?!"

He scratched his brow, wondering how to--or even if he could--explain.

The room was clearly smaller than the last one, though it was still plenty large enough for a fight, which he supposed was the point, unless he'd misunderstood what Malast was saying.

Should he tell her that, though?

Eh, she could probably handle it. Servant or not, she was a Rainlord, same as him.

"I think we're supposed to fight now," he told her.

“Excuse me?!” She looked horrified.

“Didn’t you hear what Malast said? We’ve been drafted into a tournament.”

“Why?!”

“He wants us to compete for godhood, I guess. And that means fighting.”

“I can’t fight you!” she said. “You’re a monster!”

“A monster with feelings, thank you.”

“You know what I mean! I can’t possibly defeat you!”

“Ah, hmm.” He tilted his head at her. “Well, you could just surrender without actually fighting, I think.”

“Okay! I surrender! Now leave me alone and go fight somebody else!” She looked up at the ceiling. “You hear that?! I said I surrender!”

And it took a moment, but the distortion did indeed arrive another time, and Diego’s vision melted in on itself.

When it returned to him, he discovered another chamber, similar to the previous one but not identical, as the treasure here was different, and the temperature had risen again.

When he looked around for his new opponent, his eyes settled on the Hun’Sho man from earlier.

Seyos.

“I don’t suppose you’re going to surrender without a fight, are you?” said Diego.

Seyos had his swirling cloak drawn in front of his body.

There was no telling what other ridiculous artifacts of a magical nature the guy had at his disposal. And of course, Diego had never fought a Hun’Sho before. He had no idea what to expect, and neither did Yangéra, whom he couldn’t see but could sense clinging to his back, still.

“Before we get into this, I have an important question for you.” Diego’s mouth twisted, and he couldn’t stop his next words from becoming a snarl. "What did you do with Jasirok?"

Seyos didn't answer him.

"It was you who took him, wasn't it? Deny it, if you like, though I don't think I'll believe you."

"Your concern for him surprises me," said Seyos. "Is this, too, another one of your deceptions?"

"1509

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

"Deceptions?" said Diego. "What deceptions? You're the one who's been hiding out and snatching people through mirrors."

"Proper guidance sometimes requires extreme methods," said Seyos. "You would know that if you were ever called upon to protect your loved ones from a threat which was far beyond your own meager power to stop."

That was a lot of words--and passionately spoken, as well--but Diego couldn't say he understood where any of it was coming from. He wanted to keep Seyos talking, though. "That still doesn't explain what deceptions you were referring to. I haven't lied to you or done anything to harm you, have I?"

"Do not play at innocence!" shouted Seyos, his tone suddenly manic. After a breath, however, he settled himself. "The others all trusted him, but I knew. I knew Ettol would bring more of you here to claim my treasure. To take my place as a new god. You are all deceivers, every one."

"Hold on a second here. We aren't with this Ettol person. I've never even met the guy. In fact, I have a lot of questions about who the hell he is, myself. From the way Malast talked about him, it sounds like Ettol is a god, too, no?"

"Hah! Ettol is no god! A pretender is all he is! A manipulator of emotion and a thief of reason and faculty!"

"Alright, well, that's a start. Can you tell me what Ettol looks like, maybe?"

Seyos merely stared back at him.

Diego smacked his lips. "Why does nobody remember what this jackass looks like, huh? I find that extremely suspicious."

Seyos shifted behind his cloak. "...You are truly not Ettol's kinsmen?"

"Kinsmen? Of course not! I'm a damn Rainlord--and proud of it!"

"Rainlord?"

For a second, Diego thought he saw the light of recognition in the Hun'Sho man's eyes. And it made no sense to Diego's mind, but still, he had to ask, "Do you know of us?"

"A proud and ancient group of surface-dwellers," said Seyos. "Renowned for bringing trouble wherever they go."

Diego nodded his head admissively. "Not inaccurate, I suppose, but now you've made me curious--where in the world did you hear all of that?"

Again, Seyos did not answer him.

Yangéra chimed in from over Diego's shoulder, having still not let go of him. 'You've been to the surface before, haven't you, Seyos?'

"I have observed outsiders as a preventative measure for many years," said Seyos. "I recently increased my efforts, though it appears to have been in vain."

That made Diego squint. "Increased how?"

Seyos scowled. "Enough of your questions. You obviously have nothing of value to say."

"I have plenty of value, if you would just listen!"

But unsurprisingly, he wouldn't just listen, and Diego was prepared when he saw the rifle appear out from behind Seyos' swirling cloak.

Diego didn't doubt that it was ardor-infused, and so he dove to his right. 'Pan-forma now,' he told Yangéra as a flaming bullet sliced through his left arm like it was wet paper."

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

He felt her initiate the merge. It was like a somehow familiar moment of realization, a forced epiphany, prying his mind open and expanding it into her own. Not particularly pleasant, but not as bad as it used to be, either.

And the power. The surge of not only strength but thinking capacity. That was most welcome.

He didn't have to care about dodging bullets now. The immediate and complete regeneration of pan-forma rendered Seyos' weapon as deadly as a water pistol, ardor or not.

The only pressing concern in Diego and Yangéra's collective consciousness now was whether or not they would be able take Seyos alive. Certainly, Diego's nitrogen transfiguration ability did not lend itself well to restraint. They closed the distance at full sprint, aiming for a quick submission hold.

But then everything was wrong.

Diego lost all sense of himself, and he felt abruptly as if half his mind had been torn out of his head.

Because it had, he soon realized. He and Yangéra were separated again. Just like that, she was there on the ground in front of him, and he was struggling even to crawl. This was post-hyper-state exhaustion, he was fairly sure, but why? What the hell just happened?

Seyos had something in his other hand. Some kind of orb? It was so hard to tell. And Diego became immediately more concerned with the gun being pointed directly at Yangéra.

None of it made sense. There was no time. His reaper was about to die if he didn't do something, and there was only one thing to do, as far he could tell.

"I surrender!" Diego yelled, as loud as he could muster.

It wasn't fast enough to stop Seyos from getting another shot off. A bullet pierced Yangéra's avian chest.

‘Agh!’ she cried out, shivering.

Diego grabbed her and wrapped himself around her. “Malast! I said I--!”

Seyos blinked out of existence and was gone.

Diego could see the ethereal smoke rising out of his reaper, the familiar indicator of a significant wound. “Are you alright?” he asked.

‘Yeah, I think so...’

He exhaled and rolled over, not intending to let go of her anytime soon.

--++--++--

Royo Raju understood the circumstances before the one called Manuel Delaguna did. He couldn’t tell what the man’s reaper was thinking, but it seemed apparent enough that his opponent didn’t realize that they were supposed to fight.

Royo could hardly fault him for that, though. Everything had happened so quickly. And Royo wasn’t eager to be aggressive, either. At the moment, this curious and confused camaraderie was certainly preferable to fighting a superhuman whose powers Royo didn’t fully grasp.

So he took his time and looked the new chamber over, paying especially close attention to the treasure here and encouraging the one called Manuel to do the same, ostensibly in hopes of finding a way out of here.

That might not have worked if the one called Manuel wasn’t so agreeable. Or confident, maybe. Too early to tell."

"1511

But the treasure helped. It was certainly captivating enough to keep them distracted--so captivating, in fact, that Royo had to be careful not to get too lost in it himself. He did still have a weapon on him, if worse came to worst, but he hoped to find something else that would be useful. Even if he did manage to get past the one called Manuel, there were still subsequent opponents to think of.

Fortunately, he had some idea of what to look for--or hoped he did, at least. He had held a passing interest in ancient artifacts a few years ago, toward the end of his formal education. At the time, he hadn't actually put much stake in such things. It was more of a guilty pleasure than anything, but needless to say, the very recent past had altered his opinion. Having encountered so many superhumans and ghosts--and now even a "god," supposedly?

He would be rather disappointed if none of the items around here were even a little bit magical.

The temptation, he knew, was to gravitate toward any object that was glowing, but according to an essay of dubious origin he recalled reading, that would be a rookie mistake.

While it was true that the emission of light could indeed be indicative of some manner of "power" stored therein, it was very unwise on the treasure seeker's part to touch such objects without reserve. Even discounting the still-quite-credible threat of deadly radiation, there was another potential problem, according to the essay. Oftentimes, these "forces beyond mortal reckoning," as the essay had dubbed them, would use the human body as a conduit--not unlike that of electricity, though potentially even more dangerous.

Now, perhaps that was all nonsense, but Royo was of a mind to exercise caution, nonetheless. He knew, at least, that those glowing jewels which had surrounded Malast were safe to the touch, as those were simply akaridaiya, or light diamonds.

Well. Calling them "simply" akaridaiya was perhaps doing them a disservice. Akaridaiya had been tremendously valuable in the Undercrust since ancient times and had never ceased being so. Perhaps it was only natural they should treasure objects which could emit sustained, unfueled, harmless light.

The Hun'Kui weren't particularly bothered by the darkness, of course, but other races could be, and Royo knew for a fact that surface-dwellers would pay absolutely absurd prices for those diamonds, if he could find the right buyer. Why, the volume that had surrounded Malast would be worth the GDP of a small kingdom. Possibly even a not-so-small one.

All of that was potentially wonderful news, to be sure, but it was far from his mind, presently.

Royo's goggled and glowing eyes scanned his options, eventually catching upon a notably non-metallic object. A glove. It did have a silver metal lining, but the rest of it was some kind of cloth. He had to believe that if anything here would be safe to the touch, it would be a glove."

"1512

((Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 2))

He slid his hand into the cloth and let his fingers stretch through it and get comfortable. It was rather loose, unfortunately, but he supposed--

He felt it move on its own, writhe against his flesh.

His impulse was to panic and tear it off, but he resisted. It wasn't painful. If anything, it was more comfortable now.

Yes, he realized. It had tightened around his hand. Fitted itself to him, perhaps.

After a moment, he decided to remove it anyway, just to ensure that he actually could, and indeed, it slipped off his hand again without fighting him.

Curious.

He put it back on and waited.

It didn't readjust to his form again. It didn't need to. It still fit perfectly. The first adjustment had remained, even after removal.

Unless he was hallucinating, this object was clearly special in some way. He had to wonder about its origins, as well as what else it might be capable of. Convenient as it was, he didn't see a whole lot of utility in it, so far.

Still, just having some level of protection for his hand made him feel immediately safer in handling these other objects. His eyes went to a shelf he'd seen earlier and stopped on a small metal container, the kind that might be used to house particularly precious stones.

He grabbed the container, and it crumpled under his grip. Whatever was inside, he heard it shatter and saw glassy dust trickle out onto the ground.

Royo pursed his lips to one side, set the container down, and observed his glove anew.

Hmm.

He deliberated for a second, then grabbed the ruined container again, this time employing strength deliberately, as much as he could muster.

He felt almost no resistance, hearing more crunching and seeing more dust. When he opened his hand again, the container was unrecognizable. The metal had not only lost its shape, but it had also taken new shape around his fingers. The force applied had been so great that the metal now looked like soft clay that had just been squeezed.

He hoped whatever he'd just destroyed inside that container wasn't too valuable, but considering everything he was currently looking at, it probably was.

Oh well, though. No helping it now.

He wanted to try his glove out on another object before drawing conclusions, however. For all he knew, it could have been the case that the metal of the container was the abnormal thing, not his glove. So he picked up a gold coin next and pressed it between his thumb and index finger. It folded like rubber and stayed that way.

Interesting.

Just to be sure, he tried again on a couple of other objects of comparatively lesser value, and the results remained consistent.

This couldn't rightly be called super strength, in Royo's estimation--not like that of the superhumans, at least. No, this was limited to his fingers and wrist only. It would be immensely useful for gripping, twisting, and crushing; but it was not going to let him punch like the superhumans could or lift tremendous weight like they could.

A very good find nonetheless, Royo felt."

"1513

As he searched for something else of use, he practiced lifting other objects with the glove on. It was simple enough to avoid crushing something. He just had to be extra gentle. He could see this glove being a double-edged sword, potentially. A mad part of him wanted to test it on himself--to see if he would have to worry about unconsciously grabbing his own arm or hand, perhaps--but he decided to forego that experiment, at least for now.

His gaze eventually stopped on a pair of boots and a sword with a sequined hilt.

Now why did this sight look so familiar? He shut his eyes and tried to recall.

Yes, he'd seen a drawing of these items--or ones like them, at least. Those long, curving boot buckles with straps that went all the way around--that was a distinctive design. If the book he was thinking of was correct, then these were the Boots of Karugetti, and they supposedly had the power to "defy the heavens"--whatever that meant.

And the sword. That thin and faintly curved blade. That was the Sword of Hamenszoon, and it supposedly had the power to cast illusions. He remembered thinking how ugly it was and how unpleasant those sequins on the hilt would make it to wield.

Indeed, he was unfortunately proved right. It felt like reptilian scales against his flesh. He considered using his gloved hand, but it seemed a waste to occupy it with a weapon when it was probably more threatening without one. He instead decided to remove his green scarf and wrap it around the grip.

That was better.

He still had no idea how to wield it, though. He'd never trained in any manner of swordsmanship, nor did he know how to draw out its power. Assuming it truly had any.

But he knew something of ardor. The force and fuel of the planet. He knew of its debatably magical properties, and he knew of its extraction, refinement, and infusion processes as well.

Most importantly, though, he knew that to manipulate ardor required concentration in one's very soul. It required a degree of focus and "oneness" with the planet itself. A sense for the world's "pulse," as some described it.

It required training, in other words--training which he had undergone many years ago, though he had not understood its significance until much more recently. Back then, it was still an experimental thing, one of many "cutting edge" forms of training which he had been forced to undertake, lest he lose his job as an iron miner.

There had been a span of nearly five years straight where it seemed like he had to go through some new type of training every week, and the vast majority of them were a complete waste of time--if not physically painful.

But that one. That one had been something. He still remembered that initial feeling, the first time he'd ever truly sensed ardor."

"1514

It was so unbelievably overwhelming and terrifying. Like suddenly finding oneself in the ocean that he'd read so much about. Not being able to swim or move, for that matter. Just being completely smothered from all directions at once. That experience alone had nearly converted him into a follower of the Heart of the World.

After that first time, it was much more manageable, though not particularly helpful in day-to-day life. While the sensing of ardor required training one's mind and soul, the actual manipulation of ardor still required enormous industrial tools built by the hands of the supermen.

Sadly, even as revelatory as it was, there simply wasn't much literal value in that training for the average Hun'Kui outside of the mining industry.

But he was not average, Royo knew, nor were these circumstances.

If anything was going to help him activate this sword's power, it would be this training.

He concentrated on his breathing. On regulating it. And unifying his mind with it.

It was comfortable like an old set of clothes. Familiar, though perhaps not as easy to slide back into as he would have liked. But he managed.

His mind became his breathing. He moved with it. In and out of his own lungs. An extension of his very soul, his life force. And with that ebb and flow, he could begin to feel the rhythm of the world around him, seeing the heretofore invisible movement in perceived stillness.

It was the pulse of life itself. Asynchronous and all-encompassing.

Holy fire, there was way more ardor around him than he had realized.

True, it had been quite a while since he had performed this sensory technique, thus making it only natural that he would feel a bit overwhelmed by it all again, but even so--this level of power was ridiculous. Not just from the sword, either. It was everywhere. The sword, the boots, his glove, all of the ridiculous treasure--even the floor and walls were practically bursting with ardor, as if threatening to erupt at any moment.

His old bosses would have loved this place, iron or not.

He gathered himself and tried to focus. On the sword. That was all that mattered now.

Indeed, he could sense the ardor flowing through it. Burning through it. He couldn't help feeling like it would scorch his flesh and swallow him whole. But he knew that wasn't possible. Or he mostly knew it, anyway.

But now what?

He didn't really know. There weren't any industrial tools handy, and even if there were, how would he use them on a sword, of all things?

This ardor was unlike that which he had worked with, as well. It didn't need to be extracted or molded in any way. It was simply there. Waiting.

On him?

Perhaps so.

Perhaps he needed only reach out with his own soul. He could do that much, he was fairly sure.

The Sword of Hamenszoon responded with a burst of ardor that knocked him clear out of himself, shattering his concentration and forcing him back a few steps.

He waited for his disorientation to go away again, but his vision didn't quite realign properly. Or didn't seem to.

Because he suddenly had four left hands, each holding an identical sword."

"1515

Royo moved his hand up and down, to and fro, marveling at the sight before him.

The duplicates faded after a moment, however.

He did it again. He bumped his soul against the ardor sword, and he was prepared this time, so he was able to sense the ardor resonate briefly, like a kind of invisible flash.

The duplicate arms and swords returned, but Royo wasn't satisfied. It had to be capable of more than just this, he felt. He bumped his soul into it again and held it there, trying get a more complete feel of both the ardor and the blade itself.

He needed to know the sword, to see it completely and understand all of its components. Examining its ardor could help with that, potentially. Ardor adapted itself to whatever structure it dwelled within. More specifically, it was the "flow" of ardor which adapted itself, and to a trained mind like Royo's, that flow was discernible.

It was a shame that ardor wasn't more common in the Undercrust, Royo had always felt. This training would have been far more versatile and valuable, if that were the case.

He found it. The flow of ardor. He had to concentrate harder to see patterns in it, as if holding up an imaginary magnifying glass to reveal its secrets.

The smaller, jagged distortions in the flow indicated the material of the sword. Gold and silver made up most of it, along with several trace elements he wasn't trained to recognize. There was, however, one long, thin vein of either iron or nickel running right down the middle.

Not terribly surprising. Ardor famously flowed through iron and nickel so smoothly and cleanly that the two elements were indistinguishable from one another, when judging solely from their flow patterns. No other elements acted as such perfect conduits, as far as Royo knew.

But that wasn't all he was interested in, here and now. He wanted to know where the ardor's "pressure points" were.

Any object crafted by human hands would have structural weaknesses. That was one reason why it was so desirable to place ardor into it--because the ardor would compensate for those flaws. But to do so, the flow of the ardor would have to be disrupted, which often left detectable "whirlpools," as it were.

As far as the physical structure was concerned, these whirlpools balanced everything out, eliminating weaknesses entirely, but that was fine, because Royo didn't want to destroy the sword. Far from it. He only wanted to know where it would be best to apply pressure from his own soul. And he immediately found one whirlpool in the hilt.

Sensible.

The designer had probably intended for it to be there. But Royo also sensed eleven more along the length of the blade, the last one sitting just below the tip.

He bumped his soul into the hilt a little stronger, and when it appeared to do nothing, he realized that it was the same whirlpool that he'd been using all along. It wasn't that it did nothing. It was simply already in use, maintaining the duplicate images that Royo was currently seeing."

"1516

((Double Saturday -- Page 1 of 2))

Royo used his gloved hand, careful to be extra gentle, and bumped his soul against the first whirlpool up from the hilt.

He sensed the sword respond again, and suddenly, he saw duplicates of not just his arm, but his entire body.

There were now three Royo Rajus, one standing on either side of him.

And they were convincing, too. He had to phase his hand through one of them to make sure they really were just illusions.

They were. The projection flickered for a few seconds before correcting itself.

That was a relief. As much as he might have been able to accomplish with full, thinking clones of himself moving and acting in the world, he didn't think he would like that very much, primarily because he wasn't sure they wouldn't try to kill him and take his place.

It was a thought he'd had before, though never quite this seriously.

Regardless, he had a fairly good grasp of the sword's power, now. The other whirlpools in the ardor flow simply adjusted the placement of the illusions, relative to where Royo was standing. Useful for masking his position from opponents who would otherwise know to attack the center image, he decided.

The final whirlpool, however, the one near the tip of the blade, was different, and as much as Royo tried, he couldn't quite understand what it did.

It seemed to transform the whole world around him, making everything come alive in a kind of ethereal fire--a visual representation of all the ardor around him, he was pretty sure. But what did that mean? What actual purpose did it serve? Was it really just to help him detect the presence of ardor?

If so, then that ability was sadly redundant for someone with his training. But it would make a certain degree of sense, he supposed. If the sword was designed for use by someone who couldn't sense ardor on their own, then that pressure point would likely be very helpful.

At least, this was what he was thinking until he heard the one called Manuel's voice again.

"Eleyo?" the man said. "Where did you go?"

Royo was looking right at him, and the one called Manuel should have been able to see him. Granted, the lighting was a bit poor, and these surface-dwellers seemed to have rather bad eyesight, but still. This was abnormal.

Royo supposed he should answer. "I am here," he said.

The one called Manuel looked around, still apparently not seeing him. "Where? Even my reaper can't sense you."

Royo understood and smiled to himself. The Sword of Hamenszoon's final illusion was to render its wielder invisible.

It did make him wonder, however, what the designer had been thinking. Why would he ever not use the invisibility? It was clearly superior to all the others in just about every way imaginable.

Almost as soon as he had the thought, he got an answer. The ethereal world all around him diminished, and the one called Manuel spotted him.

Royo bumped the final pressure point again, but it wasn't doing anything now.

It had some sort of hard time limit, he realized.

How unfortunate."

"1517

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

"Where did you go, just now?" said the one called Manuel.

"I am not certain," said Royo, which was technically true. He didn't wish to explain his still-increasing understanding of the Sword, but neither did he wish to lie to this person.

The one called Manuel appeared to be conversing with his ghost.

Which was dangerous, Royo felt. If they finally realized that they were supposed to be fighting, they might begin to see Royo as a threat.

The Sword's invisibility would have been extremely helpful here and now, if only he hadn't just wasted it all. He could sneak up and subdue them before they knew what was happening.

He wondered if the invisibility would "recharge" on its own. He knew that ardor was similar to electricity insofar as being able to accumulate as a "charge," but unlike electricity, ardor had the potential to generate its own charges, without outside input. And indeed, he could sense that the ardor within the Sword itself had not diminished in any way, so it clearly didn't need to be "refueled" with fresh ardor like the modern firearms of the Hun'Kui did.

It was far from guaranteed, but Royo had an inkling that he only had to wait.

Time was precious, in that case. He turned and picked up the Boots of Karugetti in order to examine them more closely while he still could.

The one called Manuel spoke up again before Royo could detect anything new. "Do you have any idea how to get out of here yet?"

Well, there was fighting one another, but Royo didn't want to mention that. He did have an alternative in mind, though he'd barely given it a moment's thought so far. He pointed across the room to a tall pile of treasure. "There is a monument under there similar to the one we used earlier." He didn't know for sure, of course, as he hadn't seen it, but he'd noticed its larger, ardor-laden presence amidst all the other, smaller ones.

That seemed to distract the one called Manuel and his ghost, as Royo hoped, and they wandered toward the buried object.

"Another one?" said the one called Manuel. "Now that you mention it, I thought I saw more of them back in that room where we found Malast."

Royo knew what he was referring to. Most likely, they were all part of some sort of network which allowed travel between many different treasure chambers. He might have bothered to mention all of that, if it wasn't more desirable to keep the two of them occupied with figuring it out for themselves.

It wasn't proving all that helpful, however. He'd slipped the Boots of Karugetti on and begun testing their pressure points, but if they truly did harbor some kind of magical ability, it wasn't nearly as obvious as the Sword's was.

But even if he disregarded their apparent fame, Royo did think there was something special about them. The pressure points were in the soles of the boots, right below his toes, which struck him as very deliberate placement."

"1518

Still, he wasn't making any progress, so he decided to just keep the Boots on and move toward the one called Manuel. If he was going to land a decisive surprise attack, his odds would be better at close range.

He kept bumping the final pressure point of the Sword, hoping for the invisibility to reactivate, but as of yet, he was having no such luck.

"I hope the others are okay," the one called Manuel was saying. "I can only imagine what the Water Dragon must be thinking, after we all disappeared like that. Lorios can't even sense him, anymore."

As Royo drew nearer, the one called Manuel turned to face him, as did his ghost.

Heh.

Trusting, but not too trusting, eh?

Royo could appreciate that.

Truthfully, he liked the one called Manuel. Quite a lot.

The fact of the matter was that this man had done nothing to deserve Royo's ire--and indeed, the exact opposite was the case. Immediately following the fight with the greatworm by the train, when the ground had collapsed beneath everyone's feet, it was the one called Manuel who had saved Royo from falling to his death.

And that was no trivial deed.

While Royo did not believe that it made the one called Manuel trustworthy in all regards, Royo would not be forgetting it any time soon, either. He fully intended to repay this man tenfold, one day--perhaps one day soon, if he really did manage to become a god.

It was rather unfortunate that the one called Manuel was Royo's first opponent in this tournament, but such were the idiosyncrasies of life, he supposed.

Nothing in all of creation would prevent Royo Raju's ambition.

So when he again bumped the final pressure point of the Sword of Hamenszoon, and it actually responded this time by cloaking the world in ethereal fire once more, Royo did not hesitate.

He didn't know how long the invisibility would last this time, so he went for the ghost first, needing to test the most crucial thing to his mind.

Could he touch the ghost?

He knew of their ability to phase through physical objects. He had seen it with his own eyes, thanks to these goggles, but he had also seen them avoiding the worms earlier, too, which suggested to him that ardor was the key factor. And he had a glove with ardor in it.

He grasped the ghost and held on. Yes. It worked exactly as expected.

The one called Manuel was clearly startled by his disappearance, and now even more so, as the ghost was probably yelling.

Royo slipped the Sword of Hamenszoon back into its sheath on his waist. The invisibility dispersed the second the hilt left his grasp, but Royo was already drawing his pistol instead.

He didn't know much of the superhumans' powers, but he knew of their immortality, and he knew that even this would not be enough to truly kill them.

Royo locked eyes with the one called Manuel just before pulling the trigger and said, "Forgive me."

The man's head exploded as the flaming bullet tore through it."

"1519 -- CLXIII

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

Royo holstered his weapon as the "dead" superman's body hit the ground, blood splattering and sizzling against the uneven stone.

The ghost squirmed in his grip, but the glove allowed him to maintain his hold. Its horrific face almost made him want to destroy it, but he knew that to be his own, unjustifiable impulse. As he understood it, the reason the supermen existed in the first place was because these ghosts retained no powers or potency of their own.

"Lorios, was it?" said Royo, and the ghost stopped moving. "I cannot hear anything you are saying, but you needn't worry. I will not hurt you. You may not believe me, but I hold great affection for your Manuel. I promise to reward him for his heroism as soon as it is within my power to do so."

The reaper could not respond, of course, but Royo allowed a moment for it anyway, just in case some new revelation occurred. He took the opportunity to look over the treasure on this side of the room, and though there was certainly plenty to admire, nothing in particular caught his eye or sparked a sense of recognition. He wished he had devoted more time to studying such artifacts.

“However,” Royo eventually continued, “I do not know if this qualifies as a victory in this tournament, so I would like you to voice your surrender to Malast, if possible. I believe he can hear you, no?”

More silence as he waited.

He decided to release the ghost, if only to build back a modicum of trust. He still kept his eye on it, though. He’d only heard that they were powerless. He still wanted to be prepared for any unpleasant surprises.

But when his vision began to distort in that familiar way, Royo knew that he had indeed made it through the first round.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Three: ‘O, deadliest Knife...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Jercash’s thick boots crunched over the gravelly, smoldering earth as he entered what was left of the town of Orobell. Vanderberk, Germal, Koh, and several others came crunching up behind him as Jercash caressed the left tip of his mustache, taking in the scenery.

Barely any buildings still stood, and those that did looked like they’d been blasted out by mortar shells, the smoke from their ruins rising all the way up to the evening clouds. Automobiles were everywhere, though not as they should have been. Instead, they were overturned or on fire or buried in rubble or crumpled up like an old newspaper.

“Huh,” said Jercash in two voices. “Ya know, last I checked, this place was being protected by the Vannies. I’m not goin’ senile, am I?”

A small red-haired woman shuffled up next to him. Her thin-rimmed glasses didn’t do much to conceal the diagonal scar down the middle of her face. “No, sir,” she said, rifling through a briefcase. “Our latest intelligence placed thirteen mid-level threats in this town only five days

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

Royo holstered his weapon as the “dead” superman’s body hit the ground, blood splattering and sizzling against the uneven stone.

The ghost squirmed in his grip, but the glove allowed him to maintain his hold. Its horrific face almost made him want to destroy it, but he knew that to be his own, unjustifiable impulse. As he understood it, the reason the supermen existed in the first place was because these ghosts retained no powers or potency of their own.

“Lorios, was it?” said Royo, and the ghost stopped moving. “I cannot hear anything you are saying, but you needn’t worry. I will not hurt you. You may not believe me, but I hold great affection for your Manuel. I promise to reward him for his heroism as soon as it is within my power to do so.”

The reaper could not respond, of course, but Royo allowed a moment for it anyway, just in case some new revelation occurred. He took the opportunity to look over the treasure on this side of the room, and though there was certainly plenty to admire, nothing in particular caught his eye or sparked a sense of recognition. He wished he had devoted more time to studying such artifacts.

“However,” Royo eventually continued, “I do not know if this qualifies as a victory in this tournament, so I would like you to voice your surrender to Malast, if possible. I believe he can hear you, no?”

More silence as he waited.

He decided to release the ghost, if only to build back a modicum of trust. He still kept his eye on it, though. He’d only heard that they were powerless. He still wanted to be prepared for any unpleasant surprises.

But when his vision began to distort in that familiar way, Royo knew that he had indeed made it through the first round.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Jercash's thick boots crunched over the gravelly, smoldering earth as he entered what was left of the town of Orobell. Vanderberk, Germal, Koh, and several others came crunching up behind him as Jercash caressed the left tip of his mustache, taking in the scenery.

Barely any buildings still stood, and those that did looked like they'd been blasted out by mortar shells, the smoke from their ruins rising all the way up to the evening clouds. Automobiles were everywhere, though not as they should have been. Instead, they were overturned or on fire or buried in rubble or crumpled up like an old newspaper.

"Huh," said Jercash in two voices. "Ya know, last I checked, this place was being protected by the Vannies. I'm not goin' senile, am I?"

A small red-haired woman shuffled up next to him. Her thin-rimmed glasses didn't do much to conceal the diagonal scar down the middle of her face. "No, sir," she said, rifling through a briefcase. "Our latest intelligence placed thirteen mid-level threats in this town only five days ago."

"1520

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

Jercash exhaled through his mouth. "Well, this is inconvenient." He half-turned toward everyone. "Spread out and see what you can make of this mess," he said more loudly. "Groups of three. Zenia, Liar--you're with me."

They all dispersed, leaving only the red-haired woman with the briefcase, Germal, and Germal's reaper, Nerovoy.

To Jercash's eyes, the reaper was a simple plastic bag, fluttering noiselessly through the air. It was a far cry from the skeletal phantasms that he perceived them as in his youth.

They made their way toward the carved-out heart of the town, not particularly bothered by all the bodies around. Jercash could sense that they were certainly not pretending to be dead, as none of them had souls--nor were there any souls lingering around, waiting to be ferried.

"It looks like the aftermath of a hurricane," said Germal, "but Kavia doesn't get such weather."

"Yeah, it was probably one or more of our eager young guns," said Jercash. "Kids these days."

'Perhaps it was the work of Hada,' said Nerovoy.

Jercash knew the reaper was probably joking, but he didn't see much point in gracing that with a response. The God of Storms was not likely to have suddenly started existing. More plausibly, it was someone trying to feed an aberration, though he kept that guess to himself, in case it proved wrong later.

"You never told us what you planned to do here," said Germal.

"Yes, and there was a reason for that," said Jercash plainly. "I don't know you, and they call you the Liar of Lyste. When I combine those two facts, I've got myself a paranoia sandwich."

"I see," said Germal. "I thought I would have your trust implicitly, as I have Gohvis'."

Jercash snickered. "Gohvis doesn't trust you. And if you think he does, you're a fool." He stopped walking in order to spin around and put his face right up to Germal's. "Which begs the question. Are you a fool? Or are you lying to me?"

Germal met his gaze steadily, not balking, but not saying anything, either.

Jercash merely waited. He deliberately chose not to pressure him with his soul. He wanted Germal's response to be of the man's own choosing. In a way, that would be more informative than trying to coerce the truth out of him.

That, and he wasn't entirely sure that such a tactic would work on this person. There was just something about him that gave Jercash that impression. Maybe it was the horn. Right in the middle of the guy's forehead? And the way it curved ever so slightly to the left?

So weird.

Jercash didn't like it much, and he normally enjoyed creepy things.

"...You are right, sir," said Germal. "I was lying."

Jercash laughed and turned away again. "There, you see? You really do deserve that name."

"I do apologize, sir," said Germal, sounding genuinely ashamed now. "I wasn't thinking."

Jercash didn't really care, either way. It wasn't the first time he'd been lied to by a supposed ally, and it wouldn't be the last.

'He meant no disrespect,' said Nerovoy. 'It's a compulsion of his. Sometimes, he simply can't help himself.' He shot a glance at Germal. 'It can be a real problem, when he's not careful.'"

"1521

"That sounds pretty annoying," said Jercash, hardly even listening to the words coming out of his own mouth. "You must have lived a difficult life, eh?" He was more concerned with the environment. The town of Orobell had held a special place in his heart, once upon a time. To see it reduced to rubble was leaving him with mixed feelings. Partly solemn, for that angelic woman who had lived here a hundred years past; and partly ecstatic, for all the insects who would no longer be a drain on the planet's resources.

"I have had my share of sorrows, yes," said Germal, "but now I find the future looking rather bright."

"That so?"

"Yes," said Germal. "A-and please allow me to apologize again for my indiscretion. I hope I have not soured you to me as an ally. I have nothing but admiration for you and the work you've done, ledo."

"Oh, don't worry about it so much." Jercash waved his hand. "I'm a very forgiving person by nature." He wasn't.

'In that case, would you mind telling us why you wanted to come to this place?' said Nerovoy.

"Eh, I suppose there's no harm in it at this point," said Jercash. "See, the idea was to infiltrate this group, not exterminate it. I had reason to believe that they had ties to the Hammer, so it would've been nice if we could've used these poor dead folks here in order to get a leg up on him."

"Are you saying that this was Kane's hometown?" said Germal.

"That, or something similar. Supposedly."

"Wouldn't that mean he could be on his way here, at this very moment?"

"Heh. Wouldn't that be something?"

Germal's expression suggested that he did not agree.

'If you truly had credible intelligence,' said Nerovoy, 'then why did you not spread this information far and wide?'

Jercash snorted. "'Credible' might've been a strong word for it. And who would you suggest I tell, exactly?" He spared the reaper a brief glare. "I am Abolish."

That gave Nerovoy pause, perhaps only then realizing precisely how true that statement was. 'Y-you could've told Dozer, surely.'

"I did. But he's got plenty of other concerns. And he never listens to me, anyway."

Jercash knew that he mostly had Jackson to thank for his recent "promotion," such as it was, but that was only insofar as appearances were concerned.

The truth of the matter was that Jercash had been the tip of the spear for quite a few years now. Decades, arguably--though he knew many who would indeed argue that.

Sure, the names Dozer and Morgunov still struck far more fear than his own, and they likely would continue to do so for many more years--which was fine with him. Preferable, actually. But the reality, at least from his perspective, was that those two barely ever did anything anymore."

"1522

Morgunov had descended so far into his own madness now that he hadn't left his laboratory more than a handful of times in the last thirty years. The lunatic might of course still show up one day and surprise everyone, but he certainly couldn't be relied upon to do that.

And Dozer? Jercash couldn't say he fully understood what he was planning, but the old bastard seemed to have grown so paranoid that his actions had become indistinguishable from cowardice.

And sure, Gunther and Dunhouser had been much more reliable--each one a powerhouse in his own right, with plenty of strong and loyal followers. But that was about all they'd been. Men of action. Not men of forethought.

Certainly, losing both of them at once had been a major blow to Abolish's military strength, but it was for the best. Weapons you couldn't control were never truly part of your arsenal, anyway.

Jercash felt quite good about his decision to delay his own men from answering Dunhouser's request for reinforcements. He couldn't imagine a better outcome, unless Jackson had died along with them. At least now, some genuine direction might be able to take hold.

It was still a bit crazy to him, though, the fact that Gohvis hadn't shown any interest in picking up the pieces left by their deaths.

Had he known that this was what Jercash wanted? It seemed like he had, but how could that be? Did Gohvis simply know him that well? Pretty unfair, if so.

Even if the Monster didn't make for a very reliable or even consistent ally, the sheer enigma of that man had never ceased to pique Jercash's interest.

Then, of course, there was Ivan. For the time being, rescuing that stupid asshole was probably more trouble than it was worth, what with Iceheart being the one guarding his frozen head.

Ideally, Jercash would be able to raise someone up to take Ivan's place as head of all the intelligence divisions--a few someones, actually. Rather than putting all of their eggs in one basket, as Ivan had done, it would be much more effective to share the highest levels of intelligence-gathering between multiple heads. Voss, Xen, and Caster had already taken to their new positions pretty well, but it was still early days, and Jercash had several backup candidates in mind.

Still, he'd probably want to go retrieve Ivan, eventually. That was going to be a pain in the ass.

Oh, and he supposed there was Vanderberk to consider, too, but fuck that guy. At least he might be useful if Kane really did show up.

Jercash doubted that would happen, though, and even if it did, he'd taken precautions. Teams of scouts had been patrolling the area forty miles out for the past few days. There would be plenty of warning, in the event that Kane decided to show his fat face here.

And besides, Jercash had a couple new toys in the bag over his shoulder that he wouldn't mind testing on a truly worthy adversary. He'd never been the most bloodthirsty--compared to his comrades, at least--but it wouldn't do to shy away from conflict too much. That was how wolves became sheep."

"1523

((Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 2))

Jercash stopped in front of the largest remaining structure in town, seemingly. A clock tower. It looked like it had been struck by lightning a few dozen times, and its bottom floor was completely filled with rubble. The actual clock face was on the ground, charred black and bent, and Jercash prodded it with the toe of his boot.

That was a couple hundred years of history down the drain, some of which had been his own. He recalled stealing a kiss while standing in this very spot.

He felt empty.

A very familiar feeling.

"Are you alright, sir?" came Zenia's voice.

Jercash looked at her. She seemed concerned about him. Of course she did. She was still young. And as far as secretaries went, she was probably the most doting one he'd ever had.

She was attractive, to his eyes, despite the scar. Perhaps even because of it. She was wounded, both inside and out. It complemented her, as a person, he felt.

All things considered, he might've married her by now, if he didn't like her so much.

He patted her gently on the head. "I'm fine," he said.

That seemed to appease her, and she relaxed.

What expression had been on his face to cause her to worry about him, he wondered? It wasn't the first time she'd noticed something like that.

He'd have to be more conscious of such things in the future. It wouldn't do to cause his cute little Zenia to be any more concerned about him than necessary. She already had plenty of reason to be worried that the Vanguard would kill him next.

He noticed Koh approaching from the right, and he had someone on his back. A little girl with frayed pigtails and ashes all over her. She was clinging to the Man-Eater's silvery fur as if her life depended on it, and the look on her tiny, tear-stricken face was one Jercash had seen many times before.

Abject horror.

It was no surprise. The safe assumption was that she'd grown up in this town and seen it torn to pieces, perhaps even seen her own family slaughtered in front of her.

Jercash had no sympathy for her, old and callous as he knew himself to be, but he did understand what she was going through, at least.

She'd seen Hell. The Hell that humanity makes for itself. And in all likelihood, Abolish had shown it to her. Perhaps now, her eyes could be opened to the truth. Or maybe she'd simply direct all her hate at Abolish and grow up to take revenge on them one day.

It could go either way, at this point.

Heh, or she could alternatively take comfort in some pacifistic mindset. That was technically possible, though Jercash had yet to witness such a transformation with his own eyes. Pacifists had always interested him. They were like alien lifeforms--all but impossible for him to understand, but fascinating nonetheless."

"1524

As Koh neared their group, Jercash offered to take the girl from him, but the dog only growled at him, his jaw already visibly slick with blood. Instead, Koh carried her over to Germal, who leaned in, as if to examine her.

"I wasn't going to hurt her," Jercash felt compelled to say.

Koh just stared back at him.

A sudden question occurred to him. "Where are Vanderberk and Rita? Didn't they go with you?"

Koh spat out half of a human skull.

Jercash's expression flattened as he looked at it. "You killed both of them?"

Koh let out a beastly snort that somehow still managed to sound smug.

Jercash eyed the Man-Eater again. He'd known that Koh was powerful. Of course he had. But to eat Vanderberk, just like that? A guy who'd recently gotten Gohvis' vague approval?

Come to think of it, Gohvis had mentioned something about Koh biting Ivan's head off, too.

Just how strong was this dog, anyway?

It almost made Jercash want to test him and find out. Without the ability to speak, Koh would never be able to occupy a leadership position and be regarded as Jercash's equal in terms of rank, unless his reaper could fill that gap for him. Jercash had yet to meet whoever that was, which only left Jercash with even more questions.

Gohvis' men truly were ridiculous.

"...Tell me you didn't kill their reapers, too," said Jercash.

And Koh did nothing.

Jercash glowered. "You've been a very good dog so far," he said with a darkness that didn't match the words. "Do you want me to start treating you like a bad dog?"

A tense moment transpired.

Then Koh's torso contracted and flexed, and the dog coughed up two reapers as if he were suddenly a cat and they were hairballs.

They barely retained their form, having both been rendered into unconsciousness while covered in soul-empowered drool and bile.

Jercash grimaced and picked them both up. He wiped them against his coat.

"You will be alright now, cedo," Germal was saying softly as he brushed the tears from the little girl's face with his thumb. He'd been whispering to her for a while, and even now, Jercash could barely hear him. "Don't you worry. We will take care of you. There is no safer place in this world than by our side."

And to the horned man's credit, she actually did look better. Her eyes were still puffy and red, but her posture and breathing had relaxed.

Germal's next words were loud enough that he must have meant for Jercash to hear them. "Do you think you can tell us who did this to your town, cedo? Do you remember them?"

She didn't answer.

Germal patted her head. "It's okay if you don't, cedo. We won't be angry. But I want you to try and think back, just in case."

Jercash didn't think that was going to work. Not yet anyway. The girl was obviously traumatized beyond words. Perhaps in time--

"I remember," she said in a voice that was even smaller than her."

"1525

"Good," said Germal. "That's very good." He kept one hand on her forehead, as if checking her temperature, and with his other hand, he dug into his travel bag and produced a syringe with a detached and still-wrapped hyopdermic needle.

Jercash cocked an eyebrow. "What are you giving her?"

"Nothing yet," said Germal. "This is only a precaution. Go on, cedo. Tell us what you remember."

"It was the Flying Man," she said, sounding surprisingly calm. Almost eerily so. "He killed all the grownups. Boom. Flash. I heard their screams. Boom. Flash. It was so loud. It hurt my ears. Boom. Flash. He killed mommy and daddy. Boom. Flash. Then the others showed up. The Flying Man's friends. The Smiling Man. The Green Man. They argued. The Green Man saw me. He tried to get me. He said he wanted to eat me. But the Flying Man stopped him. Boom. Flash. The Green Man's arm came off." She started shaking. "The Flying Man. The Flying Man said. He said--he said I--he told me--" Spittle began to form on her lips, and her eyes started rolling back into her head.

"Tch!" Germal tore the wrapping off the hypodermic needle with his teeth as he dug into his bag again for one rubber glove and snapped it on. He screwed the needle onto the syringe, then tapped the side of the tube with one hand while grabbing a swab from his bag with his other. He sterilized a small area on her arm and finally plunged the needle into it, pressing down steadily with his thumb.

Jercash observed in silence. He'd seen more than his share of medical emergencies and had therefore picked up a modest degree of knowledge on the subject. He understood the procedure of what had just happened, but not why. She'd obviously just had some kind of seizure or similar neurological problem, but what in the world had caused it?

"She has a condition," said Germal, having apparently predicated what Jercash was thinking.

"Epilepsy?" guessed Jercash, not really convinced he was right. His medical "expertise"--if it could even be called that--had more to do with gaping wounds, severed limbs, and so forth.

"Something like that," was all Germal told him. He felt her forehead again.

Her eyes returned to normal, but only for a second before easing shut. She went limp, and Germal scooped her up before she could fall off of Koh. Germal put his ear up to her face, probably to make sure she was still breathing, and then checked her pulse.

After a few moments, Germal appeared to relax. Zenia helped him return his tools to his bag for him while he shifted the girl's weight into a more comfortable carrying posture. Koh nuzzled up to the one-horned man, perhaps offering to carry her again, but Germal just shook his head.

Nerovoy floated closer to Jercash. "You don't mind if we take her with us, do you?"

"1526

((Double Saturday -- Page 1 of 2))

"I intended to, anyway," said Jercash, eyeing Germal. Zenia spoke the words that were on his mind.

"I didn't know you had medical training, Mr. Germal," she said. "Oh, or should I call you Dr. Germal?"

"Just Germal is fine," he said.

"Do you have any other hidden skills?" said Jercash.

"Oh, a few. As I'm sure you do."

Jercash thought he sensed reluctance. "You don't wish to tell me about them?"

"This hardly seems like the time or the place, wouldn't you agree?"

Jercash wasn't so sure that he did. "As your superior, it would be quite helpful if I knew the full extent of your capabilities."

Germal bobbed his head to the side a little. "That is understandable. Very understandable, indeed. But I am not sure Gohvis would appreciate me saying too much."

"Oh, well, if he gets mad, you can just tell him I forced it out of you."

Germal paused, that blank-yet-friendly expression still perfectly guarding his thoughts, as usual.

Jercash wondered if he was privately consulting Nerovoy.

“Hmm,” Germal eventually said. “If you insist, sir, then I suppose I cannot refuse. My fields of expertise are psychology, neurology, and medicine.”

“Mm. Anything else?”

“Oh, I’m also an expert deliveryman, if that counts.”

“Quite the curious skill set you’ve got.”

“Perhaps. But such is life, no? We go through the doors that open, wherever opportunity takes us.”

Jercash wanted to keep prodding, but he couldn’t think of any other relevant questions.

‘Would you mind if Germal and I took the girl somewhere to rest?’ said Nerovoy.

“You’re that concerned about her?” said Jercash.

‘A bit, yes. But I was also thinking Germal wouldn’t be much use to you here with his hands full.’

Jercash wanted to refuse for some reason he couldn’t articulate, but he caught himself and decided to cool it with all this irrational suspicion, for now. He knew only too well about the dangers of paranoia for servants his age. He wasn’t going to end up like his mentor. “Alright. Report back to me by midnight.”

‘Yes, sir.’

He watched them go.

When Koh turned to join them, however, it tickled his distrust again.

“You,” said Jercash with force. “You stay with me, Koh. I’d still like to get to know you better.”

The dog looked at him, then at Germal’s shrinking back, then at him again. For a second, Jercash thought the dog might disobey him. But he stayed.

“Good boy,” said Jercash.

Koh had no reaction to that.

Jercash tilted his head at him. "Do you like being treated like a dog? Or does it annoy you?"

Koh just snorted.

"I don't know what that means. Seriously, tell me if you don't like it right now, or I'm just gonna keep doing it. I'm very much a dog person, you see." His own words made him crack up. "I mean, not as much as you, obviously! But you get my point, right?"

"1527

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

Still, Koh made no response.

"...Alright, then," said Jercash, immediately wanting to test the limits. He pointed at Koh authoritatively. "Sit."

And to both his and Zenia's utter shock, Koh sat.

Jercash stared, wide-eyed and open-mouthed. "Uh... roll over?"

Koh rolled over.

Jercash squealed with delight and ran over to the giant dog. "Oh, you're such a good boy! Yes, you are!" He rubbed behind Koh's ears with both hands. "And you're so fluffy! How did you get so fluffy, huh?! Just a big softie, is what you are! Yeah!"

"Sir, this is making me a little uncomfortable..."

"Shut up, Zenia! Don't ruin this for me! Do you know long I've been wanting to get a dog?! Ever since Thrasher died!"

"I don't know who that is, sir."

"Oh, right, that was before your time. Well, it was about forty years ago. Thrasher was this big, beastly pit bull, you see. Not anywhere near as big as Koh here, of course--nor as well-behaved, for that matter. In fact, now that I'm thinking about it, he was a real asshole. Always trying to bite people, including me. He ended up getting mauled by a mountain lion, but in all honesty, he probably provoked it. Still miss him, though." Jercash allowed a beat to pass. "Hey, why don't you come over here and pet Koh with me? You won't believe how soft his fur is!"

"I'll pass on that, sir."

"What, are you worried he'll bite you?" He turned to look directly at Koh's huge face. "You wouldn't do that, would you? Because you know that Zenia's not a servant, and that roughhousing wouldn't be a good idea, right? And you know that if you harmed her in any way, I would go tear the head off of that little girl you just saved and smile to myself afterwards. You know all that, don't you? Because you're such a good boy!"

Koh met his gaze evenly, but that was the extent of his reaction.

Jercash waved Zenia over. "C'mon."

She remained where she was. "I'd still rather not..."

Jercash smacked his lips and went back to petting Koh. "Your loss."

"Sir," said Zenia, taking that stern tone that Jercash so rarely got to hear from her, "you still have considerable work left to get done today, do you not?"

Of course he did. He had a crapload of reports waiting for him back at camp, and most of his men were going to need new marching orders after the dead end that Orobell turned out to be. He was still holding onto hope that there might be something helpful to be found in the ruins of this town, but he wasn't going to be surprised if it didn't turn out that way.

That girl's testimony had certainly been interesting, though. He fully intended to look into who else was stationed here in Kavia, right now, because even with access to Izalog's impeccable memory, he wasn't recalling any Abolishers who had the kind of power that would be required to level this town full of Vanguardians."

"1528

That meant only one of two things, really. Either there was a third power at play here, aggressive toward the Vanguard and therefore a potential new ally; or one of his lovely subordinates had recently acquired a substantial power boost.

He hoped it was the latter. Abolish always had a use for new rising stars, and it had been a while since he'd gotten to promote someone. It was always a nice feeling, getting to see dramatic growth in the youngsters.

Except when it went to their heads, of course.

Jercash sensed Horace's rapid approach with fifteen or so seconds to spare.

Horace was one of his stronger subordinates. He'd mastered pan-rozum almost completely, which was quite the threatening boost for his manganese transfiguration ability.

Jercash sensed the man's pan-rozum merge from more than fifty meters away, which was more than enough warning, really, even if the man had been one of those ever-annoying light wielders. So Jercash had plenty of time to react. He even had time to realize that it wasn't himself who was being attacked but Vanderberk's reaper, the unconscious Elinox.

Trying to create yet another opening in upper management, most likely.

Sadly, as much as Jercash might have liked to let Vanderberk eat shit here and die permanently, that would ultimately be counterproductive. So he raised Elinox out of the way of a sudden bed of manganese spikes and batted away the incoming javelins as well.

To his credit, Horace seemed to realize his failure immediately, but even by then, it was too late. Jercash was already on him, having found the man's neck with his free hand.

Both of Jercash's hands were full now--Horace's neck in his right, and Elinox in his left. But that wasn't a problem, because he just grew a third hand out of his chest. This one was made mostly out of beryllium, as per his transfiguration ability, but it functioned just as well.

He used it to rip the reaper right out of Horace's body, along with a few ribs, muscles, and organs. Horace collapsed immediately, and Jercash set to work freezing his head, though he deliberately took his time with it.

"Horace, Horace, Horace," said Jercash, shaking his head. "What am I going to do with you?"

Horace couldn't answer, partly because his lungs needed time to regrow and partly because of the lingering disorientation that came with leaving a hyper-state.

The man's reaper was still conscious enough to talk, however. 'F-forgive us, Hahth Jercash! I don't know what came over us! It was madness! We would never dream of standing against--!'

"Shh-shh-shhh," hushed Jercash, squeezing the reaper enough to cause concern but not to kill. "As the saying goes, I'm not angry with you. I'm just disappointed."

The reaper was apparently too afraid to respond now.

"A blind frontal assault from fifty meters away?" said Jercash. "Really? Did you learn nothing from me? It would've been so much smarter to act casual, get up close, and then try to kill Elinox." He indulged in a pause for timing. "It still wouldn't have worked on me, but it definitely would've been smarter, is all I'm saying."

"1529 -- CLXIV.

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

'Please!' the reaper tried. 'I-it all happened so quickly! I don't understand what came over us! One minute we were talking--'

"Calm yourself," commanded Jercash. "I'm not going to kill you. For now. Later? Maybe. But you'll have plenty of time to work on your excuses until then, so try not to lose your head, hmm? You'll need it."

The reaper fell silent at that, which was probably wise.

He made a small, round cage for Horace's frozen head and his reaper.

Jercash didn't like killing his own men, and he especially didn't like killing their reapers. Servants could be released if they got too far out of line, but reapers were a precious commodity. Very difficult to replace and always risky to do so.

Still, he could hardly believe that Horace had tried to do something so stupid. Sure, it wasn't terribly surprising that one of his subordinates would let their ambition get to them during these times of organizational turmoil, but it certainly was surprising how incompetently Horace had gone about it.

Jercash had only been half-joking when he'd chastised the reaper about their plan of attack. Horace didn't have the most impressive mental fortitude, but the man should have known better than to attack Vanderberk's reaper while Jercash was standing right there. He definitely should have known.

...What if he had?

Jercash stopped. He looked up and around, surveying the ruins of Orobell another time.

What if Horace had known better? What would that mean? Would that mean his goal hadn't truly been to kill Vanderberk? What would it have been, then? To test Jercash? To get a glimpse of his power?

It was true that not many people knew what Jercash was capable of in combat. He much preferred it that way.

Ah.

There was that paranoia again.

It wasn't going to let up anytime soon, was it?

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Four: 'Assess and have forethought...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector never managed to learn his name, as apparently this Hun'Kui didn't speak Mohssian like Eleyo did, and Hector had to struggle through trying to speak Hunese at Garovel's instruction.

Eventually, the Hun'Kui man appeared to understand what was going on, at which point, Hector was more than prepared to be attacked, but the man surrendered immediately, instead.

That was how Hector passed the first round.

In the second chamber, he found Mr. Sheridan, already rifling through the treasure scattered around it. The man didn't seem to have any idea what was going on, and Hector ended up explaining the situation to him, too.

"Fighting?" said Mr. Sheridan. "You fought someone before coming here?"

"Well, not technically, but sort of." That brought a question to Hector's mind. "But wait. Does that mean you didn't fight someone?"

"Sure didn't. Just been siftin' through the goods here, tryin' not to worry too much about how the hell I'm gonna get outta this place."

Hector didn't want to doubt the man, but he hadn't known him very long at all and so had to wonder if that was really true. 'Think he's lying?' he asked Garovel."

"1529 -- CLXIV.

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

'Please!' the reaper tried. 'I-it all happened so quickly! I don't understand what came over us! One minute we were talking--'

"Calm yourself," commanded Jercash. "I'm not going to kill you. For now. Later? Maybe. But you'll have plenty of time to work on your excuses until then, so try not to lose your head, hmm? You'll need it."

The reaper fell silent at that, which was probably wise.

He made a small, round cage for Horace's frozen head and his reaper.

Jercash didn't like killing his own men, and he especially didn't like killing their reapers. Servants could be released if they got too far out of line, but reapers were a precious commodity. Very difficult to replace and always risky to do so.

Still, he could hardly believe that Horace had tried to do something so stupid. Sure, it wasn't terribly surprising that one of his subordinates would let their ambition get to them during these times of organizational turmoil, but it certainly was surprising how incompetently Horace had gone about it.

Jercash had only been half-joking when he'd chastised the reaper about their plan of attack. Horace didn't have the most impressive mental fortitude, but the man should have known better than to attack Vanderberk's reaper while Jercash was standing right there. He definitely should have known.

...What if he had?

Jercash stopped. He looked up and around, surveying the ruins of Orobell another time.

What if Horace had known better? What would that mean? Would that mean his goal hadn't truly been to kill Vanderberk? What would it have been, then? To test Jercash? To get a glimpse of his power?

It was true that not many people knew what Jercash was capable of in combat. He much preferred it that way.

Ah.

There was that paranoia again.

It wasn't going to let up anytime soon, was it?

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Four: 'Assess and have forethought...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector never managed to learn his name, as apparently this Hun'Kui didn't speak Mohssian like Eleyo did, and Hector had to struggle through trying to speak Hunese at Garovel's instruction.

Eventually, the Hun'Kui man appeared to understand what was going on, at which point, Hector was more than prepared to be attacked, but the man surrendered immediately, instead.

That was how Hector passed the first round.

In the second chamber, he found Mr. Sheridan, already rifling through the treasure scattered around it. The man didn't seem to have any idea what was going on, and Hector ended up explaining the situation to him, too.

"Fighting?" said Mr. Sheridan. "You fought someone before coming here?"

"Well, not technically, but sort of." That brought a question to Hector's mind. "But wait. Does that mean you didn't fight someone?"

“Sure didn’t. Just been siftin’ through the goods here, tryin’ not to worry too much about how the hell I’m gonna get outta this place.”

Hector didn’t want to doubt the man, but he hadn’t known him very long at all and so had to wonder if that was really true. ‘Think he’s lying?’ he asked Garovel.”

"1530

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

‘If he IS lying, he’s doing it pretty well,’ said Garovel. ‘If we assume that Malast forced everyone else into this tournament along with us, then that means there are eleven combatants total--unless Malast himself is participating, which would be weird. And since eleven is an uneven number, it’s very possible that Mr. Sheridan here was the odd man out and got a free pass for the first round.’

‘Hmm.’

Mr. Sheridan seemed to be having a hard time pulling his eyes away from the treasure. “Agh, if only this damn suit had more than one pocket! Talk about a design flaw!”

Hector could hardly blame him for being so preoccupied with it. As far as distractions went, it was maybe the best Hector had ever seen. He’d wanted to examine the hoard in the last room, but he’d been too concerned about a fight breaking out. He hadn’t wanted to underestimate any of the Hun’Kui, not while they had weapons that could hurt Garovel.

‘Well, you just keep an eye on him,’ said Garovel, ‘and I’ll look over the treasure! Man, what a great plan!’

Hector frowned but didn’t look away from Mr. Sheridan. It was unfair but also probably the most sensible thing to do. He wouldn’t even know what he was looking at, really, aside from just a bunch of really expensive shit.

That golden glimmer was really itching at his peripheral vision, though.

Dammit.

Mr. Sheridan was digging through another pile, scooping coins and gems out of his way as if they were dirt.

Hector persevered. He spared a few quick glances around the chamber as well, wanting to make sure treasure wasn't distracting them from anything else that might've otherwise been obvious.

But no. It was just more rocks and lava.

Garovel was being suspiciously quiet, so Hector decided to prod him for some answers.

'Where do you think all this treasure came from?' said Hector.

'Seyos, presumably.'

'Okay, but I mean, where did he get it all?'

'Good question, especially because a lot of this stuff does not appear to be from the Undercrust.'

Hector's gaze hardened. 'Are you serious?'

'Sure am. Which means Seyos, or someone else, has been to the surface. And fairly recently, too, from the looks of it. This thing here is the Egg of Prosperity.'

Hector chanced a look at where the reaper was pointing and, indeed, saw a gold-and-silver egg inlaid with red gemstones.

'This friggin' thing is probably worth a cool mil all by itself,' said Garovel. 'Maybe more.'

'Holy shit. In troas?'

'Mmhmm. But yeah, I heard about it going missing from Yena Maria around two hundred years ago, which is not nearly as long as the Hun'Sho have been in Himmekel.'

'Hmm.'

'And I'd just like to point out that this almost certainly means I'm right about Torveis having been to the surface, too. God of Fire, my ass.'

"1531

'Why would Torveis lie about all that?' said Hector.

'Maybe because the Hun'Sho have been stealing our shit,' said Garovel. 'Look at this fucking place. There's probably enough treasure in all these rooms to buy a country.'

'They didn't seem like they cared much about money.'

'They didn't seem like they cared much about ANYTHING. Which makes me think they were hiding what they cared about.'

'Hmm, but what would they even need all this treasure for? They've just been sitting in Himmekel for a thousand years, right?'

'Well, if I had to guess, I'd say they're hoarding treasure in order to fund some sort of great revival of their people. In that sense, maybe Torveis wasn't lying. Maybe "Avar's return" is to be interpreted more metaphorically.'

'Didn't sound like he was being metaphorical...'

'Maybe he believes in it literally, despite it nonetheless being intended to be taken metaphorically.'

'Wouldn't that mean he wasn't lying to us?'

'Not about Avar, maybe, but still about how he was able to recognize a bird. That was horseshit, for sure.'

'You seem really determined to not like the Hun'Sho.'

'I'm an untrusting bastard like that.'

Hector had to bob his head a little at that. 'Maybe we both are.'

'Good, then. So you agree that the Hun'Sho are suspicious as hell.'

'I don't know. I still want to like the Hun'Sho, kinda. I mean, they can't all be bad, right? They're still individuals, same as us.'

'Yeah, yeah, fine. If you wanna be all non-racist about it.'

Hector just breathed a quiet laugh.

'Holy crappity!' the reaper suddenly exclaimed, making Hector turn briefly to look at him. 'I do believe I'm looking at the Shifting Spear of Logante! Hector, come pick this thing up!'

He hesitated but kept Mr. Sheridan within line of sight as he moved toward Garovel.

The Intarian man seemed to be preoccupied with coins now, despite having disregarded them earlier. He was holding them directly up to the visor of his suit and squinting, probably trying to read whatever was engraved on them.

Hector saw the “spear” that Garovel was pointing at. He plucked it out of a silvery pile and discovered it to be far shorter than he’d expected. It was barely bigger than a flashlight, though the blade had an admirable golden sheen to it.

‘It’s, uh... kinda small, isn’t it?’ said Hector.

‘Say, “Grokoh.”’

‘Excuse me?’

“Grokoh.” Say it aloud. Right now.’

“Uh... G-Grokoh.”

The spear immediately extended to five times its size, though Hector noticed its weight had barely changed at all.

“...Huh,” was all he had to say.

‘Now say, “Sworok,”’ said Garovel.

“Sworok.”

The spear changed shape entirely, and in the blink of an eye, Hector was holding a sword instead.

‘Pretty neat, eh?’

‘Yeah, sure, but... ah... Garovel, this seems kinda useless.’

‘What? It’s not--’ The reaper paused. ‘It’s, uh...’

‘...Can it do anything else?’

‘Sure. It can transform into all sorts of different melee weapons.’

‘...That’s great, Garovel. Real helpful.’

‘Shut up, it’s cool! I’m sure the designer just didn’t intend for it to be wielded by a materialization user!’”

"1532

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 16))

‘Is it, like, super durable or something like Haqq’s shield?’ said Hector.

‘...Not particularly, no,’ said Garovel. ‘But when it breaks, it, uh... it reforms to its... original shape...’

Hector felt a little bad, but he couldn’t say he was impressed. ‘Hmm.’

‘It has ardor in it, though. So that could be helpful, right?’

‘...Helpful, how exactly?’

‘Well, that means it can be used to hit reapers ‘n stuff.’

‘I can just use my soul for that, Garovel.’

‘Ah. Well. Maybe it would make a good gift for Lynnette.’

Hector’s expression soured somewhat from behind his helmet. There the reaper went again, trying to play the Lynn card. ‘I’m pretty sure that shadow already allows her to do all this shit, too, more or less.’

‘Yeah, okay, but. Maybe she’d just... like it? As a present?’

Somehow, Hector kinda doubted that. ‘...Can we sell it?’

‘Hector, this thing was a national treasure of Calthos, once upon a time.’

‘So... their government would pay a lot for it, then?’

‘No! It needs to be either used by someone or put in a museum!’

‘That’s pretty lame...’

‘Agh.’

‘I feel like I’m in a video game,’ said Hector.

‘What?’

‘I feel like I just opened a treasure chest or something and found a really cool weapon that I’m completely the wrong class for.’

‘I have no idea what you’re talking about, right now,’ said Garovel.

‘Really? None?’

‘I’m three thousand years old, and I have no hands! Why the hell would I know anything about video games?!’

‘Alright, geez. You sound pretty upset about it.’

‘Maybe I am. Maybe ever since I first learned about them, I’ve thought video games sounded like they could be really goddamn fun. And maybe I’m a little bitter about that.’

‘Eh... it’s probably for the best,’ said Hector. ‘For some reason, I feel like if reapers could play video games, you’d all get addicted and then just never stop.’

‘Oh, you mean because we exist in a state of purgatorial hell, and because video games might provide us a blissful escape from it?’

‘Uh... I meant more because you never sleep and because you’re always complaining about boredom, but, ah, that answer works, too, I guess...’

‘I’ve given the matter some thought before.’

'I can tell. And it kinda sounds like you DO know a lot about video games, actually.'

'I don't know what you're talking about.'

'Mm.'

'But I do know what we're going to be doing as soon as you and I are able to use pan-forma without killing ourselves.'

'That sounds... agh, alright, whatever. Can we focus on what's important right now? Find us something really good in all of this, Garovel.'

'I haven't stopped looking. But man, I can't believe you don't like the Shifting Spear of Logante.'

'Why does that name sound familiar, by the way?'

'Oh, maybe because we were just talking about it back in Babbadelo.'

'We were?'

'Well, us reapers were.'

Hector tried to recall but was struggling to."

"1533

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 16))

'It's a famous weapon,' said Garovel. 'Once wielded by the great hero, Logante.'

Hector was unfamiliar with the name. 'What made him a hero?'

'He prevented a civil war and brought peace to Calthos some 1300 years ago.'

'Okay, well, that's pretty cool. What happened to him?'

'Last I heard, this spear was in the belly of a particularly nasty worm, so...'

‘Logante got eaten?’

‘Probably, yeah.’

‘Wow... what a happy ending...’

‘It’s probably not the most fucked up piece of history lying around down here.’

‘Great...’

‘Oh hey. Speaking of...’ Garovel motioned to a small piece of black cloth poking out of a closed trunk. ‘I wonder if that’s... hmm.’

Hector didn’t bother asking for clarification and decided to just open the trunk straight away. It stuck on something, but with a bit more effort, he yanked the lid free.

Something long and metal came flipping out and smacked against his chest hard enough to embed itself in his breastplate.

Surprised but unharmed, Hector grabbed the apparent handle and pulled the object out to examine it.

It was a flanged mace, he realized. He recognized the design, more or less, from his research. It was fairly small and certainly shinier than the pictures he’d seen on the internet, but it felt pretty hefty in his hand, and the bulbous head looked like it would hurt to get hit with. The head had four vertical rivets, each one perpendicular to the next, and the thick spike at the tip had no doubt been what caused it to get stuck in his armor the way it had.

Hector wanted to ask Garovel about it, but the reaper was quite obviously more interested in the black cloth from before.

‘Oh my goodness,’ said Garovel slowly. ‘I was right. It’s the Scarf of Amordiin.’

“Amoor-deen?”

‘Haven’t heard of him before?’

Hector shook his head.

‘Hooboy, well. Where to begin...?’ Garovel fell quiet, perhaps gathering his thoughts.

Hector removed the Scarf and closed the trunk again in order to sit on the lid. He was abruptly feeling as though he should get comfortable for what he suspected was going to be yet another history lesson. His hands were already quite full of items to examine, anyway, between the spear, scarf, and mace.

‘Okay, well, it’s not exactly a happy tale,’ said Garovel.

‘I figured as much.’

‘You want the full version or just the highlights?’

‘Highlights, please.’

‘Full version, it is, then.’

‘Fuck you,’ said Hector, though he did laugh.

‘So Amordiin was this young guy who really wanted to make a name for himself, okay? And he got it into his head that he could accomplish this by rescuing a princess. Problem was, he couldn’t actually find any princesses who were in need of rescuing.’

‘That WOULD make the plan more difficult...’

‘Yeah, so, can you guess what he did?’

‘Uh... come up with a new plan?’

‘Aha. No. He kidnapped the crown princess of Vantalay.’

‘Oh. That’s, um... hmm.’

‘Yeah.’”

"1534

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 3 of 16))

‘I’m guessing that didn’t work out too well for him,’ said Hector.

‘Actually, it worked out incredibly well,’ said Garovel.

‘Are you serious?’

‘Yep. Amordiin was able to successfully disguise himself as his own “villain.” And then he staged a “rescue” of the princess while she was nearby, so she was able to hear but not see what was going on. So he saved her from himself and became a hero, praised by all.’

‘...I don’t know if I believe you, Garovel.’

‘I’m telling you, it’s true. It was a whole big thing among us reapers for a while, because there weren’t many servants around in Vantalay at the time. Certainly not any interventionist types. We were just there, exercising our neutrality, ferrying souls, and watching this horse’s ass take over the kingdom. It was amazing to witness. Like a soap opera long before television was invented.’

‘Wait, he TOOK OVER the kingdom?’

‘Oh yeah. You didn’t think the story was done, did you? Once he became a hero, that was just the first step. He steadily increased his fame, doing all kinds of ridiculous and unsavory shit, until eventually, he ascended to the throne himself and became its new king.’

Hector eyed the black cloth in his hand. ‘How does the scarf fit into all this?’

‘He was always wearing that, no matter what he was doing. Even in the bath, he didn’t take it off.’

Hector wasn’t sure he wanted to keep holding it all of a sudden. ‘Ew.’

‘Oh, it’s fine. This was seven hundred years ago. Or eight. Or five. I’m fuzzy on the timeline, but the point is, he considered this scarf to be very valuable. And who knows? Maybe it’ll help us mimic his success.’

‘I don’t know if I want be like that guy, Garovel...’

‘Oh, don’t get me wrong. He was a piece of shit. I’m not saying you should consider him a role model.’

‘Hmm. Was he a bad king?’

‘That’s debatable. As with pretty much any ruler, he did some good things and some bad things. And during his reign of thirty or so years, Vantalay was peaceful.’

‘I’m sensing a “but” on the way...’

‘But... as he got older, he became rather ruthless and enacted a few policies that his subjects didn’t agree with. He was ultimately overthrown and beheaded in front of his family.’

‘Holy fuck.’

‘Yeah, it was pretty awful.’

‘Do you know any stories that DON’T end in gruesome death?’

Garovel tilted his head upward as he thought about it. And kept thinking about it.

‘Garovel?’

‘Yeah, no, they pretty much all end in gruesome death. The only ones that don’t--well. They haven’t finished yet.’

‘Wow, that’s... great, Garovel. Real comforting.’

‘What do you want from me? I’m a reaper of death, not a children’s author.’

Hector decided to try and get the conversation back on track. ‘You still haven’t explained what makes the scarf so special.’

‘Oh, that? I dunno.’

‘Are you fucking kidding me, Garovel? What was the point of telling me that whole story, then?’

‘There needed to be a point?’

‘Agh...’

"1535

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 4 of 16))

‘Learning about history is a point unto itself,’ said Garovel.

‘Learning about history? Or explaining about history?’

‘What’re you tryin’ to say?’

Hector exhaled and shook his head. They were getting sidetracked again. ‘You really can’t tell me anything useful about this scarf?’

‘Well, okay, so Amordiin had a lot of “interesting” items like this--items which I suspect gave him extraordinary aid in various ways. He seemed to acquire more as he gained fame, supposedly from a “witch” or “coven of witches,” depending on who you ask. As far as I know, he also had a mask, a dagger, a hat, and a couple rings, but--’

‘You’re still not telling me anything about the scarf, Garovel.’

‘Would you quit being so impatient?! Just let me finish!’

Hector wanted to talk back some more, but he held his tongue.

‘Amordiin had his scarf and mask from the beginning, meaning they were likely the most instrumental in his rise to power. So while we may not know what this item is capable of specifically, we know that it helped him sneak into a castle full of soldiers and kidnap the most well-protected woman in the land.’

‘Hmm.’ Hector wished he could touch the scarf with his bare hands, but his armor was in the way. It did seem incredibly light, though, even for a piece of cloth. Almost like a feather, fluttering and trying to catch the breeze at even the slightest of Hector’s movements.

‘Why don’t you try putting it on?’ said Garovel.

‘You sure it’s safe?’

‘Absolutely not, but when has that ever stopped us?’

A horrifically good point, Hector supposed. He set his two weapons down and stood up.

He’d never actually worn a scarf before, though. He decided to just open up a hole in his armor and wrap it around his torso like a stomach warmer, trying not to cringe too badly at the searing pain of the Undercrust’s heat before closing the hole back up.

He waited, focusing his mind away from the pain and more or less succeeding, though maybe not as well as he would’ve liked.

He kept waiting.

And kept waiting.

'...I'm not feeling anything special,' said Hector.

'Is it touching your skin?'

'Yeah.' He had made sure to tuck a bit of it up and under his shirt.

'Well, shit. Maybe you're wearing it wrong?'

He definitely was, but he didn't see what difference it made.

'Try wearing it over your armor, instead,' said Garovel.

Hector's mouth flattened in his helmet. 'Wouldn't that be bad in a fight? My opponent could just yank it and throw me off balance or something.'

'Look, I dunno, just try it, okay? You don't have to wear it that way forever. And besides, it'll look cooler.'

Hector sighed but did as he was bid, enduring more pain in order to remove the scarf and subsequently wrap it around his neck. It was quite long, probably meant to be worn by someone taller, and he didn't want too much bulk around his neck, so he forewent any extra loops and let it drape over his back instead."

"1536

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 4 of 16))

Still, Hector didn't feel any different, until he remembered to make sure the scarf was touching his skin. He nestled it in between his helmet and his breastplate, wincing against more burning pain from the heated iron around his own fingers.

But even that didn't--

Wait.

No.

Something was different. Very different. But he couldn't quite tell how just yet because of the pain still being there. It was making it much more difficult to focus, and he still had to keep renewing his armor, as well.

That was three things, all wanting attention from him simultaneously. The armor, the pain, and this still undefined sensation.

Stubbornly, perhaps, he didn't want to ask Garovel to numb his pain. He wanted to compartmentalize it in his own head, cordon it off with nothing but his own ability to concentrate. He'd already been treating his armor this way while he'd been carrying on conversations with Garovel and everyone else, so why couldn't he extend it a step further?

It was difficult. He felt his armor waver as his concentration did, and traces of heat started leaking in, adding a fresh dose of pain to the still lingering quantity.

He just had to think about three things at once. Or rather, he had to not think about them. That seemed to be the real trick of it, he'd come to realize back in Himmekel. It wasn't about trying to divide his attention between them. It was about treating each thing as if it didn't necessarily need his attention. Just letting it exist there in his head. Like a growing plant. It didn't require constant attention. Just every now and then. Attention was like water. The idea could take root in the soil of his mind on its own, if he would just allow it to.

That was his theory, at least.

It wasn't panning out very well for him, though. Physical pain was a different kind of demanding, as far as attention was concerned, and Hector couldn't figure out how to just let it sit there in his head like the other two things--not before all of his concentration began crumbling around him.

He staggered forward a couple steps and hunched over.

Time to admit failure, he knew.

"Okay," he muttered between groans and strained breaths, "please numb my pain, Garovel."

'You have to make an opening in your armor for me.'

He growled and annihilated one of his pauldrons. Relief arrived a second later, spreading instantly from the reaper's grip on his shoulder.

Hector took a haggard breath and sat back down on the trunk. "I guess three is too many..." He wondered if that number was a hard limit, or if he might be able to eventually overcome it with more training.

'Three?' said Garovel.

'Oh, uh. It's just, ah... well, I'll tell you later.' He hadn't really been explaining the details of his training to Garovel, lately. The reaper probably thought he'd just been meditating normally and working on materialization. This probably wasn't the time or the place to go into it, though, he felt."

"1537

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 5 of 16))

'Are you okay?' said Garovel. 'Did the scarf do something?'

'Yeah, I'm fine,' said Hector. 'But I don't know if it--ah. Just. Gimme a second. I have to concentrate.'

'Alright...'

Hector refocused. He fixed his armor first, then tried to understand what this new sensation was. Whatever it was, it made everything around him feel different. It was almost like being underwater. Or in a windstorm, maybe.

Yeah. That was it.

Air.

He could feel air breaking against him, almost as if he were standing at the top of a skyscraper, being buffeted by wind. Or maybe... maybe it was more like he was the skyscraper. Because the wind, even as strongly as he could feel it, didn't cause him to flinch or move at all.

Where was it coming from, this wind? It wasn't making any sound.

He stood up again to look around.

Whoa.

He felt the entire chamber shift. Like a somehow stationary earthquake.

But no. That wasn't right, he realized. The room hadn't shifted. It had just become clear to him. The room itself had. He could practically see it now, the entire space that filled the room.

It was the air again. Specifically, the air's movement. He could sense it, the flowing lines of it.

What a strange room. Entirely encapsulated in rock and a couple pools of magma. There was nowhere for the air to escape to, but it was still being slowly and perpetually pushed upward, probably by heat. And when it reached the ceiling, it had to stop and be pushed aside by the air below it, which created a new kind of air current around the walls of the chamber. A cyclical flow.

Hector took a step, and the air became even clearer to him. Crisper in his mind.

The scarf. It was behind him, but he could see its movements because of the air, too. In fact, that was where the movement was clearest, he realized.

He was beginning to get the picture.

'I think... ah...' How to explain? Hector took a deep breath and noticed that he could sense that, too, escaping through the crevices in his helmet.

Holy crap, this was all a little overwhelming.

'You think what?' said Garovel.

'Ah... I think this scarf is like a... a kind of "air pressure sensor" or something.'

'Air pressure sensor?' the reaper echoed. 'You can sense air pressure now?'

'I... guess so? Or, uh... maybe that's not quite right. I can sense "airflow," I think.'

'Hmm. Interesting.'

Hector tried taking another step, and indeed, his sense of the whole room became clearer again.

Oh, wait, but it was also getting slowly duller again, too. Each passing second, his sense of the air in the room weakened slightly.

Why? Because of his own movement?

He lifted a hand.

Yep. Mystery solved.

‘Seems like I can sense the movement of the air best when I myself am moving,’ said Hector. ‘It’s like a... a domino effect or something.’

‘Domino effect?’

"1538

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 6 of 16))

‘Yeah,’ said Hector. ‘Like, um... when I move, it makes the air move a little, which then makes it even easier for me to sense it, I guess?’

‘Oh, I get what you mean. You make the air move, and then that air pushes against more air--to a lesser degree, of course--but you’re saying you can still sense it, even at that lesser degree? Like air dominoes, is what you were trying to say?’

‘Er, yeah... I think.’

‘That was a weird analogy, Hector.’

‘Wha--how would you describe it, then?’

‘Oh, as “waves,” maybe? Y’know, the way a normal person would conceptualize it?’

‘I... ah... hmm.’

‘Your movement causes air to move away from you in waves, and the scarf allows you to sense those waves, no?’

As Hector thought about that, it did seem to make more sense than dominoes.

Well, shit.

‘It’s okay,’ said Garovel. ‘I’m beginning to see a pattern with you and weird descriptions of things, though.’

Hector tilted his head. ‘What’re you talking about? I don’t, ah... do I?’

The reaper chortled. ‘Do you remember that time you described Lynn’s purple shadow as “death-taffy?”’

He did. ‘Hey. That was... that was accurate, wasn’t it?’

‘I never said your descriptions were inaccurate. Just weird.’

‘Hmph.’

‘Anyway, what else is the movement of the air telling you?’ said Garovel.

‘What do you mean?’

‘Well. I guess what I’m really wondering is if the airflow is allowing you to sense the locations of objects around you.’

‘Oh. Yeah, it is. Like, uh... I can see where Mr. Sheridan is right now, even though I’m not looking at him.’

‘Aha, excellent. Alright, I’m watching him. Tell me what he’s doing.’

Hector focused on what the lines were telling him. ‘He’s crouched down and examining something.’

‘Good. Maybe with this--’

‘It’s a box in his hands. He’s struggling to open it. Doesn’t seem like he’s having much luck. It needs a key. There’s some kind of cut stone inside, standing on a little tripod or something.’

‘Whoa, whoa. You can sense THAT much detail?’

‘Er, yeah...’

‘You can even sense what’s INSIDE the box?’

‘Yeah. Because it’s not, uh... vacuum sealed or whatever? I can sense air flowing through it.'

The reaper paused, perhaps thinking. 'How quickly is the air in the box moving? Can you tell?'

'Uh... seems pretty slow, I guess. The air around the ceiling and walls is a lot faster, by comparison.'

'Holy shit, Hector. Do you have any idea how useful this could be?'

He was beginning to.

'Well, that clinches it. You have to keep that scarf on forever now. It'll be your new fashion statement from now on.'

Hector exhaled a laugh and walked the few short steps back to the trunk in order to pick up the other two items he'd put down earlier."

"1539

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 7 of 16))

'This certainly explains how Amordiin was able to kidnap the princess of Vantalay without being detected,' said Garovel. 'He could sense where all the guards were and stay out of their line of sight.'

'If he'd had a reaper looking out for him, he could've done that without the scarf.'

'Heh. True. But still, the Scarf of Amordiin is perfect for you. In fact, I'd even go so far as to say it's an ideal tool for any materialization user.'

Hector could see what he meant. This thing increased his spatial awareness by leaps and bounds. He was already getting a few ideas about how he might be able to put that to use. He eyed the Shifting Spear of Logante another time, still in its sword form. 'Well, one out of two isn't bad, I guess. How do I make this thing small again?'

'Say "Shrokoh."'

"Shrokoh."

The sword compressed in an instant and became a quaint little spear again. Hector pressed it against his breastplate and remolded his armor around it, creating an inner pocket for it to comfortably nestle within.

‘Oh, so you’re gonna take the Spear, after all, eh?’

‘Might as well,’ said Hector. ‘It’s pretty light. And I was thinking Mr. Easton might be able to get some good use out of it. Maybe. He seemed like more of a gun guy, though, so I don’t know.’

‘What’s that other item you’ve got there?’ said Garovel. ‘Another weapon? Let me have a closer look.’

Hector held the flanged mace up for the reaper’s inspection. ‘Well?’

‘Curious... I don’t sense any ardor in it. It doesn’t seem particularly special. But at the same time... I don’t know. It’s almost like it’s too normal.’

‘What does that mean?’

‘It’s hard to describe. It feels like... there’s nothing special about it but maybe there’s supposed to be. Like it’s empty, somehow. Is it hollow inside?’

Hector raised it up and down, checking its weight again. ‘No way. If anything, it’s heavier than it looks.’

‘I’m not sure how else to explain it, then.’

‘Hmm. You sure you don’t recognize it?’

‘Nope.’

‘So it doesn’t have a cool name or anything, then?’

‘Maybe it does, but I don’t know it. We could name it ourselves, if you like.’

Hector’s shoulders slumped a little. ‘Eh, it’s not the same...’

Abruptly, Hector sensed Mr. Sheridan approaching but didn’t turn to face the man.

‘Heads up,’ said Garovel.

‘I know,’ said Hector, keeping his eyes forward.

Mr. Sheridan's steps were abnormally slow. Measured. Careful. As if he didn't want Hector to hear him coming, perhaps.

Hector didn't want to believe that. He wanted to believe Mr. Sheridan was every bit as friendly and trustworthy as he'd thus far acted. But Hector also wanted to get a measure of the man's true character. So he didn't turn around.

And then he sensed Mr. Sheridan reach for one of the guns in his bag.

'Hector,' said Garovel.

'I know,' he repeated."

"1540 -- CLXV.

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 8 of 16))

There seemed to be a pile of coins and stones in Mr. Sheridan's bag now, but the man's hand indeed wrapped around the grip of a pistol. He didn't pull it out yet, though.

Still, Hector wanted to give him the benefit of the doubt. Maybe the man was worried that Hector would betray him for the sake of the tournament and was therefore preparing to defend himself at a moment's notice.

But after a couple more steps, when Mr. Sheridan began lifting the weapon up to point it at Hector's back, that was as far as the young Lord Goffe's courtesy extended.

Hector bricked the pistol in iron, encasing Mr. Sheridan's hand along with it.

"Oh--what?! Ah--hey!"

Hector finally turned to look at him.

Mr. Sheridan stopped flailing when he noticed Hector's stare. "Aha... I, ah..."

Hector didn't say anything. He wanted to hear what the man was going to say for himself.

“Ah... eh... I’m sorry, Lord Darksteel. Please don’t kill me.”

Hector sighed. “Why were you about to attack me?”

“Oh, um, well, y’know, you guys’re pretty hardy, ‘n I knew you wouldn’t actually die, so I just thought, maybe, ah... ooh, I’m really very sorry.”

“You want to win this tournament and become a god?” said Hector.

“I... I thought it might be nice, yes. But I see now the error of--”

“You weren’t worried that your next opponent might just kill you in an instant?”

“Oh, well, I-I suppose I figured that if I could eliminate you, then the others would be smooth sailing by comparison.”

“That doesn’t make any sense at all.”

“Heh, please don’t kill me.”

“I’m not gonna--” Hector stopped himself. Obviously, he wasn’t going to kill him. But it could be a problem if Mr. Sheridan became genuinely convinced of that. He recalled the only rule of this tournament as Malast had described it. Victory was achieved when the opponent died or surrendered. “Mr. Sheridan... do you admit defeat?”

“Oh! Yes, of course! I happily surrender!”

Well, that was one less thing to worry about, at least. When the distortion in his vision began to arrive, he made sure to annihilate the iron around Mr. Sheridan’s hand and weapon.

The next room was noticeably larger than the last two, almost on par with the one that they’d found Malast in.

That was not Malast standing in front of him now, though.

That was Seyos.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Five: ‘O, disgruntled lord...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Hun'Sho didn't seem to appreciate him stomping through Himmekel, but Zeff was far beyond the point of catering to their sensitivities.

When Axiolis had told him that everyone else's souls had simply vanished into thin air, the Lord Elroy had not been pleased. His time spent trying to get Carver's damn EWE to work had been frustrating enough, but now this?

He honestly wasn't sure what he would do if he discovered that these molten bastards had done something to Hector and the others."
"1540 -- CLXV.

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 8 of 16))

There seemed to be a pile of coins and stones in Mr. Sheridan's bag now, but the man's hand indeed wrapped around the grip of a pistol. He didn't pull it out yet, though.

Still, Hector wanted to give him the benefit of the doubt. Maybe the man was worried that Hector would betray him for the sake of the tournament and was therefore preparing to defend himself at a moment's notice.

But after a couple more steps, when Mr. Sheridan began lifting the weapon up to point it at Hector's back, that was as far as the young Lord Goffe's courtesy extended.

Hector bricked the pistol in iron, encasing Mr. Sheridan's hand along with it.

"Oh--what?! Ah--hey!"

Hector finally turned to look at him.

Mr. Sheridan stopped flailing when he noticed Hector's stare. "Aha... I, ah..."

Hector didn't say anything. He wanted to hear what the man was going to say for himself.

"Ah... eh... I'm sorry, Lord Darksteel. Please don't kill me."

Hector sighed. "Why were you about to attack me?"

"Oh, um, well, y'know, you guys're pretty hardy, 'n I knew you wouldn't actually die, so I just thought, maybe, ah... ooh, I'm really very sorry."

"You want to win this tournament and become a god?" said Hector.

"I... I thought it might be nice, yes. But I see now the error of--"

"You weren't worried that your next opponent might just kill you in an instant?"

"Oh, well, I-I suppose I figured that if I could eliminate you, then the others would be smooth sailing by comparison."

"That doesn't make any sense at all."

"Heh, please don't kill me."

"I'm not gonna--" Hector stopped himself. Obviously, he wasn't going to kill him. But it could be a problem if Mr. Sheridan became genuinely convinced of that. He recalled the only rule of this tournament as Malast had described it. Victory was achieved when the opponent died or surrendered. "Mr. Sheridan... do you admit defeat?"

"Oh! Yes, of course! I happily surrender!"

Well, that was one less thing to worry about, at least. When the distortion in his vision began to arrive, he made sure to annihilate the iron around Mr. Sheridan's hand and weapon.

The next room was noticeably larger than the last two, almost on par with the one that they'd found Malast in.

That was not Malast standing in front of him now, though.

That was Seyos.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Five: 'O, disgruntled lord...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Hun'Sho didn't seem to appreciate him stomping through Himmekel, but Zeff was far beyond the point of catering to their sensitivities.

When Axiolis had told him that everyone else's souls had simply vanished into thin air, the Lord Elroy had not been pleased. His time spent trying to get Carver's damn EWE to work had been frustrating enough, but now this?

He honestly wasn't sure what he would do if he discovered that these molten bastards had done something to Hector and the others."

"1541

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 9 of 16))

Zeff and Axiolis visited the last place where Axiolis had sensed them, which turned out to be some kind of empty moat around a stone monument. But without any idea of what to look for or visible traces of where they might have gone, Zeff soon started consulting the Hun'Sho for information.

At first, he'd been polite. Then he'd gotten steadily more assertive.

Now he was angry and looking for Torveis, the Hun'Sho who had spoken to the group the most during their first day in Himmekel.

A different Hun'Sho approached him first, however. It was a physically brighter and larger man, hands held out in front of him as an apparent sign of peaceable intention.

"Please," the molten man said, "you are scaring my people, Kare'Hyomen."

Zeff's expression twitched. 'What did he just call me?'

'It's not an insult,' said Ax. 'It's their name for those from the surface. The same way that Hun'Sho is our name for them.'

And it took concentrated effort, but Zeff tried to steady himself. He had no proof of their guilt. And he knew that treating them like criminals would not aid him in acquiring their assistance.

Willingly, anyway.

"I apologize if I have been causing you alarm," said Zeff with a stiff jaw, noticing that more Hun'Sho were gathering around them. "But my kin are missing, and I must find them as soon as possible. Can you help me?"

"I will do all I can. My name is Lemoros. Might I ask yours?"

"Zeff."

"Then, Zeff, let us go somewhere more private and speak there."

"Let us not. Let us speak right here, right now."

That was obviously not what Lemoros wanted to hear, and the Hun'Sho man looked around at the open street and increasing amount of onlookers.

Zeff just tried not to feel like they were gathering around to lynch him. "If you have any idea where they might have gone, please stop wasting my time and tell me." Then, more loudly, he addressed the crowd "That goes for all of you. If you have anything to tell me, anything that might help me find my kin, then do so now, and I will leave you alone."

'Please,' Ax added, 'we are very worried about them. They are as precious to us as I am sure all of you are to one another.'

Someone laughed.

Zeff's attention was drawn instantly. "Who was that?" he said. The voice had come from his left. He knew that much and took a step toward it. "Who laughed just now?"

Dead silence.

"Who laughed?!" he growled, no longer in control of his anger.

"Please, Mr. Zeff--" tried Lemoros.

"Step forward now or be hunted down!" said Zeff, taking another step.

The crowd was perfectly still now. Beings of magma, frozen. Not even daring to look at one another, apparently. And why weren't they? Weren't they confused? He couldn't read Hun'Sho expressions and so didn't know if they were frightened, but surely, they should have looking around at one another in confusion, no?

Was it because none of them were confused? Was it because they all knew exactly what was happening here?"

"1542

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 10 of 16))

One of the Hun'Sho to Zeff's right stepped forward. "Please calm yourself, Mr. Zeff."

Zeff recognized the voice but not the face, as they all looked more or less the same to him. "Torveis?"

"Yes."

"Tell me what is happening here," said Zeff, able to steady his voice somewhat. "Where are my people, Torveis?"

"Mr. Zeff, you ask more than you realize..."

Zeff didn't know what that meant, and he didn't care, either. "I ask only what is necessary. If you cannot help me, then stand aside."

Torveis stepped closer and reached out to him.

A wall of soul-strengthened ice shot up between them. "BACK. AWAY."

Torveis did. A chorus of mumbles and whispers rose from the onlookers.

Zeff refocused on the direction that the laugh had originated from. "One of you will answer my questions."

And again, there was silence.

Fine, then.

'Hold on, Ax," said Zeff.

The reaper latched onto his back without hesitating.

Zeff picked the first Hun'Sho in front of him and walked forward. He coated his own hand in a gauntlet of ice and grabbed the man by the molten neck. "Allow me to ask again. Where are my--?"

Someone in the back row started running away.

Zeff released his chosen Hun'Sho and launched himself over the crowd on a platform of hissing ice. The runner didn't get far. Zeff landed on him and pinned him to the ground with both bare hands and ice alike.

"Where were you going?" he said, much calmer now that he had his target within his grasp.

The other Hun'Sho were yelling something now, but Zeff wasn't listening. He materialized a dome around himself and his captive.

"S-stop!" the Hun'Sho man said. "I know nothing!"

"Tell me what you do know, then. Why did you laugh at us?"

"I--! I wasn't--! I know nothing!"

Zeff tightened his grip on the back of the man's neck.

'You should dig into his chest and go for his core,' advised Ax privately. 'His heart, in other words.'

Zeff paused at that. 'He won't be useful if he is dead, Ax.'

'He will not die unless you destroy his core. These people are very durable.'

That was good enough for Zeff. He ripped into the Hun'Sho man's back with a blade of ice and started rifling around.

"Ah! Stop! Don't do that! I know nothing that you--!"

Zeff's hand found a very warm sphere, and he knew it was what was he looking for when the Hun'Sho man released an inhuman scream as soon as Zeff had touched it.

"Answer my questions."

"The elders! They have been lying to the rest of us! That is all I know!"

Well, that was new, at least. "Who are these elders?"

"Ah--oh! Lemoros and Torveis are elders! And Arsok! And Meigast!"

Hermeios! And--!"

"That is good enough." Zeff stood and released him."

"1543

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 11 of 16))

The Hun'Sho outside the dome were just standing there, watching. Not trying to break in and rescue their friend, as Zeff might have assumed. They started backing away when they saw Zeff looking over them again.

He annihilated the dome and watched the majority of them scatter.

'Which one's Torveis?' he asked.

'Straight ahead of you, not moving,' said Ax privately.

Zeff saw him. He appreciated that the man wasn't making him chase him down, at least. "Explain yourself, 'Elder' Torveis."

Torveis sighed but stood his ground as Zeff approached. "We are a peaceful people. Why must you resort to violence?"

"Why must you lie to my face?"

"You do not understand."

"I know. That is what I am trying to correct."

Torveis shut his eyes, though the glow still shown through a little. "We would have been happy to explain, if you had simply allowed us privacy, first. This is a sensitive matter, one we wish the children not to overhear."

And in spite of his bristling emotions, Zeff could understand that much, at least. "You have my apologies, then." He could only manage to sound half-sincere, though.

Torveis sighed again. "We are prisoners in this place. And our keeper, Seyos, is ever watchful. Even now, he may be listening. However, as I am still standing here, perhaps he is not."

Zeff just kept listening.

“Seyos wields tremendous power, and we are at his mercy. But that is not enough for him. He often gives us tasks to complete for him. He transports us to distant locations--sometimes with him, sometimes not--and forces us to aid him in collecting valuables. By now, it must be an absurd volume, but I do not know where he keeps it all or to what end he means to utilize it. I imagine, however, that wherever it is, you will find your kin there.”

Zeff was silent as he processed all of this information.

‘You have no idea how we can get there?’ said Ax, still attached to Zeff’s back.

“I know that Seyos can see and travel through every mirror in Himmekel, but I do not think he is limited to that. I think it is merely the most convenient for him.”

“None of this explains why that Hun’Sho man laughed at us,” said Zeff.

Torveis hesitated and looked around. The black street had emptied, and only the tall Lemoros had remained by Torveis’ side. The two elder Hun’Sho exchanged nods.

“The children do not know of Seyos,” said Torveis. “And in recent years... Seyos has stopped giving tasks to the elders. He has been giving them to the children. And... they have not been returning.”

Zeff’s eyes widened.

‘Your children have been disappearing?’ said Ax.

Lemoros interjected. “We do not truly know that he has been giving them the same manner of tasks that he had been giving us. We have only been assuming that, as it seemed the most obvious explanation. But... as not even one of them has returned, I have begun to suspect that Seyos is doing something else with them.””

”1544

"We tried to tell the children that those who have disappeared simply chose to leave Himmekel on their own," said Torveis, "but it seems they have stopped believing us. Assuming they ever did."

"They are far smarter than we have ever given them credit for," said Lemoros. "It was a mistake to lie to them."

Torveis shook his head. "It was undesirable and even heart-wrenching, but it was not a mistake. If Seyos discovered that we had told them about him--"

"He would do, what?" said Lemoros, sounding more frustrated than Zeff had yet heard from any Hun'Sho. "Abduct them? As he is doing now? We should have done more to prepare them. Our inaction is to blame."

'You've been Seyos' prisoners here for a thousand years, no?' said Ax.

"Roughly, yes," said Torveis.

'Yet you said that these abductions started only recently. What prompted them?'

The Hun'Sho exchanged glances again.

"The arrival of Ettol and Carver, no doubt," said Lemoros. "Seyos has always been rather forceful and demanding, but he never harmed any of us, as he appears to be doing now. I do not know what has come over him or why."

"I do," said Torveis, causing everyone to look at him. "Or at the very least, I can guess. I believe Seyos may be trying to instigate the return of Avar in some way."

"What makes you think that?" said Lemoros.

"Avar heralds our return to prominence," said Torveis. "And Himmekel is not the only enclave of the Hun'Sho in the world. We know that Seyos has been in contact with others. It would make sense if that--or something similar--was their goal."

So there were more Hun'Sho hiding elsewhere. That was news to Zeff. They had gotten away from the topic he actually cared about, however. "I need to know how to find this Seyos."

Torveis sighed. "I am sorry, but I do not know. Seyos comes to us at his leisure.”

“You said he uses mirrors to travel,” said Zeff.

“Yes, but we have tried many times to discern the method of their function,” said Lemoros. “To no avail.”

“Truly, we would help you in this if we could,” said Torveis. “It would very much be in our interest if you were to bring Seyos’ reign here to an end. His power is beyond us, but perhaps it is not beyond you.”

‘Then take us to the rest of the elders,’ said Ax. ‘Perhaps one of them will know something that can help us.’

The Hun’Sho exchanged looks another time.

“Very well,” said Torveis. “But we must be exceptionally cautious. There is no telling when Seyos might be observing us.”

Zeff scowled and rubbed his knuckles. “It would be more convenient if he attacked us first.”

“I am glad you are confident in your abilities,” said Torveis, “but please, do be careful. Seyos likely wields power that is stranger than anything you have ever seen.”

Zeff returned a flat stare. “I wouldn’t bet on that, if I were you.””
"1545 -- CLXVI.

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 13 of 16))

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Six: ‘The Unworthy...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The booming, disembodied voice of Malast arrived before the fighting had a chance to begin.

“This will be a three way battle,” said the Idle God. “The third combatant is still being decided, so the two of you may prefer to wait for him to arrive in the interest of fairness. Or you can simply get started without him. It is your choice.”

A third combatant?

Ah. That would explain why Malast had chosen the Chamber of Grand Desire as their battlefield. It was much larger than most of the Vault’s other treasure rooms. Even after all this time, Seyos was still nowhere near filling it. He had hoped to remedy that during his next venture to Qenghis, but that was before Ettol had arrived and thrown everything out of balance.

For a time, Seyos and Hector merely looked at one another, not saying or doing anything.

Seyos knew more than the surface-dweller probably realized. He had been observing the invaders since their arrival in Himmekel. It had been his hope that they would simply leave without incident, but that was not to be, it seemed. Foolishness on his part, he now realized. He should have known that their claims of arriving here accidentally were lies. Of course they were here for his treasure.

This, too, was Ettol’s doing, he knew. That insufferable wretch. No doubt, this was the man’s true goal all along--to bring outsiders here, attempting to stir the Idle God to action.

It wasn’t going to work. Seyos wouldn’t allow it. Supreme Will or not, these meddlers were not going to simply show up and take that which rightfully belonged to him.

Especially not that ashen filth.

How could Malast possibly consider one of them to be a suitable vessel for Secho? It beggared belief. Surely, Malast had not forgotten what they had done, the misery that they were responsible for.

At length, Seyos could endure the tense silence no longer. “You should never have come here,” he said.

“...I don’t want to fight you,” said Hector.

“Hah!” He pointed at the mace in the young man’s hand. “And yet you steal the Moon’s Wrath from me!”

Hector glanced at the weapon a moment. “...Aren’t you the one who’s been stealing?”

Seyos scowled. "All such technology is derived from the knowledge pioneered by my brethren. That you would not understand this, is sadly to be expected."

"...Okay, so if I give you this thing right now, you'll stop trying to kill me and my friends?"

Those words took Seyos by surprise, but they sounded genuine. But no. It was just another trick, of course. Seyos knew better. "I did not expect you to say something so cowardly, but you are right to fear me."

Hector made no response.

Seyos found that irritating. "If you surrender now and return the Moon's Wrath, I will show you mercy. I promise to spare the lives of both you and your reaper.""

"1545 -- CLXVI.

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 13 of 16))

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Six: 'The Unworthy...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The booming, disembodied voice of Malast arrived before the fighting had a chance to begin.

"This will be a three way battle," said the Idle God. "The third combatant is still being decided, so the two of you may prefer to wait for him to arrive in the interest of fairness. Or you can simply get started without him. It is your choice."

A third combatant?

Ah. That would explain why Malast had chosen the Chamber of Grand Desire as their battlefield. It was much larger than most of the Vault's other treasure rooms. Even after all this time, Seyos was still nowhere near filling it. He had hoped to remedy that during his next venture to Qenghis, but that was before Ettol had arrived and thrown everything out of balance.

For a time, Seyos and Hector merely looked at one another, not saying or doing anything.

Seyos knew more than the surface-dweller probably realized. He had been observing the invaders since their arrival in Himmekel. It had been his hope that they would simply leave without incident, but that was not to be, it seemed. Foolishness on his part, he now realized. He should have known that their claims of arriving here accidentally were lies. Of course they were here for his treasure.

This, too, was Ettol's doing, he knew. That insufferable wretch. No doubt, this was the man's true goal all along--to bring outsiders here, attempting to stir the Idle God to action.

It wasn't going to work. Seyos wouldn't allow it. Supreme Will or not, these meddlers were not going to simply show up and take that which rightfully belonged to him.

Especially not that ashen filth.

How could Malast possibly consider one of them to be a suitable vessel for Secho? It beggared belief. Surely, Malast had not forgotten what they had done, the misery that they were responsible for.

At length, Seyos could endure the tense silence no longer. "You should never have come here," he said.

"...I don't want to fight you," said Hector.

"Hah!" He pointed at the mace in the young man's hand. "And yet you steal the Moon's Wrath from me!"

Hector glanced at the weapon a moment. "...Aren't you the one who's been stealing?"

Seyos scowled. "All such technology is derived from the knowledge pioneered by my brethren. That you would not understand this, is sadly to be expected."

"...Okay, so if I give you this thing right now, you'll stop trying to kill me and my friends?"

Those words took Seyos by surprise, but they sounded genuine. But no. It was just another trick, of course. Seyos knew better. "I did not expect you to say something so cowardly, but you are right to fear me."

Hector made no response.

Seyos found that irritating. "If you surrender now and return the Moon's Wrath, I will show you mercy. I promise to spare the lives of both you and your reaper.""

"1546

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 14 of 16))

"...And what about everyone who was with me?" said Hector.

"They must prostrate themselves likewise," said Seyos. "Mercy must be earned."

"I don't think they'd agree to that," said Hector.

"Neither do I," said Seyos.

And there was silence again.

Seyos readied himself beneath the Deceiver's Cloak. Within its billowing and distorted visage, he was able to hold many more items than he would have otherwise been able to carry. He reached first for the item which had subdued Diego, the Orb of Tranquility.

There existed no better tool for dealing with servants. Ever confident in their power, they never saw it coming, this item which could suppress the synchronicity of their soul with that of their reaper. As soon as a servant laid eyes on it, the Orb rendered them no better than the corpse that they truly were.

And so would it be here. As soon as this Hector looked at the Orb...

As soon as he looked at it...

Hector would be...

What?

Seyos didn't understand. He'd presented the Orb. Hector was staring right at it, and yet he was still standing there, unfazed.

How could--?

Agh...

The Supreme Will.

It played a role here, too?

How intolerably obnoxious.

"What's that?" said Hector plainly, as if trying to kill Seyos with irritation alone.

"Nothing," growled Seyos. He returned the Orb to the Cloak and began deliberating.

The Fists of Enkir. The Shield of Hamenszoon. The Twin Blades of Boros. The Mask of Amordiin. The Deceiver's Dagger. The Deceiver's Eye. The Black Spindle. The Box of Perdition.

Ugh...

The Orb of Tranquility had been ideal precisely because of how innocuous it appeared. The other items he had to choose from were not nearly so. As soon as he pulled one of them out and began using it, Hector would realize something was wrong and no doubt mount some sort of counteroffensive.

And that would be most undesirable.

Seyos had not survived all this time by actually bothering to fight servants. They were far too troublesome for that.

But Seyos did have something else up his sleeve--or rather, around his neck.

The Pendant of Unso, though it was meant to be used in conjunction with the Staff of Unso, was still far from useless on its own. And Malast did say that there were no other rules to this tournament, so there was no reason he couldn't use it.

Very well.

"Pardon me for one moment," said Seyos. He gripped the Pendant with one hand and focused on the desired room. "I will return shortly with a gift."

“Wha--?”

Distorted space enveloped him, and Seyos closed his eyes to mitigate the disorientation.

In an instant, he arrived precisely where he meant to.

His home for the last millennia.

It was far from the life of luxury that he had enjoyed during his time as Guong before the Great Fall, but he had come to hold affection for this place, in a strange way. The feeling of safety was comforting enough.

And the mirrors. The many, many mirrors."
"1547

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 15 of 16))

Of course, they weren't truly mirrors. Rather, they were spatial windows, connected to every mirror in Himmekel. They allowed him to observe the daily lives of his subjects, to understand their struggles, their needs and desires--as well as their lies and their treason, unintentional though it may have been.

Seyos' eyes fell upon his stone desk in the middle of the chamber, upon the bodiless core currently sitting upon it.

A terrible shame. One day, such intelligent and probing minds would be of tremendous value to the Hun'Sho again, but right now, they were only a nuisance. Too much so, sadly. Seyos hated having to do this to his own kin, but he knew all too well that they simply would not understand what needed to be done for the continued survival and resurgence of the Hun'Sho.

He picked up the core of young Jasirok and gripped it in the palm of his molten hand. "With this sacrifice," he whispered, "you will do unto our enemies as they once did unto us."

Seyos took a few moments to simply breathe, long and deeply, feeling the weight of the deed that he was about to do. He had done it far too many times, these past few years. It was all for the preservation of his people. Even if they eventually discovered what he was doing and hated him for it.

It was all for their sake.

Seyos circumnavigated the desk and retrieved the Wand of Conduction from the top right drawer, as well as one of the many small metal containers from the bottom left drawer. Next, he moved toward the mirrors and tapped the Wand against each one as he passed, activating them just long enough for a brief look on the other side.

Hmm.

Not many of his people were in their homes. Strange, for this time of day. Perhaps they knew more of what was happening than Seyos had previously realized. He knew they wouldn't dare set foot outside Himmekel, of course, not with Enkir and Dunikei wreaking their eternal havoc, but still, it troubled him.

He would look into it later. Seyos crammed the Wand into the Deceiver's Cloak. There wasn't a proper space for it, but it would do, for now.

He readied himself to teleport again. He knew that he wouldn't have much time once he returned to the Chamber of Grand Desire. He held Jasirok's core in one hand and the small metal container in the other. With effort, he twisted the cap off the container and heard it pop.

He dumped its murky contents onto the core. Almost immediately, he felt it pulse in response.

No time now. He tossed the container aside, gripped the Pendant of Unso, and jumped back to the Chamber of Grand Desire.

As expected, Hector was still there, though he had moved closer to the small pile of treasure by the far wall, no doubt looking for more valuables to pillage."

"1548

((The 14 pages of Valentine's Day + Double Wednesday -- Page 16 of 16))

Before Seyos could move, however, metal appeared all around him, fixing him in place with one hand still around the Pendant and the other still around the trembling core.

“Where did you go?” said Hector, only then turning to face him.

Seyos saw no reason to answer that. The magma of his body was already beginning to change the metal’s color, so it wasn’t unthinkable that he would be able to break out of this encasing--or even absorb it into him, perhaps. But the surface-dweller would probably just make more.

No, the only real solution here was to use the Pendant again and teleport away. He had to be careful, though, to make sure that he didn’t bring the core with him. And since he couldn’t physically drop it from his hand, due to the metal encasing, it required deliberate mental effort to leave the core behind, to ensure that it didn’t become enveloped in the Pendant’s power along with him.

But he managed it, just as the core was growing too violent in his hand. And in a blink, he was gone from the Chamber of Grand Desire once again.

Seyos didn’t know if he would’ve been able to defeat the one the others had been calling Darksteel in single combat, but he certainly knew that the “gift” he had just left behind would crush anyone. One day, all the world would know both the folly and wrath of the Hun’Sho as that foolish young invader was about to.

Seyos, in the meantime, intended to get a head start on killing the other remaining combatants.

--++--++--

‘Garovel, what the hell am I looking at?’

‘Ah--isn’t that a Hun’Sho core?’

Hector supposed it did look similar to the one he’d seen in Torveis’ chest, but what the hell was wrong with it? It was vibrating like crazy now, and just a moment ago, it had a ripped a hole through the empty iron shell that he’d made for Seyos.

He didn’t know where the guy had gone, but it was more than enough to put him on edge. For all he knew, Seyos could pop in at any moment and try to take his head off. That was why he’d made sure that Garovel was tucked away in the safest possible combat position--around the wrist of his shield hand.

‘Careful, Hector,’ the reaper said. ‘Something is very wrong with that thing. What I’m sensing is--I can’t explain. The ardor within it is spiking in a way I wouldn’t have thought possible. I don’t know--’

The core expanded visibly, ballooning up to the size of a basketball, and dark goo started oozing out of it. The white-hot exterior cracked, releasing more. And then it simply broke apart entirely, replaced by a shooting column of murky slime.

Of sludge.

The mass grew all too quickly, and it wasn’t much longer before Hector began to realize what he was looking at.

He was watching a worm being born. And a very large one, at that."
"1549

Instinctively, he tried coating the mass in iron, but he was not surprised when it did absolutely nothing to stem the growing tide of sludge. The iron simply expanded out and broke until it, too, was swallowed by slimy darkness.

“G-Garovel...”

‘Wow, this is even worse than I was expecting.’

“What the fuck do I do?!” Hector was finding it abruptly difficult to remain as calm as the reaper sounded.

‘Hmm, good question.’

“Garovel!”

The worm was already as big as a house.

‘Okay, well, let’s look at this logically. We already know you can’t kill it. And we’re trapped in here, so we can’t run from it, either.’

“That’s not helpful.”

‘The treasure. Maybe there’s some more treasure around that will help you take it down.’

Well, it was a plan, at least. Unfortunately, despite the size of the room, there wasn't nearly as much treasure in it compared to the previous ones Hector had been in. And he knew that with absolute certainty, thanks to the Scarf of Amordiin. Apart from the relatively modest pile currently at his back, there were two other, even smaller ones on the second and third floors of the chamber, respectively.

There was no point in complaining, though. It would have to do.

Still keenly aware of the bubbling mass in the center of the room, Hector set to work, looking over the nearest treasure pile. He and Garovel had already gotten a brief opportunity to examine this one earlier when Seyos disappeared, but the only thing that caught the reaper's attention had been a glittery orb that was apparently called the Hypnosphere.

Hector went for it immediately, because he didn't know what else to do, freeing one of his hands by hanging his mace on a materialized hook.

'What're you gonna do with that?'

"I don't fucking know! You tell me!"

'Uh... just chuck it at it.'

"Really?!"

'Yeah!'

"Okay!"

He spun around, gathered his strength in his throwing arm as he reeled back, and launched the Hypnosphere straight into the worm's body.

Nothing happened.

"Garovel, that didn't do shit!"

'Well, there goes five million troa down the toilet.'

"Why'd you tell me to throw it, then?!"

'Eh, it was a calculated risk. And that thing was ugly, anyway.'

The worm was as big as two houses, now, and it had an obvious mouth and eyes, which were pointed in his direction.

‘Hey, that item over there could be the Bell of Calming.’

It took a second, but Hector saw what he was referring to. A silvery bell with geometric engravings. He grabbed it without hesitation.

‘Try ringing it.’

He did so. Hard. The sound was sharp and clear, certainly loud enough to carry across the whole room.

And he waited for some noticeable change to occur.

But it didn’t.

‘...Huh. I guess it’s not the Bell of Calming, after all.’

“Garovel, that thing is gonna fuckin’ kill us!”

‘Yeah, I’m starting to get a little worried, actually.’”

"1550

Hector didn’t think this was the time for banter. “What’s the next item?!”

‘Ah, I don’t think there is one in this pile. Just a bunch of coins and jewelry.’

“Agh!”

But Hector did know what to do next, at least. He had to get to the second floor.

He launched himself up with a materialized platform and landed with a heavy thud. From there, the treasure was straight ahead, so he bolted for it, able to maintain a full sprint with the vigor that he now felt flowing all throughout his body.

Still, this new level of awareness was difficult to get used to. In a good way, perhaps, but difficult nonetheless. He kept his attention focused firmly on the growing worm even while it was completely out of his line of sight beneath the rock under his feet. He barely even looked at the treasure and just let Garovel go over it for him.

“Anything?!”

‘Mm, nope, sorry.’

Hector wanted to scream.

‘Hey, you could always try that mace you picked up. Didn’t seem all that special to me, but Seyos called it the Moon’s Wrath, so it must have something to it, right?’

Hector hadn’t forgotten. “I’d have to get in close to attack it with this thing,” he said, trying to be calmer, “and I don’t think we want to do that.”

‘Oh yeah. If you get caught in that slime, you might not be able to get out, huh?’

That was his exact concern, yes. He still remembered some of the Rainlords getting swallowed up at the battle by the train. They’d managed to free themselves with an incredibly impressive attack from inside its gut, but Hector doubted that he would be able to pull off the same trick. Or maybe he could. But he didn’t want to put himself in a situation where he had to find out.

Nonetheless, he did take the Moon’s Wrath in hand once again. If he wasn’t able keep the beast away from him, then the mace would be a good option--if not the only option.

The worm was beginning to move now, Hector sensed. Its growth had finally slowed but still not quite stopped, and it was now the size of an office building. He could see a bit of it peeking over the second floor and squirming its way in his direction over the rock.

Time for the third floor, he decided. It was a good thirty or so meters above him, but he appreciated the extra distance between himself and the worm. He could sense it beginning to thrash around down there and climb up.

He went for the treasure pile.

‘Ooh! Grab that thing right there that looks like an orb on a tuning fork!’

He saw it and did so. “Okay, what does it do?”

‘It’s, ah, difficult to explain, but we’ll be able to find some really cool shit with it. It’s like a special kind of metal detector.’

Hector needed a second to find his words. "How will that help me kill the worm?"

'Oh, it won't. It's useless for that.'

Hector sighed angrily."
"1551 -- CLXVII.

((Double Saturday -- Page 1 of 2))

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Seven: 'Bolster thine insight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

After the one called Manuel, his next opponent was his own companion through all of this, Lenos.

Royo did not know whether that was a relief or not, but he tried to take advantage of the opportunity.

And even now, he was reluctant to simply swap intel with Lenos in an entirely candid manner. He knew that Malast was listening, at least, and while Royo didn't think that the so-called Idle God would care about anything surreptitious they might say, he didn't know who else might be listening. He could quite easily imagine a scenario in which Malast was allowing the defeated combatants to observe the proceedings with him.

Somehow.

Without any clear definitions regarding the extent of Malast's power, Royo could only rely on his imagination to protect him from making any missteps in these delicate circumstances. Hopefully, it would suffice.

So he and Lenos attempted to communicate in code, as they had done two days ago and all during their time in Himmekel. They had never quite been sure that someone wasn't just around the corner, listening. The ghosts had been of particular concern there. The goggles allowed Royo to see them, sure, but he didn't know the extent of their capabilities or how easy it was for them to eavesdrop over large distances.

As soon as he made it out of this place, he fully intended to learn everything he could about those troublesome beings. He had a feeling that his next encounter with them wouldn't be nearly so amicable as this one had thus far been.

"Do you really think you can become a god?" said Lenos in Hunese.

Royo paused at that question. "To be honest... no, I do not. But if there is even the slightest possibility that Malast is telling the truth, then I believe the risk is worth it."

"What if you become someone else, like he said?"

"That would be--" Royo stopped himself and squinted at Lenos. "You understood what Malast was saying? You speak--?" And he stopped himself again, because he'd been about to say "Mohssian," but as he thought about it, that wasn't quite right, was it?

"What are you talking about?" said Lenos. "Of course I understood him. He spoke perfect Hunese."

Royo met the other man's gaze evenly. "...Did he, though?"

"Yeah, I..." Lenos seemed to be realizing what Royo just had.

At first, it had been exactly as Lenos had just said. Royo remembered getting the impression that Malast had been speaking Hunese. But when the others started talking to him as well and listening to everything he was saying, Royo somehow began thinking that he was speaking Mohssian.

But Malast hadn't been. The Idle God hadn't spoken either language.

Yet they had all understood him without even noticing it.

Was it some sort of telepathy? Royo didn't think so. He distinctly recalled seeing the man's mouth move when he spoke. But the words. What were the exact words that Malast spoke? What were the sounds that they made?

Royo genuinely didn't know. He recalled the meaning of Malast's words just fine, but the words themselves? They were a blur."

"1551 -- CLXVII.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Seven: 'Bolster thine insight...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

After the one called Manuel, his next opponent was his own companion through all of this, Lenos.

Royo did not know whether that was a relief or not, but he tried to take advantage of the opportunity.

And even now, he was reluctant to simply swap intel with Lenos in an entirely candid manner. He knew that Malast was listening, at least, and while Royo didn't think that the so-called Idle God would care about anything surreptitious they might say, he didn't know who else might be listening. He could quite easily imagine a scenario in which Malast was allowing the defeated combatants to observe the proceedings with him.

Somehow.

Without any clear definitions regarding the extent of Malast's power, Royo could only rely on his imagination to protect him from making any missteps in these delicate circumstances. Hopefully, it would suffice.

So he and Lenos attempted to communicate in code, as they had done two days ago and all during their time in Himmekel. They had never quite been sure that someone wasn't just around the corner, listening. The ghosts had been of particular concern there. The goggles allowed Royo to see them, sure, but he didn't know the extent of their capabilities or how easy it was for them to eavesdrop over large distances.

As soon as he made it out of this place, he fully intended to learn everything he could about those troublesome beings. He had a feeling that his next encounter with them wouldn't be nearly so amicable as this one had thus far been.

"Do you really think you can become a god?" said Lenos in Hunese.

Royo paused at that question. "To be honest... no, I do not. But if there is even the slightest possibility that Malast is telling the truth, then I believe the risk is worth it."

“What if you become someone else, like he said?”

“That would be--” Royo stopped himself and squinted at Lenos. “You understood what Malast was saying? You speak--?” And he stopped himself again, because he’d been about to say “Mohssian,” but as he thought about it, that wasn’t quite right, was it?

“What are you talking about?” said Lenos. “Of course I understood him. He spoke perfect Hunese.”

Royo met the other man’s gaze evenly. “...Did he, though?”

“Yeah, I...” Lenos seemed to be realizing what Royo just had.

At first, it had been exactly as Lenos had just said. Royo remembered getting the impression that Malast had been speaking Hunese. But when the others started talking to him as well and listening to everything he was saying, Royo somehow began thinking that he was speaking Mohssian.

But Malast hadn’t been. The Idle God hadn’t spoken either language.

Yet they had all understood him without even noticing it.

Was it some sort of telepathy? Royo didn’t think so. He distinctly recalled seeing the man’s mouth move when he spoke. But the words. What were the exact words that Malast spoke? What were the sounds that they made?

Royo genuinely didn’t know. He recalled the meaning of Malast’s words just fine, but the words themselves? They were a blur.”

"1552

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

“He really is a god,” said Lenos. The man sounded convinced now.

Royo remained skeptical, however. Just because he did not have an immediate explanation did not mean there wasn’t one.

But he couldn’t deny that, more than ever now, he wanted to believe. If Malast truly was a god, then that might truly have been Secho’s remains in his hands. And Royo might truly be able to...

He shook his head. He needed to focus. The tournament was not yet done, and his most difficult opponents were no doubt still ahead.

"I will support you however I can," said Lenos.

Royo blinked.

"I don't intend to gamble with my own life any more than I have to," said Lenos. "And I don't have aspirations to godhood, so you go right ahead with all of this, if that's what you want. I--"

Royo clasped his hand over the other man's mouth. "Do not say that you surrender. Not just yet, anyway. Help me to examine the treasure in this room, first." He pulled his hand away.

"...Alright." Lenos eyed the glowing pile to Royo's right, then straightened his back and sauntered over to it. "How much do you know about treasure hunting, by the way?"

Royo followed his lead. "A fair amount--though not as much as someone like Kogibur would, I suspect."

"Heh." Lenos didn't remove his eyes from the treasure.

That meager reaction was more than enough of an affirmation for Royo's suspicions. He had been wanting to confirm Lenos' true identity as the infamous thief, Kogibur, and he was glad to have finally found the opportunity.

Royo looked over the treasure himself, but nothing here sparked immediate recognition. He'd gotten very lucky in the first round, he knew.

"I wish we could take everything here," said Lenos.

"We will," said Royo, and he heard Lenos snicker. "But for now, find me something that would assist me in a fight."

"Hmm. In that case, you have your pick of this, this, and this."

Royo examined each item that he'd pointed at but didn't dare touch any of them yet.

The first was a small orb, translucent and very fragile-looking, though if it had survived all this time, then it was probably more durable than it appeared. When he focused, Royo could indeed sense ardor in it, bearing a decidedly unique flow. Swirling like a tiny, contained sulfur storm.

“That one, I believe, is the Sasume.”

The Piercing Eye? The name sounded familiar, but he couldn't place it. “What can it do?”

“According to my information, it will either reveal the innate secrets of the world around you... or drive you mad.” A beat passed. “Or possibly both.”

Royo gave him a look.

“Hey, I wouldn't touch it, but you? I figured, you're already trying to fuse yourself with a god, so maybe you're crazy enough to choose this, too.”

"1553

Royo wanted to argue, but the man had a point. And he actually wasn't ruling out the Piercing Eye yet, either, even as he moved on to the other two. One of them was a metal rack with a pendulum in the center, and the other was a simple blue crystal. “What are these two, then?”

“The Daichigeki and the Tokets'Jigok.”

The Earthshock and the Frozen Hell. Intrigued as he was by those names, Royo didn't like what they implied.

“The Daichigeki is said to be able to rend the ground beneath one's feet and even cause earthquakes powerful enough to bring down buildings. And the Tokets'Jigoku is said to be capable of freezing anything it touches.”

Royo didn't normally hate being right. “...So they would both kill me, is what you are saying.”

“Mm, well, presumably, there is a safe way of using them, but... yeah, they do seem pretty dangerous.”

More than just seemed, Royo felt. In the Undercrust, an earthquake was one of the most deadly and unpredictable events imaginable. An item which could instigate them would certainly be powerful, but to Royo's mind, there existed no conceivable method by which an earthquake could be controlled. Not down here. And he didn't intend to die to falling rocks that he had caused to fall. A more idiotic end, Royo could hardly imagine.

As for the blue crystal, a Hun'Kui trying to harness the power of ice was not much more appealing. Theoretically, of course, it could be very strong, but one misstep while attempting to acquaint himself with the crystal's exact functionality, and that would spell the end for him. It was akin to an insect trying to figure how to properly use pesticide. He had no real knowledge base from which to operate or available safety precautions to take.

"These are both worthless," Royo decided.

"I suppose if they weren't, they wouldn't just be sitting here," said Lenos. "That caped Hun'Sho bastard would probably be using them himself, hmm?"

"Indeed."

"I'm sorry I couldn't be of more assistance." Lenos started grabbing light diamonds in order to stuff them into his unfortunately small pockets.

Royo, however, had not given up. His gaze fell upon the Piercing Eye once again.

The secrets of the world against the threat of going mad? Compared to the other two items, the Eye's risk was at least somewhat appealing.

And the more he thought about it, the more he began to wonder, was that truly the gamble? Could any object really cause someone to go mad? Just like that?

And even if it could do that, would it?

Would it be possible to resist its influence? With a strong enough mind, perhaps? A strong enough will?

Royo saw sense in that logic--and more frighteningly even to himself, he saw potential in it.

It was a risk, of course. There was no doubt about that. But was it a risk worthy of himself? Of his ambition?"

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

Royo hesitated. He hesitated as he had done only a handful of times in his entire life.

This feeling. Terror and uncertainty mixed together. He'd felt it before. Like teetering on the brink of both life and sanity.

He had no way of truly knowing what would happen if he grabbed the Piercing Eye, right now. No way of knowing what would become of him. Of his own mind.

And yet, he was genuinely considering doing it, anyway.

Because he had to. He needed to take a risk here. If his next opponent was one of the supermen, or Seyos perhaps, then what would he do? He had managed to take the one called Manuel by surprise, but he doubted it would be so easy with the Senmurai and the one called Diego. The Senmurai in particular had seemed determined to stop him earlier and would no doubt be on his guard.

And somehow, Royo did not think that his current three artifacts would be enough. The Sword of Hamenszoon and this unnamed glove of strength were both useful enough, but they certainly didn't make him invincible; and he still did not know what power dwelled within the Boots of Karugetti, despite having examined them with his ardor sense.

If he wanted the power of a god, he first required the power to win this tournament.

Yes.

That was the dreadful truth of it, Royo felt. He would be both a coward and a fool not to acknowledge his own weakness when the potential to do something about it was sitting right in front of him.

He grit his teeth and took a deep breath.

He grabbed the Piercing Eye with his bare hand.

The effect was immediate. Not quite pain but something like it. Extreme displeasure. Invasive unsettlement. All throughout his mind. Consuming his world, his thoughts, his memories, his everything. He could feel himself panicking, and involuntarily, he let go of the Eye.

He rushed back into himself all at once, wide-eyed and struggling for breath. On his hands and knees now, he needed time. Time to realize that he was still there. Still present. Still sane.

Well, as much as he had been before, at least.

Lenos was saying something, and Royo tried to say something reassuring, but he wasn't really listening to himself. He was still focused on the Eye. That ordeal had been torture of a manner he had never before experienced.

But he'd seen something in it. The barest glimpse. As if the whole world were a blanket, and for but a moment, he had been granted a look at what was beneath it.

He was going to do it again.

"Step back," said Royo, removing Lenos' hand from his shoulder.

Lenos did not give up, however. "What do you think you're doing?! You can't--!"

Royo shoved him away and grabbed the Eye again."
"1555

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

His brain was marginally more prepared this time. The battering of sensations hit him like a wave, and again, he felt the same panic from before. But he retained enough of presence of mind now to stop his hand from letting go, to override bodily instinct with force of will.

It got worse.

He lost space. He lost time. He was losing himself. But he saw it again. The blanket. The veil. He put his hand forward--or some crackling, imagined representation of his hand, at least--and tried to grasp the veil. It was already partly peeled back. He just had to pull it the rest of the way.

And so he did.

He regained space. He regained time. He regained himself.

But the storm all around him did not cease. Still, it pummeled him, his mind, with so many sensations and emotions and distractions that he couldn't even distinguish them from one another before they were replaced by something else, something newer, better, terrifying, worrying, encouraging, mortifying, ecstatic, dull, soul-crushing--

Endless.

It was folly to engage with it. He had to keep himself. Himself. His own mind. His own focus. These emotions were not his own. They were external. They were sorcery. Witchcraft. Whatever. It didn't matter what they were. They didn't matter. Only he mattered.

Him and the world around him. The real world.

And through it all, the swirling and somehow visible mayhem of emotions, he could see what he wanted to see.

Lenos, standing right next to him.

But of course, his name was not truly Lenos. And it was not Kogibur, either. The man didn't have a name. At least, not one that was given to him by his mother. Because the man had never known his mother. Or his father, for that matter. He'd been an orphan of the Higher West Layer, as Royo himself had been. He had been treated with contempt in the community home in which he had grown up. He had been lastingly scarred by that experience, to the point of trusting none but himself. And a woman. In his adolescence. A woman who then betrayed him for money.

It could be no surprise, then, that Lenos did not fully trust Royo now. And that was not mere suspicion on Royo's part. He knew that Lenos had reservations about him. He could see it, as clearly as he could see the man's face.

But he could also see that Lenos did trust him a little. Which was more than Royo would have expected, quite frankly.

And it didn't stop. Royo could see still more. Wavering and fleeting feelings, hovering around Lenos, whispering about his soul and his past. A job he'd taken. A mentor he'd had. Threads of his life woven together into a grand web that was as easy to navigate as it was to think. Royo had only to look where he wanted, consider what he wanted, and Lenos' knowledge was Royo's knowledge."

"1556

"Are you sure you're okay?" said Lenos through the howling storm. His voice sounded perfectly calm, apparently not bothered to be standing in the midst of a hellish vortex.

Royo was very much not sure that he was okay, however. He was beginning to feel a kind of exhaustion he had never felt before. His head was tired, though the rest of his body was not. It wasn't quite dizziness or light-headedness, exactly.

He decided to put the Eye back down again.

The storm dissipated almost immediately, as did the web of knowledge around Lenos.

Royo was beginning to understand how it worked. "I am fine," he finally said, trying not to sound haggard. "Can you find something for me to carry this item in?"

"Ah, okay, let me have a look around."

Royo tried wrapping his green scarf around the Eye before picking it up again, but as he expected, it did nothing to prevent the object's power from activating.

Royo let Lenos search in silence. He focused on controlling his breathing as he tried to take mental stock of himself.

He was fairly certain that he was still sane. And his memories--there were no notable gaps, as far as he could tell. Childhood, adolescence, adulthood. All there.

And perhaps most importantly, he still felt the same. Confidence bordering on arrogance? Check. Ambition that approached delusional psychosis? Yeah, that was there, too.

He supposed his gamble had paid off, after all.

It had been a while since he'd felt such a strong sense of relief.

Now all that was left to do was begin testing the limits of the Eye. Its usage obviously took an exhaustive toll, so it would be best if he could somehow determine the most efficient duration to keep it active, he felt. And of course, he still wanted to know exactly how informative the Eye could be. Was it only personal histories? Or was there--?

"Eleyo!"

A gunshot rang out, and Royo turned to see Seyos there, already attacking the both of them with giant red hands.

Royo swiped the Eye and dove out of the way, only for the hand to follow him and clobber him square in the chest. The impact added to his momentum and sent him toppling over himself through the air until he hit the ground and skidded up against a wall.

The wind was knocked out of him, and possibly a rib was broken, but there was no time to worry about that, he knew. The hand was still pursuing him.

He activated the Sword of Hamenszoon and rolled out of the way.

The hand stopped in midair, suddenly not knowing where to go.

This invisible respite wouldn't last long, though. He had to make the most of it. The Piercing Eye was already active, and though the combination of the Sword's visual effects added to the Eye's created just about the most confusing thing Royo had ever looked at, his only concern right now was Seyos. And in that regard, the Eye was not letting him down."

"1557

((Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 2))

Former royalty among the Hun'Sho. Scarred eternally by what the Hun'Kui had done to his people. Transformed them. Into worms? The Sludge Sickness.

Royo was able to perceive that much in an instant, but there was much more there--darker thoughts, dwelling more deeply within. But Royo didn't need to know the man's life story, right now. He needed to know how to kill him.

And so the Eye revealed it to him.

A core in his chest. Seyos' heart.

Royo didn't wait. He pulled his pistol, aimed for it, and fired.

He was off the target, though. At this distance, the core was too small of an object to hit, and the flaming bullet instead pierced Seyos' right lung.

And Royo knew that, somehow. The Eye was telling him.

He didn't have time to be impressed, though. He'd given away his position with that gunshot. He bolted left as a giant hand crashed down on the spot where he'd just been standing.

The hand. Royo's gaze lingered on it long enough for the Eye to reveal its nature to him.

One of the Fists of Enkir. A gloved artifact imbued with the properties of a magma golem. It could stretch and even grow far beyond its perceived physical size. It also burned to the touch--and would have to Royo, if Hun'Kui weren't so resilient to heat. Crafted 1,527 years ago by Arigas, whoever that was.

Interesting, Royo thought as he ran.

But if it worked on the Fists, then wait. Could it also...?

He looked at his own boots. The Boots of Karugetti.

They maintained their momentum in accordance with the wearer's will. Crafted 363 years ago by Arkos.

A much shorter and simpler description than the Fists, and in the heat of the moment, Royo was having trouble conceptualizing what it meant.

One of the hands had Lenos in its grip now, he noticed, and the other was pursuing him again. The Sword's invisibility had faded.

Royo activated its illusion power. Three copies of himself shot off in separate directions, mimicking his same running posture. He made sure to zigzag to add to the confusion, then aimed his gun again and fired. This time, it hit exactly where he wanted to, as the target was nearer and larger.

The hand that had Lenos exploded at the wrist when the bullet cut through it, and Lenos was free again. The man fell to the ground in a crumpled heap, however, not moving.

Royo pulled the trigger two more times, aiming for Seyos himself again, but there was some sort of shield there, now. The Shield of Hamenszoon, the Piercing Eye told him.

An artifact capable of absorbing any projectile under a weight of seventy grams. Crafted 792 years ago by Hamenszoon.

Royo growled to himself as the Sword's copies faded. He would have to reload soon, and he didn't have that many bullets left.

He needed to get in close. If he could do that, he could end this in an instant."

"1558

((Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 2))

Royo activated the Sword again and tried to circle around to Seyos' backside.

Seyos pulled out a pair of artifacts, and Royo identified them immediately.

The Twin Blades of Boros. Small swords which were capable of guiding even an amateur swordsman's hand toward the vital points of his desired opponent. Exceptionally deadly at close range. Crafted 33 years ago by Luann.

With that knowledge, Royo backed off again and sent out an extra wave of copies.

Where was he keeping all these damn things?

The Deceiver's Cloak. An artifact which allowed access to several small pocket dimensions. Crafted 4,612 years ago by Skapa.

Ah.

He didn't want to fire his pistol again and give away his position. At the moment, the best course of action to his mind was to wait for the Sword's invisibility to recharge. It would only take a few minutes, if he could hold out that long.

He seemed to be relatively safe as long as he kept multiple copies afoot. Running around the room in circles was especially helpful in that regard, because all of his copies mimicked his behavior, and by choosing the correct pressure point on the Sword, Royo was able to have as many as eight of himself all running counterclockwise around Seyos.

It was clearly pissing Seyos off as well, which was a nice bonus.

Royo took the opportunity to examine the Sword. While he already had a working knowledge of it, he wanted to be sure he hadn't missed anything.

The Sword of Hamenszoon. An artifact capable of producing illusions based on the wielder. Crafted 794 years ago by Hamenszoon.

Huh. Surprisingly uninformative.

Royo tried looking harder, wanting the Eye to provide him more detail.

The Eye did so, spelling out the exact function of each one of the Sword's pressure points, as well as informing him that they required manipulable soul power to do so. And as Royo had already discovered, seven copies was indeed the maximum number of illusions that the Sword could produce at one time.

The Piercing Eye was even so generous as to tell him the precise amount of time remaining before the invisibility was fully recharged. One minute, forty-eight seconds, and counting.

That was better. Royo was satisfied.

Movement from Seyos drew Royo's attention again, and he was ready to identify the next artifact.

It was a small cube, small enough to fit in Seyos' molten palm.

The Box of Perdition, the Eye told him. An artifact capable of producing explosions with a range of up to 750 meters. Crafted--

What?

Royo skipped the last part and instead pushed for more detail.

The Box had to be set on a timer with as little as fifteen seconds or as long as fifteen minutes. The blast would not harm the box itself but could still produce a force of up to five tons.

This was a very large problem.

Royo knew he couldn't wait any longer and went on the offensive. All seven clones of himself followed suit, converging on Seyos simultaneously."

"1559

One of the illusions disappeared to a pointless attack from Seyos, and Royo caught a glimpse of the jewel around Seyos' neck.

The Pendant of Unso. An artifact capable of teleporting the wearer to a set of predetermined locations. Crafted 1,341 years ago by Unso.

Royo understood as well as he could in the split second he had to perceive it. Seyos meant to activate the Box and teleport to safety.

That wasn't going to happen.

Royo went for the Pendant first but found the Shield of Hamenszoon in the way. That was fine. Royo let go of his pistol, knowing it would be unnecessary at this range, and grabbed the Shield with his gloved hand. He had still yet to examine that glove, but he knew its power well enough.

He put all his strength into his grip, and his fingers dug into the Shield like teeth into flesh. The Shield cracked and snapped in two.

Seyos looked surprised, and Royo took the opening to go straight for the man's heart. Seyos jolted away from him, though, and then they were struggling at such close range that they were nearly wrestling.

One of the Twin Blades of Boros arose with Seyos' left hand, and Royo only just managed to twist himself out its path before it could plunge into his own heart. He still received a long gash across his chest, which was most certainly painful but not enough so to make him lose focus.

The Deceiver's Cloak swirled as Seyos did, obscuring Royo's vision. Royo sent out another fresh wave of the Sword's copies and dove to the side. A slash from another Twin Blade vanished one of the illusions, and Royo saw another opening. His glove found Seyos' left arm and crushed it. One of the Twin Blades dropped from his grip, but the Hun'Sho did not so much as flinch. The other Twin Blade came straight for Royo's neck and narrowly broke upon the Sword of Hamenszoon--so narrowly, in fact, that Royo felt a shallow cut below his left ear.

Royo shoved himself forward and slammed his body into Seyos, knocking him off balance. The Cloak swirled again, but Royo still roughly knew where the man's neck was and went for it. Pressing through the Cloak, he found it with his glove.

He crushed it without hesitation.

Seyos staggered back but didn't fall. He was still moving, though not normally. The one remaining Twin Blade swung vainly at thin air, and Seyos' molten head sagged grotesquely to one side, apparently too heavy for his broken neck.

The fight was more or less over now, it seemed. There was no point in prolonging things, Royo felt.

He sent one more wave of illusions from the Sword and approached Seyos from the side. He stabbed the man through the chest and then wrenched it open in order to dig into Seyos' body with his glove.

There it was. The core.

Seyos said something incomprehensible, more wheezing than words.

Royo barely noticed. He crushed the core, too."

"1560 -- CLXVIII.

Immediately, the entire world around him shifted.

At first, he thought it was Malast teleporting him again, but when he saw the raw vortex around Seyos suddenly grow to ten times its previous intensity, Royo realized this was the work of the Piercing Eye.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Eight: 'Look erstwhile and take heed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Seyos' body barely had the opportunity to go limp before time itself seemed to slow. The body caught in midair, scarcely falling at all, and Royo simply watched.

His own movements were slowed as well, apparently, though his mind was not.

What was the Eye doing? He'd tucked it into the belt around his waist earlier and now would've liked to remove it, but at the speed his hand was going, it seemed like it would take a good ten minutes to make the journey.

Was it trying to show him something? To help him understand something?

He had just killed a man. It was not likely that the timing of this was coincidental.

He tried to observe Seyos more closely. The dying Hun'Sho man was like a volcano. And not because of his magma body. Rather, because of the enormous output of raw emotion and information. There was so much of it there now, shooting out of his body in all directions.

Perhaps the Piercing Eye was trying to give him time to observe it all.

Yes, that must have been it, Royo figured. The Eye hadn't actually slowed time itself, merely his perception of it.

Wonderful. Now he was going to be stuck here, watching this bastard die in slow motion while he waited for his own hand to remove the Piercing Eye and free himself.

Royo didn't care about anything he was seeing. He didn't want to know more about Seyos.

But there wasn't much else to do.

Ah. The glove. The object that was responsible for killing Seyos. Royo still didn't even know if it had a name, as he had yet to examine it with the Eye.

The Demon's Grip, the Eye told him. A gloved artifact capable of increasing the wearer's strength by a factor of up to one hundred thousand. Crafted 122 years ago by Morgunov.

Royo's eyes might have widened if he could move them that quickly. He pressed the Eye for greater detail.

An object which requires precision training in order to bring out its full potential.

That was all the information the Eye had for him. He would've liked to know more about Morgunov, as he certainly recognized the name, but the Piercing Eye didn't work that way, it seemed.

So he'd finally begun to discover its limitations. He had started to wonder if the Eye simply didn't have any.

Royo observed the progress of his hand toward the Eye.

Still about nine-tenths of the way to go.

He wanted to sigh.

He also wanted to look around and check up on the Box of Perdition, but that would've required turning his head.

Fine.

He observed the still-falling Seyos."

"1560 -- CLXVIII.

Immediately, the entire world around him shifted.

At first, he thought it was Malast teleporting him again, but when he saw the raw vortex around Seyos suddenly grow to ten times its previous intensity, Royo realized this was the work of the Piercing Eye.

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Eight: 'Look erstwhile and take heed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Seyos' body barely had the opportunity to go limp before time itself seemed to slow. The body caught in midair, scarcely falling at all, and Royo simply watched.

His own movements were slowed as well, apparently, though his mind was not.

What was the Eye doing? He'd tucked it into the belt around his waist earlier and now would've liked to remove it, but at the speed his hand was going, it seemed like it would take a good ten minutes to make the journey.

Was it trying to show him something? To help him understand something?

He had just killed a man. It was not likely that the timing of this was coincidental.

He tried to observe Seyos more closely. The dying Hun'Sho man was like a volcano. And not because of his magma body. Rather, because of the enormous output of raw emotion and information. There was so much of it there now, shooting out of his body in all directions.

Perhaps the Piercing Eye was trying to give him time to observe it all.

Yes, that must have been it, Royo figured. The Eye hadn't actually slowed time itself, merely his perception of it.

Wonderful. Now he was going to be stuck here, watching this bastard die in slow motion while he waited for his own hand to remove the Piercing Eye and free himself.

Royo didn't care about anything he was seeing. He didn't want to know more about Seyos.

But there wasn't much else to do.

Ah. The glove. The object that was responsible for killing Seyos. Royo still didn't even know if it had a name, as he had yet to examine it with the Eye.

The Demon's Grip, the Eye told him. A gloved artifact capable of increasing the wearer's strength by a factor of up to one hundred thousand. Crafted 122 years ago by Morgunov.

Royo's eyes might have widened if he could move them that quickly.

He pressed the Eye for greater detail.

An object which requires precision training in order to bring out its full potential.

That was all the information the Eye had for him. He would've liked to know more about Morgunov, as he certainly recognized the name, but the Piercing Eye didn't work that way, it seemed.

So he'd finally begun to discover its limitations. He had started to wonder if the Eye simply didn't have any.

Royo observed the progress of his hand toward the Eye.

Still about nine-tenths of the way to go.

He wanted to sigh.

He also wanted to look around and check up on the Box of Perdition, but that would've required turning his head.

Fine.

He observed the still-falling Seyos."

"1561

((Double Saturday -- Page 1 of 2))

There was so much information there that Royo wasn't even sure where to begin.

He supposed that it did make him curious, though. What was all of this information, exactly? Just the man's emotions? No, it couldn't be. Dying wasn't that complex, was it?

Perhaps it was. Especially for an immortal Hun'Sho.

Royo wanted to smile.

He chose the first "thing" that his eyes stopped on and tried to unpack it.

A memory, it seemed to be. Of what? What was this color? Green? It was so bright. Royo hadn't seen much of it in his lifetime, certainly not in shades like this. Plants, he supposed they were.

It must have been the surface. He'd read enough about it. So Seyos had been to the surface, had he? Bastard. A part of Royo had always wanted to go there, ever since he was a child, but he knew it was all but impossible for a Hun'Kui. The environment there was deadly.

Maybe it wouldn't be impossible for a god, though. Now there was a thought.

Royo moved on to the next memory without even delving further into that one. There were so many. He just wanted to find something interesting. Maybe even something informative. With as long as this asshole had been alive, he must have known all sorts of useful things, right? It only made sense.

He wondered if there was some easier way to navigate through everything than just picking whatever caught his eye. He tried to press the Eye for something more. Something clearer.

The Eye provided.

The memories became more distinct to him. Not visually, perhaps, but still distinct nonetheless. Only so much of the Eye's perception was visible. All of this information streaming into his mind was not like text popping up in midair waiting for him to read it. Rather, it simply appeared in his head, describing itself to him in a manner similar to--but thankfully still distinguishable from--his very own thoughts.

And all of these memories became linked to one another along an apparent timeline. Royo was able to navigate his way back all the way to the beginning.

It took a while.

There were noticeable gaps as well, which Royo supposed made sense. Memories became clouded and lost over time. It was only human to forget things. He had begun thinking that Hun'Sho simply weren't human, but perhaps they were, after all.

There it was. The oldest memory.

It was a face. And not that of a Hun'Sho or a Hun'Kui, but of a surface-dweller.

They all looked more or less alike to Royo, but he could at least tell that this one was male and elderly. The old man was saying something, but Seyos apparently couldn't understand him, so neither could Royo.

Royo demanded more detail.

The Eye provided.

The old man in the memory was Seyos' father, Avaross. An incarnation of Avar.

The linked memories were beginning to make more sense to Royo, arriving in his perception as a merged group of information rather than separate pieces.

This man was the father of the first generation of Hun'Sho. A generation of which Seyos had been a member."

"1562

((Double Saturday -- Page 2 of 2))

Avaross gave everything to his children. He spent a century raising them, teaching them, placing all of his hopes upon them.

And Royo began to see...

A fledgling Hun'Sho. A boy by any standard. But with an unparalleled father.

Avaross inspires them all. He instills in them principles of morality. Of goodness. Hope. Prosperity. And of course, peace. He teaches them of an ideal world. One which He wants their help in building. That is why He has made them the way they are. That is why He granted them immortality.

The boy can only admire Him. Avaross is greatness personified, loving them all in equal measure, giving them all equal attention.

Under His guidance, the Hun'Sho flourish. Their numbers grow quickly at first, as Avaross instructs them in how to have children. New incarnations of themselves. Identical in every physical aspect, yet still carrying a new soul and new ardor. Male or female, every Hun'Sho is able to bring life into the world.

In time, this strikes the boy as strange. He comes to learn of the surface world and the people there. Of the men and women there. He decides to ask his father about why He decided to give the Hun'Sho two genders.

"With you, my beloved children, I have done my best to replicate the civilizational successes of humanity as I have witnessed them--and likewise, to avoid the failures. I do not believe that either gender is one of those failures."

The boy is not sure he understands, but it matters little. There is much yet to learn, and he has eternity to do so.

They work hard, all of his brethren. They build. They follow Avaross' every command, listen to His every word and desire. They become His ideal people. And the world they create for themselves is good.

For a time.

Father begins to change. His behavior. His actions. He grows impatient with them, at times. Not as kind as He once was. More and more, He seems weary, yet when they ask, He says nothing is wrong. He says the world is wonderful. He says they have nearly achieved His ideal.

Nearly achieved. Nearly. Ever nearly.

The boy and his kin continue onward, undeterred. One day, that ideal WILL be achieved. They are immortal. It is inevitable. One day. And then Father will smile again. Father will be happy again.

But that is not what happens.

Instead, Father creates the Hun'Kui.

They are different. So very different. Each of them is distinguishable in their physicality. None can reproduce independently. They are much more like the poor wretches of the surface than the Hun'Sho are.

The boy pities the Hun'Kui. But he understands them, as do the other Hun'Sho. He understands that Father has created these ashen beings so that the Hun'Sho can guide them to their own level of greatness--and in so doing, perhaps even achieve still higher greatness as well.

Then the Hun'Sho will be more like Father than ever before."
"1563

The boy does as much as he can. He befriends as many Hun'Kui as he can. Many of them are pleasant. Many of them are amusing.

But they have so little potential. They are so primitive. It is difficult to connect with them on anything other than the most superficial of subject matter.

They are wild. They are impulsive. They are little better than animals, driven almost entirely by their instincts. Civilizing them will take many, many years, the boy feels.

But that, too, is fine. For the Hun'Sho are blessed with immortality. However long is required, the deed will be done.

And yet...

Father spends so much time with the Hun'Kui. They are constantly demanding his attention, constantly in desperate need of it. Of course they are. They cannot help themselves. They are as pitiful as newborn babies and even slower to learn. Entire generations of Hun'Kui come and go, making the same essential mistakes their entire lives.

So why does Father seem to enjoy their company so much more? Why does He forgive and forget their transgressions so easily? This was not how He raised the Hun'Sho. He was strict. He was instructive. He was attentive. Yet now He is none of those things. Now He spends almost all of His time with the Hun'Kui, not even bothering to teach them anything. He simply idles among them, which surely only serves to reinforce the Hun'Kui's own problem of idleness, no?

Slowly, it is all falling apart. The boy sees it, day by day. The world that he and his brethren have built under Father's guidance--it is beginning to rot. Progress is being lost. Potential is being lost.

The boy does not know what to do. This is when Father would normally encourage him or teach him something new, something useful and helpful to everyone. But Father is not doing that. Father is too busy attending to the Hun'Kui.

Their work is failing. They cannot seem to help the Hun'Kui. They are outnumbered so greatly. The Hun'Kui multiply at such a rate that the Hun'Sho cannot keep up. It is too much work, trying to help all of them.

The boy tells Father of these concerns.

But Father does nothing. He says only to keep trying.

It makes so little sense. Did He not design the Hun'Sho to achieve His ideal? Why, then, does the good behavior of the Hun'Sho go unrewarded? Why does the bad behavior of the Hun'Kui always seem to earn Father's attention? His affection, even?

The boy does not understand. Were the Hun'Sho not Father's favorite? How could that be? They work so much harder than the Hun'Kui. They try every day to better themselves, to follow Father's teachings.

Why must this feel so painful? Even the Hun'Kui, with all of Father's attention, seem to be largely miserable. There are so many of them in need, and they cannot all bask in the glory of Father's presence simultaneously.

The boy is not sure for how much longer he can withstand it. And his peers, the other Guong, are all expressing similar sentiments.

But what can be done? This is Father's will, no?"
"1564

((Double Monday -- Page 1 of 2))

Their world is becoming a terrible place. Full of stagnation and sickness and suffering. This cannot be the ideal which Father desired.

Then, one day, when the boy's hope is just about at its end, another among the Hun'Sho takes decisive action.

His name is Torosh. He is the boy's peer, one of the original generation, though some are now considering him their leader, the greatest among the Guong.

Torosh begins imprisoning Hun'Kui. He is even talking of executing some of them, though only those who have been found guilty of particularly heinous crimes.

Where before, the Hun'Sho had always deferred to Father's ever-forgiving judgment, Torosh is going against Him. Torosh speaks at length to the rest of them about his decision.

"If we are to help the Hun'Kui, truly help them, then we cannot continue as we have been. While we may have all the time we desire to achieve our goals, the Hun'Kui do not. It is not a mercy or a kindness to take a gentle approach. Order must be reestablished if we are to have any hope of making progress again."

The boy agrees, for the most part, but he fears going against Father. He does not think it wise. And so he does not join Torosh in making this decision. The boy buries such thoughts and does as he has always done. He follows Father's orders.

As do most of the Hun'Sho. Torosh's actions have divided them.

When Father learns of what Torosh and the others are doing, He is not angry. But he is not pleased, either. He is eerily calm.

"Freedom is integral to the goal of an ideal world," Father tells them. "That you do not understand this after all this time, is my failing, I suppose. Forgive me, my children."

Father frees their prisoners. And then He imprisons Torosh and his followers, instead.

The boy is more fearful than ever now. But he is glad that he did not disobey Father.

As time goes on, the boy becomes increasingly convinced that Torosh was right. The suffering of the Hun'Kui continues, unabated. And their suffering becomes the Hun'Sho's suffering. Even if the ashen wretches bring most of it upon themselves, it is painful to observe it every day like this.

Senseless. Senseless and horrific.

The boy gives up. There is no point to this struggle. He decides to stop worrying and simply do as he is told. It is better this way. It is better to not care. Caring only brings disappointment and sorrow and pain. Allowing himself to become numb to it all is the only real solution, he realizes.

Perhaps this is Father's true lesson. That suffering is endless and hoping for anything better is an exercise in futility.

Then, a man arrives.

No.

Not just a man. Something more. Father's equal.

The way they speak to one another. The way they pay each other respect. And most of all, the way they quarrel. Rarely, has the boy ever seen Father get so angry as when He speaks to this man."

"1565

((Double Monday -- Page 2 of 2))

The boy is curious for the first time in a long time. He wishes to know more of this person. He decides to ask.

"I have no name, little one. For I am He Who Is Not."

"Why have you come here?" the boy asks.

"I have always been here. I know your struggle, young Seyos. I know you feel lost. Tell me. Do you believe Avaross is to blame for your misery and that of your kin?"

The boy does not know what to say. He does not wish to lie. But he does not truly know if he blames Father. Perhaps a part of him does, even if he had not allowed himself to acknowledge it all this time.

"...You love Avaross, even now?"

That, at least, the boy can answer. "Yes, of course I do. He is my father."

"You are a good son."

The boy does not know what to think or feel. Somehow, this man reminds him of how Father used to be. There is... a warmth there that the boy has not felt in a very long time.

"I will try to help you if I can."

But just as quickly as the man had arrived, He Who Is Not is gone again.

The boy is more conflicted than ever. More confused than ever. He wants to leave, to travel and learn more of He Who Is Not, but the boy is scared.

So he stays.

And things continue to worsen. The Hun'Kui do not organize. Or rather, they cannot. Whenever they try, others among them arrive to rob and murder them, to take from those who have worked hard for what they have. It is not just.

Yet Father continues trying to change the Hun'Kui's very nature with words alone. Even though He was the one who made them that way. He wants them to choose to do the right thing on their own. He wants them to be moral, as the Hun'Sho are moral.

Or does He? The boy does not truly know anymore. Avaross is a mystery to him now.

But it does not matter. The boy is powerless to do anything. This is the domain of Avaross and none may go against His will.

And then it happens.

Avaross disappears.

There was no warning. No trace left behind. He is simply gone.

And no one knows what to do.

The Hun'Kui panic. And so do the Hun'Sho, though in a more reserved manner. Without guidance or protection, the world is suddenly much more terrifying.

Soon, however, a man wrapped entirely in bandages arrives. He does not speak, but he carries a message for the Hun'Sho and Hun'Kui.

A message from He Who Is Not.

"You are now free," it reads. "Do as you will, and have will as you do it. All that I can do for you, I have now done. Goodbye."

"1566

Many more years pass. Torosh and his followers are freed during this time. They are as confused as everyone else when they learn what has happened, but Torosh is able to galvanize the Hun'Sho and help guide the Hun'Kui toward order. It is difficult, because the ashen wretches have much to learn and are often unwilling and even violent.

A firmer hand is required. The Hun'Sho are in agreement. It may have been against the wishes of the Avaross whom they most recently remember, but they do not believe it would be against those of the Avaross whom they remember raising them.

So they subjugate the Hun'Kui by force. It is a miserable process. Grueling and often bloody. But the boy does not see hope in the alternative. Letting the Hun'Kui remain free to bring ruin upon themselves does not strike him as wise.

The boy cannot hold slaves himself, however. He finds it too distasteful, even if he understands his kin's logic and does not think any less of them. He cannot wholly disregard the shadow of Avaross, as the others seem to.

Instead, after a semblance of structure and hope for peace has been achieved, the boy decides to travel. He believes there is much to be learned, elsewhere in the world.

And indeed, there is.

He learns of other gods. He learns of their sudden absence.

And perhaps most importantly, he learns the tales of He Who Is Not. The God of All That Is Not. The Void. And the many other names. It is confusing, because each culture calls Him something else. It seems as though He never identified Himself properly.

From all the tales of different gods that the boy hears, the God of All That Is Not seems to be the most mischievous among them. They always tell of how He interferes in the other gods' plans, disrupting their efforts, playing pranks on them. Some even describe Him as evil-- or as Evil itself.

But the boy does not think so. He wishes that he could meet the God of All That is Not again, but the one thing he learns definitively from all of these tales is that He is gone.

All of the gods, the Primordials, have left. The God of All That Is Not has removed them from this world, save one.

Malast. The Idle God. The God of the Underworld.

The boy seeks Him out, this remaining god.

It takes a very, very long time. Thousands of years, even.

The boy becomes a thief along the way, because from all the tales he has heard, there is only one method for acquiring Malast's attention. Stealing--or at least, attempting to steal--the Urn of Growth.

The boy worries. It is terribly dangerous, of course. No one in the tales survives Malast's wrath. They all die in the attempt. But the boy has confidence in his skill. He has acquired several useful artifacts during his journey, artifacts which he has stolen from the irresponsible and undeserving. The Staff and Pendant of Unso, in particular."

"1567

((Double Wednesday -- Page 1 of 2))

He succeeds. He gets away with the Urn. But he dares not open it. He learned much of the fearsome power that magical artifacts such as this can hold. And of course, this was never his objective, either. His wish was to speak with Malast without being instantly turned to dust by a god's wrath.

So the boy begins planning.

After all these years, he returns to his kin, to his home. And he is welcomed into a land of tremendous prosperity. He is not surprised. He has heard the whispers of the Hun'Sho all over the world, the hushed tales of their magnificence and power, both feared and desired.

The boy could not be prouder. He has never felt such unity with his kin as he does now. It is entirely wonderful. And he is all the more pleased when they welcome him home--as they should, for he has brought many, many gifts with him.

He becomes a Guong once more and strives to help the Hun'Sho reach still greater heights of prosperity.

There are so many Hun'Sho now. And so many more Hun'Kui. But these are not problems, as they once would have been. Infrastructure and order have turned these into blessings. Into potential.

He takes his subjects and builds a city. Himmestat. It is an enormous undertaking, and he has more work than he knows what to do with, more problems than he knows how to fix, but he never forgets his plan. He never forgets his objective to one day meet the only remaining god in the world.

The other Guong are now being difficult. The love he once felt for them has faded rather quickly. They are jealous of all that he has. Even with as much as he has shared, they still desire more. They seem to think him undeserving of his riches--and of his followers, too. The other Guong attribute Himmestat's success not to his actions but to those of his immediate subordinates.

This bothers him. Because he knows that there is more truth in it than he would care to admit. Torveis, in particular, is very competent and personable. Even the Hun'Kui seem to show genuine affection for him. And the boy hears the whispers, the surreptitious talk of wanting Torveis to become Himmestat's new Guong.

They don't understand. But he will show them.

He builds a vault. The greatest vault in all the world. Himmekel. Here, he will finally be able to set the stage for his meeting with Malast. And protect that which is his, as well.

It takes many years, but he manages it. He uses a few of Rathmore's Tools to help get the job done and even builds a network, connecting Himmekel with distant treasure troves that he had created or found during his travels.

So much work. All culminating to this. The Vault of Paradise.

And finally, after all is prepared, he spreads the rumor. The rumor that the Urn of Growth is hidden away in Himmekel.

Sure enough, Malast arrives, looking for it."

((Double Wednesday -- Page 2 of 2))

At first, the boy is careful not to present himself directly before the god. In time, however, he sees that Malast is not at all what he had expected.

Malast does not wish to kill him. Malast merely wants the Urn back. The boy does not seem to concern or interest him in the slightest.

Yet the Idle God does not leave. He merely sits there, in a chair of stone. The boy has never seen him get up from it. Even when Malast first appeared, He had already been sitting in it. The boy does not understand. But then, such is the mysterious power of a god, he supposes.

He asks Malast many questions, wanting to get to know the God of the Underworld better, but it is a difficult process. Malast hardly engages with him at all. The only subject that is able to spark any continual semblance of interest is that of the other gods. The Primordials.

The boy is immensely curious as to where they have all gone and why, exactly. In the end, however, Malast says that He does not know, but the boy is not sure he believes that. Malast seems to know many things that He should not, yet He never explains how. It is quite frustrating, but what is to be done about it? The man is a god, and the boy is not.

The Urn of Growth, he eventually learns, could change that. He begs Malast to grant it to him, but the Idle God refuses.

"It would turn you to dust," He says.

The boy is increasingly infuriated by this. If he could only become a god, he thinks, then it would prove his greatness beyond doubt to the other Guong. To Torosh, especially. But no matter what the boy tries or does, Malast continues to refuse him.

And then the Surajj'Byok arrives. The Sludge Sickness.

The Hun'Kui have discovered a terrible weapon to use against the Hun'Sho and are wielding it with malevolent abandon. So many of the boy's kin are transformed into abominations of nature. Reckless killing machines. Chaos and evil made flesh.

He watches some of the Hun'Kui laugh with demonic madness as the world crumbles around them.

There is nothing worse imaginable, to his mind. He begs Malast for help. He begs Malast for the power of a god, the power to perhaps save his people.

But the Idle God remains exactly so.

This is the Apocalypse of the Hun'Sho.

Himmekel is their only salvation. Without it, everyone in Himmestat would have surely perished. Instead, a few hundred are able to survive.

But the world is forever changed now. The Hun'Sho are on the brink of extinction.

Everything else is meaningless. His squabbles with the other Guong. His treasure. His jealousy. They are all petty nonsense. Only the survival of his kin matters now.

So they hide. They remain quiet. And do nothing. They are immortal, after all. They can be as patient as they like. A time of revival will surely come, if they can simply endure."

"1569

The boy takes advantage of the many tools at his disposal to go out and search for other Hun'Sho in secret. Surely, he is not the only Guong who has survived. Indeed, there are others, though they are few, as expected.

And they are broken. They are terrified, just as he is. Some refuse even to speak to him, having grown so paranoid. They do not seem to understand the cause of the Sludge Sickness and think it may be some sort of divine punishment for betraying Avaross' wishes all those years ago.

Hope is thinner than ever. Even Torosh is wallowing in his failure.

The boy does not know what to do. When he returns to Himmekel, he finds that his subjects do not believe in him any longer. They refuse to acknowledge him as Guong.

Fine.

He does not need them to love him back. He does not need them to cooperate willingly. So the boy disappears from their lives and hides himself away. He uses his tools to watch them, to protect them, to guide them, and yes, to occasionally coerce them. There is too much for him to do alone. His people require more power. More treasure. More magic. And they must help him acquire it.

A delicate balance is achieved in Himmekel. He is all but forgotten there. Only the oldest Hun'Sho remember him now. Only they know of his protection and intention. But that is enough. He is not interested in being Guong again. He is not sure he could even do the job.

Malast has deemed him unsuitable, and perhaps there is truth in that. The boy has been thinking so for quite a while. He wants to do something. He wants to revitalize his people. But how can he? When he has already failed them so thoroughly and repeatedly? What can he do on his own? Gather treasure? To what end? What hope is left, truly?

He does not know the answers to these questions. He does not know how or why he continues on in this way.

He visits the Prime Archivers in Luugh. They are surprised to encounter a living Hun'Sho and are accommodating to him. He uses their resources to conduct his own research into the Primordials and into godhood.

It is a very slow process. He has difficulty with their written languages. The Prime Archivers allow him to come and go as he pleases. He makes sure to reward them for their help.

And then, Ettol appears in Himmekel.

The boy is terrified. Everything will begin to change now. He knows that Ettol's arrival will bring more outsiders to them. His kin are in danger again. He must take drastic action. Because...

Because he knew that...

He knew...

He knew...?

He...?

The vision faltered. Royo found himself standing exactly where he had been previously, observing the slowed demise of Seyos.

He had so many questions--chief among them being, what in the world had just happened?

He had gotten a broad view of Seyos' entire life, of course. That much was obvious. What was less apparent, however, was why it had ended so abruptly. It hadn't felt finished. It felt like it just broke down.

And right after Ettol's introduction."

"1570

Everything was beginning to feel strange now. Royo could sense a shivering change in his slowed perception. And it was slight, but he thought he could see a difference in the speed of everything. His hand was moving more quickly than it had been before. Seyos was falling faster. The information was spilling out of him more rapidly.

It was all still incredibly slow, just not as slow as it was.

And that suggested to Royo that this little slowdown event was going to end soon. Maybe he wouldn't even need to wait for his hand to reach the Piercing Eye. The whole ordeal could break down at any moment.

Before the vision he'd just had, he would've considered that a good thing, but now he wasn't so sure. Seyos was a wellspring of knowledge. There was still so much that Royo could see and learn here.

And perhaps, in spite of himself, he hated Seyos a little bit less now. Not enough to regret killing him, certainly, but Royo found it difficult not to pity him at all.

It was strange.

This was a level of understanding beyond simply knowing what Seyos had been through. Royo felt almost as if he had lived Seyos' life himself. And this degree of emotional connection...

It was uncomfortable. He didn't need it clouding his thoughts, right now. He needed to maintain his focus.

Thankfully, that was simple enough. He just had to remind himself that Seyos had tried to kill him, that he would have killed him if Royo hadn't killed him first.

No amount of emotional thinking could counter that, as far as Royo was concerned.

Still, he didn't want this to end just yet. He wanted to know more. He needed to.

About Ettol. Maybe the Piercing Eye could tell him something. Even if Seyos' memories had been tampered with, even if they were in the midst of breaking down during this elongated moment, perhaps there was something to be gained here.

Royo had to try. He demanded more from the Eye. More detail. More anything.

The Eye provided.

Seyos' knowledge was a mess. It was spreading out everywhere and vanishing into nothingness. So much information, bleeding out in all directions. None of it was coherent enough to formulate a vision like it had before, but Royo could still catch bits and pieces. And then he caught a glimpse of what he wanted.

A meeting between Ettol and Malast.

Words were being spoken in it, but they were incomprehensible. Silhouettes and even faces were being shown in it, but they were distorted and crumbling. Everything was off, like looking through some kind of swirling and cracked window, where even the light on the other side of it was fading away.

But even so, Royo was able to distinguish three things.

The first was that Ettol was not alone. He had a companion with him. A large, monstrous companion. The second, was that Ettol, judging from his skin tone, seemed to be a surface-dweller. But the third and final thing was, by far, what Royo found the most strange.

Ettol had a single horn on his head."

"1571 -- CLXIX.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Nine: 'Think not, worry not...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Durendia awoke to the sound of the one-horned man's voice.

--yeah. He's certainly a strong candidate. But who would he match with? I would be most concerned about--ah. You are awake. How are you feeling, cedo?"

Her little head pulsed. Not with pain, exactly, but a close approximation of it. She wanted to move, to get up, but she was still so dizzy and exhausted that she ended up just shifting in place a bit before giving up. It was pretty cozy right where she was, anyway.

Then she realized why.

The big gray dog had wrapped himself around her. His tail alone was enough of a blanket that she didn't feel cold, despite being able to see her breath.

Germal crouched over her and felt her forehead. "Cedo, can you hear me?"

"Y-yes," she finally managed to say.

"Good. That's very good."

She had never heard such a soothing voice. Not even from her own mother.

Her mother...

Durendia's eyes widened and her face went pale. The memories. The images. The carnage. It was all rushing back to her, and she didn't know what to do about it. She didn't know what was real and what was imaginary.

So much blood. And the stench. She couldn't get it out of her head. Or her nostrils. She could still smell it. Everything was--

"Shh," came Germal's voice again, which seemed to soften her entire world, somehow. "It's okay, cedo. You're okay."

And she was.

As simply as that.

She felt... normal. She felt like herself again.

In fact, what had she just been worrying about? She couldn't remember.

"I know," said Germal. "I'm being careful."

She didn't know what that meant. Was he talking to her? She couldn't tell.

She felt Koh's giant nose next to her ear and heard it sniffing. Then he licked her cheek, and she couldn't help giggling at the tickling sensation. He smelled like tobacco, but she didn't mind it so much.

Germal removed his hand from her head and stood up.

She was still confused beyond all reckoning, though. She asked the first thing that popped into her head. "Who are you?"

He regarded her with a smile. "I'm your uncle. And don't you worry. I'm going to take good care of you from now on."

She believed him wholeheartedly. "Why do you have a horn on your head?"

He laughed mildly. "Someone gave it to me. Why? Do you like it?"

She shrugged.

"Hmm. It doesn't frighten you, does it?"

She shook her head.

"Good. That's very good."

Comfortable as she was, she still wanted to stand now. Her whole body felt stiff as she wriggled her way out from the wall of canine around her and tried to find her footing. She stumbled forward.

Germal caught her. "Careful now, cedo."

She looked around. "Where are we?"

"A little town called Orobell. Have you heard of it?"

"1571 -- CLXIX.

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

Chapter One Hundred Sixty-Nine: 'Think not, worry not...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Durendia awoke to the sound of the one-horned man's voice.

"--yeah. He's certainly a strong candidate. But who would he match with? I would be most concerned about--ah. You are awake. How are you feeling, cedo?"

Her little head pulsed. Not with pain, exactly, but a close approximation of it. She wanted to move, to get up, but she was still so dizzy and exhausted that she ended up just shifting in place a bit before giving up. It was pretty cozy right where she was, anyway.

Then she realized why.

The big gray dog had wrapped himself around her. His tail alone was enough of a blanket that she didn't feel cold, despite being able to see her breath.

Germal crouched over her and felt her forehead. "Cedo, can you hear me?"

"Y-yes," she finally managed to say.

"Good. That's very good."

She had never heard such a soothing voice. Not even from her own mother.

Her mother...

Durendia's eyes widened and her face went pale. The memories. The images. The carnage. It was all rushing back to her, and she didn't know what to do about it. She didn't know what was real and what was imaginary.

So much blood. And the stench. She couldn't get it out of her head. Or her nostrils. She could still smell it. Everything was--

"Shh," came Germal's voice again, which seemed to soften her entire world, somehow. "It's okay, cede. You're okay."

And she was.

As simply as that.

She felt... normal. She felt like herself again.

In fact, what had she just been worrying about? She couldn't remember.

"I know," said Germal. "I'm being careful."

She didn't know what that meant. Was he talking to her? She couldn't tell.

She felt Koh's giant nose next to her ear and heard it sniffing. Then he licked her cheek, and she couldn't help giggling at the tickling sensation. He smelled like tobacco, but she didn't mind it so much.

Germal removed his hand from her head and stood up.

She was still confused beyond all reckoning, though. She asked the first thing that popped into her head. "Who are you?"

He regarded her with a smile. "I'm your uncle. And don't you worry. I'm going to take good care of you from now on."

She believed him wholeheartedly. "Why do you have a horn on your head?"

He laughed mildly. "Someone gave it to me. Why? Do you like it?"

She shrugged.

"Hmm. It doesn't frighten you, does it?"

She shook her head.

“Good. That’s very good.”

Comfortable as she was, she still wanted to stand now. Her whole body felt stiff as she wriggled her way out from the wall of canine around her and tried to find her footing. She stumbled forward.

Germal caught her. “Careful now, cedo.”

She looked around. “Where are we?”

“A little town called Orobell. Have you heard of it?”

"1572

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Durendia paused to think. The name sounded familiar, somehow, but that was the extent of it. She shook her head. “What happened to this place?”

“Some very bad people came and destroyed it,” said Germal.

The smoldering ruin had dozens of columns of smoke, all illuminated in the moonlight and bending in the wind.

“Why did they do that?” she asked.

“It’s a game they play.”

That piqued her curiosity even more. “A game?” She liked games.

“Oh, indeed. They try to destroy all of each others’ things.”

She didn’t much like the sound of that game, though. “That sounds scary...”

“It can be. They take it very seriously. Perhaps because they play for such high stakes.” He patted her head. “But there’s nothing to worry about, cedo. There are other games we can play.”

Koh came up beside her, dragging a heavy cloth in his mouth. He nudged it against her, obviously wanting her to take it.

She was beginning to shiver, so she did so. She scratched behind his ears for him while she tried to warm up again.

A speck of white fell across her vision, and she looked up at the sky another time to discover that it was beginning to snow. It made her smile. She'd always liked the snow.

"Master Germal, sir!" The distant voice grew quickly closer as a man she didn't recognize ran up to the three of them. "We may have found a lead on the attackers!"

"Oh?" said Germal. "Do tell me more."

"Ah, well, there appears to be a trail through the forest, but we're not entirely sure yet, sir. I would've reported this to the Knife directly, but I don't want to trouble him if it turns out we were wrong. He might, um... well..."

"Wise of you," said Germal, chortling. "Allow me to guess. You previously worked under Dunhouser?"

"I--yes. That I did, sir. How...?"

"The fact that you are worried about bursts of violent outrage from your superior is rather telling, I'm afraid. But I don't think you need to worry about such things with Jercash. From my understanding, he's not one given to crushing his subordinates."

The man looked surprised. "O-oh... uh... really, sir? But, ah, didn't he just take out Horace a little while ago?"

"Oh, indeed he did. But I believe it was Horace who started that, not Jercash."

"What? Why would anyone ever--? You'd have to be an idiot to attack the Knife first! But then again, I guess Horace was kind of stupid..."

"Who knows what came over him?" said Germal.

"Ah. Anyway, sir. I apologize for getting sidetracked. There was another reason why I came to you for help, actually. I've heard that you were in the 11th Ranging Division, which would make you an expert tracker, no?"

"Well, not so much me as him." Germal motioned toward Koh.

The man's eyes went hesitantly to the giant dog."
"1573

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

"While, yes, I was technically a Ranger, too," said Germal, "it was really Koh who did all the heavy lifting. I mostly just provided operational support for him."

"I... see." The man seemed like he was trying to suck his own lips into his face as he deliberated on his next words. "Then, ah... w-would it be too much to ask for his help here?"

"Oh, I'm sure he'd love to. Right, Koh?"

Koh snorted strongly enough to kick up a cloud of dust in front of him.

"Don't be a surly bore," said Germal. "The man is asking nicely for your help."

Koh glanced between the two men, then at Durendia, then back at Germal.

"Of course, we'll take her with us," said Germal.

Koh stood up.

Germal looked back at the unnamed man. "Lead the way."

"Oh, thank you so much, Master Koh."

The dog returned a calm, low woof, and they all began walking.

Germal and the stranger kept talking, but Durendia wasn't really paying attention anymore. They were mentioning a lot of names and places that she didn't recognize, and she soon found herself much more interested in the snow. It was picking up. She wondered if there would be enough to build a snowman soon. Or a snowdog, maybe. It would be fun to make a second Koh, she thought.

When they arrived at their apparent destination, her attention returned to the situation at hand.

The enormous hole in the forest was difficult to miss. Felled and splintered trees littered the path forward, so Germal helped Durendia onto Koh's back in order to protect her feet. It was fun. Koh moved so smoothly over the rough terrain that she had no trouble keeping her balance. She remembered trying to ride a horse once before and finding it not nearly this easy.

"Here's where we ran into trouble, Master Koh."

The sundered pathway split into several narrower ones. Some of them even looked blocked by more fallen trees ahead, but it was difficult to tell with only the moon and a few flashlights in the darkness.

"Some of our men have gone ahead, but from what we can tell so far, it's all a mess. We suspect there was some sort of battle in this particular area."

Koh lifted his nose and sniffed audibly.

"That is probably a safe bet," said Germal. "Some of these trees aren't just knocked down but also pitch black as well. That would suggest fire or lightning, which matches what happened to the town. And the direction that they fell also suggests that the fight was moving away from Orobell. Good work, soldier."

"Th-thank you, sir."

Koh ambled forward, not choosing from any of the branching paths and instead simply going straight ahead into the line of trees that were still standing. It grew pitch dark under the canopy of leaves overhead, and Durendia could hear the others following behind."

"1574

She'd always been scared of the dark, but she wasn't now. The flashlights helped, but it was mainly because Koh was here. She felt like the bravest little girl in the whole world with him around. Maybe that wasn't how bravery worked, but it was what she felt--along with a tinge of anticipation, wondering where Koh was leading everyone.

In time, they reached another clearing, and the moonlight returned. A new set of branching pathways lay before them, and this time, Koh chose the leftmost one.

Snow was everywhere now, filling her vision so much that it was getting difficult to see ahead.

As they continued on, Germal approached her from the side. "Do you know the story of Hada, cedo?"

She shook her head.

"The God of Storms? The God of Wrath? You've never heard of him?"

She shook her head again.

"Would you like me to tell his tale?" said Germal. "I think you might enjoy it."

She nodded.

The one-horned man smiled that smile that made her feel safe. "Well, it all began long ago. Before even humanity as we know it existed. Hada was born deep beneath the earth, but he hated it there, because he loved the sky. Even before he had ever seen it, he knew that he loved it. He believed that it was his destiny to be one with the sky, and so he became desperate to reach the surface. He searched every day for a means of getting there.

"Eventually, he encountered someone named Ettol, who said that he knew the way to the surface and would show him--on one condition. Ettol didn't want anyone else to know the way, so he said that Hada had to seal himself and all of his power into a bottle, and then Ettol would carry Hada to the surface. Hada, eager to achieve his destiny at any cost, agreed to this demand, and sealed himself away.

"And indeed, Ettol did exactly as he had promised to do. He carried Hada through a secret passage to the surface. However, once they were there, Ettol did not unseal the bottle. He placed Hada on a rock and left him there. Hada was wrath. He was closer to his goal than ever before and yet powerless to take that final step.

"So passed many, many years until someone discovered Hada there. The poor man who released him was consumed in Hada's fury, as was much of humanity, for Hada brought forth storms unlike any the world had ever seen. Hada quickly grew to hate mankind, as he was jealous of them. They had been living on the surface for so many years before him that they had already claimed much of it for themselves. So he tried to wipe humanity out in its entirety.

"But with the aid of other gods, they resisted him, which of course served only to make him angrier. And that is why the world still has terrible storms even to this day. It is a lingering effect of Hada's never-ending bitterness and hatred towards humanity."

Durendia frowned. "I didn't like that story at all."

"No?" said Germal. "My apologies then, cedo."
"1575 -- CLXX."

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

The group stopped when they came upon another wide clearing. This one was fully enclosed, however. There were no more branching paths to pursue, and Koh had stopped as well.

There was, however, someone lying there. They were not moving.

Durendia was uncomfortable again. Still not frightened exactly, but very unhappy nonetheless. She had a dreadful feeling that it was a dead person. Something in the way the body was positioned. Very unnaturally contorted.

Koh started toward it. Durendia didn't want to get any closer, but she didn't know how to say so. Perhaps the dog guessed as much, because he stopped again and let Germal and the others examine it.

They took their time.

Durendia tried to just think about the snow, but she couldn't help staring. Unpleasant as it made her feel, she couldn't fully stifle her curiosity.

"I recognize this man," someone eventually said. "Isn't this Akio, the Spear of Kavia?"

"Wow, yeah, I think you're right. Heh. So I guess someone axed Akio, eh?"

"Ha. Nice."

"This is pretty impressive work. I heard this guy was a real pain in the ass, over in Hoss."

“He was one of the Kane’s strongest lackeys, wasn’t he?”

“Yeah. Guess that confirms that this town really was important to Kane, eh?”

“Most likely.”

“Who the hell took this guy out, though? We don’t have anyone strong enough around here, do we?”

Germal stepped into the two men’s conversation. “The body is still mostly intact, including the head, which would suggest that the killer got to his reaper first. Perhaps all this destruction we’ve seen here in the forest was the killer struggling against Akio’s mindless corpse.”

“Ah, that’d make sense. Still pretty impressive, though, don’t you think? Catching a famous guy like this off guard?”

“Eh, maybe he had one of our ‘invisi-bros’ with him.”

“Maybe. But I don’t know, man. After Ivan cocked everything up in Sair, the whole Vanguard probably knows that we can be invisible now. And this guy was high up on the food chain, right? So he should’ve already had some countermeasures ready for that sort of thing.”

“You’re giving the Vannies too much credit, dude. They’re not that smart.”

Germal interjected again. “Perhaps this really was the work of Hada,” he laughed. “And if not, then perhaps it will be.”

“...Sir, what the hell are you talking about?”

“Oh, nothing. Let’s get this body to Jercash, shall we? I’m sure he’d like to see it.”

“Yes, sir.”

Chapter One Hundred Seventy: ‘Hold, and achieve beyond thyself...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Things were not going well for Hector. The treasure in this room had not helped. Even after having Garovel examine it all, Hector was no better off than before.

And the worm didn't stop. It came crashing after him like a tidal wave of sludge at every opportunity. It was all Hector could do to just stay ahead of the damn thing.

Problem was, there was nowhere to go."
"1575 -- CLXX.

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

The group stopped when they came upon another wide clearing. This one was fully enclosed, however. There were no more branching paths to pursue, and Koh had stopped as well.

There was, however, someone lying there. They were not moving.

Durendia was uncomfortable again. Still not frightened exactly, but very unhappy nonetheless. She had a dreadful feeling that it was a dead person. Something in the way the body was positioned. Very unnaturally contorted.

Koh started toward it. Durendia didn't want to get any closer, but she didn't know how to say so. Perhaps the dog guessed as much, because he stopped again and let Germal and the others examine it.

They took their time.

Durendia tried to just think about the snow, but she couldn't help staring. Unpleasant as it made her feel, she couldn't fully stifle her curiosity.

"I recognize this man," someone eventually said. "Isn't this Akio, the Spear of Kavia?"

"Wow, yeah, I think you're right. Heh. So I guess someone axed Akio, eh?"

"Ha. Nice."

"This is pretty impressive work. I heard this guy was a real pain in the ass, over in Hoss."

“He was one of the Kane’s strongest lackeys, wasn’t he?”

“Yeah. Guess that confirms that this town really was important to Kane, eh?”

“Most likely.”

“Who the hell took this guy out, though? We don’t have anyone strong enough around here, do we?”

Germal stepped into the two men’s conversation. “The body is still mostly intact, including the head, which would suggest that the killer got to his reaper first. Perhaps all this destruction we’ve seen here in the forest was the killer struggling against Akio’s mindless corpse.”

“Ah, that’d make sense. Still pretty impressive, though, don’t you think? Catching a famous guy like this off guard?”

“Eh, maybe he had one of our ‘invisi-bros’ with him.”

“Maybe. But I don’t know, man. After Ivan cocked everything up in Sair, the whole Vanguard probably knows that we can be invisible now. And this guy was high up on the food chain, right? So he should’ve already had some countermeasures ready for that sort of thing.”

“You’re giving the Vannies too much credit, dude. They’re not that smart.”

Germal interjected again. “Perhaps this really was the work of Hada,” he laughed. “And if not, then perhaps it will be.”

“...Sir, what the hell are you talking about?”

“Oh, nothing. Let’s get this body to Jercash, shall we? I’m sure he’d like to see it.”

“Yes, sir.”

Chapter One Hundred Seventy: ‘Hold, and achieve beyond thyself...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Things were not going well for Hector. The treasure in this room had not helped. Even after having Garovel examine it all, Hector was no better off than before.

And the worm didn't stop. It came crashing after him like a tidal wave of sludge at every opportunity. It was all Hector could do to just stay ahead of the damn thing.

Problem was, there was nowhere to go."
"1576

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Up and around and back down again, iron platform after iron platform, the whole process had quickly become cyclical while Hector tried to buy himself the time to come up with a new plan. A plan that didn't involve fighting it at close range, preferably.

But more and more, that didn't seem like it was going to happen. Sooner or later, he would have to take that risk. Whether it was because he actively chose to do so or because he screwed up somehow and let the worm catch up to him--it was going to happen, he felt. And he was beginning to think that, of those two possibilities, the prior would be better. If nothing else, attacking the worm head on at least sounded more attractive than falling on his ass and getting smothered.

How to approach it, though? It would be best if he could create an opening for himself, somehow. If he could distract the beast for even just a split second, then he could test out the Moon's Wrath on it without risking being eaten.

An ideally placed iron platform at just the right moment could throw the worm off balance. In theory.

It would have to be precise, though. If it didn't have enough mass to it or if it struck at the wrong angle or the wrong moment... that would get ugly. That might even be the end for him and Garovel both, right then and there.

Great.

He needed to consult Garovel before committing to something so stupid.

‘Garovel, should I just charge in and attack this fuckin’ thing?’

‘Ah... aha... hmm.’

‘Garovel, that’s not helpful.’

‘I’d rather you didn’t do that, I think.’

‘Then what DO I do? This is getting us nowhere.’ He launched up and away on yet another iron platform, annihilating his earlier one in the meantime.

‘Well, I think the safest course of action is to just keep on going exactly as you are and wait for either Diego or Zeff to rescue us.’

Hector could see logic in that plan. But he could see flaws in it, too. ‘We don’t know that they WILL rescue us, Garovel. For all we know, they could be in even worse trouble than we are, right now.’

The worm splattered against the ceiling like a bubbling geyser, and sludge shot out in all directions.

Hector was ready, though. He could sense every gelatinous chunk flying his way and bounded out of their path while simultaneously raising iron walls behind him for added protection. The sludge knocked against each one with enough force to knock them all over, but that was fine. As long as none of it touched him, he didn’t--

There was some on his arm.

He tried to materialize it away from himself, to fling it off of him with rapid iron spikes, but the iron wouldn’t grow. The field density of the worm’s soul or ardor or whatever the hell the thing had--it was too strong, Hector concluded.

So he took the opposite approach and did a swirling, haphazard somersault through the air while annihilating the iron around his arm."
"1577

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

It worked as Hector had hoped it would. The sludge went flying. And so did he, over the edge of the chamber's third floor.

The Scarf of Amordiin was helpful here. He caught himself with a tall spiral of iron and slid all the way down to the bottom. It was a technique he'd used before--one that he was beginning to think he should give a name to.

The cacophonous splash of more sludge erased that thought from his head, however, and he had to launch himself away again.

'In fairness,' said Garovel, 'I really doubt they're in more trouble than we are, right now. I'm not sure ANYONE is, quite frankly.'

'Still doesn't mean they're going to show up and save us,' said Hector, remaking his missing chunk of armor. 'We need a better plan than that.'

'Hector, there may not BE one. Not to be negative, but we're pretty fucked.'

Hector might've sighed, if he could've spared the breath for it.

'Really, though, you're doin' a great job, buddy. I'm plenty impressed, already. You just focus on keeping us alive for as long as you possibly can, alright?'

And Hector wanted to argue, but he stopped himself, because he noticed something different in Garovel's soundless voice. Something off. A slight tremble. And a bit too much of a lilt, maybe, almost as if...

As if Garovel were trying not to sound frightened.

The worm arrived again with a boom and interrupted his train of thought, but Hector never lost track of it. After he managed to create some more distance, he found his mind lingering on that notion.

Garovel was scared.

That wasn't so surprising, really. They were in a terrifying situation with no escape. But it WAS surprising that Garovel was apparently scared enough to be having trouble concealing it.

That was what Hector found concerning.

And though it hardly seemed possible at this point, Hector was beginning to get the impression that these circumstances were somehow even more dire than he had realized.

Wonderful. Just what he wanted. Even more pressure to not fuck up horribly.

He knew he had to keep his calm, though. His focus.

‘Just think of this as a new form of training,’ Garovel was saying, sounding more self-assured again.

‘How the hell would this qualify as training?’

‘You’re honing your agility. With the help of a pet.’

‘A pet,’ he echoed dubiously.

‘A very large, slimy, man-eating pet, yes.’

Well, at least the reaper wasn’t too scared to distract his servant with stupid bullshit.

A genuine distraction did arrive, however, in the form of a new presence in the chamber. Thanks to the Scarf of Amordiin, Hector sensed the person there immediately, standing at the bottom of the chamber and looking around in probable confusion. Unfortunately for whoever it was, Hector and worm were above them.

Hector knew his task at once. He had to get there before the worm did."

"1578

Hector bolted over the side of the third floor again, armor scraping against rock, and knocked himself straight downward with a velocity state in an iron boulder. He went to work on an iron web in order to slow himself once he was close enough, but it was going to be a very tight window, he knew. He was prepared to launch them on a platform of their own, if necessary.

And he caught a glimpse of the person.

It was a Hun’Kui. Eleyo, almost certainly. But he was wearing Seyos’ cloak.

In that same moment, Eleyo looked up and no doubt perceived his imminent demise. Hector falling toward him, chased by a giant mass of sludge and ardor.

Eleyo gripped a pendant around his neck, just as Seyos had done previously, and vanished into thin air.

And Hector was alone with the worm again--only now, he'd compromised his positioning, and the worm was nearly on top of him.

Not much choice now.

He ignored the immediate confusion and shot himself sideways with a horizontal pillar. When he was close enough to the wall, he followed up with a vertical pillar, adding extra mass to it as well as a slight curve to the tip, trying to help with the adjustment in his trajectory. He still ended up scraping the wall with his shield and armor, but it mostly worked, and he went flying upward again, feeling rather like a pinball.

The hope was to slip by the worm entirely, but the Scarf of Amordiin was telling him now that that wasn't going to happen. The only consolation was that the concentration of sludge here was thinner than the main body.

He readied his grip on the Moon's Wrath, then swung with all his strength as soon as he made contact.

Sludge splattered everywhere, but he made it up and over to the second floor.

He allowed himself to stop and check if he had any sludge on him. The Scarf informed him that, other than a few specks here and there, he didn't.

He indulged a breath of relief, and then rumbling reminded him that he was still being chased, and he propelled himself away on still another iron platform.

'Something's different with that mace now,' said Garovel. 'It doesn't feel quite so "empty" anymore. It has ardor in it.'

Hector wasn't sure what to do with that information.

'Hit the worm again,' the reaper said.

'Uh--are you sure? Didn't you want me to--?'

'I know what I said. But now we're conducting research, and science is important enough to risk our lives for, right?’

Hector didn’t wholly agree with that sentiment, but he didn’t argue, because the result was what he’d wanted earlier.

The worm was climbing again, sloshing over rock and tossing bits of treasure around.

Hector took his chance and slammed a giant iron cube into it just as it was reaching the second floor.

The worm didn’t seem particularly bothered by the impact and kept on after him like so much flowing water, entirely undeterred."

"1579

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Not quite the distraction he’d hoped for. Hector launched himself away without enough time even to choose his direction or stabilize himself. He and his armor went flipping through the air.

But the Scarf. Again, it was helping him. With it, he didn’t become disoriented. He didn’t lose track of where he was or where the worm was or even where the wall that he was flipping toward was. Being able to sense the space immediately around himself proved to be a stabilizing effect for his mind, and this wasn’t the first time he’d noticed it in this fight, either.

He was able to materialize an iron curve against the wall just before he hit it. So rather than slamming against it and losing all momentum, his armor scraped against the curve and then slid safely off to the side. He was even able to reorient himself into an upright position and land easily on both feet, still on the second floor.

‘Holy crap, Hector.’

‘Think I’m getting the hang of this Scarf.’ He watched the iron curve he’d made a moment ago fall off the wall and annihilated it before it hit the ground.

The worm was getting close again, and Hector bounded up and over it, deciding this time not to flee. He wanted the edge of the worm. His most recent test had revealed that he couldn’t distract it, but maybe he could still navigate around its huge bulk nimbly enough to avoid immediate death.

The sludge pulsed and stretched, reaching out for him a little--but only a little. Not like the worm's mouth could. This section here was the tail, Hector was pretty sure, and while it was obviously still dangerous, it didn't seem nearly as aggressive in its efforts to absorb or devour him.

It did seem more aggressive in its efforts to slam him into the wall, though.

And since he wasn't confident that a blow from the Moon's Wrath would counter something with enough force to derail a train, he decided to leap over the tail instead of taking it head on. When the tail smacked into the wall and splattered everywhere, Hector rushed in to attack. He held the mace low, letting it drag behind him a little, and then brought full force to bear with vigor-enhanced strength.

The mace struck true and the already-thinned tail exploded into even more chunks.

That was all the opening he was going to get, though, as he could already sense the mouth twisting around to catch him from behind. He launched himself out of its path, and the worm's mouth bent upward after him, snapping and drooling at him but still out of reach.

He landed on the other side while it rumbled and writhed, eagerly trying to reposition itself so that it could chase him again.

Hector put some distance between himself and the worm again, waiting for Garovel's assessment.

'That was a solid hit,' the reaper said. 'Seems like the the mace is "full" now.'

"1580

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Full?' said Hector.

'Of ardor,' said Garovel.

'Yeah, but what does that actually mean?'

‘Dunno. Try to do something with it.’

‘Like what?’

‘Uh. Hmm. Maybe it’s got a secret button on the bottom of the handle.’

Hector checked. ‘It doesn’t.’

‘Well, shit, I’m out of ideas. You think of something.’

Not knowing what else he could do, he tried swinging the mace at thin air.

It didn’t do anything.

The worm was gaining on him again, so he had to stop fiddling with the mace and concentrate on keeping his distance. The beast didn’t seem fazed by the loss of its tail. Perhaps because its tail wasn’t even missing, anymore. The splattered sludge had already reaccumulated.

He waited for his next opening, which arrived when he got the worm to slam dumbly into the wall again.

This time, he tried just pointing the mace straight at the worm. He knew that he would probably have to get close and attack it directly again, but he really didn’t want to do that and was therefore trying to exhaust all other options that he could think of, even if they were stupid and pointless like--

The spike at the tip of the mace turned suddenly white hot, burning and glowing with enough intensity to make Hector squint inside his helmet.

Then a thick beam shot out, appearing all at once, a bar of bright, solid white light.

And it cleaved a chunk out of the worm like a knife. Black sludge went flying in the familiar way.

‘Holy fuck!’ said Garovel.

‘This fuckin’ thing can shoot lasers?!’ said Hector, wide-eyed.

‘Oh, it’s empty again. I guess that used up all the ardor.’

‘Aw, shit.’

‘Recharge it! I wanna see more lasers!’

‘Garovel, I’m trying not to get us killed here.’

‘Oh, I know! And you’re doing a great job of that, by the way! Really, just stellar work! Keep it up, buddy!’

‘Thanks...’

‘Now go recharge that laser.’

Hector intended to, but he wasn’t nearly as thrilled about it as the reaper seemed to be. Getting in close enough to hit the worm with the Moon’s Wrath again would be flirting with death, he knew. And Hector wanted to keep his relationship with death purely platonic, if at all possible.

Nonetheless, he dove in and got his hits. It took a while. Where before it had taken only two swings, this time it took four, perhaps because the hits themselves weren’t quite as “solid” as that one from earlier had been.

But the Moon’s Wrath was finally recharged, and Hector found an opening to use it.

Just as before, the beam shot out, illuminating the chamber and carving a hole into the worm.

A hole which was refilled all too soon, just like the last one had been.

‘Hmm.’

‘Garovel, this laser’s not doin’ shit to that thing.’

‘Yeah. That kinda bites. You’d think something that cool would be the solution to all our problems.’”

"1581

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

Hector started running again. ‘Now what do we do?’

‘Good question,’ said Garovel. ‘Back to plan A, I guess. Stay alive until someone saves our sorry asses.'

'Agh... I really hate plan A...'

'Well, I'm open to hearing a plan C, if you've got one.'

'Er...'

'Plan A, it is.'

'No, hold on! I can think of something!' He racked his brain, feeling like he really could think of something, for some reason. Like he was forgetting something, maybe. Something important. 'Uh...! Hmm...!'

Shit. Why wasn't it coming to him? It was almost like there was a giant, man-eating sludge monster distracting him.

'Don't strain yourself,' said Garovel as Hector launched himself over the large gap in the second floor and ran briefly along the wall before landing on the other side, still running. 'Okay, are you just trying to show off, now? Because I was already impressed.'

Hector was hardly listening, though, too caught up in his multiple focuses. While it was true that the Scarf of Amordiin was helping him to understand where he could move and how precise that movement needed to be, he was beginning to realize that there was another aspect at play here, too.

His own armor was helping, in a weird way. Even though it was bulky and heavy as shit, it was also adding a ton of momentum. His undead strength had made it easy not to notice, because it made the armor not actually feel all that heavy, but he was sensing it more and more now. It was almost like he could relax his whole body and just let the armor keep carrying him forward.

He wasn't actually going to do that, of course, but it was an interesting feeling nonetheless. And it required a light touch, too. A very precise use of his own strength. Too much, and he would overcome the momentum and simply move normally, but with a deliberately weak application, that momentum could be preserved--and even harnessed, as he had just proved to himself by running along the wall.

But all of that was quite a lot to process and think about while still conversing with Garovel, keeping track of where the worm was, maintaining the cooling effect of his armor, AND trying to remember whatever it was that he felt like he was forgetting.

So it was no surprise, really, that he was not entirely succeeding at a couple of those things, at the moment.

He was letting his focus drift into too many things simultaneously again. Hector didn't need a repeat of what had happened in that previous treasure room in order to realize that he was on the verge of fucking himself over.

Focus. Prioritize.

He knew where the worm was. Because he had to. That was the top priority. And he knew where he needed to go in order to keep ahead of it. That was pretty much the same priority. He could lump those two thoughts together."

"1582

The cooling effect on the armor could take a little bit of a back seat, he felt. While helpful, it wasn't strictly necessary--nor was talking to Garovel. Maybe he could lump those together, too, in a less effective capacity.

'Sorry, Garovel,' he said. 'I might not hear what you're saying for a little while.'

'What're you--?' Even before that, the reaper had already been saying something, but Hector needed his focus now.

He needed to remember.

A fresh distraction arrived first, however.

The worm was doing something different. Its movements had changed. Its mouth was wriggling and twitching, and its bulk was starting to twist and bubble. It even stopped chasing him.

Hector stopped running in order to stand and observe it with his actual eyes this time.

'Oh, what now?' said Garovel.

Hector saw a crackle of blue light within of the monster's cavernous mouth and heard the bristling static of electricity.

That was all the warning he got. A flashing bolt of electricity arced out in an instant and crashed upon a freshly materialized lightning rod. The iron exploded on impact, taking a chunk of the second floor with it and knocking Hector into the wall.

‘Oh god, I forgot they could do that!’

Hector steadied himself and started running again, ignoring his ruptured ear drums and stinging eyes. ‘You’re a reaper. How did you forget?’

‘Well, okay, I didn’t technically forget. I was just hoping this one didn’t have that power!’

That certainly would’ve been nice.

He started materializing lightning rods behind him as he moved. He wasn’t sure if he and Garovel could survive a direct hit from one of those bolts, and he didn’t intend to find out.

‘Heh,’ said Garovel. ‘I guess it’s a good thing you have experience fighting against lightning.’

That reminded Hector that he’d found out from Ivan that Desmond Grantier was still alive. And if Desmond was alive, Hector had a feeling that Karkash was, too. Or at least, it wouldn’t surprise him.

Hector tried to refocus. The crashing boom of ardor-infused electricity was making it difficult to concentrate, though. The bolts weren’t frequent, but the fact that one of them had destroyed part of the second floor was very troubling to Hector.

This whole chamber was infused with ardor, which made the rock far more durable than normal. All the times that he’d slammed into it--either just by landing in full or getting thrown into the wall--Hector hadn’t left a single scratch. Nor had the worm, until now.

Which was another question.

‘Why did the worm only just now start using its electricity?’ said Hector. ‘We’ve been fighting for a while.’

‘Well, it WAS just born. Maybe it’s still getting used to its own power. Maturing, if you will.’

His eyes widened at that notion. ‘So it’s getting stronger as the fight draws out.'

'I don't know about THAT, exactly... but kinda, yeah.' The reaper broke for a laugh, though it sounded somewhat nervous to Hector. 'It's not like its power will just keep growing indefinitely.'"

"1583

Hector sensed another lightning bolt coming. That was expected, of course. But the worm's mouth wasn't pointed at him. It was pointed ahead of him, where he was about to be and where his most recent lightning rod wasn't.

He barely changed course in time and raised a simple iron wall to mitigate the impact. The wall exploded toward him, and he had to annihilate its sundered pieces before they pummeled him. He still ended up blocking a few lumps of ardor-infused rock with his shield, however.

And yet again, the worm was closing in, and Hector was forced to run.

'Did you see that?!' said Hector.

'Yeah,' said Garovel slowly.

'It just changed tactics on me! It's not just "maturing" or whatever! This fuckin' thing is problem solving!'

'But. Um. Hmm. Really, though, isn't learning just another aspect of maturing? I mean, when you think about it--'

'I thought it was just a mindless monster!'

'Aha... Mm, so did I, honestly.'

He needed to calm down, Hector knew. Panicking wasn't going to do him any favors. And Garovel wasn't quite sounding as calm as usual, either.

He had to get a hold of himself. He had to protect Garovel. No matter what.

And he had to think of something.

That thing from before. Whatever he was forgetting. What the hell was it?!

Then it finally hit him.

The Shard. His line to Emiliana. Maybe she could tell him something about worms, something that could help him kill this damn thing. Or at least not get eaten by it.

He couldn't stop, though. As he kept on running and jumping and materializing, he made an opening in his armor and found the Shard there. He let the Moon's Wrath take its place and gripped it with his bare hand. The mace was much larger and stuck out of his breastplate, giving the appearance of a small spear through his chest, but Hector wasn't concerned with fashion, at the moment. He reached out with his mind.

'Emiliana,' he thought.

There was no immediate response, but that was not surprising. He kept at it, figuring that she would answer eventually.

Thankfully, it only took a couple minutes instead of hours.

'Hector?' came her soundless voice. 'What is the matter?'

'Giant worm,' he said, trying not to sound like he was freaking out. 'Fighting one. Right now. Information, please.'

'Oh! Right! O-okay, o-one second! I made some notes! Allow me to find them!'

'Please hurry.'

Silence returned as she was presumably searching, and in the meantime, the Scarf of Amordiin was informing him that the worm was about to puke up more lightning.

This time, though, he could sense the beast's mouth swaying back and forth as the electricity built up and was held there for longer than previously.

It was trying to juke him, the wormy bastard.

Hector decided to just materialize a whole fleet of lighting rods around him. Wherever it wanted to shoot, the area would be covered."

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

His plan worked, though maybe a little too well. Lightning leapt from rod to rod, destroying each one as it went and sending so many iron chunks flying at once they created a kind of electrical storm all around him.

‘Okay,’ came Emiliana’s voice again. ‘Are you still there?’

Hector was busy annihilating all of his shredded iron so as to rob the electricity in the air of its prime conductor, but he still managed to say, ‘Yeah.’ It calmed the crackling storm almost instantly, but now his armor was the prime conductor, and a bolt from the thin air struck him, though it was weak enough that it only knocked him back a couple steps instead of sending him flying.

He launched himself away just as the worm’s gaping jaw crashed down.

That was much closer than he wanted it to be. He could sense sludge all over his armor and started trying to remove it with more acrobatic movements, as he did earlier.

‘You okay in there?’ he asked, consciously directing the thought at Garovel alone.

‘Yeah, I’m good.’

Emiliana was saying something again. ‘--was hoping to corroborate more of this so that I did not tell you something that was false. The list is quite long, so--’

‘Just give me whatever you’ve got,’ he told her.

‘Um--very well. Their slimy bodies have strange electromagnetic properties, which allows many of the larger ones to accumulate a very strong charge and expel it from--’

‘Yep. Know that. What else?’

‘Um. Ah--do you know that their sludge can be a powerful acid?’

'Yeah.' He neglected mentioning that it was one of the things about worms that he was LEAST afraid of, having already seen much more powerful acid elsewhere. No sense in derailing the conversation.

'Okay. Did you know that they can increase their mass by breaking down rock and absorbing it into their bodies?'

Oh.

Oh shit.

'No, I didn't,' said Hector. But that did explain why the worm seemed to be a little larger, all of a sudden. And a lot of those rocks that the worm's lightning had torn out of the floor and walls were missing now, according to the Scarf.

'They can also divide themselves and reassemble as they please.'

'Yeah. Seen that firsthand.' Granted, this particular worm hadn't done so yet, but he didn't doubt that it could. Though, given the circumstances, he might've preferred a bunch of little worms to the one big one. They might be more difficult to keep away from, sure, but at least he wouldn't have to worry about getting pancaked into the wall or swallowed whole.

'I have also read that worms can absorb the abilities of servants that they have eaten. I have seen conflicting information with regard to this one, however. Do you know if it is true?'

'No, sorry. Haven't seen that one yet, thankfully.'
"1585

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

And as Hector sensed more lightning inbound, he was beginning to feel as though this conversation was not the tide-turner that he needed it to be.

'What about weaknesses?' said Hector as he dove out of the way of more exploding lightning rods.

'Oh, yes, of course. In order to kill them, you must destroy somewhere around ninety percent of their body. I have read numbers as low as eighty percent but also as high as ninety-seven percent, so make of that what you will, I suppose.'

Hector's brow furrowed, and he scrambled back to his feet, armor scraping against rock. 'That's...! That's not really a "weakness," Emiliana...'

'I, ah... I realize that, yes...'

And there was silence as Hector merely continued fleeing.

At length, he had to break it. 'Are you telling me that worms don't have any weaknesses?'

'I'm afraid so. At least, none that Ibai and I were able to discover in so short a time.'

That was probably the very last thing that Hector had wanted to hear, right now.

But wait. Maybe she was just joking around. Maybe Chergoa was putting her up to this. 'Really?' was all he managed to say.

'Yes. I'm sorry.'

'You didn't even find anything about a "wave" that can put them to sleep?'

'What? A wave? What kind of wave?'

'That's what I'm asking you!'

'Ah! Oh! I'm sorry! I don't know anything about a wave that affects worms!'

'Well, shit!'

'Wait a minute, are you okay?! How much danger are you in, right now, precisely?!'

'A lot!' He knew that he probably should've kept trying to play it cool so as not to worry her... but fuck it. Everything was terrible, and despite his better judgment, he really wanted to just say so. 'Oh, but it's just me, though! Zeff's not here!'

'I wasn't going to ask--'

'I wish he WAS here! He could probably kill this fuckin' thing!'

And there was a pause, then Emiliana laughed.

Hector didn't know how to respond to that. 'What the--?! Why are you laughing?!'

'Ah, I'm so sorry! I just--! I didn't expect you say something like that all of a sudden! I'm not happy you're having a hard time or anything like that! I swear!'

But he could still hear her snickering a little.

'I'm so sorry! That just took me by surprise! Really! You just always seemed so stoic and in control that I--! I just never thought you would say anything like that!'

'I hope Gohvis eats you.'

That made her laugh even harder than before, though she continued trying to apologize.

'It's fine,' he said. 'But now you're really distracting me, so I have to go. I'll talk to you later, if I'm not dead.'

'Okay! Um! Do your best! Again, I'm so--'

He refitted the Shard into his armor, having had his fill of that conversation."

"1586

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Garovel must have taken notice of Hector releasing the Shard, because he said, 'Done talking to Emiliana?'

'Yeah.'

'Learn anything useful?'

'I learned that the only way to kill this thing is to destroy ninety percent of its body mass.'

'So... no, then.'

‘Pretty much,’ said Hector. ‘I can’t even destroy one percent of it, let alone ninety.’

‘Mhmm. Even after poking holes in it with the Moon’s Wrath, the worm doesn’t seem to have gotten any smaller.’

‘Yeah, I think it’s growing, actually, by absorbing the broken rocks around here.’

‘Oh. Lovely. Back to plan A, then?’

Hector exhaled a growl and tried to think of something else.

And he did.

‘I’ve got an idea,’ he told Garovel.

‘Oh? What’re the odds it’ll get us eaten?’

‘Uh. Pretty low, I guess.’

‘Tell me more, then.’

Hector sensed more lightning on the way and knew that he shouldn’t let the opportunity pass while he explained. ‘I’ll just show you.’

‘Alright. Dazzle me.’

The worm was trying to fake him out again with its head movement, but that was fine. Hector materialized an army of conducting rods, just as he had done before, but this time, he kept making them taller and taller; and then at the last instant, right when he felt like the worm was finally going to let the lightning rip, Hector added a second growth out of the side of every rod simultaneously, making each one rush straight toward the worm, which Hector had allowed to get quite close.

The lightning hit just as the wall of angled conductors completed the circuit with the worm’s body. Iron exploded all around him, as expected, but it didn’t result in an electrical storm this time. The vast majority of the lightning went straight back into the monster, zapping it with its own ridiculous power.

It was enough to make the worm seize up and stop in place. Sludge rippled visibly across its body, distorting its shape somewhat in apparent displeasure.

But that was it. After a couple seconds, the beast recovered and let out a roar, perhaps wanting Hector to know that he'd pissed it off.

Hector didn't waste the opening, though. He leapt up, Moon's Wrath held tight, and smashed in its left eyespot. The hit was hard enough to send sludge splattering all the way out the back of its head.

He landed on its contorted back, materializing a falling iron plate for himself so that he didn't immediately sink into the worm's body, and then launched himself off of it before the beast could turn around and devour him.

He hit the ground rolling and scraping on rock, but he quickly found his footing and started running again.

'Okay,' said Garovel. 'I'll admit. I'm reasonably dazzled.'

Hector wasn't. 'That still didn't do anything, though! Agh!' He could already sense that the "damage" he had done to the worm's head was entirely recovered."

"1587

'Yeah. That does suck. But hey, on the bright side, the Moon's Wrath is fully charged again, and it was practically empty before. That was a really good hit you just landed.'

'That stupid laser isn't gonna help, either, Garovel!'

'Mm, maybe not, but it's important to stay positive, Hector.'

'Since when?!'

'Since now! I've been trying really hard not to panic during all of this, okay?!'

'I've noticed!'

'What?! What do you mean, you've noticed?! Why didn't you say anything, then?!'

'Because I've been busy trying to keep us alive!'

'Well, now I feel like a jackass!'

‘Good!’

‘Fuck you! Hurry up and beat this worm already!’

‘How, goddammit?!’

‘I don’t know! Use the Scarf or something! Do more cool flips! I’m sure that’ll help!’

‘Give me some real advice, asshole!’

‘Have you tried talking it into submission?!’

‘What?!’

‘Well, it worked against the Salesman, didn’t it?!’

‘Agh! I should just let it kill us!’

‘C’mon, Hector, buddy! Don’t give up yet! You can save us, probably! I believe in you, kind of!’

More iron and rock exploded as lightning crashed above his head, forcing Hector to make a hard right turn mid-gallop. He launched himself up and away again, trying to build more distance so that he had time to think.

‘Do you need more positive thinking?’ said Garovel, calmer again. ‘Because if so, I’ve got you covered. Let’s see, um--Oh. With all this ardor-lightning destroying everything, it’s way more spacious in here now. Isn’t that great?’

Hector didn’t answer him.

‘It’s more room for you to maneuver,’ the reaper continued, undeterred. ‘That’s good, right? Especially with the Scarf of Amordiin? I mean, shit. I thought improved spatial awareness would just enhance your materialization. I didn’t think it would turn you into some kind of iron ninja.’

Still, Hector was more concerned with trying to come up with a new plan.

‘Hey, maybe we’ll get lucky and the worm will blast us a tunnel out of here.’

That was an interesting idea. But it was still pretty useless, he figured after a moment. Trying to direct the worm to dig in a particular spot might have been possible, but there was no way to know WHICH spot to choose. It all looked the same, and Garovel couldn't help with that, either, because his reaper's sense was blocked by all the ardor in the rock.

Ugh.

Failed plan after failed plan. And even though there was definitely more space to run around in now, all the debris was slowly adding to the worm's bulk.

And that was going to become a real problem sooner or later, Hector felt. The larger the worm grew, the more difficult it would become to avoid.

So maybe that was what he should have been focusing on. Preventing its growth.

In fact... maybe he could even take that a step further. Maybe he could whittle the worm down, bit by bit.

Hmm.

Well, it was a new plan, at least."
"1588

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

The worm chose that moment to roar more loudly and piercingly than it ever had previously, making the whole enormous chamber tremble.

Hector was far enough away that the sheer force of it didn't knock him back, but he could see rubble around the beast being blown away, and even at this distance, he still had to stop running so that he didn't trip and fall on his face.

The worm wasn't moving while roaring, though. So Hector figured it was as good a time as any to go in.

He charged toward it, mace held straight ahead of him, and loosed another beam of radiant white. He intentionally aimed to only graze the beast, and indeed, that was what he achieved. The light sliced into the right side of worm's head, and a sliver of dark sludge went flying away from it.

Hector pursued that sliver like it was a wild animal. And it basically was. It splattered against the ground but didn't stop moving for an instant. Its many black droplets quickly reformed into one and started squirming its way back to the rest of the worm.

Hector trapped it in a box of iron from ten meters away, but he didn't have the luxury of getting to see how well the iron held, because the worm was again way too close to ignore. He used a haphazard platform to flip himself out of the beast's quaking path. He was about to return his attention to his iron box, believing that he had bought himself a few precious seconds while the worm was busy trying to turn itself around again, but he was forced to reassess the situation entirely when he sensed the giant worm split itself apart instead.

Thirty or so horse-sized worms were suddenly swarming him.

There wasn't time to react with anything that required actual thought. It was gut impulse only.

And his gut came up with the good old spike defense. Tried and true and stronger than ever before. Iron exploded out from his armor in every conceivable direction at once, skewering some of the worms and displacing others, filling so much of the chamber that he couldn't even see or sense anything with the Scarf of Amordiin anymore.

The Scarf required the free movement of air to work, he knew, and the spikes were so numerous and densely packed that he'd completely encased himself and the Scarf in iron.

And perhaps even more unsettling, it grew immediately quiet, as well. No more rumbling. No more crashing. No more sloshing--or at least, not as much. After a moment, he realized that he could still hear some sludgy movement on the other side of his wall of spikes. He could feel the vibrations in his iron, too.

The worm definitely wasn't dead yet. Not that he'd really expected it to be.

He didn't want to undo his work yet, however. Not if it meant he'd just get swarmed again.

'Can you tell what's going on out there?' he asked Garovel."

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Hmm,' said Garovel. 'It seems to be trying to reassemble itself.'

'Only "trying?" What's stopping it?'

'All the iron in the way, presumably.'

'Really? I didn't think it would be that effective.'

'Ah. Well. It's not. They're starting to mass successfully now. I'd suggest getting us out of here.'

Indeed, Hector could feel the growing vibrations through the metal and knew the reaper wasn't joking. He dematerialized some of the extra iron around his armor in order to free up some space for himself, but even with just that small volume removed, he was already seeing sludge oozing through the cracks, squirming and wriggling angrily.

The Scarf was providing a little more information now, telling him that sludge was creeping throughout the entire network of spikes around him and even above his head. But there was still far too much iron blocking everything for the Scarf to give him a complete picture of the worm's progress.

He readied his grip on the Moon's Wrath.

Hector annihilated a huge swath of the iron all at once, freeing both himself and a tidal wave of slime, which was already falling toward him like a dark blanket. He launched himself up to meet it head on and bashed open a hole for himself with the mace. He flew out and over and landed on a sliding platform of iron to help him ease to a stop.

He'd gotten away with less sludge on him than he'd expected, but still more than could be ignored. Rather than trying to fling it off of him, however, he boxed it up, each bit. Four boxes in total, one on his arm, leg, back, and foot. Then he separated the boxes from his armor and set them down on the ground.

He didn't have time to do much more than that. The hundred other parts of the worm had reconnected, though not into one gigantic beast again. Instead, they'd formed into three, which were certainly smaller but still way too big to deal with directly.

And this was far worse, he soon discovered.

With three of them chasing him, running was harder and more chaotic than ever. They tried to surround him, to cut him off, to lead him into one another, to break apart into little ones again and confuse him while the other two tried to take advantage of the opening.

There was barely time to think.

In fact, there wasn't time to think, really. Not as a single, coherent train of thought, at least.

Again, he found his thoughts divided into separate tasks, though all of those tasks were now devoted toward the same overall purpose of saving his own ass. He had to think while also sensing openings and reacting to incoming attacks.

It was a mad and clumsy dance. He would get hit, half-covered in slime, and just keep going. For as long as his body would allow him to keep moving. His mind would reassess. He would create more iron. Flip and clean himself off. Smash a way through with the Moon's Wrath. Get hit again. Knocked on his ass. But never would he stop moving. Back on his feet. Running again. Through a cloud of slime, through the gaps that he could sense in the sludge."

"1590

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

It only kept getting more ridiculous. The worms would change their pattern, and so would Hector. They would try to trick him, and he would find the escape route or make one.

But most importantly, he kept to the plan. To isolate little bits of sludge whenever he could, to prevent them from making it back to their three big brothers.

Hector had come to realize the key factor, though only in the back of his mind.

It was the size of the worms.

When they were too big, his iron couldn't do anything to them. They would have enough mass to break or otherwise overwhelm it. But when they were small--the size of a dog, maybe--he could successfully box them in.

He could only spare enough time and mental capacity to sense them in fleeting moments, but they were there, more and more as the madness continued. His iron boxes. Littering the battlefield.

Yes. He was beginning to think that this plan could actually work. The little worms weren't able to break free. If he could just--

He sensed one of the big worms slam down and smash a dozen iron boxes, undoing half his work in an instant. And the other half? Those boxes were vibrating on their own now.

The little worms tore their way through his iron like corkscrews. Come to think of it, he'd seen worms move like that before, back when the train was first attacked. It was how they were able to tunnel through solid rock.

The worm was still learning. Still discovering its own abilities.

Insanity.

Hector was just about at the end of his rope.

What the fuck was he supposed to do here? Was this just impossible?

Well.

Of course it was.

It had been impossible from the beginning. He'd been an idiot to ever think otherwise, really. To ever have hope that he could actually win a fight like this, against a literal monster, the kind that he would've thought only existed in legends and nightmares.

He and Garovel were going to die here.

A part of him had felt that way the whole time, if he was being completely honest with himself.

But then again, a part of him always felt that way. In fact, at this point, he would've felt weirder without that feeling constantly there in the back of his mind. The only difference now was that the feeling was in the front of his mind, instead, demanding his attention.

And that was no excuse to give up.

That was no excuse for anything.

As his feet struggled to keep their balance, as his senses became crowded with waves of hungry sludge in all directions, as his hand gripped the Moon's Wrath, as he tried to brace himself with his shield, and as he angrily thought that, actually, there were still a couple things left that he wanted to try on this giant pile of sentient shit--that was when he finally felt it there in his mind.

The response."

"1591 -- CLXXI.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-One: 'The Lord of Darksteel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The overwhelming sensation of emergence in that particular moment was not immediately helpful. If anything, it made matters worse, because the feeling took him by surprise while he was mid-swing with the Moon's Wrath.

Which threw Hector off balance.

Instead of smashing cleanly through the wall of sludge in front of him, the mace stopped halfway and got stuck there. It had still managed to make an opening for him to launch himself through, which he did, but in doing so, the Moon's Wrath slipped from his grasp and was swallowed by the amassing sludge.

Hector flew farther than he expected to, as well. His iron had launched him with much more strength than he'd intended it to, and he ended up hitting the wall on the far end of the chamber, though he did at least manage to catch himself on it instead of slamming into it face first.

He slid back down to the ground, armor scraping against rock, and turned around to observe the worm.

It had stopped chasing him, for the moment. It was perhaps impossible to know what the beast was thinking or feeling--assuming it could do either of those things--but Hector got the impression from the way it was sloshing up and down that it was quite pleased with itself.

Pleased with its prize.

'It's okay,' Garovel was saying. 'Don't panic.'

Hector wasn't. As much as he might've liked to hold onto the Moon's Wrath, losing it didn't bother him terribly. Not now, at least.

Instead, he was already thinking about what he was going to do next. What he could do next.

Just before the emergence, there had been something he had wanted to try, something he had done a while ago but had yet to properly integrate into his fighting style. And now, well...

He was certain that he could get it to work.

A single iron cube appeared in orbit around him.

He added to it, doubling its mass. Tripling it. Quadrupling it. Increasing it still further, larger than anything he had yet tried to put in orbit. It became so big that he had to raise himself up on a platform so that the cube didn't scrape against the ground.

Soon enough, it was the size of a car.

The worm, having concluded its little celebration, finally noticed him again and started sloshing toward him.

Hector ramped up the speed of the cube's orbit. Faster. Faster. Still faster.

He added his soul to the boulder, though of course he knew that he couldn't compete when it came to soul-strengthening. It was just for that little bit of extra oomph. Because really, he intended to make up for that difference in power with sheer physical force.

So he didn't stop increasing its speed, even when the giant cube began whipping up a whirlwind around him, even when he could feel himself beginning to lose control of it. That was the ultimate goal, after all. He just had to focus and allow himself to lose control of it at just the right moment.

And he did."

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-One: 'The Lord of Darksteel...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The overwhelming sensation of emergence in that particular moment was not immediately helpful. If anything, it made matters worse, because the feeling took him by surprise while he was mid-swing with the Moon's Wrath.

Which threw Hector off balance.

Instead of smashing cleanly through the wall of sludge in front of him, the mace stopped halfway and got stuck there. It had still managed to make an opening for him to launch himself through, which he did, but in doing so, the Moon's Wrath slipped from his grasp and was swallowed by the amassing sludge.

Hector flew farther than he expected to, as well. His iron had launched him with much more strength than he'd intended it to, and he ended up hitting the wall on the far end of the chamber, though he did at least manage to catch himself on it instead of slamming into it face first.

He slid back down to the ground, armor scraping against rock, and turned around to observe the worm.

It had stopped chasing him, for the moment. It was perhaps impossible to know what the beast was thinking or feeling--assuming it could do either of those things--but Hector got the impression from the way it was sloshing up and down that it was quite pleased with itself.

Pleased with its prize.

'It's okay,' Garovel was saying. 'Don't panic.'

Hector wasn't. As much as he might've liked to hold onto the Moon's Wrath, losing it didn't bother him terribly. Not now, at least.

Instead, he was already thinking about what he was going to do next. What he could do next.

Just before the emergence, there had been something he had wanted to try, something he had done a while ago but had yet to properly integrate into his fighting style. And now, well...

He was certain that he could get it to work.

A single iron cube appeared in orbit around him.

He added to it, doubling its mass. Tripling it. Quadrupling it. Increasing it still further, larger than anything he had yet tried to put in orbit. It became so big that he had to raise himself up on a platform so that the cube didn't scrape against the ground.

Soon enough, it was the size of a car.

The worm, having concluded its little celebration, finally noticed him again and started sloshing toward him.

Hector ramped up the speed of the cube's orbit. Faster. Faster. Still faster.

He added his soul to the boulder, though of course he knew that he couldn't compete when it came to soul-strengthening. It was just for that little bit of extra oomph. Because really, he intended to make up for that difference in power with sheer physical force.

So he didn't stop increasing its speed, even when the giant cube began whipping up a whirlwind around him, even when he could feel himself beginning to lose control of it. That was the ultimate goal, after all. He just had to focus and allow himself to lose control of it at just the right moment.

And he did."

"1592

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

The iron boulder shot forward with a thick gust of wind that was strong enough to knock him clean off his platform. Its shape distorted in midair, and it hit the worm dead on, causing as much of an explosion as the beast's own lightning had earlier.

'Hector, what the fuck was that?! How did you just--?!'

He was only half-listening to the reaper. He was still a little disoriented from the blowback. Even though he'd tried to brace himself, he hadn't expected it to be quite that powerful.

Garovel was still talking, saying something about wind speed, but Hector needed to maintain his focus.

The worm needed time to recover, too, which was already more of an effect than a simple impact from his iron had previously had, but there was no doubt in Hector's mind that it would recover--and soon.

That was a good test run. A good foundation from which to build. Now he needed to refine and improve it.

Two more cubes appeared in orbit around him. And this time, he changed their shapes preemptively as he grew them. He knew they would begin to distort as they left his control, but he still wanted them to be less boxy.

He wanted them to be blades.

From everything he'd come to know of worms in his multiple encounters with them, he knew that the bigger they were, the more they could withstand blunt force and explosive impacts. He needed to cut it down to size.

And fortunately enough, the worm had already split itself up into three again. No doubt, it wanted to replicate its previous success with that strategy, but it was going to be sorely disappointed.

He started bounding away on rising platforms and waited for them to try to surround him.

It didn't take long.

He made it up to the second floor, which was now mostly gone, and sure enough, one of the worms rose up right in front of him while the other two chased from behind. Its mouth was already wide open as it lunged at him.

He loosed one of the blades--a circular disc with a saw-tooth edge--and cleaved the worm in two from mouth to tail. He chased the half that splattered off to the right and loosed the second disc, bisecting it again.

Those two chunks splattered against the wall, and Hector immediately boxed them in with iron while also readying more discs for the worms at his heels.

His strategy didn't end there, however. He knew from earlier that just boxing the little ones in wouldn't be enough, not when the big ones could free them.

So he brought them with him.

The two boxes full of sludge--he launched them toward himself and put them into orbit along with the still-growing discs.

The boxes were unfortunately still rather cumbersome. He could see them shaking as the sludge tried to free itself, which it probably soon would, Hector figured. But he would be ready."

"1594

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

There were so many moving parts. The shifting armor with its cooling effect. Twenty-four boxes in orbit. And five more discs, orbiting at a much higher speed, ready to be let loose.

Yet he wasn't struggling to maintain it all. He felt as if he could handle much more than this, even. But he did want to organize it a bit more. So he started allowing the twenty-four boxes to collide and attach themselves to one another. The walls of each of the cubes were maintained, however. He only wanted to group them together, like miniature hotels, perhaps. Each piece of sludge stayed where it was, in its own room, but now the rooms were grouped together horizontally.

He found it even easier to keep track of, and perhaps most importantly, it freed extra space in orbit around him. He was going to be needing that soon, he felt.

The worm below had amassed itself back into a single beast again. It appeared to be biding its time, searching for debris to devour and absorb while it waited for Hector to come for it.

Somehow, he didn't much care for that. At this point, he almost would've preferred it to keep acting like a rabid animal.

And perhaps that was why it wasn't doing that.

The thing wasn't nearly as stupid as he might have hoped, Hector knew. If it wanted him to attack first, it was probably going to try something sneaky. And it hadn't used its lightning in a while, either, as it had been divided.

That was going to be a problem, with all this iron swirling around him. He'd have to be even more mindful of it.

'Hector, wait a minute,' said Garovel.

'What?' He'd been just about to leap down there.

'The treasure pile over there. There are a few mirrors in it. I want you to grab one. The largest you can carry unhindered.'

Hector saw the pile he was referring to and started making his way over. It was a bit scattered compared to when they'd first arrived but still mostly intact. He still had to ask, though, 'Why a mirror?'

'Just a precaution,' the reaper said. 'The worm ate the Moon's Wrath, remember? And there are rumors that these bastards can absorb powers.'

Hector understood. It would be like the time he fought Harper, in other words. Thinking back on that experience, he very much hoped it didn't come to that.

He found a mirror that seemed suitable, if maybe a bit expensive-looking with its bejeweled and golden paneling. According to the Scarf of Amordiin, it was the largest one here, being slightly taller and wider than Haqq's shield. He decided not to carry it, though, wanting to keep his right hand free, and instead chose to encase it in iron and add it to his orbital collection.

Garovel chuckled. 'That's pretty handy.'

Hector could only agree.

He started back toward the worm, going over his next plan in his head."

"1593

Moving with his iron was easier than ever. He hardly even had to think about it. He only had to know where he wanted to go and how he wanted to get there, and his iron carried him as if on the nose of a train--or in the mouth of a snake, perhaps, considering how trivial it was to weave in between piles of rock and eager slime. And the Scarf of Amordiin was certainly helping in that regard, too. Being able to sense the worms attacking before Garovel even had a chance to warn him was immensely valuable.

Another of the worms dove in mouth-first, and Hector slid out of its path on a suspended railway of iron. The opening was clear, and he took full advantage, loosing another sawblade. He had tried to evolve it another step, though, and added a second, perpendicular disc to it. So instead of splitting the worm in two, it split in four.

He didn't let up on the pressure, either. His next work was three sawblades melded into one, and he loosed it on one of the four sections he'd just made, dicing it up even more.

Those looked small enough. He boxed all the little sludgy chunks in iron and added them to his orbital collection as he readied still more discs.

These six new boxes were clearly much more stable than the first two, Hector sensed. They weren't shaking nearly as much and--

Yeah, the sludge was already breaking through the larger two, drilling holes into them and trying to goop its way out.

He could've just added more iron to the boxes to try and keep the troublemakers where they were, but he didn't want to do that. Instead, he saw an opportunity with the next worm lunging after him.

Hector annihilated the first two boxes and allowed the sludge therein a blissful moment of freedom right as the nearest worm dove in and missed. Then a multi-sawblade sliced through all of them at once, creating a fresh new batch of collectible sludge.

That was twelve more little boxes in orbit. And after another two discs for the worm that had so graciously offered itself up to him, Hector had another batch of six on top of that, bringing him to a grand total of twenty-four boxes so far, all orbiting around him as he eased himself onto the third floor.

Even with all of that work, there was still plenty more slime sloshing around below. Math wasn't really his forte, but from his estimation, it looked like he'd reduced its overall mass by maybe a third or so.

However, the sludge that remained seemed to be thinking twice about chasing him now.

'Sweet Cocora,' said Garovel. 'Hector, that was... I'm not even sure what to...'

Hector didn't want to be too pleased with himself. 'It's not over yet.' He double-checked the boxes in orbit around him. They were trembling a little but holding, nonetheless."

"1595

He didn't want to rush in and attack the worm directly. He had a feeling that that would be playing into its slimy, nonexistent hands and would probably get himself counterattacked in some way. And at this distance, simply launching more discs probably wouldn't do much. They were fast, sure, but the worm's reactions were pretty fast, too, from what he could tell, and he wanted to save the discs anyway for an opportune moment. Right now, they were probably his best means of getting out of a very bad situation.

So he decided to go for something different--something that would allow him to easily harass the beast from afar and hopefully piss it off.

He'd been wanting to try using temperature manipulation offensively since the beginning of the fight, but he knew that it was still unstable here in the Undercrust. The moment he materialized any freezing iron, the ambient heat would cause it to weaken or even explode. Not particularly useful for caging a worm--and having endured one of those explosions himself, he was pretty sure they wouldn't have enough force behind them to actually damage this monster.

It might be enough to annoy it, though. And he wanted to see if he could make the explosions any more powerful now, too.

He materialized a frozen boulder of iron, as big as the worm itself, and let it drop on the beast's head.

It didn't do much. It certainly didn't explode. It must've had too much mass for the heat to compromise its structure that quickly. The worm didn't seem particularly bothered by it, either, and just oozed out from below it and continued on its merry way, gobbling up debris.

Dammit. He annihilated the boulder.

Maybe this wouldn't even work. He was going to have to figure out the optimal mass for these particular atmospheric conditions, and how many guesses would that require?

Or maybe...? Maybe he could keep the mass the same and just keep decreasing the temperature?

Hmm.

Surely, the lower the temperature of his iron, the more intensely the heat of the Undercrust would clash with it.

Worth a shot, he supposed. He had no idea how low he could push the temperature now. Hell, he didn't even know that before the emergence. He hadn't had the occasion or the notion to find the exact limitations of his ability to manipulate temperature.

But now was as good a time as any to find out.

Temperature manipulation was a funny thing. He'd come to realize that it wasn't like other techniques. He couldn't achieve it by just visualizing it in his mind the way he did when he was creating shapes or adding iron to things. With temperature, it was more like a command, as if he were giving his iron an order that it had no choice but to follow.

Velocity states were similar in that regard, but still not quite the same. With velocity, spatial awareness was as equally important as the command was, but with temperature, it was more... emotional.

Yeah. That was exactly what it was, Hector was beginning to realize."
"1596

The command had to be impassioned when it came to temperature. Not angry or anything like that. Just emotionally stronger in relation to the degree of desired change.

At least, that was the easiest way for him to conceptualize it.

The next boulder that he dropped on the worm was well below freezing, but it was still only enough to make it crack audibly. It did seem to annoy the worm a little more, though, so that was something.

The beast reared its head back and vomited lightning all the way up toward him.

Hector was already dodging. The explosion rocked the third floor, but he was well out of its blast radius and only had to endure a few pebbles bouncing off his armor.

Third time was the charm, he felt. The next boulder was even colder still, and it did explode as it materialized above the worm's body.

The blast splattered the worm across the bottom floor, and he could see the sludge bubbling with what he thought might be irritation.

So he annihilated the scattered chunks of iron and did it again right as the worm was reforming.

After that, the worm didn't even bother fully reforming before it started sloshing its way upward like a vertical tidal wave.

Yeah, he was pretty sure he'd pissed it off now.

He leapt up, above the enormous chasm in the third floor, and loosed another disc at max speed. The knockback from the sonic boom was enough to send him up higher through the air and touch the ceiling briefly as he watched the disc cut through the sludge like a knife through warm butter.

He took advantage of his position and bounced off the ceiling in order to shoot himself straight downward, eager to pick up more boxes of sludge for his collection.

The glaring crackle of lightning got in his way, however, and he only had a split second's warning to materialize a lightning rod for himself there in midair. He only just managed to ground it against the rock wall before it exploded right in front of him.

Haqq's shield took the brunt of the impact for him, and he continued through, smote black and covered in iron dust but no worse for wear.

Then he saw the laser.

It was too fast to react to, appearing all at once, as lasers do. He only knew that it originated from straight ahead.

The shield took the brunt of it. But not all of it. The beam was just a little too broad, and everything immediately around the shield got hit with the beam as well.

Hector's body was split in two. The beam cut through his armor like it was nothing, making his shield-arm separate from the rest of him.

The same arm that was holding Garovel.

And it was falling into an ocean of sludge.

Hector reacted without even thinking, loosing every disc he'd had in waiting while simultaneously growing a half-dozen more.

And the ocean parted."

"1597

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 20))

Hector went to work while he could, boxing up every bit of isolated sludge that he could sense. It was everywhere, but so was his spatial awareness, and iron clapped together in rapid succession. He pulled them all toward him. More for the collection. So much more. It was almost complete now.

He hit the ground floor just after his arm did.

'You alright?' he asked.

'Yeah,' said Garovel, though he sounded a little shaken and followed it up with a sigh.

Only a few puddles of sludge were left after all that, and Hector could sense exactly where they were while he retrieved his shield and reaper. His arm was still regrowing, so Hector took his time but never stopped keeping track of his opponent, even in its weakened state.

Hector felt like Garovel could use some encouragement. Without a doubt, that had been one of their closest brushes with death, just now. 'Ah... you were right about the worm absorbing the power of the Moon's Wrath.'

'Mm. Looks like you didn't need that mirror, though.'

Hector eyed the iron-encased mirror as it orbited past his field of view. 'It'll make a good souvenir. Or maybe we can sell it. It looked expensive.'

'Would you mind just finishing the fight, already? You're making me nervous.'

His arm still had a bit more to go, but maybe he didn't need it.

The last bit of sludge had managed to reaccumulate into a cow-sized lump, and it was hiding behind a pile of debris on the other side of the room.

That was too big to add to his collection, so he'd have to break it up.

With a wave of his hand, Hector dropped a cluster of deeply frozen javelins on it. They exploded and blew the worm to pieces.

He boxed the final remnants up and started gathering them. Little iron boxes, sliding across the uneven ground toward him, pushing themselves along a track in the same way that he had made his iron do many times before.

And he completed his worm collection.

He exhaled a ragged breath. Dozens upon dozens of iron boxes floated around him in synchronous orbit, crowding up the space around him with so much mass that it completely blocked his normal vision, at times.

And they were all clear to him, in his mind. There were seventy-two of them there, including the larger, hotel-like one that he'd made earlier. And a couple discs, as well, which he now decided to dematerialize.

'Well done, my friend.'

Relieved as he felt, Hector was also a little confused now. Was the fight over? He was pretty sure he'd won. The worm couldn't break free of its many tiny cages, even if it wasn't technically dead.

'Uh... so now what, Garovel?'

'Good question. I figured Malast would've teleported us by now.'

‘Hmm.’

‘Do you think you can destroy the little chunks of the worm, one at a time?’

‘Uh... yeah, probably.’

‘Try that, then. It might take a while, but you’ll work your way up to destroying ninety percent of its body mass eventually, right?’

‘Alright.’ He set to work."

"1598 -- CLXXII.

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 20))

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Two: ‘Thine ambition, grasp firmly...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Royo Raju frowned tiredly. He didn’t know what to do now.

Frankly, when he’d been teleported into that chamber with Hector and a giant worm, seeing them both seconds away from crushing him like an insect, Royo had not wanted any part of it. Fighting human opponents was one thing. Even superhumans, he could deal with. But a damn worm, too?

He had lived in the Undercrust all his life. He knew only too well what those abominations were capable of.

So he had fled. He had used the Pendant of Unso and gotten the hell out of there. It was one of the wiser decisions he’d made lately, Royo felt. He had hoped that the worm would eliminate the Senmurui for him, especially considering the worm wasn’t an actual competitor in the tournament, meaning that Royo would win by default as the last man standing. In theory, anyway. He wasn’t sure if Malast would have made him fight the worm anyway, but presumably not, if the Idle God genuinely did want a successor for Secho.

Not that it mattered now, of course.

He and everyone else had witnessed Hector's battle, thanks to Malast--or rather, thanks to the Staff of Unso.

An artifact, according to the Piercing Eye, which was capable of creating traversable rifts in space when used in conjunction with Heartstone. Created 1,348 years ago by Unso.

What Heartstone was, Royo had yet to work out, nor did it seem as though he would know anytime soon.

Fatigue had reared its ugly head after that reading. Certainly, the battle with Seyos had been exhausting, but this was beyond merely that. It was a side effect of using the Piercing Eye so much, he was convinced.

So he had stopped using it, despite very much wanting to. He had managed to catch a glimpse of the absolute abyss of information that was sitting right there in front of him, in the form of the Idle God.

Royo didn't know what would happen if he tried to wade into that territory. If he didn't already feel on the verge of passing out, he might have been more tempted to try it.

And so, here he now was, sitting on the ground and trying to recuperate--or at least think of some sort of plan, maybe--while he observed the Senmurai finishing off that monster.

He could hear the one called Zeff laughing faintly. "Impossible," the man was saying, sounding equal parts amused and incredulous.

Only minutes ago, the man had been shouting at Malast--and even threatening and grabbing him by the neck. He didn't seem to understand or perhaps even care that he was speaking to a god.

Malast had only sat there, however, telling him that it wouldn't be fair to let him join the tournament this late, even though he would make a suitable vessel for Secho.

The one called Zeff had seemed as though he were about to become violent, until suddenly, the Senmurai started winning.

It was so profoundly unfair.

Confident as he was in himself, Royo didn't think he was a match for the Senmurai. Certainly not now. Not after what he'd just seen."
"1598 -- CLXXII.

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 20))

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Two: 'Thine ambition, grasp firmly...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Royo Raju frowned tiredly. He didn't know what to do now.

Frankly, when he'd been teleported into that chamber with Hector and a giant worm, seeing them both seconds away from crushing him like an insect, Royo had not wanted any part of it. Fighting human opponents was one thing. Even superhumans, he could deal with. But a damn worm, too?

He had lived in the Undercrust all his life. He knew only too well what those abominations were capable of.

So he had fled. He had used the Pendant of Unso and gotten the hell out of there. It was one of the wiser decisions he'd made lately, Royo felt. He had hoped that the worm would eliminate the Senmurai for him, especially considering the worm wasn't an actual competitor in the tournament, meaning that Royo would win by default as the last man standing. In theory, anyway. He wasn't sure if Malast would have made him fight the worm anyway, but presumably not, if the Idle God genuinely did want a successor for Secho.

Not that it mattered now, of course.

He and everyone else had witnessed Hector's battle, thanks to Malast--or rather, thanks to the Staff of Unso.

An artifact, according to the Piercing Eye, which was capable of creating traversable rifts in space when used in conjunction with Heartstone. Created 1,348 years ago by Unso.

What Heartstone was, Royo had yet to work out, nor did it seem as though he would know anytime soon.

Fatigue had reared its ugly head after that reading. Certainly, the battle with Seyos had been exhausting, but this was beyond merely that. It was a side effect of using the Piercing Eye so much, he was convinced.

So he had stopped using it, despite very much wanting to. He had managed to catch a glimpse of the absolute abyss of information that was sitting right there in front of him, in the form of the Idle God.

Royo didn't know what would happen if he tried to wade into that territory. If he didn't already feel on the verge of passing out, he might have been more tempted to try it.

And so, here he now was, sitting on the ground and trying to recuperate--or at least think of some sort of plan, maybe--while he observed the Senmurai finishing off that monster.

He could hear the one called Zeff laughing faintly. "Impossible," the man was saying, sounding equal parts amused and incredulous.

Only minutes ago, the man had been shouting at Malast--and even threatening and grabbing him by the neck. He didn't seem to understand or perhaps even care that he was speaking to a god.

Malast had only sat there, however, telling him that it wouldn't be fair to let him join the tournament this late, even though he would make a suitable vessel for Secho.

The one called Zeff had seemed as though he were about to become violent, until suddenly, the Senmurai started winning.

It was so profoundly unfair.

Confident as he was in himself, Royo didn't think he was a match for the Senmurai. Certainly not now. Not after what he'd just seen."
"1599

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 20))

Such was the essence of life. Unfairness. That was a lesson he had somehow refused to learn as a child, despite being confronted with all the evidence in the world.

Even now, a part of him still wanted to refuse. It didn't care how impossible the feat was or how drained he felt or even how close to dying he'd come on several occasions now.

That part of him was telling him that, sure, maybe he couldn't beat the Senmurai, but maybe he could still outwit him. Maybe the Senmurai didn't have what it took to be truly merciless in this tournament. Maybe he could just refuse to surrender, to force the Senmurai to make a choice of either killing him in cold blood or losing the tournament.

That was the one rule that Malast had specified, after all. Victory was achieved when one's opponent either died or surrendered.

It was a foolish plan, to be sure, but that part of him was telling Royo to try it, anyway. To be bold and unrelenting. To be himself.

But there were at least two major problems with that plan that Royo could think of. The first was, of course, what if Hector really did just kill him? While it was true that Royo's instinct was telling him that the young surface-dweller wouldn't be able to do it, he also didn't really know him well enough to gamble with his own life so confidently.

The second problem was that--even if Royo's instinct was correct and Hector couldn't bring himself to kill him--the choice was a false dichotomy. Hector wouldn't actually HAVE to surrender to Royo. The fight could simply become an indefinite stalemate.

And the Senmurai was immortal, while Royo was not.

If Hector really wanted to, he could just wait Royo out, even if it took years. More likely, though, it would only take until Royo starved to death in this godforsaken place.

So, yes. Royo could no longer see a realistic path to victory in this game they were playing.

"Well?" came the voice of the Idle God. "Hidden One? Are you going to fight the Iron One or not? I may be the most patient being in all of Creation, but if you plan on surrendering, then there's no need to draw things out."

Royo was having a hard time just keeping his eyes open. Every muscle in his body ached. The cut on his chest that he'd received from Seyos was just an extra helping of pain, as was the freezing burn that he'd received accidentally from the one called Zeff a couple days ago. And really, he just wanted to go to sleep. To let his weary mind rest.

He had about a thousand reasons to surrender, right now. It would've been so easy.

And yet, he couldn't bring himself to say the words.

Instead, he was thinking that this game was all wrong. Surely, if there was no means by which a player could achieve the proposed objective, then that was no game at all, was it? It was a foregone conclusion. Rigged."

"1600

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 4 of 20))

He'd encountered games like this before. Hell, he'd helped make a few of them. So he knew that there was really only one thing, besides surrendering, that players could do when they found themselves besieged from all angles like this.

Change the game.

Everyone was staring at Royo now, waiting for his response.

Royo kept his gaze locked on Malast as he chose his next words very carefully. "...What will you do if the Iron One, as you call him, actually wins this tournament?"

"What do you mean?" said Malast. "I'll give him Secho's remains, as I said I would."

"...And what if he accepts Secho's remains, but decides not to use them?" said Royo.

Malast made no response.

"What if he elects not to become a god," said Royo. "What will you do, then?"

"That wouldn't make any sense," said Malast, though he sounded uncertain. "He could have surrendered at any time. Why would he have fought so hard in this tournament, if he didn't wish to win?"

"He does wish to win," said Royo. "He simply does not want the prize. At least, not to use."

"What does he want it for, then?"

“He wants to keep it so that none may use it,” said Royo. He didn’t actually know that, of course, but as long as it supported his cause and sounded convincing, then it didn’t matter whether it was true or not. As long as he said it with complete and utter confidence, then maybe Malast would believe it. “His goal is not to harness the power you are offering. His goal is to prevent anyone else from harnessing that power for evil--or what he views as evil, at least.”

Malast smacked his lips but didn’t say anything.

“Ask him yourself, if you want,” said Royo, in truth hoping that Malast wouldn’t do that. Perhaps this wasn’t the time for such a simple trick as reverse psychology, but he did have something to follow it up with. “Just don’t expect him to tell you the truth. Obviously, he would not want you to realize that he has no intention of doing as you want him to.”

The one called Zeff intervened. “What the hell are you talking about? What is all this nonsense about becoming a god?”

This was precisely what Royo didn’t need, right now. Why couldn’t this problematic fool have just stayed where he was back in Himmekel? Royo didn’t even know how the hell the one called Zeff had managed to get here.

“I thought you already knew all about that,” said Malast. “That’s what this whole tournament is for. Wasn’t that why you wanted to join?”

“I didn’t want to join your moronic tournament!” said Zeff. “I just want my people back! Either bring Hector here now or take me to him so that I can bring him back myself!”

“The tournament isn’t over yet.” Malast’s eyes returned to Royo. “Or is it?”

"1601

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 5 of 20))

Royo grimaced. There was no good way to answer that question directly. So he avoided it. “You must know by now that I will use your gift. I will not let it go to waste. Your friend Secho would be reborn with me, absolutely.”

And Royo saw Malast hesitate.

The one called Elise chimed in. "Why don't you just admit that you're too scared to fight Lord Darksteel and surrender?" she said.

What an obnoxious woman--and made all the more so, because he knew that she wasn't wrong.

He didn't have the energy to argue with her, though. What would be the point? To keep up appearances? Everyone present must have been able to tell that he was an exhausted wreck.

Besides, it didn't matter. He wouldn't achieve victory here by winning her over. Or any of these other interlopers, either. They were inconsequential. It was only Malast whom he needed to convince.

And judging from the Idle God's expression and sudden quietude, Royo felt like that might just be possible, after all. Malast probably didn't care one iota about any of these people or their opinions. Malast only wanted his friend back.

"Do you truly wish to see Secho again, or do you not?" said Royo.

"Ugh, you're not really listening to this, are you?" said the surface-woman. "He is obviously just--"

"Be silent," said Malast, with familiar force.

And she was. Her mouth continued to open, but no words came out.

The one called Zeff grabbed Malast by the throat. "What have you done to her?!" he roared.

"Begone with you." The Staff of Unso shined in Malast's hand.

And the one called Zeff vanished into thin air along with his ghost.

Royo blinked, thinking for a second that Malast had just annihilated the two of them. But then he saw them appear in the viewing window, alongside the Senmurai, whose body language suggested that he was quite surprised to see them.

Silence fell as no one else dared speak.

Even Royo was hesitant.

At length, Malast finally asked him something. "...Why would the Iron One believe that you would abuse Secho's power?"

A dangerous question, that one. "Because he is mistaken," said Royo, hoping that wasn't a foolish thing to say. Perhaps that could be helped with a qualifying follow up. "But of course, I cannot read his mind and know his reasoning with complete certainty. Perhaps he merely thinks that none should wield such power."

Malast sighed that familiar sigh of his. "Well, he wouldn't be the first."

Madly and impulsively, Royo wanted to say that Malast should simply ask Hector himself, but he was fortunately able to stop himself. No good would come of bringing Hector into this conversation, he felt.

"I think I'll ask him," said Malast.

It took everything Royo had not to scowl as he watched Hector and his ghost vanish from the viewing window and reappear in front of Malast.

Goddammit."

"1602

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 6 of 20))

The Senmurai noticed Royo there immediately, and the two exchanged looks.

"Eleyo," came the surface-dweller's armor-tinged voice. "Are you okay? You don't look so good..."

The answer to that, of course, was no. He felt like he might collapse if he lost focus for even a moment, but that was neither here nor there.

Even now, the Senmurai was making metal hover around himself, as if to intimidate Royo, as if to imply that he wasn't even tired after that grueling fight that everyone had just witnessed.

These damn supermen...

"Iron One," interrupted Malast. "Why do you wish to become a god?"

The question seemed to surprise him. "Uh... I don't."

Malast looked over at Royo.

Yes. That was the ideal answer.

"Then why did you apparently risk your life fighting that worm?" said Malast.

There came a long period of silence.

Then Hector finally said, "...Wait, what? I could've surrendered against it?"

Malast blinked dully at him. "Of course you could have. Are you stupid?"

"Hey, I... What? The last time I checked, none of the contestants were giant slime monsters. I didn't think that qualified as a proper match or whatever. I thought--agh... I--just... agh..."

"Mm. So in other words, you were fighting for your life, not to win the tournament."

"Yes! But wait a second! Are you really saying you would've teleported us out of there, if we'd asked you to?!"

"Of course I would have."

"What?! Why?!"

"What do you mean, why?"

"I thought you didn't care!" said Hector. "You kept on telling us about how much you don't care about anything, so I thought Garovel and I were just screwed!"

"Ah... hmm." Malast scratched his chin thoughtfully. "Well, I can understand why you would think that, but still, you could have at least asked, no? It would have been in perfect accordance with the rule I established before the tournament. And I mean, c'mon. I'm not entirely without empathy."

"Oh yeah? Is that why you forced everyone into a tournament without even asking us if we wanted to participate first?"

"What need was there to ask?" said Malast. "If you didn't want to participate, you could have just surrendered in the first round."

“Malast.” The Senmurai broke for a groan of exasperation. “It’s not that simple. Some of these people are my allies, you know. Friends. But others--we barely even know each other. And not to mention, we have completely different levels of strength, too. Pitting us against each other made no sense...”

“Sure it did,” said Malast, though he offered no counterargument.

“It was also kind of cruel,” Hector added.

“What? Cruel? I don’t see how.”

“It was really dangerous and confusing!” The Senmurai was looking around now. “Is everybody okay, by the way?!”

There were a few words of acknowledgment thrown out from everyone else.

“The only casualty in the tournament was that of Seyos,” said Malast.

Hector paused. “So it was dangerous and someone did die.”

“Ah... well... yes.”

Royo wasn’t sure what was happening. Why did it suddenly sound like the Senmurai was winning this argument? And why did the Idle God sound like a child being scolded?"

"1603

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 7 of 20))

“You see?” said Hector. “Just because you have the power to do things like that to people, doesn’t mean you should. Especially not without asking their permission first. I mean, you’re a god, aren’t you? Have a sense of responsibility or something!”

“I... I do have a sense of responsibility...”

Rather than responding, the Senmurai just stared at him, waiting for elaboration.

“I--” Malast looked over his audience. “Ugh. Why do you think I never intervene in the affairs of your kind? Despite constantly being asked to, no less? It's because I have a responsibility to let you be the makers of your own fate."

"...Is that really true?" The Senmurai probably could not have sounded more doubtful if he tried.

"Yeah," added the one called Diego. He was sitting cross-legged on the ground with his ghost in his lap. "Seems like you intervened pretty hard with this little tournament of yours."

"You, return to silence," said Malast.

And again, the one called Diego found himself unable to speak.

"Was that really necessary?" said Hector.

"I find that one's voice particularly irritating for some reason."

Hector folded his armored arms. "He's not wrong, though. You did intervene in our affairs, didn't you?"

Malast's expression twitched. "That's. Because. Secho. Secho is an exception."

"Why?"

"Because!" said Malast with uncharacteristic fervor. "I told you before! He is my only friend! The only thing I have ever liked!"

"Okay," allowed Hector. "But then, doesn't that mean that the real reason you don't intervene in our affairs is just because you don't feel like it? Because we don't interest you? I mean, you are the God of Boredom, after all."

"I... well... that's... true, but..."

"I mean, you can rationalize it all you want, but you can't honestly say that you have a sense of responsibility if you're really just doing what you feel like doing."

And Malast appeared to be lost for words.

This was getting out of hand, Royo felt. He had no idea what the Senmurai's game here was, but it didn't seem like a good idea to just let it go unchecked.

He would have to challenge Hector himself, if there was to be any hope of rescuing Malast from him.

“Senmurai,” said Royo, gaining everyone’s attention. There was no point in pulling his punches. He needed to turn the conversation into favorable territory. “If Malast gives you the Urn of Growth, will you use it to merge with Secho’s remains? Or will you simply take it and do nothing with it?”

“Ah...”

Good. That seemed to have removed some of that momentum.

“Why are you asking?” said Hector.

An easy question to answer. “Because it is highly relevant to achieving a desirable resolution from our current circumstances. Malast wants nothing more than his friend to return to him.” He spared the Idle God a pitying glance. “Now, perhaps the manner in which he has gone about it... has been less than ideal, but he never claimed to be a perfect being, despite whatever biases you and I may possess toward the term ‘god.’”

"1604

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 8 of 20))

“...If that’s really all he wants,” said Hector, “then why hasn’t he done it by now?” He looked toward Malast again. “How many years have you been down here, holding onto that thing?”

Malast bobbed his head, having regained some composure, apparently. “...It has been quite a long time, I suppose. But then again, time is not time.”

“Oh, please, no,” said the Senmurai. “Don’t even start with that shit...”

“Bearers of the Supreme Will are quite rare,” said Malast. “And on top of that, finding one who is agreeable makes the task even more difficult. I tried in the past to find a suitable vessel for Secho, but to no avail.”

“...Did you really try that hard?” said Hector. “Are you sure you didn’t just get bored and lazy?”

"I... that's..." Malast grit his teeth, and then added force to his next words. "Be silent."

"...No," was all Hector said, unfazed.

"Agh... Supreme-Will-having bastard..." He broke for a familiar sigh. "Look. The point is, I had just about given up hope of ever seeing my friend reborn when Ettol finally arrived and said that he would help me out."

That piqued Royo's interest--and the Senmurai's, by the look of it.

Royo spoke up first, however. "Why did Ettol decide to help you?"

"I don't know," said Malast. "That guy never explains himself. And I honestly thought he was full of crap, until the three of you showed up."

"Three?" said Hector.

"Three suitable vessels. You, the Hidden One, and the Angry One."

Royo didn't need to ask. He had a pretty good idea of who the Angry One was. And Malast was probably right to think that the one called Zeff would not be very agreeable to his offer. Not in these circumstances, at least.

"Hmm," hummed Hector. "How did Secho die, anyway?"

Malast paused at that, shifting somewhat in his tall stone chair. "The Void rended him from existence."

Royo felt the air grow abruptly more tense when Malast said that, almost as if the Idle God's sheer animosity had been made physical.

A curious sensation, Royo thought.

"The Void?" said Hector while Royo was distracted. "You're telling me the Void is real, too?"

Malast seemed confused by that question. "Real? Of course not. How could the Void be real? The Void is all that is not. Non-existence cannot be real."

"...Excuse me?"

Royo didn't quite follow that, either.

“Whatever,” said Malast. “I’m not good at explaining things, okay? Can we just get back to resurrecting Secho, please? I’d like to get a nap in later, and this annoying conversation is really eating into my me time.”

Royo saw the opening and took it. “It should be clear by now that I am your only reliable option. You must know beyond doubt that I will absolutely revive Secho for you.”

“Hold on--” tried Hector.

“No, he’s right,” said Malast. “He is far more agreeable than you are, Iron One.””

"1605

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 9 of 20))

Yes! But Royo kept his weary eyes on Hector, wary of becoming too hopeful.

“Do you think the Hidden One will abuse Secho’s power?” said Malast.

And to Royo’s surprise, Hector did not immediately say yes.

Instead, the Senmurai hesitated. “I... ah...”

Royo was confused to see such apparent meekness from him, but he didn’t let the opportunity escape. “You needn’t worry. I give you my word that I will not abuse Secho’s power.”

Malast regarded Royo with a flat look. “Maybe you will, maybe you won’t. But if that is the Iron One’s concern, then I can understand it. And though the tournament seems to have reached a premature end, I believe it is obvious enough that the Iron One would have been the victor.”

Royo wished he could’ve argued with that, but he could imagine that if he did, Malast would call his bluff and force them to go fight. And that was precisely what Royo had been trying to avoid this whole time.

“As such,” the Idle God went on, “since I will be giving his prize to another, the Iron One deserves a different prize. A prize which may one day serve to check yours, Hidden One, should you ever decide to misuse it.”

Royo Raju exchanged looks with the Senmurai.

They said nothing. It felt as if they didn't need to.

For his part, Royo sensed a kind of silent understanding between them.

A prize to check his own.

Royo wasn't in love with the idea, but he doubted he would ever get a better offer. And though he didn't know what was going through the Senmurai's head right now, he had a feeling that Hector felt the same way.

But it felt like more than that, too. Somehow.

He had never put much stock in prophecies, but he was a believer in destiny. He had never thought that mere mortals could--or even should--see what awaited them in the future. Destiny was important and meaningful, but spending one's time trying to predict it was folly, he felt.

Yet now, he did not know how else to explain this feeling. Perhaps it was because there were more than just “mere mortals” present. Whatever the case, it made him feel as if his destiny was being inextricably bound to this person. As if, one day, the Senmurai would become either his greatest ally or greatest foe.

He wondered if the Senmurai was feeling similarly in this moment. He almost considered using the Piercing Eye to try to find out.

Then, after the moment passed, the Idle God, He Who Sits, did something that no one was expecting him to do.

He stood.

“Alright,” said Malast as he walked over to the Senmurai, “let's see here...” He reached out with one hand.

The Senmurai, rather understandably, recoiled away from him.

Malast took notice and paused there. “Fear not. I will do you no harm. Allow me to place my hand upon you.””

"1606 -- CLXXIII.

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 10 of 20))

And with reluctance that was visible in his body language, the Senmurai did so. "W-what are you going to do?" he asked as the Idle God's hand found the pate of his helmet.

Malast ignored the question in favor of a long period of silence, instead. "Mm... yes... I see. As I thought. You possess the blessing of Focus."

"What?" said Hector.

"Granted to you, I presume, by that 'Rasalased' you mentioned before. Your prize, then, shall be a second blessing to complement that one. I shall grant you Domain."

"Uh... er, what does that do?"

Malast spared Royo a sidelong glance. "I do not think I would be doing you any favors by explaining its workings in front of the Hidden One." He allowed a beat to pass. "Also, I hate explaining things. I'm no good at it. I'm sure you'll figure it out on your own. You'll have to be patient, though. Like your first blessing, and like Secho's power, it will require time to grow."

"Ah, um, okay..."

There was another long period of silence.

"...Hmm," said Malast.

"Uh," said Hector. "Everything going okay up there?"

"Oh, sure. Of course. Sorry. It's just. I've only ever granted a blessing once before. It's a little weirder than I remember. Probably because you already have one. It's fine, though. Don't worry."

"...Are you sure? Because you sound a little worried, yourself."

"I said it's fine. I've got this. I mean, it might start to hurt here in a little bit, but that's how you'll know it's working."

“Wait, what?”

“Uh-oh.”

“What?! What does uh-oh mean?!”

“No, it’s fine. Might want to brace yourself, though.”

“For what?! I don’t--!”

The Senmurai’s armor exploded, and Hector went flying backward, all the way to the other side of the chamber, and slammed against the wall. He wasn’t dead, though, judging from the screams of agony that were coming out of him.

A few items had fallen out of his obliterated armor and landed at Malast’s feet.

“Oh, you dropped some things.” The Idle God bent down to pick them up, bundling them adjacent the Urn of Growth in his other hand.

Hector was apparently too busy enduring pure hell to respond, however.

Malast gave a nod. “I’ll just hold onto them for you, I guess...” Then his gaze turned toward Royo.

Suddenly, Royo wasn’t so sure that he wanted to become a god, anymore.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Three: ‘Ascension in body and spirit...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn’t just pain. It was existential confusion. Where he was. Who he was. What he was doing. All of that knowledge escaped his mind and danced around it like teasing little gremlins, poking and prodding him, daring him to chase them in vain as Hector stumbled around in his own head.

Oh, but it was pain, too. There was still plenty of that, to be sure. More than he’d ever felt, possibly. It was hard to judge when every fiber of his being was on fire and imaginary horrors were beginning to rear up in his mind, parting the turbulent ocean of his thoughts and terrorizing him in ways that he had never known previously."

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 10 of 20))

And with reluctance that was visible in his body language, the Senmurai did so. "W-what are you going to do?" he asked as the Idle God's hand found the pate of his helmet.

Malast ignored the question in favor of a long period of silence, instead. "Mm... yes... I see. As I thought. You possess the blessing of Focus."

"What?" said Hector.

"Granted to you, I presume, by that 'Rasalased' you mentioned before. Your prize, then, shall be a second blessing to complement that one. I shall grant you Domain."

"Uh... er, what does that do?"

Malast spared Royo a sidelong glance. "I do not think I would be doing you any favors by explaining its workings in front of the Hidden One." He allowed a beat to pass. "Also, I hate explaining things. I'm no good at it. I'm sure you'll figure it out on your own. You'll have to be patient, though. Like your first blessing, and like Secho's power, it will require time to grow."

"Ah, um, okay..."

There was another long period of silence.

"...Hmm," said Malast.

"Uh," said Hector. "Everything going okay up there?"

"Oh, sure. Of course. Sorry. It's just. I've only ever granted a blessing once before. It's a little weirder than I remember. Probably because you already have one. It's fine, though. Don't worry."

"...Are you sure? Because you sound a little worried, yourself."

"I said it's fine. I've got this. I mean, it might start to hurt here in a little bit, but that's how you'll know it's working."

"Wait, what?"

"Uh-oh."

"What?! What does uh-oh mean?!"

"No, it's fine. Might want to brace yourself, though."

"For what?! I don't--!"

The Senmurai's armor exploded, and Hector went flying backward, all the way to the other side of the chamber, and slammed against the wall. He wasn't dead, though, judging from the screams of agony that were coming out of him.

A few items had fallen out of his obliterated armor and landed at Malast's feet.

"Oh, you dropped some things." The Idle God bent down to pick them up, bundling them adjacent the Urn of Growth in his other hand.

Hector was apparently too busy enduring pure hell to respond, however.

Malast gave a nod. "I'll just hold onto them for you, I guess..." Then his gaze turned toward Royo.

Suddenly, Royo wasn't so sure that he wanted to become a god, anymore.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Three: 'Ascension in body and spirit...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn't just pain. It was existential confusion. Where he was. Who he was. What he was doing. All of that knowledge escaped his mind and danced around it like teasing little gremlins, poking and prodding him, daring him to chase them in vain as Hector stumbled around in his own head.

Oh, but it was pain, too. There was still plenty of that, to be sure. More than he'd ever felt, possibly. It was hard to judge when every fiber of his being was on fire and imaginary horrors were beginning to rear up in his mind, parting the turbulent ocean of his thoughts and terrorizing him in ways that he had never known previously."

"1607

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 11 of 20))

There was no compartmentalizing his thoughts this time. No way to disassociate himself from the confusion and agony. His mind was consumed in full, and he thought he saw all manner of things which defied comprehension or even visual cohesion.

Monsters with faces. Humanoid but distorted. Distended. Burning with light or fire or energy or some other thing that he couldn't even conceptualize. The colors, the fury, the chaos, the madness. Raw emotion made flesh. Raw flesh made emotion.

It was too much. Far, far too much. And he was naked against it. No armor to protect him. Not even a body to contain him. Just everything-- everything pouring through his mind and his soul, carving through him like a million knives, until suddenly--

Suddenly.

Suddenly, it wasn't. Suddenly, there was nothing.

No. Not nothing. It was all still there. But it felt like it was "outside," somehow. As if he'd found shelter. Like a little cabin in a blizzard.

And then, as if the very thought manifested itself into truth, it was a little cabin in a blizzard.

It wasn't quite right, perhaps. Still blurry and wispy and ethereal. But a cabin, nonetheless.

"Interesting choice," came an encompassing voice. A familiar one, too.

Hector was still trying to process everything, though. He hadn't gone insane, he was pretty sure. "W-wh... a-ah..." The words died in his fumbling mouth.

Did he even have a mouth?

He couldn't tell.

"How are you, Young Hector?" the voice said, all full of comfort and certainty--two things that Hector very much appreciated, at the moment.

"I... I don't... ah..."

"It is alright. You are well. You are having a difficult moment, but you are well."

Whose voice was that? It felt so clear and familiar to him. It felt like it should have been obvious. But he was still so confused. He'd just come in from the blizzard. He needed to warm up. To center himself.

"Take as long as you need."

He tried to focus. To find his thoughts. To hold them.

And he did. He had no idea how long it took, but he did.

"I am glad," the voice said.

"Who...?" As soon as the word left his thoughts, Hector realized the answer. "...Rasalased."

"Hello."

Hector thought he felt himself smile. "...How are we speaking like this?"

"We are not. And yet perhaps we are."

Maybe he should have seen that response coming. "...What?"

"Does the method matter?"

"...Why wouldn't it?"

Rasalased laughed. "I am but a shadow of myself here. In your mind. The piece of me which I placed within you in order to make up for the piece I took."

"...Hmm."

"You are feeling better."

It wasn't a question, Hector realized. It was an observation. "Yeah, I guess I am..."

"That is good."

"Rasalased, what the hell is happening, right now?"

"I am preventing you from losing yourself to insanity."

"...Oh. Uh. Well, thank you, in that case."

"You are welcome."

"1608

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 12 of 20))

"Why, uh...? Why was I was going insane, though?"

"Your blessings are conflicting with one another."

"Oh. So... it's kind of your fault that I was going insane in the first place, then..."

"That is true, yes. I might have warned you against this, but I did not think that you would ever acquire a second blessing--and certainly not so quickly."

"Yeah, me too..."

"But there is no cause for concern. Though I am the problem, I am also the solution."

"Ah... yeah. Thanks again, by the way. And not just for what you're doing, now. Ivan would've killed everyone in Dunehall, if you hadn't helped me the way you did."

"That is also true, yes. But so too would they have died, if you had done nothing. If you must thank me for my help, then I must thank you for yours."

Hector didn't know what to say to that.

Rasalased pitched a different subject at him. "Who is it that granted you this new blessing, Young Hector?"

“Ah... you mean, you don’t already know?”

“Hmm? Perhaps I do. I would like you to tell me, nonetheless.”

“Uh. Alright. It was Malast.”

“Ah. Indeed. So it is the God of the Underworld who is holding one of my Shards, then.”

Hector might’ve blinked. That was right, wasn’t it? The Shard had been in his armor, along with the other items he’d stored there. So when his armor had been destroyed... right in front of Malast...

“...Is that gonna be a problem?” said Hector.

“I do not think so. It seems as though he does not sense my presence. I am still dormant within the Shards, after all. Only here, in your mind, am I awake.”

“...Hmm.” Hector wasn’t sure he understood, but that was nothing new when it came to Rasalased, he supposed.

“It is a pity,” said the Dry God. “I might have enjoyed speaking to him. He is far older than me.”

That, Hector had a hard time believing. “Really? He’s older?”

“Very much so.”

“But, uh... I mean, compared to you, he struck me as kinda... childish, in some ways.”

“Indeed? How curious. Now I would like to speak to him even more.”

Hector couldn’t even imagine what that encounter would be like. He didn’t entirely want to imagine it, either. “...Are you sure that wouldn’t, like, bring about the end of the world or something?”

Rasalased laughed again. “I am quite certain that it would not.”

“Hmm.” That brought another question to mind, something that he’d wanted to ask Malast about but hadn’t gotten the chance to. “Do you, uh... do you know anything about Ettol?”

“The God of Impulse?”

“Yeah.”

“I am afraid I do not. Why? Do you?”

Hector wasn't expecting a reversal like that. “Uh... no, it's just. I've been hearing his name a lot, lately.”

”1609

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 13 of 20))

“Curious,” said Rasalased. “The God of Impulse was said to have been consumed by the Void in the earliest days of humanity. Even in my time, the name Ettol was all but forgotten.”

That information was surprisingly coherent for Rasalased, Hector thought. He almost wanted to make a crack about time not being time, but he felt like it might ruin his chances of learning anything else here. “...Do you know more about Malast?”

“No. Only stories. That is why I would quite like to meet him.”

“Right...” The more he thought about it, the more questions came to mind. “How many... beings who can grant blessings are there? Do you know?”

“I do not.”

“Can you tell me anything about Sermung? Or Dozer? Or any of the servant emperors, really?”

“Only that they are very powerful. Perhaps if I were to meet them, I could learn more.”

“Hmm. What about Cocora? Do you know if she exists?”

“No.”

“What about Avar? Or Lhutwë?”

“Lhutwë?! Of course he never existed! Only a fool would believe in such nonsense!”

“W-whoa... okay.”

Oh, right. Rasalased was a Sandlord--and probably from a time when they hated the Rainlords. The Dry God had been nice enough to Emiliana, as Hector recalled, but he supposed it wasn't so surprising that there was still lingering animosity there.

He tried to think of more things to ask, but after that string of failures, his enthusiasm had waned somewhat, and the most pressing question that he could think of was, “How much time do I have here with you?”

“Time is not time.”

Well, he walked right into that one, Hector supposed. He decided to rephrase and try again. “...Am I stuck in here?”

“No.”

“So... how do I get out, then?”

“When your blizzard is calmed, you will return.”

Right, the blizzard. It was still raging “outside” of the “cabin” that they were currently taking shelter in. “Do, uh... do you know how long that's going to take?”

“As long as it must.”

Hector wanted to sigh and laugh at the same time. “...I've missed you, Rasalased.”

“Is that so?”

“Mostly.”

“Then I thank you.”

“You're welcome. I guess.”

“I have a question for you, Young Hector.”

“I can't wait to hear it.”

“What do you intend to do with these blessings?”

“Uh...” That was one hell of a question. “I... I think I'd have to know more about them before I could figure out what to do with them. Which, uh--which reminds me. Malast said that the blessing you gave me was called Focus."

"Did he now?"

"...Yeah. I heard him myself."

"Interesting."

"...Could you maybe tell me a little more about what Focus actually does?"

"I do not think so, no."

"Figures."

"I did not think my blessing would have a name. Hmm.""

"1610

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 14 of 20))

This conversation wasn't going how Hector hoped. That seemed to be a running trend, of late.

Given who he was talking to, he'd thought that he would be able to learn something important, but if anything, it seemed like Rasalased was the one acquiring new information here, not him.

Pretty weird, Hector felt. The notion that he could tell a "god" anything that they didn't already know.

Malast had been the same way, though, now that he was thinking about it. He supposed that supported Garovel's belief that they were not truly "gods"--at least not in the sense of being all-powerful or all-knowing.

"I suppose that means you can't tell me anything about what Domain does, either," said Hector.

"Ah, is that what he called your second blessing?"

"Yeah."

“Fascinating.” And that was all Rasalased had for him, apparently.

Yeah, alright, fine. What was something that the Dry God might actually be able to tell him?

Hmm. Maybe something about the Sandlords? Or maybe just--oh yeah.

“...Do you know where Asad is, right now?”

“My successor.”

“Yeah.”

“He is in the town of Capaporo.”

Wow, a straight answer. And exactly the one he had been hoping for, too. That was a relief.

“You should hurry to him,” added Rasalased. “He is a prisoner.”

That was much less of a relief. “Prisoner?! But--wha--how?! Who’s holding him prisoner?!”

“Hmm. A good question. A lost sheep, it seems to me.”

“...Say what?”

“That is who is holding him prisoner.”

“A sheep.”

“Yes.”

“...Like a literal sheep, or...?”

“Perhaps. Or perhaps not.”

“Ugh... could you give me a name, maybe?”

“No.”

“...Fair enough, I guess.”

“He is much confused and struggling to find himself. Full of regret. His mind is in such disorder that he does not even notice when I probe for his emotions.”

“...Are we talking about Asad or the sheep now?”

“The sheep. This is why I believe he is lost.”

“Right...”

“I hope you will help my successor one more time.”

“I’d love to, but, uh, h-how do I do that, exactly?”

“I do not know.”

“Agh...”

“Good luck to you, Young Hector.”

“Thanks...”

“And goodbye.”

“Wait, what?! I still have more questions!”

“As do I. I hope we will be able to speak again.”

“Aw--!”

He felt the world shift. The cabin disintegrated, and a vast calmness enveloped him. It felt simultaneously like a gentle wind, a warm sea, and a familiar set of clothes.

Hector awoke, wincing. His throat felt hoarse; his body felt like rubber; and he was so dizzy that it took him a minute to realize that he was face down on the ground.

Slowly, he picked himself up.

‘Hector!’ came Garovel’s soundless and private, but nonetheless very loud, voice. ‘You okay, buddy?!’

‘...Yeah,’ he finally managed to say. He could feel the undead vigor coursing through his body again. No pain anymore, either. ‘How long have I been out?’”

"1611

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 15 of 20))

‘A good ten minutes or so,’ said Garovel.

Hector tried to pick himself up and found it difficult.

Oh, right. He couldn’t feel pain at the moment, but he didn’t have his cooling armor on, so the heat of the Undercrust was trying to melt his body again, competing with his regeneration and sapping the strength from his muscles.

He focused and remade the armor. It materialized quickly and easily, requiring less concentration than he recalled.

Right. Emergence.

Someone else was saying something. They’d been saying something, he realized.

“--Iron One?”

Ah. Must’ve been Malast.

Sure enough, when Hector looked up, there the Idle God was. Along with the Hun’Kui man, Eleyo.

Eleyo looked normal enough. But the jar that had been in Malast’s hands before was now in his, instead.

And it was open.

“Feeling better, Senmurai?” said Eleyo.

The man had two voices, Hector noticed, like that of a servant in a hyper-state.

Hector finally stood up fully. “Did you already...?” He didn’t know how to end that sentence.

“Yes,” said Malast. “It is done. Secho is reborn.”

Hector looked over the others. Diego, Yangéra, Carver, Elise, Manuel, Lorios, Mr. Sheridan, and the three other Hun’Kui, one of whom was unconscious and had been so all along.

They looked okay, all things considered--a bit awestruck and frightened, perhaps, but unharmed at least. Zeff and Axiolis were still in the viewing window above Malast’s head as well, though they did not look nearly as calm. If Hector hadn’t been so certain that he’d finished off that worm, then the silent mayhem in the viewing window might’ve made him worried that Zeff was fighting it now.

“We were waiting for you to awaken,” said Eleyo. Or was it Secho, now?

Hector was almost reluctant to ask, but he did so anyway. “...Why?”

“Before that,” said Eleyo, “I feel I should confess something. My name is not Eleyo. And I do not mean that it is no longer Eleyo. I mean it never was. I deceived you. And I wish to apologize.”

Hector had no response.

“My name is Royo Raju. Remember it well, for it will soon belong to a king.”

A chorus of unsettlement rose up from the two other conscious Hun’Kui in the room. They recognized the name, Hector figured.

“But there is more I should tell you,” Royo went on. “And perhaps you have realized this already, or perhaps you would have in the future, but I would like to say it now, regardless. It was I who caused your train to derail. It was I who brought those worms down upon us.”

Now it wasn't just the Hun'Kui who were unsettled.

Hector thought back. Through all the chaos, the question of why the worms had first attacked had never really occurred to him. He hadn't thought it was anyone's fault.

But apparently, it was.

Royo Raju wasn't done. "I have wronged you. I know this. I did what I had to do to escape a fate as wretched as any I can imagine, and you were all caught up in the dire consequences that followed."

"1612

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 16 of 20))

Everyone just listened, and Hector wondered where this was going. Despite what Royo had just admitted to--or perhaps even because of it--Hector didn't get the sense that Royo was going to attack them.

"I am indebted to you all," said Royo. Then he pointed at Manuel Delaguna. "Especially to you. And I do not take my debts lightly. Know that they will be repaid, in time. And know that I do not think of you as my enemies or wish harm upon any of you."

And there was silence again.

Everyone, presumably, was trying to process everything that they had just heard.

Malast broke the quietude with a yawn. "Oh. Hey." He walked over to Hector and handed the items he'd dropped earlier back to him. "Here."

It was quite a collection, Hector realized as he started taking them. The Scarf of Amordiin, the Shifting Spear of Logante, that weird orb on a tuning fork, and the Shard.

Wait, where was the Egg of Prosperity? Where was his one million troa? It hadn't gotten destroyed in the fight with the worm, had it?

Or, hold on. Did he even pick the Egg up in the first place?

...Had he really forgotten to grab it? Even after Garovel pointed it out to him?

Well, fuck.

He wondered if this was how Asad felt all the time.

When it came around to returning the Shard, Hector's hand grabbed it, but Malast didn't let go.

"What is this thing, by the way?" said Malast. "It seems a little different to the others."

And Hector locked gazes with the God of the Underworld. Silently, he again considered telling Malast that the item he was holding contained the very same Rasalased that he had expressed an interest in earlier.

He considered it. And then, he decided to actually do it. "This is a Shard of the Dry God," said Hector. "Rasalased is inside it."

'Hector, what the fuck?!' said Garovel privately.

Malast's eyes widened. The perpetually glazed look on his face went away.

Hector didn't let go of his end of the Shard, though. "...Actually, I just talked to him again. He said he wouldn't mind meeting you, but he didn't seem to know how to make contact."

"...Huh," said Malast. "Interesting."

And to Hector's surprise, Malast let go of the Shard.

"I guess I'll have to look into that later," said the Idle God. Then that glazed look returned. "Agh. That's gonna suck. I hate having to learn new things."

Hector returned the Shard to its previous place inside his armor.

'Did you really just talk to Rasalased?' said Garovel, still privately.

'Yep.' A beat passed, and then he added, 'I think. I guess I could've been dreaming or something.'

'Hector--!'

Royo's words cut him off. "Perhaps I can do something for you, right now." He held up something in his hand. Some kind of orb? "I do not think this will make up for my debt, but as I understand it, you are all trying to return to the surface, no?"

When did he learn that, Hector wondered? Did someone tell him?"
"1613 -- CLXXIV.

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 17 of 20))

Royo looked around again, perhaps waiting for someone to answer him, but when no one did, he kept talking. "Allow me to expedite your journey for you." He turned to Malast, who was going back to his seat. "Might I borrow the Staff of Unso for a moment?"

Malast had rested the Staff against his chair earlier. After he sat down again, he shrugged, grabbed it, and flung it over to Royo.

Royo caught it with one hand. "Much appreciated, old friend."

And it was fleeting, but for a moment, Hector thought he saw Malast actually smile.

"Now." The pendant around Royo's neck began to glow along with the tip of the Staff. "Should you ever decide to return to the Higher West Layer, seek me out. I will give you a hero's welcome."

Arcing sparks jumped from the Staff to the four corners of the chamber, as they had done previously, and Hector's vision started to distort familiarly as well.

"Ah, but if possible, I would prefer you not bring your Dragon next time. Farewell."

Everything blurred and smeared into itself, and Hector lost all sense of direction and space.

The floating sensation lasted noticeably longer this time, however. It was disorienting, to be sure, but Hector was almost able to regain his bearings before it finished. And when it did, he wasn't nearly so confused as he might have otherwise been.

He saw sky.

For the first time in what felt like ages, he could see stars, twinkling in the night, and a full, lustrous moon.

"What in the--?" someone said. Elise Garza, Hector recognized after a moment.

"Where the hell are we now?" said Diego. "Oh, hey, I can talk again."

'Hector?' said Yangéra. 'Do you know?'

He wasn't sure why she had singled him out to ask, but in fact, he did know. While the Scarf of Amordiin wasn't revealing their exact location in a GPS-like sense, it was revealing the shape of a familiar, two-pronged monument that was standing behind everyone's back. Hector might not have remembered it so clearly if Garovel hadn't reminded him of it only a couple days ago.

"...We're in Atreya," said Hector.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Four: 'An untimely arrival...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It took a while for everyone to get a handle on what had just happened. The lingering blue sparks around Rathmore's Gate seemed to help them conceptualize it, somewhat, but even so, the fact that they had apparently teleported over such a tremendous distance was no small matter.

Hector might've been right there with them in their confusion, if he wasn't so distracted with something else--or rather, someone else.

Eleyo. Or, no. Not Eleyo. Royo Raju. Reborn with the remains of the God of Growth.

The fact that it was Royo who had teleported them all just now was what concerned Hector. Granted, he'd used some sort of magical artifact or something in that "Staff of Unso," but would he have been able to do that before?

And the way he spoke...

It had certainly sounded like Royo had some sort of plan. Hector wondered what it was."

"1613 -- CLXXIV.

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 17 of 20))

Royo looked around again, perhaps waiting for someone to answer him, but when no one did, he kept talking. "Allow me to expedite your journey for you." He turned to Malast, who was going back to his seat. "Might I borrow the Staff of Unso for a moment?"

Malast had rested the Staff against his chair earlier. After he sat down again, he shrugged, grabbed it, and flung it over to Royo.

Royo caught it with one hand. "Much appreciated, old friend."

And it was fleeting, but for a moment, Hector thought he saw Malast actually smile.

"Now." The pendant around Royo's neck began to glow along with the tip of the Staff. "Should you ever decide to return to the Higher West Layer, seek me out. I will give you a hero's welcome."

Arcing sparks jumped from the Staff to the four corners of the chamber, as they had done previously, and Hector's vision started to distort familiarly as well.

"Ah, but if possible, I would prefer you not bring your Dragon next time. Farewell."

Everything blurred and smeared into itself, and Hector lost all sense of direction and space.

The floating sensation lasted noticeably longer this time, however. It was disorienting, to be sure, but Hector was almost able to regain his bearings before it finished. And when it did, he wasn't nearly so confused as he might have otherwise been.

He saw sky.

For the first time in what felt like ages, he could see stars, twinkling in the night, and a full, lustrous moon.

"What in the--?" someone said. Elise Garza, Hector recognized after a moment.

“Where the hell are we now?” said Diego. “Oh, hey, I can talk again.”

‘Hector?’ said Yangéra. ‘Do you know?’

He wasn’t sure why she had singled him out to ask, but in fact, he did know. While the Scarf of Amordiin wasn’t revealing their exact location in a GPS-like sense, it was revealing the shape of a familiar, two-pronged monument that was standing behind everyone’s back. Hector might not have remembered it so clearly if Garovel hadn’t reminded him of it only a couple days ago.

“...We’re in Atreya,” said Hector.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Four: ‘An untimely arrival...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It took a while for everyone to get a handle on what had just happened. The lingering blue sparks around Rathmore’s Gate seemed to help them conceptualize it, somewhat, but even so, the fact that they had apparently teleported over such a tremendous distance was no small matter.

Hector might’ve been right there with them in their confusion, if he wasn’t so distracted with something else--or rather, someone else.

Eleyo. Or, no. Not Eleyo. Royo Raju. Reborn with the remains of the God of Growth.

The fact that it was Royo who had teleported them all just now was what concerned Hector. Granted, he’d used some sort of magical artifact or something in that “Staff of Unso,” but would he have been able to do that before?

And the way he spoke...

It had certainly sounded like Royo had some sort of plan. Hector wondered what it was."

"1614

'Well,' said Garovel at length, 'now we can get to Capaporo safely. It may take us another day or two, but at least there isn't a feldeath and an army of worms in the way. As far as I know, that is.'

Zeff stepped forward, trailing rocky dust behind him. He was quite the ragged picture, what with his wild and mussed hair that looked like it would fight any comb that tried to put it back in order. "Lead on, then," he said, and he raised everyone up on a short platform of ice. "I'll carry us to our destination as quickly as I am able."

Hector intervened, wearing normal armor now instead of the cooling variant. "Wait, um--"

The expression on Zeff's face did not suggest that the matter was open for discussion. "What?" he said flatly.

Hector held his ground, though. "Let me do it." And he raised a platform of iron on top of Zeff's. "You're supposed to be keeping a low profile, remember?"

Zeff did not look like he cared.

Axiolis floated up behind the man. 'This is Hector's territory. Let's defer to his discretion.'

At that, the Lord Elroy seemed to relent, and everyone felt the iron platform sink a little as the ice beneath it dematerialized. "Go quickly, then. Everyone is waiting for us."

Hector knew it. Better than Zeff did, probably. He hadn't forgotten Rasalased's words. That Asad was being held prisoner.

He was going to have to tell Zeff about that. And soon, too. For the moment, though, he focused on his materialization. If nothing else, it would be a good opportunity to test his new limits. A giant platform moving over a forest? That would take some doing. But Hector was--

"Hold on," said Manuel Delaguna, which took a bit of the wind out of Hector's sails. "Is someone missing?"

Everyone stopped to look around at one another.

The Hun'Kui weren't with them anymore, of course, but that didn't seem like cause for the concern in Manuel's voice. Aside from them, Hector counted the four servants, the four reapers, Elise, and Mr. Sheridan.

Shit. Manuel was right.

'Carver,' said Yangéra. 'He's not here.'

'Eleyo--or Royo, I suppose--must have decided to keep him behind,' said Garovel.

'Why would he do that?' said Lorios.

'Any number of reasons,' said Garovel. 'At a guess, though, I'd say it has something to do with this "Ettol" figure we've been hearing about. Royo seemed interested in him before, and Carver claimed to be related to him.'

'Hmm.'

'There's not much we can do about it now,' said Garovel. 'And if Royo wants him for information, then I doubt he'll hurt him. He is probably not in danger.'

Hector wondered about that. He honestly didn't know what to make of Royo anymore.

"Hector," said Zeff, sounding annoyed again. "Hurry up. We can move while they talk."

The man wasn't wrong, Hector knew. So he set to work, raising the platform up higher and higher until it cleared the canopy of trees."

"1615

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 19 of 20))

'Which way?' Hector asked.

Garovel pointed to his left, and Hector grew the platform forward and then curved it around so that they would all be facing the direction that they were going.

He'd never used such a large volume of iron as method of transportation before. It was a bit strange but not difficult. In fact, the Scarf of Amordiin was making it rather easy.

Due to its ability to help him sense the movement of air all around him, Hector had a very clear picture of even the densest parts of the forest. He could sense where all the tree trunks were, where the leaves were, the underbrush, the rocks, and even the animals. A snake here, a rabbit there, a couple bears, a wolf, a group of monkeys, and tons of insects--though those were perhaps too small to sense individually. Maybe if he concentrated on them, but now wasn't the time for that.

He focused on his platform. Because the open air was telling him so much, Hector could see all the gaps in the forest--and therefore, all the places in which he could materialize iron without crushing anything. Well, except maybe a couple shrubs here and there. They'd probably be fine, though.

It was helpful, because he didn't want to obliterate the ecosystem. The area of the forest immediately around Rathmore's Gate was still plenty ruined already. Hell, even now that he'd carried them some distance away from it, he could still sense entire trees that had been uprooted or splintered in half. He noticed one tree that wasn't touching the ground. Instead, it was lodged horizontally in the canopy, dangling in midair. Some birds had made a nest on it.

All in all, it made for a type of training that he had never done before. Navigating the forest with a building-sized block of iron, creating and destroying his work around every single object and leaving it all unscathed--it certainly demanded attention to detail. And without the Scarf of Amordiin, he didn't think he would have been able to do this, not without simply flattening everything in their path.

But after a while, Hector started to get the hang of it a little too well, he felt. Even as he increased the speed to accommodate Zeff, Hector found himself thinking that this wasn't really challenging enough.

Even without his most recent emergence, he felt like he could have pulled this off as long as he had the Scarf. That was what really made this feel trivially easy. He could simply conceptualize his iron as if it were squeezing its way through all the holes in the forest, like a wave of iron jelly. Or iron sludge, perhaps.

Hmm.

Maybe that fight with the worm had more of an effect on his perception than he'd thought. He could visualize the beast's movements pretty damn well now, after having followed it so attentively over such an extended battle."

"1616

((The 17 pages of St. Patrick's Day + Triple Saturday -- Page 20 of 20))

Regardless, Hector wanted to try something more difficult, but he was reluctant to get too crazy with his experimentation. He wasn't the only one riding this thing, after all.

"How long will it take to reach Warrenhold?" said Zeff.

'At this pace?' said Garovel. 'Maybe three or four hours.'

Zeff didn't say anything to that, but he was probably still displeased with their current speed, Hector figured. Hector wouldn't have minded increasing it even further, but Elise and Mr. Sheridan probably wouldn't appreciate that very much, and their safety was most important.

Then again, as Hector thought about it, Mr. Sheridan had seemed like kind of a lunatic, so maybe he would have liked to go even faster.

Whatever. This pace was plenty fast, Hector felt, and four hours was making good time, considering their current location in the Carthrace Nature Reserve was on the opposite side of the country to Warrenhold.

But that was Atreya for you. He'd almost forgotten how tiny it was. After gallivanting all over Sair with the Rainlords, it was nice to be back home, where traveling didn't take so damn long. That trip from Luzo to Moaban had been a little ridiculous.

Mr. Sheridan was eyeing him quite a bit, Hector noticed.

Hmm. Nervous, perhaps? Maybe because he wasn't sure if Hector had completely forgiven him for trying to kill him during the tournament?

Good. Because Hector hadn't. Nor did he intend to. Obviously, it was no big deal as far as Hector himself was concerned, but what about other people? How was he supposed to trust that Mr. Sheridan wouldn't just up and shoot somebody else in Warrenhold? Someone who couldn't simply regenerate?

Maybe Mr. Sheridan really did know better. Maybe he would never do such a thing to a non-servant. But after that incident, "maybe" wasn't good enough for Hector. As soon as they reached Warrenhold, he meant to send Mr. Sheridan on his merry way back to Intar or wherever the hell he came from.

'So,' said Garovel in the echo of privacy, 'any idea yet about what this second "blessing" is?'

'...I was kinda hoping YOU would know something,' said Hector.

'Bah. Wish we had more time to figure it out.'

'Might not even matter right now. Malast said it would take a while to grow.'

'True. But still. Can't say I'm not curious. "Domain," huh? And you already had this "Focus" thing from Rasalased, too? Do you have any idea what that one does, by the way?'

He did, though he wasn't quite sure how to explain it. 'Uh...'

'I thought Rasalased just granted you the ability to materialize Haqq's shield as you please, but that doesn't sound like something that would be called Focus, to me.'

'Yeah, about that, ah... I think that's because I can... kind of... concentrate on multiple things at once...'

Garovel paused. '...Excuse me?'

'I mean, I'm still, uh... trying to figure it out. And maybe it's not that simple. But, um... yeah. My concentration seems better overall, lately, I guess...'

"1617

'Why are you only telling me about this now?' said Garovel.

'Well, I--uh. I was still figuring it out. And I didn't even think it was related to Rasalased's blessing until I heard Malast mention it.'

‘Huh...’

‘And, I guess, uh... I guess I kinda thought it was just natural. Er, uh, I mean, I thought it was because of all the meditating I do...’

‘Hmm. That’s reasonable enough, I suppose. And your meditation should be improving your concentration, too. But yeah, maybe not to THAT extent.’

‘Ah...’

‘Still. Your concentration was pretty good already. I’ve always thought you were a little absurd when it came to meditation. So if you got a boost ON TOP of that, then... Hmm. Hey, wait a minute. Is that why you’re able to just “tune me out,” sometimes? Like I’m some kind of friggin’ radio broadcast?’

‘Uh... I don’t know...’

‘It’s really obnoxious when you do that, by the way. Dunno if I mentioned that earlier.’

‘Ah. Sorry. But, I mean, it’s not like I do it for no reason.’

‘You could just ask me to be quiet. Y’know, politely. Believe it or not, I AM capable of that.’

‘...I find that hard to believe.’

‘And here comes the sass. Alright, fine. Maybe I do OCCASIONALLY talk a little too much, but c’mon, if we’re in a life and death situation, and you need to concentrate, then just say so!’

‘Oh, you mean like when a worm is trying to eat us?’

‘What? Oh. Hey. Look. You managed just fine, didn’t you? And sometimes--MOST times, even--I have insightful things to say. Which is my job, by the way. As a reaper, that is. I’m tasked with imparting all manner of mind-blowing wisdom.’

‘Uh-huh...’

‘I am a waterfall of knowledge, Hector. Trying to stem the tide of information that flows out of me is quite frankly impossible.’

‘So in other words, I should just ignore you, sometimes.’

‘...Yeah, probably.’

Hector let a breath of laughter slip out, but the others didn’t seem to notice, no doubt because of the howling wind rushing past as they traversed the top of the forest.

Hector had added a guardrail, of sorts, to the platform, as well as a ridged grip for the floor so that everyone didn’t have to worry so much about sliding around.

‘If we’re being completely serious, though,’ said Garovel, ‘then you really shouldn’t make a habit out of ignoring me during battle. I can provide observational support, which could very well save our asses, someday. Granted, now that you’ve got that spiffy Scarf, you might not actually need all that much observational support, but the basic principle that two heads are better than one still applies, I think.’

‘That’s... true.’

‘I’m glad you think so.’

‘We should probably work on that, though. I feel like we’re, maybe, not working together in combat as... efficiently as we could be.’

‘...Maybe so,’ said Garovel. ‘And I’ve certainly been feeling a bit useless, lately. It would be nice to change that.’

Hector blinked, because it didn’t sound like the reaper was joking. ‘What? You’re not useless.’

Garovel made no response."
"1618

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

‘Garovel, are you being serious?’ said Hector. ‘You’re NOT useless! How could you even think that?!’

‘I wonder.’

Hector couldn’t believe what he was hearing. The reaper had done so much for him. He had to know that, right?

'I'm not trying to sound depressed or pessimistic,' said Garovel.
'Rather, it's the opposite.'

'What do you mean?'

'Hector, c'mon. You've kinda been on a tear, lately. If I don't start working harder to step my game up, then you're probably just gonna leave me in the dust.'

'I...' Was that really how Garovel saw things? What was he even supposed to say to something like that?

'It's a GOOD thing, is what I'm saying. I want to make sure that I'm not holding you back.'

Holy shit. That might have been the most flattering thing anyone had ever said to him. 'I... you're not... Garovel, that's not true.'

'Oh, shut up. Yes, it is. Anyway, forget about it.'

'What the--?! How am I supposed to forget about it?!'

'I dunno. Maybe I shouldn't have even brought it up. Point is, we need to stay focused on our objective. Also, there's a highway coming up soon, so you should probably adjust your platform so that you don't squash any of the cars or the people inside them.'

That was a good idea.

Hector wondered briefly if he could make his iron move seamlessly around a group of cars in motion. He felt like he could, but something about the notion of experimenting with other people's lives struck him as something he probably shouldn't do.

Instead, he came up with a much safer experiment, something he'd been wanting to try for a while now.

As soon as he sensed the highway that Garovel was talking about, Hector slowed the pace of his iron, much to Zeff's expressed chagrin. Hector eliminated most of the platform below them, keeping only a comparatively thin layer for everyone to continue riding on and four tall legs.

His work was suddenly much more akin to a giant, moving table.

The shift in weight caused a bit of turbulence, which seemed to alarm the others, rather understandably, but Hector got it under control.

He wanted to eliminate the legs entirely. He wanted the platform to simply float, like one of his cubes in orbit.

It was similar, in theory, but the weight differential made for quite the leap in difficulty. The larger the mass, the more impact gravity had on his work--and therefore, the more he needed to counter its effects. With just an iron platform, that was straightforward enough, but there were people here, too, and they were weighing the platform down in different places. The same kind of "balance" that he used for his cubes in orbit had to be greatly adjusted here.

And Diego certainly wasn't helping, what with the way he was walking around, talking to everyone without a care in the world. The man probably had to get up close so that they could hear him over the wind, but still, at the moment, Hector was finding it rather obnoxious."
"1619

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

'Agh,' growled Hector. 'Tell Diego to stand still for a minute.'

'Hmm? Okay. Hey, Diego! Quit moving around so much! Hector's trying to do something!'

The Lord Redwater looked confused but acquiesced.

That was better.

He vanished the legs of the giant table as they neared the highway, and then he slapped a coating around the bottom of the remaining platform. But it wasn't just a normal coating. It was a hovering stabilizer, of sorts.

Hector couldn't simply have the platform itself hover, because the platform needed to remain stationary so that everyone didn't slide off of it like a moving walkway. This hadn't been an issue before, because on the ground, he could have the top of the platform remain still while everything below it grew and pushed onward. In midair, though, there was no longer anything to push against, which was why this new, floating "holster" for the platform was necessary.

And it worked, just as he thought it would. The platform soared over the rushing cars below and up into the night sky.

‘Hector, holy shit!’

It was actually quite difficult, Hector discovered. Even now, with everyone staying still, he was having trouble keeping the encased platform fully stable. That, and every little jostle was worrisome in its own way, threatening each time to destroy his concentration, which he very much needed right now.

The others were talking more loudly now, perhaps even to him, but he still couldn’t make out their words over the wind. And he was busy trying not to panic and drop everyone, anyway.

Why the hell had he thought this was a good idea? There were two non-servants in their group. They would surely die if they fell from this height or at this speed.

‘Hector, we’re going the wrong way now,’ said Garovel.

Agh. Shit.

The wind was becoming a problem. The higher they went, the more intense it got. And it was somehow easier to make the platform ascend than descend. Probably because in the beginning, he’d been most worried about crashing into the ground and killing everyone, so he’d decided to err on the side of upward movement, just in case.

The idea of descending was simply more frightening. That was the problem, Hector realized. It wasn’t that it was actually more difficult to pull off. He was just more afraid to do it.

But now he didn’t have a choice. They’d have to go back down eventually. And at this height, going back down a little was no big deal, right?

Goddammit. This whole thing was way more nerve-wracking than he thought it would be. He had to get a hold of himself. They were flying. Under their own power.

He tried to ease up. He had to weaken the force that he’d applied in order to counter gravity.

It worked. They began to lose altitude. But not without more turbulence. Considerably more. He heard a feminine shriek.

Sorry, Elise.

He stabilized his work and course-corrected.

Yeah. This was a better altitude. Still maybe a little too high, but the wind wasn't so crazy, at least.

He opened his eyes. When had he even closed them? He'd been relying on the Scarf completely, he realized. Thankfully, he'd made sure to keep it wrapped snugly around his neck after removing his armor earlier.

Everyone was staring at him.

Not knowing what to do, he tried to pretend like he didn't notice.

It didn't work.

Diego started walking over to him, though he was obviously being slow and deliberate about it this time, which Hector appreciated. It was much easier to account for the balance changes."

"1620

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

"So, uh," said Diego, once he was close enough, "how are you doing over here, Hector?"

That seemed like a strangely plain question. "Ah... I'm alright."

"It just occurred to me to that, despite all the craziness we've been through together recently, you and I haven't really spoken all that much."

And as was often the case, Hector wasn't sure what to say to that.

Garovel helped him out, though. 'That's sort of a running theme with Hector. He's not the most talkative.'

"He seemed rather talkative with Malast." Diego rubbed his jaw.

'Ah,' said Garovel. 'Yeah. Uh. Well, what can I say? He has his moments.'

‘That’s one way of putting it,’ said Yangéra.

Hector didn’t know what to make of the way she was staring at him.

Garovel changed the subject. ‘I don’t suppose you managed to get away with any of that treasure, eh?’

Diego frowned as he reached into his vest. “I only managed to swipe a few jewels there at the end.” He held out his hand to show his spoils. “What about you?”

‘We got a few things. We’ll show you later.’

“Hmm. Looking forward to it.”

‘By the way,’ said Yangéra, ‘what the hell was all that stuff that Malast was saying about “blessings”? I’ve been meaning to ask.’

Ah. That subject. Hector just let Garovel handle it, as usual. The reaper told them basically the same things that he and Hector had already discussed. Hector did notice that Garovel kept things vague when talking about Focus, however. Not that they had much detail to actually go into, of course, but still. It seemed like Garovel didn’t want to reveal even what little they already understood about the concentration boost it provided. Instead, he simply said that he and Hector were still trying to figure it out--which, in fairness, was not a lie.

From there, the two reapers took over the conversation for a while. Yangéra inquired about Warrenhold, and Garovel offered answers. He told her of how spacious it was, how it had seen better days, how they were currently in the middle of trying to restore it, how there was a lake near it, and how it was exceedingly durable thanks to an integrated material called nightrock.

Zeff and Axiolis came over as Garovel was explaining that last part.

‘It will be interesting to see Warrenhold again,’ said Axiolis.

‘Oh, that’s right,’ said Garovel. ‘Shenado said you’d been there before.’

‘Somehow, I doubt that is all she said,’ said Axiolis.

Garovel chortled. ‘She said you hated it.’

The other reaper’s skull-faced expression seemed to stiffen, somehow. ‘It is true that I have little love for that place. It caused considerable grief for our kin in the past.’

'I've heard,' said Garovel.

Garovel reiterated details of Warrenhold's "pest control" mechanism that they had learned from Voreese.

It didn't seem to do much for Axiolis' mood. Or Zeff's."

"1621

Zeff was staring at him again, Hector noticed. Did he want to ask a question? If so, why wasn't he saying anything? Maybe he was just waiting for an opening. The reapers were talking to each other again, so--

"You achieved emergence, didn't you?" said Zeff.

All the reapers went quiet.

"...Yeah," was all Hector could think to say.

"Good," said the Lord Elroy. "We will test your new limits as soon as we have the space and opportunity to do so. In the meantime, how difficult are you finding it to maintain this... flying platform of yours?"

"Ah... it's... kinda hard. It's the same basic principle as the orbiting technique, but there are a lot more little things to account for. I feel like, maybe, a more aerodynamic shape than a simple platform could make things easier, but I'm not really sure. The added complexity might just screw everything up, instead."

Zeff nodded. "Yes, perhaps it would. We can experiment with that when safety is not as great of a concern as it is now."

"That's what I was thinking."

"But do you feel that you are already near the limit of your ability? Or do you think you can do more than this?"

A tough question. Hector took a few moments to try and take stock of himself. His concentration was divided again, he noticed. A split between maintaining the variable factors of the flight and simply considering Zeff's words. Sure, the divide wasn't difficult when compared to what he'd had to do during that worm fight, but after learning about his Focus, he was more mindful of the division in his thoughts than ever.

Which, in its own way, he supposed, was creating another divide, wasn't it? Instead of splitting his attention in two, it was being split three ways now.

Kind of a waste, then, this third thing. But it was hard to get rid of, somehow. Agh.

"...No," said Hector. "I don't think this is all that close to my new limit. It's tough, but I feel like it's getting easier as I do it more."

"Hmm." Zeff folded his arms. "Let's increase the difficulty, then. Try putting something in orbit around you, right now."

Diego held up a hand. "Ah--do you think that's really a good idea? Shouldn't you guys save the training for later?"

Zeff regarded the Lord Redwater with a raised eyebrow. "Are you worried about safety? Because as has already been mentioned, we have not forgotten it."

"Sure, but, c'mon, we just escaped the Undercrust and twenty-seven different brushes with death--at least, that's what it felt like. Can't you just take a moment to relax a little while we wait to arrive? You didn't even sleep or eat anything while we were in Himmekel, did you?"

Zeff glowered. "You have little room to speak. Why were you and Yangéra so exhausted when we found you in front of Malast, hmm?"

Diego opened his mouth but didn't respond this time."
"1622

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Zeff didn't let up. "How close did you come to losing her, exactly? And how seriously have you been taking your training, recently? Did you train at all during the last two days?"

Diego just closed his mouth again.

"That's what I thought." Zeff pointed to the other side of the platform.

“Go practice your pan-forma.”

“But we’re still tired from earlier, and--”

“All the better for your training, then. Go on.”

Diego looked like he wanted to argue, but he didn’t. He turned and walked over to where Zeff had pointed, and Yangéra followed.

Hector watched them go. “That was a bit harsh, don’t you think?”

“Warriors are not forged through comfort and coddling. I am sure Diego knows that, too, but it seems he needed reminding.”

“Still...”

“Focus on yourself,” said Zeff. “Do as I instructed. Put an object in orbit around you.”

Hector did so.

From there, Zeff kept pressing him further and further, bit by bit, trying to slowly and incrementally get Hector to find the new limit of his ability, but there wasn’t enough time left. The training ended up being cut short when they arrived at Warrenhold.

Hector controlled their descent with nervous and careful discomfort. When they finally touched ground again, he annihilated most of his work and left it in the shape of a short, wide staircase for everyone, pointing them in the direction of Warrenhold’s aboveground entrance.

No one was immediately around to greet them, but it was still the dead of night, so that wasn’t so surprising. Hector focused on what the Scarf was telling him, searching the area in a way that his eyes couldn’t with all this darkness.

Garovel got there before him, though. ‘Your mother and Madame Carthrace are asleep in their respective rooms in the Tower of Night. Mr. Easton is in the Entry Tower, along with four souls I don’t recognize.’

He let the reaper lead the way.

It was a strange feeling, being back here again. Being home again, he supposed.

It was nice. That was what was strange about it.

Repairs to the Entry Tower were coming along, he noticed. The first chamber actually looked fairly nice now, if still littered with dirt and stone dust. No more cracks in the walls or the floor, and the stairs leading downward were no longer slightly bent or uneven.

And of course, there was electricity now, too. Actual, functioning lamps adorned the narrow entry hall, inviting them further in. Back when he had first left for Sair, Warrenhold had still been waiting on the new generator to arrive and lift them out of the candlelit darkness.

It wasn't much longer until they found Jamal Easton and their two guests.

Hector had never met them before, yet he recognized them almost immediately from their dark complexion and the young man's yellow eyes. Without a doubt, that was Asad's son. Which meant the older woman next to him was probably the Lady Najir.

Zeff and Axiolis rushed forward to greet them. "Samira! Midhat! It is wonderful to see you both in good health!"

"1623

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

Samira seemed more than a little caught off guard when the Lord Elroy moved in close and hugged her, even lifting her off her feet like a sack of potatoes.

Hector stared, arguably even more shocked by what he was seeing than she was.

"Oi--! Hah--! Y-yes! It is good to see you, too, Lord Zeff!" Her Valgan accent was much thicker than Asad's, and her gold-and-black robes dangled loosely over her whole body, covering everything but her face and hands.

Zeff let her back down, leaving the woman looking somewhat traumatized by the experience, and then went for Midhat, first shaking the young man's hand vigorously, only to pull him and lift him off his feet, too. "Oh, I haven't seen you in ages! You're almost a grown man, already!"

“Yes--I--Lord--thank--!”

Samira’s apparent reaper floated forward. ‘Lord Zeff, what are you doing? I am not sure this behavior is appropriate.’

‘Ah, I apologize,’ said Axiolis. ‘Zeff and I have been through quite a lot, lately. We are genuinely overjoyed to see you.’

The other reaper didn’t argue further.

Zeff let Midhat down. “I wish I could stay and talk more, but I must go and retrieve Asad.”

It was then that Mr. Easton approached Hector from the side and took his attention. His uniform was different than Hector remembered. The suit was even blacker than the man himself was. “Lord Goffe. There was no word of your return. We would have organized a welcome.”

“Ah, yeah. It was kind of sudden. I thought I’d be, uh--ah... well, it doesn’t matter now, I guess.” He took a breath and rethought his next words. “I haven’t actually ‘returned’ yet, though. I have to leave again for, like, a day or two. Then I’ll be back.”

“I see. I thought you might have returned after hearing the news.”

Hector paused at that. “What news?”

“So you haven’t heard. Two of Atreya’s four largest banks have collapsed. More than a million people have declared bankruptcy in the last two weeks alone.”

‘Holy fucking shit-grenades,’ said Garovel privately.

Hector just sighed and rubbed his forehead.

“They’re saying we’re about to see the greatest economic depression in the history of the country,” said Mr. Easton.

“Hoo boy.” Mr. Sheridan walked up behind Hector. “Sounds like a real pickle.” He offered Mr. Easton a handshake. “Good to meetcha. Name’s Robert Sheridan. West Intar Company.”

“Jamal Easton. Head of Security for Lord Goffe.”

“Oh! Head of Security, eh? You sure this kid needs anyone to protect him?! From what I’ve seen, he’s the one doing the protecting!”

"Ah. Well, yes..."

"Only teasing, of course," said Mr. Sheridan. "Important fella, your lord here. Nothin' but respect for him. Saved my life, y'know. Great guy. Just the best. I hope we can--"

"Mr. Sheridan," said Hector. "I'm sure you're tired. Mr. Easton will show you to a room where you can rest."

"1624

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

"Oh," said Mr. Sheridan, "well, you're too kind. I am pretty exhausted, now that you mention it. Not as young as I used to be, unfortunately. If I could trouble you for a meal as well, I would be eternally grateful. Even more than I already am, I mean!"

"Of course," said Hector. "Just give us a minute." He pulled Mr. Easton aside in order to keep his next words just between the two of them. "Keep a close eye on this guy for me while I'm away. Be nice to him, but I don't want him wandering around on his own. I don't know if I trust him, yet."

Mr. Easton just stared at him for a second.

"...What's the matter?" said Hector. Shit. Had he said something weird just now? Or stupid?

The man blinked. "Nothing at all, sir. I'll take care of it."

"...Thanks." That was a relief. Hector was about to break away from him until he suddenly remembered something. "Oh, and here." He pulled out the Shifting Spear of Logante from the back of his waistband. "I want you to take this. Careful with it."

Mr. Easton took it. "...What is it?"

Hector took a couple minutes to explain its basic functionality, going over the voice commands that Garovel had told him about earlier. Hector suspected that there were more commands that he didn't know about yet, but Garovel was busy talking to the two new Najirs at the moment.

By the end of the explanation, Mr. Easton looked a bit overwhelmed.

"...You don't have to actually use it, if you don't want to," said Hector. "I know it's kinda weird, uh... so..."

"No, ah--thank you. I will give it a try."

And again, he was about to let Mr. Easton go, until he remembered another thing. "Oh, and uh, please make sure that Mr. Sheridan knows about Warrenhold's weird, ah... psychological effects on people. I can't remember if I ever told him about that or not, so..."

"Yes, sir."

"Ah--thanks. Again." And finally, he released Mr. Easton.

Hector breathed another sigh. There were so many things to take care of. And now there was some sort of financial crisis to worry about on top of everything else?

He was feeling pretty exhausted himself, now that he was allowing himself to relax a little. And he really would've liked to sit down and have a nice meal, too. He hadn't eaten very frequently in the Undercrust, partly because of the food shortage in Babbadelo and partly because it wasn't particularly to his tastes--especially after the numbing of pain wore off and he felt like he'd eaten a bowl of lava. Even Carver's biosphere had only had vegetables.

The more Hector allowed himself to think about it, the more he began to crave a hearty meal. Or two. Or five.

Maybe it was better to just not think about it, then.

He observed the Najirs again. Asad had sent them here in order to open the door to the Undercrust for them, which was a bit unnecessary now of course, but as Hector recalled, Asad had also ordered Jada to go with them.

And yet she had ended up staying with Asad and everyone else, instead.

Hector wondered why. He also remembered Garovel mentioning something strange with them as well. Some sort of family difficulties, perhaps.

He empathized."

Hector wondered if he should even bother greeting his own mother before setting out again.

Probably not, he decided. Garovel had said she was sleeping, anyway. No point in disturbing her. Oh, but he should've asked Mr. Easton how she was doing, at least.

Bah.

He hunted down a phone in order to give Gina a quick update and also ask for one in return, but she hadn't heard from Roman since she'd last spoken to Hector. It was nice to hear her voice again, but he knew he didn't have time to enjoy the conversation--or even to explain fully. It sounded like she had quite a few questions for him--particularly why he was back on the surface without Roman--but Hector ended up just telling her that it was a long story and not to worry about it for now.

She didn't seem pleased with being left hanging like that, but time was a factor here, and it looked like Zeff, Diego, and Manuel were ready to go again.

So they did. The group of four servants and four reapers made their way down to the lowest chamber in the Tower of Night and the heavy, round door to the Undercrust. Their reapers latched onto their bodies, and then one by one, with Hector going last, they jumped into the pitch dark hole.

It was going to be a very long fall.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Five: 'When the world began to shift...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...171 years ago...

It was in the village of Trintol where they first met. A little place, by any account, not even large enough to make it onto a map. But it did have the sweeping vistas of the Melmoorian countryside going for it. The rolling green hills in all directions and the view of the aptly named Storm Mountains in the east--together, they offered a view that was quite uncommon.

Shepherding was the trade that kept Trintol afloat, and that was the first job that the six-year-old Parson Miles ever held. He wasn't very good at it. Stefol, the family dog, did a lot of the work for him. His father might have been able to teach him, if he hadn't been drafted into the war.

But Parson was not alone in that regard. It was much the same for all the other children in the village, even Damian, the lord's son.

They met when he saw Damian throwing rocks at Stefol. And Stefol, though he was old and rather small for a Melmoorian Shepherd, did not appreciate that gesture very much. So the dog chased the boy down and bit him on the ass.

Needless to say, that wasn't a very favorable first impression.

Being the lord's son, and a vengeful little shit, Damian tried to get Stefol put down. It was outrageous that a peasant's animal should bite the son of a lord, he said.

But Trintol wasn't much for that sort of thing. Everyone knew that the Lord Lofar, though he was currently absent due to the war, would not have approved of such retribution being taken, especially when the animal in question was an important part of the livelihood for the family it belonged to. Not to mention, everyone in town knew and liked Stefol more than Damian."

"1625 -- CLXXV.

Hector wondered if he should even bother greeting his own mother before setting out again.

Probably not, he decided. Garovel had said she was sleeping, anyway. No point in disturbing her. Oh, but he should've asked Mr. Easton how she was doing, at least.

Bah.

He hunted down a phone in order to give Gina a quick update and also ask for one in return, but she hadn't heard from Roman since she'd last spoken to Hector. It was nice to hear her voice again, but he knew he didn't have time to enjoy the conversation--or even to explain fully. It sounded like she had quite a few questions for him--particularly why he was back on the surface without Roman--but Hector ended up just telling her that it was a long story and not to worry about it for now.

She didn't seem pleased with being left hanging like that, but time was a factor here, and it looked like Zeff, Diego, and Manuel were ready to go again.

So they did. The group of four servants and four reapers made their way down to the lowest chamber in the Tower of Night and the heavy, round door to the Undercrust. Their reapers latched onto their bodies, and then one by one, with Hector going last, they jumped into the pitch dark hole.

It was going to be a very long fall.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Five: 'When the world began to shift...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...171 years ago...

It was in the village of Trintol where they first met. A little place, by any account, not even large enough to make it onto a map. But it did have the sweeping vistas of the Melmoorian countryside going for it. The rolling green hills in all directions and the view of the aptly named Storm Mountains in the east--together, they offered a view that was quite uncommon.

Shepherding was the trade that kept Trintol afloat, and that was the first job that the six-year-old Parson Miles ever held. He wasn't very good at it. Stefol, the family dog, did a lot of the work for him. His father might have been able to teach him, if he hadn't been drafted into the war.

But Parson was not alone in that regard. It was much the same for all the other children in the village, even Damian, the lord's son.

They met when he saw Damian throwing rocks at Stefol. And Stefol, though he was old and rather small for a Melmoorian Shepherd, did not appreciate that gesture very much. So the dog chased the boy down and bit him on the ass.

Needless to say, that wasn't a very favorable first impression.

Being the lord's son, and a vengeful little shit, Damian tried to get Stefol put down. It was outrageous that a peasant's animal should bite the son of a lord, he said.

But Trintol wasn't much for that sort of thing. Everyone knew that the Lord Lofar, though he was currently absent due to the war, would not have approved of such retribution being taken, especially when the animal in question was an important part of the livelihood for the family it belonged to. Not to mention, everyone in town knew and liked Stefol more than Damian."

"1626

After that, Parson made a habit of avoiding Damian whenever he saw him. He was a timid boy, Parson, and Damian was older by almost a year.

Then Parson met another boy who lived in the village, one whom he had seen around a few times but never learned the name of until their mothers forced them to play together.

The boy's mother said his name was Jonah, and he even answered to it when she called for him. Yet, when Parson was alone with him, the boy suddenly started acting otherwise.

"Don't call me that!" he said, hanging from a tree branch like a monkey.

Parson was confused. "Don't call you what?"

"Jonah! My name's not Jonah!"

"Then why did your mother--?"

"Shut up! She's stupid! She doesn't know anything!"

Parson didn't believe him, but he decided to play along. "Alright, so what's your 'real' name, then?"

Jonah hopped down from the tree and landed with showy toughness. "My real name is Parson."

Parson's face scrunched up. "What?! No, it isn't!"

"Yeah, it is!"

"Nuh-uh! You're a liar!"

"No, I'm not! My name's Parson! You have to call me that from now on!"

"No, I don't! Liar!"

"Yeah, you do! That's how names work, idiot!"

That was it. "Oh yeah?! Maybe I'll tell your mom that you said she was stupid!"

"What?!" That seemed to rattle him. "You better not!"

"Or what, huh?!"

"Or--! Or I'll tell everyone your stupid dog bit me, too! Then you'll be sorry!"

So Parson punched him.

Then Jonah punched him back.

It was the first fight Parson ever got into. It really hurt.

When both boys returned with black eyes and ripped clothes, their mothers were indignant. Parson got ten whips with father's old belt. His mother didn't seem to have any trouble carrying out the sentence in the man's absence, nor did she care to listen to his claims that Jonah had it coming.

When he saw Jonah the next day, though, the boy seemed different.

"I'm sorry for what I said before." Jonah's eyes were at his feet.

Parson checked to make sure the coast was clear, wondering if his mother was putting him up to this.

Oh. Yep. There she was in the window, watching them.

Better put on a good show for her, then. "Don't worry about it," said Parson, and he stuck his hand out to shake on it. "I'm sorry, too."

Jonah took the handshake with a big smile.

Huh.

It was only supposed to be for pretend, but as they continued to spend more time together, it became clear that Jonah didn't realize that. The little jerk actually took the words to heart.

Well, that was fine, Parson supposed. He still didn't like Jonah very much, but it was better than another spanking.

And they became friends. More or less.

"My name really isn't Jonah, though."

Parson rolled his eyes. "So what is it, then?"

"It's Peter. You have to call me Peter from now on."

"Ugh. Fine. You're Peter now."

"Yes! Thanks, Parson!"

"Sure."

"1627

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

As the days went by, they spent more and more time together, mainly because 'Peter' followed Parson around at every opportunity.

What an obnoxious brat. Parson wondered if this was what it was like to have a little brother. Peter claimed to be older than him, but when Parson asked the boy's mother directly, surprise, surprise, that turned out to be a lie. Parson had a full year on him.

Parson's next encounter with Damian was at the summer festival. All the boys in the town had gathered to play a game of tag. Some of the girls tried to join in, but the boys chased them off. Parson wouldn't have minded their company, especially not that of Alisa Brandt, but oh well. He hoped he would find an opening later so that he could kick dirt on that stupid pink dress she was wearing. Where did she even get a dress like that, anyway? She couldn't have made it herself. It was way too nice.

Damian tagged Parson while he was distracted.

Agh. Stupid Alisa and her stupid dress. What was she laughing about, huh? It really bothered him.

He had to tag Damian back. For some reason, no one else would do. It had to be Damian. So Parson chased him down and ignored everyone else.

The other boys took notice fairly quickly, but Parson didn't care. Maybe it was because he wasn't feeling quite so timid, anymore. He'd been in a fight. He had this weird little minion following him around. Parson's confidence had grown. And he absolutely didn't want to lose to Damian, lord's son or not.

Eventually, Parson managed to tackle him. It was rougher than they were supposed to play, but that was how these games went. The boys all knew that. And so did the girls, probably, watching them the way they did.

But Damian didn't seem to take it that way. He socked Parson in the jaw, and then they were rolling in the dirt, kicking and screaming, punching and clawing.

The other boys had to pull them off of one another before the adults showed up.

And that was the strangest moment of all. Everyone understood without any words being spoken that, regardless of what they had just been doing, the grownups couldn't find out. Parson just didn't want to get punished. Were the other boys the same way?

It seemed to be working. They could pretend. He didn't even mind acting like Damian was his best friend.

But just as the adults were turning to leave, one of the girls ratted them out.

"They were fighting!" she said. "We saw them! Didn't we, girls?!"

The other girls all agreed with her--even Alisa, who scrunched her face up and stuck her tongue out at Parson in particular.

Traitorous wenches.

This was why girls couldn't be trusted.

The boys were all punished. Parson's mother whipped his ass so hard that it hurt to sit for the next few days."

"1628

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

However, the next time Parson, Damian, and Peter met, there was much less animosity. While Parson still couldn't exactly say that he liked Damian, there was a degree of camaraderie between them. They had a common enemy in the girls now. And arguably the adults as well.

And so it was that they became a trio, of sorts, and spent their days scheming away, trying to come up with various ways of terrorizing the girls. One time, they gathered as many frogs as they could find and released them like a plague upon the girls' most frequent haunts. No one ever knew who was responsible. Another time, they gathered up crickets. And still another time, they gathered up fleas.

They regretted that one, though, and resolved to start coming up with plans that didn't involve animals.

They relied on Peter for a while, helping him to hone his craft as a liar. First, they tried to trick the girls into thinking that Peter was a prince. It didn't work so well. Then they tried to convince the girls that the well on the south end of the village was haunted.

"By what?" one of the girls asked.

"By the ghost of Mad Man Morris!" said Peter.

"And who is that?"

"He was a lunatic and a murderer! He killed his whole family and laughed while he did it! They say he fell down the well and died, but you can still hear his moans at night!"

The girls didn't believe them, of course. But they convinced them to visit the well at night in order to prove their courage, at which point, Parson had already climbed into the well and was waiting for them. After a few timely moans of "agony," the girls quickly decided to leave.

And the next day, they began to hear rumors of the ghost in the well.

It was all they could do to contain their pride and laughter.

That meager taste of success was all the motivation they needed to push themselves toward ever greater heights. Story after story, prank after prank, the trio began to grow rather infamous as troublemakers.

But by far, their most triumphant venture was when they covered Damian in sheep's blood and told everyone--with the greatest of sincerity and commitment to their roles--that he'd been mauled by a pack of wild coyotes.

They had the whole village in an uproar.

Of course, when everyone realized the truth, the Trio caught hell to a greater degree than they ever had before, but it was worth it, Parson felt. He'd never laughed so hard in his life or had so much fun.

In time, some of the other boys wanted to join their little gang, but it was far too late for new members. The Trio were in agreement that they should keep things exactly the way they were.

The other boys didn't take the rejection well, perhaps because the Trio lobbed curses and mud at them, and for a while thereafter, the Trio went to war with all the other boys in Trintol."

"1629

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Of course, it was only a pretend war. A game. Not like the real war that was raging in the south and the northeast.

"Think we'll ever see them again?" said Steven one day, while they were lounging around a hole that they had recently dug out for themselves as a hiding spot. He had stopped wanting to be called Peter a month ago, nor did he want to go back to Jonah. And rather than quarrel with him over something that they didn't really care about, Parson and Damian merely went with it. Besides, it made for an extra means of confusing people in the village, which was always a plus. "Our fathers, I mean. Think they'll ever come back?"

"Of course they will," said Damian. "Why wouldn't they?"

Steven scoffed. "Idiot. Don't you know what war is? It's where people die. Lots of people."

"I know that. But they're not gonna die."

"How do you know?"

"He doesn't," said Parson. "He's just being optimalistic."

"Do you even know what that word means?" said Damian.

"Do you?" said Parson.

Damian folded his arms. "You shouldn't use words you don't know the meaning of. It makes you look stupid."

"Shut up. You don't know anything."

"My mother says the war is going great for our side," said Damian. "There's nothing to worry about."

"Hmph," Parson huffed. "As if she would tell you the truth."

"You callin' my mother a liar?!"

"No, I'm callin' YOU a baby!"

And they fought again, but it didn't have the same kind of genuine anger behind it that it used to. They were both content to let it end in a draw. Steven tried to get them to shake hands. They both just slapped him instead for trying to order them around.

Not long after that, tragedy arrived and hit them like a ton of bricks.

Stefol passed away. The Miles family dog had simply grown too old.

The Trio didn't know how to react. This was their first experience with such things.

But they were sad. That much, they knew. Even Damian, who'd been bitten not that long ago. They'd all gotten to know Stefol much better in the recent months, Parson included. The old dog had seemed fuller with life during that time than Parson ever recalled before.

Then, at his mother's recommendation, Parson decided to make a memorial for Stefol. The other two members of the Trio joined him.

Alas, it was a task which would never see completion.

“Hey, what’s that?” said Steven, pointing toward the horizon.

Parson saw what he meant. Smoke in the distance.

“A fire?” said Damian. He sat atop a tall boulder that they’d been trying unsuccessfully to roll up a hill for the past day or so. They hadn’t been exactly certain what they were going to do with it if they ever managed to actually get it up there, but it had seemed like it would make a good fixture for Stefol’s memorial.

Soon, they caught sight of a rider as well--a lone man on horseback crossing over the hills and coming toward Trintol. He was slumped forward in the saddle, not riding properly at all.”

"1630

When they saw the rider fall from his horse and not get back up, the Trio ran to meet him.

Damian went straight up to the downed man as the horse ran off on its own. He prodded the guy with a stick he often carried around, then put his hand under the man’s nose. “He’s still breathing, I think.”

“Why’s he dressed like that?” said Steven.

“It’s a uniform, stupid,” said Parson. “Soldiers wear ‘em.”

“I’m not stupid! I just ain’t never seen one before!”

“Neither have I, but it’s obvious. You should pay more attention when the grownups talk. They say all sorts of things when they think we can’t hear ‘em.”

“I do pay attention! I just ain’t never--”

“Those are Melmoorian colors,” said Damian. “That means he’s one of ours.”

Parson ran around to the man’s other side. “We should drag him back to the village, then.”

“What if they just think we’re playing another prank?” said Steven.

“How could this be a prank?” said Parson. “We can’t fake a dead body.”

“He’s not dead,” reiterated Damian.

“Just shut up and help me.”

“He looks heavy,” said Steven.

“So what?” said Damian. “You a weakling?”

“No! I’m super strong!”

“Coulda fooled me with those twig arms of yours,” said Parson.

“Shut up! I’m stronger than both of you!”

Damian and Parson both laughed. “Go ahead and prove it, then,” said Damian. “Grab his feet, Torocles.”

“What? I told you, I’m Steven!”

“Idiot,” said Parson. “Torocles was the strongest man who ever lived. Ain’t your mother ever read you that story?”

“What? Yeah, of course she has! Shut up!”

And it took a while, but with group effort, they managed to drag the man all the way back to Trintol.

The adults were all aghast at the sight of the stranger. They quickly shooed the boys away from him and then carried him off to Damian’s house, the largest in the village.

The Trio tried to follow and sneak a look in, but even Damian couldn’t find anything else out. The adults were too wary of them. And when night started to fall, Parson had to go home disappointed.

“Boy,” his mother said, taking that punishing tone that he’d heard so many times before. She raised her hand, and he braced himself, but she didn’t smack him. Instead, she patted him on the head and ran her fingers through his hair. “You did a good thing today. I’m proud of you.”

What a weird feeling, that was.

He went to bed happy.

He awoke to his mother shaking him. "Parson! Get up, Parson!"

It was still the middle of the night. "Ma? What's going--?"

She all but threw him out of his bed. "Get up! We have to go!"

He didn't dare protest. He followed her blindly and confusedly. What were all these noises from outside? Shouting and rushed footsteps? Horses, too?

And a scream. A terrible scream. Enough to make his blood run cold. He would've frozen in place at the mere sound of it if his mother hadn't been dragging him by the arm."

"1631

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

They abandoned their home and ran. As his mother pulled him into the dark and open wilderness, Parson looked back at the dwindling Trintol behind.

It was burning.

He could hear more screams like the one earlier, equally as horrible or more.

And he saw horsemen. Not just in the village but around it, too. One of them was riding toward them.

"Mother!" he tried to whisper. But there was too much chaos. Too much noise. She didn't seem to hear him. Or she was simply too focused on running.

He didn't need to be dragged, anymore. His legs were carrying him in stride with her now. He was almost dragging her, even.

But when he looked back, the horseman was still coming. It was dark, but his mother definitely noticed the rider now. She grabbed Parson and dove into a line of underbrush and rocks.

Without any shoes on, Parson's feet were getting cut up and bleeding, but he hardly even noticed. He could still hear the horse trotting, closer than ever now. His mother stopped and held him in place with her, huddled low behind a large stone. He could barely make out the contours of her face despite being close enough to feel her breath, to hear her heart beat, even.

His own heart was pounding harder than it ever had, too. He wanted to go back to running, but she was holding him too tightly in her arms and kissing his forehead.

The horse's clopping steps stopped, suddenly.

And they waited.

"Out with you, woman!" came a man's shout. "I know you are here! I saw you flying the town!"

Parson could feel her trembling.

"Make this easier for yourself and come out! I will not hurt you!"

His mother forced him to look up at her.

"Stay," she said beneath her breath. "Stay, boy."

He felt entirely unable to control himself, but he managed to nod, somehow.

Then she stood up.

He tried to hold onto her, to keep her where she was, but she was stronger than him.

And she left him there.

He didn't move. She had told him to stay. That was all he could think about. He had to listen to her.

He tried to listen for what was happening, but he could only vaguely make out a voice every now and then. A horse neighing. A bush rustling. A bird cawing. The wind howling.

He waited. He waited a very long time. He grew cold, but for the longest time, it didn't bother him. He was too occupied with listening, with waiting. When was she going to come back? What was taking so long? What was happening?

He wanted to know. And he also didn't. Just thinking about the answers to those questions made him feel far colder than he already was.

At length, however, dawn broke, and he began to feel the wilderness around him. The cold, the wind, the dirt, and the hunger."
"1632 -- CLXXVI.

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

He couldn't stay here forever, he was beginning to think. He would have to move, eventually.

But not yet. He could wait for her. Just a little longer.

Then he finally heard something different. The horse. Rustling movement. Trotting off.

The rider was leaving, Parson realized.

He waited. He listened. He hoped. If the horseman was gone, perhaps his mother would return to him now.

And he kept waiting.

Had the horseman carried her off with him? Was she never going to return?

Eventually, Parson could abide the wait no longer. He had to know. He stood on unsteady legs and stepped out from his hiding place. He searched the area for the rider's camp from the previous night.

When he found it, he also found his mother.

She was on the ground, covered in blood. Her clothes were torn, and her throat had been cut.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Six: 'Descend, and have care...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The first part of the fall was a bit rough. Hector hadn't quite nailed the correct trajectory when he'd jumped in, so he soon ended up hitting the wall and bouncing off of it. He ping-ponged back and forth for a while before finally managing to correct his angle of descent with iron. He armored up during that time as well, finding it better to scrape against the wall with metal than with bare flesh.

Once that was done, though, the journey became quite peaceful. And long. It was a strange feeling, to be sure. As he got accustomed to the sensation and relaxed a bit more, his senses began to blend together, which eventually became disorienting as well. At times, he wasn't even sure if he was falling. It almost felt as if he were simply suspended in midair, instead.

'That's not too surprising,' said Garovel privately after Hector had told him about it. 'The human body is in no way adapted to falling such a great distance. That, and I've heard gravity can get pretty screwy in these holes, too. I'm sure your brain doesn't appreciate that very much, either.'

It was true that he felt a little woozy at times. He tried to maintain his focus, though. A question. He had to think of a question. 'Ah... oh, uh. By the way, um... you mentioned it before, didn't you?'

'...What? Mentioned what before?'

'Uh... ah...'

'You okay there, buddy?'

'Y-yeah, I think so. Sorry.'

'Want me to knock you out and just wake you up when we get there?'

'N-no, that's okay. This is... this is good training. I think.'

'Hmm. If you say so.'

'But you DID mention something before...'

Garovel laughed. 'Yes, Hector. I have mentioned lots of things before.'

'No. I mean. But. Yeah.'

Garovel laughed harder. 'This is more fun than I expected. I like disoriented Hector.'

‘Ah... er...’ Dammit, there was something. He was trying to remember. ‘You mentioned something about these giant holes, didn’t you?’

‘Mm, sure?’

‘Agh...’

‘C’mon, buddy, you can do it.’”

"1632 -- CLXXVI.

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

He couldn’t stay here forever, he was beginning to think. He would have to move, eventually.

But not yet. He could wait for her. Just a little longer.

Then he finally heard something different. The horse. Rustling movement. Trotting off.

The rider was leaving, Parson realized.

He waited. He listened. He hoped. If the horseman was gone, perhaps his mother would return to him now.

And he kept waiting.

Had the horseman carried her off with him? Was she never going to return?

Eventually, Parson could abide the wait no longer. He had to know. He stood on unsteady legs and stepped out from his hiding place. He searched the area for the rider’s camp from the previous night.

When he found it, he also found his mother.

She was on the ground, covered in blood. Her clothes were torn, and her throat had been cut.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Six: ‘Descend, and have care...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

The first part of the fall was a bit rough. Hector hadn't quite nailed the correct trajectory when he'd jumped in, so he soon ended up hitting the wall and bouncing off of it. He ping-ponged back and forth for a while before finally managing to correct his angle of descent with iron. He armored up during that time as well, finding it better to scrape against the wall with metal than with bare flesh.

Once that was done, though, the journey became quite peaceful. And long. It was a strange feeling, to be sure. As he got accustomed to the sensation and relaxed a bit more, his senses began to blend together, which eventually became disorienting as well. At times, he wasn't even sure if he was falling. It almost felt as if he were simply suspended in midair, instead.

'That's not too surprising,' said Garovel privately after Hector had told him about it. 'The human body is in no way adapted to falling such a great distance. That, and I've heard gravity can get pretty screwy in these holes, too. I'm sure your brain doesn't appreciate that very much, either.'

It was true that he felt a little woozy at times. He tried to maintain his focus, though. A question. He had to think of a question. 'Ah... oh, uh. By the way, um... you mentioned it before, didn't you?'

'...What? Mentioned what before?'

'Uh... ah...'

'You okay there, buddy?'

'Y-yeah, I think so. Sorry.'

'Want me to knock you out and just wake you up when we get there?'

'N-no, that's okay. This is... this is good training. I think.'

'Hmm. If you say so.'

'But you DID mention something before...'

Garovel laughed. 'Yes, Hector. I have mentioned lots of things before.'

'No. I mean. But. Yeah.'

Garovel laughed harder. 'This is more fun than I expected. I like disoriented Hector.'

'Ah... er...' Dammit, there was something. He was trying to remember. 'You mentioned something about these giant holes, didn't you?'

'Mm, sure?'

'Agh...'

'C'mon, buddy, you can do it.'"
"1633

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

'Something, uh...' Hector remembered. 'Names! They have names!'

'Oh, right, yeah. What about them?'

Shit, what about them? 'What, uh...? Ugh...'

'Oh, are you trying to ask what the name of this hole is?'

'Yeah! That's it!'

'Well, I don't actually know, sadly. I'd never even heard of Warrenhold before Voreese told us about it, and I definitely didn't know that it had a path to the Undercrust in it, much less the path's name.'

'Oh.'

'We can ask Voreese next time we see her. Or we could just name it ourselves. We could call it the Warrenhole. Heh.'

'Wow...'

'A thousand troa says that that's what Voreese calls it.'

'You don't have any money to bet with, Garovel.'

'I'll just use yours.'

'Why would I take a bet against my own money?'

'Look, stop being logical. I thought you were disoriented.'

'I think it's passed now.'

'Well, shit.'

'Speaking of owing me stuff, though, I haven't forgotten our last wager.'

'Hey, I wouldn't have owed you anything. Voreese is DEFINITELY going to call it Warrenhole.'

'Garovel.'

'What?'

'You're trying to change the subject.'

'I don't know what you're talking about.'

'Bullshit. We had a wager, and you lost.'

'That's funny. I remember you disqualifying yourself by cheating.'

'No way. I won fair and square, and we both know it. Now you have to tell me something significant about your past.'

'Eh, I dunno. I mean, given the circumstances and my overall generosity as a person, I think we can probably just consider it a draw.'

Hector couldn't help laughing. 'You're so full of shit.'

'Tell you what. I'll tell you something significant about my past, if you do what you promised, too.'

'It WASN'T a draw, Garovel.'

'It kinda was, though.'

Hector wasn't going to budge on this. 'You tried to redefine the definition of your second guess after the fact. That doesn't count as a draw at all.'

'That's YOUR interpretation. My interpretation was you tried to cheat by pretending my second guess was wrong.'

'You're unbelievable.'

‘You’re just scared of having to pay Lynn a compliment.’

‘Of course I--agh! Whatever.’

‘Just one compliment! It’d be easy! Here, I’ll even help you prepare. You can tell her her eye patch looks nice.’

‘What the fuck kinda compliment is that?’

‘The easy kind. And I’m saying that’s okay.’

‘It sounds sarcastic.’

‘Well, don’t say it in a sarcastic tone, then.’

‘I’m not gonna say it at all! I won the wager, jackass!’

‘Just because you keep saying that doesn’t make it true.’

‘I hate you.’

‘I hate you, too, buddy.’

Hector gave a mental sigh. ‘Fine. If you really don’t wanna tell me about yourself that badly, then I’m not gonna force it out of you.’”

"1634

‘Oh, you mean like you’ve BEEN doing? I’ve been feeling a lot of hostility, y’know.’

‘My apologies,’ said Hector dryly. ‘I don’t know what came over me. I’m sure it would’ve been a boring story, anyway.’

‘Oh shit. Really? You’re doing this, now?’

‘Doing what? It’s just--now that I’m thinking about it, I’m not even sure why I decided to bet for it in the first place. I mean, if you had anything interesting to say about your past, you probably would’ve told it to me a long time ago.’

‘This isn’t gonna work, Hector.’

‘What isn’t?’

‘First of all, I know that YOU know that I have tons of interesting stories left to tell. I’m three thousand years old. You can’t possibly believe I’m out of material, already.’

‘Whatever you say, Garovel.’

The reaper snorted a laugh. ‘You sack of a crap! Stop trying to piss me off!’

‘I don’t know what you’re talking about.’

‘Fuckin’ liar.’

‘It’s alright, Garovel. You don’t need to be ashamed of your boring history. I understand.’

‘Wow.’

Hector laughed but decided to change tactics. With how stubborn the reaper was being, he was getting the impression that they were wading into sensitive territory here. ‘Do you really not want to tell me, though? I mean, you know, it actually IS okay, if you don’t want to. Seriously.’

The reaper made no response.

‘...Garovel?’

‘Um. Well. It’s not that I don’t want to tell you anything at all about my past. Because--and I’m being serious here--there’s plenty to tell. Obviously, I could pick a story from almost any point in my life, and you’d probably be fine with it. But... I’ve been thinking for a while now that there is... one story in particular that I’d like to tell you, even though it’s not one I like to tell.’

‘...So that’s why you’ve seemed so reluctant about this.’

‘I planned on telling it to you, sooner or later. It’s just easier to put these sorts of things off.’

‘Why don’t you like telling it?’

‘There are a few reasons. It’s quite personal, for one. And for another, it could be bad if other people found out about it. There’s sensitive information in it. But mostly... I think... the main reason I don’t like telling it is simply because... it doesn’t paint me in a very flattering light.’

‘Oh...’

‘While it did happen a very, VERY long time ago, I won’t blame you if you think less of me after I tell it to you.’

Suddenly, Hector wasn’t so sure he wanted to hear it anymore. ‘Uh... shit, Garovel. It’s really that bad?’

‘I would say yes. But then again, I don’t really know. I’m not sure what you’ll think.’

‘O-okay. Um.’ He tried to prepare himself. ‘I’ll try to keep an open mind, then.’”

"1635

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

‘Alright, then. Here goes.’ Garovel paused, perhaps to gather his thoughts. ‘It’s a story from when I was still alive. It took place on the continent now known as Exoltha.’

‘Ah--sorry to interrupt so soon into it, but, uh... I seem to recall you telling me that you weren’t sure what your homeland was called nowadays.’

‘Hmm, did I?’

‘Yeah. It was back when you first told me about the Lyzakks. Your native people, you said. And then later, you told Ibai that you grew up on Exoltha. Or the Dáinnbolg, is what I think you called it. Either way, I’m pretty sure everyone knows about the dead continent nowadays.’

‘How strange,’ said Garovel.

‘Right? It’s almost like you were lying or something.’

‘You’re probably just remembering wrong.’

‘Don’t think I am.’

‘Oh yeah? What makes you so confident, huh? Your memory’s not that good.’

‘Maybe not like yours, but I can remember stuff. Sometimes.’

‘Yeah, when it’s inconvenient for me, apparently.’

‘Why did you lie?’

‘Well, technically, I didn’t.’

‘Technically, you said you didn’t know something that you actually did know. That’s a lie, Garovel.’

‘No, see, while Chergoa and I did grow up on Exoltha, the small region of it where we lived was eventually broken off from the rest of the continent and therefore isn’t a part of it anymore. It became a group of islands and drifted rather far away.’

‘Drifted? Islands don’t float, do they? I mean, they’re made of rock.’

‘Islands DO drift, though admittedly not as quickly as these did. And you’re right, islands normally do not float, but these ones do, because they’re man-made. And I genuinely do not know what they’re called nowadays, either.’

‘Hmm.’

‘So you see, I didn’t actually lie.’

‘...Right. You just left a ton of stuff out.’

‘Well, it wasn’t especially important at the time and would’ve needlessly complicated the conversation, okay? And as you already know, I don’t particularly like talking about this part of my past very much. Now will you stop breaking my balls and let me continue on with my story?’

‘Go ahead.’

‘Alright. So I was still alive and in the flesh. Living on Exoltha. And no, before you ask another pedantic question, we didn’t actually call it Exoltha in those days.’

‘I wasn’t gonna ask that.’

‘Mm. Regardless, for ease of storytelling, I’m just gonna keep referring to it as Exoltha, okay? Okay. Anyway, it began, like many stories, with war--’

'I'd still like to know more about those man-made islands, by the way.'

'Stop interrupting, dammit.'

'Sorry. It's just, I mean, this was like three thousand years ago, right? So who made them? A servant?'

'Yes. Now do you wanna hear this story or not?'

'Of course I do.'

'Then shut up for a minute.'

'...Fine.' If Hector was being completely honest, though, a part of him would've liked to keep stalling. He might've kept trying, if the reaper hadn't started to sound sincerely annoyed."

"1636

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

Garovel took a moment before continuing. 'So there was a war. But that wasn't such a rare thing. My people were a brutal sort. We fought all the time, often amongst ourselves. It's hard to truly articulate how different life was, compared to civilization as you know it today, but that was one of the biggest things. Bloodshed was as common a thing to us as eating or sleeping.'

Hector just listened.

'Part of the reason for that may have been because reapers were a well-known part of our culture, and there was a prevailing idea among the Lyzakks that death wasn't really the end. It was easier--mentally, that is--to risk our lives in deadly combat, because we knew that we could live on after our mortal end. At the time, we believed it was a measure of our courage and dutifulness in life. If we lived a "worthy" life in other words, then we would get to come back as a reaper and watch over our brethren.

'And I was certainly no exception. I believed that wholeheartedly. It wasn't until much, much later, after I'd already become a reaper myself, that I began to realize it was simply a hereditary, luck-of-the-draw type thing. That was quite the horrific revelation, let me tell you. Thinking that you'd lived a good and worthy life and that all of your fellow reapers were the same--that was a comforting belief. Until it was gone, that is. I'd never felt so deluded and ashamed of myself as I did then.

'But I'm getting ahead of myself, I suppose. That's not even part of this story, really. This is just about what I did during the war.'

Hector thought of a question and decided to interrupt. 'Did this war have a name?'

'Not one that many have heard of, I should think. But in Mohssian, it would've translated to "the Thousand Books War."'

'It was a war over books?' said Hector.

'More or less. See, my people weren't very, uh, shall we say, "literarily inclined." We had a habit of going around and destroying places where any sort of writing was being kept.'

'Why?'

'It may be hard to believe by today's standards, but writing was a very controversial development in our culture. The idea was that writing things down made you "careless of mind," because if you wrote something down, then you wouldn't have to remember it. And that was considered a trick of sorcerers and saboteurs in an effort to weaken our culture and our people.'

'We did, however, write things down in stone. Even long before I was born, that was a revered tradition. Which, I freely admit, was maybe a bit hypocritical of us, but the difference, at least in our minds, was that because stone made the task so much more difficult, it couldn't be "abused" for trivial matters. You would only bother with the arduous task of writing something in stone if it was something that you really, REALLY wanted to write down.'

'Huh...'

"1637

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

'But anyway,' said Garovel, 'it wasn't what you might call a "good war." Or--okay, maybe that sounds like an oxymoron and simply an impossibility--and maybe it is. War is obviously terrible. But what I mean is, it wasn't a war that we had a good reason for fighting. We were the aggressors, and we were trying to destroy all these libraries before they could "sow disorder" or "stir dark sentiments" among our people. That was basically the extent of our justification for it. And even though I believed it at the time and for many years thereafter, when I look back on it now... well. I'm ashamed of myself, to say the least.'

Hector wasn't sure what to say.

'...But perhaps that doesn't really give you a complete pictures of things,' said Garovel. 'I'll put it more bluntly. Over the course of the war, I burned down seven different libraries and slaughtered dozens of innocent people in the process.'

Now Hector really didn't know what to say.

'Of course, they didn't seem so innocent to me at the time, nor was I acting alone, but that doesn't absolve me of my crimes, I think.'

'It... it was three thousand years ago, Garovel.'

'That doesn't absolve me, either, Hector.'

'I... I don't... uh...'

'It's okay. You don't have to say anything. And you don't have to overlook it, either. It's a part of my past, and even though that's not who I am anymore, I wanted you to know about it.'

He felt like he had to say something, but he didn't know what. Garovel had really killed people? Innocents?

He was having a hard time with that. He didn't want to believe it. But then again, life was different three thousand years ago. And it was a different culture. And... and...

'...Why did you tell me that?' said Hector.

The reaper took his time answering. 'I... don't want to hide the truth from you. Even when it's terrible.'

'But that's...' Hector sighed in his own mind. A part of him--a rather strong part of him--wished that Garovel hadn't told him. He didn't want to think of Garovel as having done something like that. 'Did you... did you really kill innocent people? Like, non-combatants who couldn't fight back?'

'...Yes.'

Somehow, that one word hurt Hector more than he thought it would. It was so difficult to understand, to consolidate with everything he had already known about Garovel. This was someone who had resurrected him for the expressed purpose of rescuing innocent people, and yet...? Now Garovel was saying...?

Agh.

It was one thing for Garovel to have fought and killed people in a war. Other warriors. That was what Hector had been thinking the reaper was going to say. Even that thought had made him uncomfortable, but now, he felt like he would've understood that a lot better, at least. When you were in a war, you were fighting for your own survival as much as you were to achieve victory for your side. It wasn't pleasant to think about, maybe, but it was understandable.

Killing non-combatants was beyond that, though, Hector felt. That was significantly more awful."

"1638

There arrived a very long silence as Hector deliberated over what to say. He knew that he wanted to say something, and perhaps Garovel could somehow tell, because the reaper was giving him plenty of time to think.

Would more context help, Hector wondered? He wasn't so sure that it would. And it wasn't like Garovel hadn't provided any, already. A culture where bloodshed was common as eating and sleeping, the reaper had said.

Hector was grasping. 'Was it... like, ah... w-were you following orders? Or I mean, was it, uh, peer pressure or something?'

'...I suppose I could make those arguments,' said Garovel very calmly and slowly. 'And there would even be truth in them. Certainly, if I had refused to follow orders, I would have been flogged and possibly executed. And there was definitely an element of peer pressure to it as well. Every culture has peer pressure, to some extent, else it wouldn't really function as a culture.

'But if I am being entirely honest with both myself and with you, then, no. I believed quite strongly in what I was doing. I truly thought that those innocent people were simply not innocent. I thought they were evil and traitorous.'

Hector frowned inside his helmet. 'I don't suppose... there's any chance they actually were evil and traitorous, is there?'

The reaper gave a weak laugh. 'You're really trying to give me the benefit of the doubt, aren't you?'

'I just... I don't know.'

'Well. Contrary to what I may have said in the past, I am not omniscient. So maybe they were traitorous in some capacity. Maybe they were even evil, by some strange definition. But the fact of the matter was that I didn't have any good justification for believing so. And yet I did.'

Hector didn't have anything to say.

Garovel wasn't done, though. 'The killings were horrible enough, obviously, but I also don't want to understate the seriousness of burning down those libraries. These days, the whole world is a library, thanks to technology, so the loss of one is not nearly as much of a tragedy. In those days, though? I'm certain I helped destroy knowledge that could not have been found anywhere else. Probably even knowledge that remains lost even to this day. There's no way to tell. And when I imagine the potential rippling effect of that lost knowledge throughout history... it makes me wonder how many other innocent people might have been saved.'

'That's... that's unknowable, Garovel. You shouldn't think like that.'

It was the reaper's turn not to say anything.

And there was more silence. Hector wanted to say something, but this was all a lot to take in, and he didn't want to say something he didn't mean. He especially didn't want to say something that he knew was wrong, because even if it sounded good, it probably wouldn't help.

Garovel had just bent over backwards to tell him the truth. Hector didn't want to betray that effort by lying to him."

At length, however, Hector thought of something he wanted to ask. '...When did you change? And how?'

'My views didn't change until about a hundred years after I became a reaper,' said Garovel. 'That was when I decided to start traveling. As for "how"... well. There wasn't any singular cause, I'd say. It was more a cumulative effect. I was slow to change my mind--as you might expect from someone who'd lived that way his entire life.'

'...Is that why you decided to start taking servants? To make up for... all of that?'

The reaper paused again. 'Yes. That would be fair to say.'

'I... see.'

'It's also why I would like to turn Warrenhold into a place of safeguarding knowledge, if possible. Maybe it's too little, too late, but I'd still like to try, nonetheless.'

Hector didn't know what to say.

Garovel left it at that for a while, and Hector just allowed his thoughts to swirl in his mind, not really holding onto or trying to unpack any of them. He felt like he understood Garovel much better now, and yet he didn't know what to make of that understanding.

He didn't feel like he disliked Garovel any more, though. And that was strange. Because he should have, shouldn't he? Was his friendship with Garovel making him completely overlook this?

That didn't seem right...

But maybe there was more to it than just that. It was so long ago, and Garovel obviously regretted it. And Hector didn't know any of the people whom Garovel had killed, so...

Ugh.

Hector felt intensely uncomfortable with himself. He didn't think any less of Garovel. But he might've thought less of himself.

Maybe he was just thinking that way because it was familiar, though. Easier.

Agh. So confusing. He couldn't tell if he was being honest with himself about any of this. He only knew that it felt very strange and that he didn't like it.

In time, Garovel spoke up again. 'I can sense the bottom. You should try to protect your Scarf, if you can. Don't want to get blood all over it.'

Hector removed it and boxed it in iron.

Then he blacked out.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Seven: 'Attend to thee...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When he awoke, Hector was nude. He was not surprised, though. While he hadn't felt the impact from the fall, it must have surely been enough to obliterate his whole body and force Garovel to regrow him from scratch. Mere iron armor certainly hadn't protected him from that shit.

The clothes he'd been wearing were soaked in blood and flesh and even splintered bits of bone, but Zeff was there to jetwash and steam-press them for him.

They weren't in very good shape afterward, though. The Lord Elroy wasn't the most delicate launderer. Maybe they weren't supposed to be cleaned with water. And of course, the multiple fights with worms and the impact from the fall just now probably hadn't done them any favors, either. They were hardly even recognizable compared to when he'd first gotten them, which was only a week or so ago, back in Babbadelo."

"1639 -- CLXXVII.

At length, however, Hector thought of something he wanted to ask.

‘...When did you change? And how?’

‘My views didn’t change until about a hundred years after I became a reaper,’ said Garovel. ‘That was when I decided to start traveling. As for “how”... well. There wasn’t any singular cause, I’d say. It was more a cumulative effect. I was slow to change my mind--as you might expect from someone who’d lived that way his entire life.’

‘...Is that why you decided to start taking servants? To make up for... all of that?’

The reaper paused again. ‘Yes. That would be fair to say.’

‘I... see.’

‘It’s also why I would like to turn Warrenhold into a place of safeguarding knowledge, if possible. Maybe it’s too little, too late, but I’d still like to try, nonetheless.’

Hector didn’t know what to say.

Garovel left it at that for a while, and Hector just allowed his thoughts to swirl in his mind, not really holding onto or trying to unpack any of them. He felt like he understood Garovel much better now, and yet he didn’t know what to make of that understanding.

He didn’t feel like he disliked Garovel any more, though. And that was strange. Because he should have, shouldn’t he? Was his friendship with Garovel making him completely overlook this?

That didn’t seem right...

But maybe there was more to it than just that. It was so long ago, and Garovel obviously regretted it. And Hector didn’t know any of the people whom Garovel had killed, so...

Ugh.

Hector felt intensely uncomfortable with himself. He didn’t think any less of Garovel. But he might’ve thought less of himself.

Maybe he was just thinking that way because it was familiar, though. Easier.

Agh. So confusing. He couldn’t tell if he was being honest with himself about any of this. He only knew that it felt very strange and that he didn’t like it.

In time, Garovel spoke up again. 'I can sense the bottom. You should try to protect your Scarf, if you can. Don't want to get blood all over it.'

Hector removed it and boxed it in iron.

Then he blacked out.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Seven: 'Attend to thee...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

When he awoke, Hector was nude. He was not surprised, though. While he hadn't felt the impact from the fall, it must have surely been enough to obliterate his whole body and force Garovel to regrow him from scratch. Mere iron armor certainly hadn't protected him from that shit.

The clothes he'd been wearing were soaked in blood and flesh and even splintered bits of bone, but Zeff was there to jetwash and steam-press them for him.

They weren't in very good shape afterward, though. The Lord Elroy wasn't the most delicate launderer. Maybe they weren't supposed to be cleaned with water. And of course, the multiple fights with worms and the impact from the fall just now probably hadn't done them any favors, either. They were hardly even recognizable compared to when he'd first gotten them, which was only a week or so ago, back in Babbadelo."

"1640

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

Hector put the rags on anyway. Evangelina Stroud probably wouldn't be very pleased if she saw what had become of her gifts, but oh well. At least they covered his balls. And his cooling-variant armor would cover the rest of him.

The first chamber that they found themselves in was an expectedly dark one. They still had their lamplights from before, but Hector discovered that his had broken during the fall. So had Manuel's, apparently, though Diego's and Zeff's lights were both fine.

Ah. They'd probably strengthened theirs with their souls, Hector figured. He wished he would've thought to at least try that with his own lamp, even if his soul wasn't yet strong enough to have actually protected it. Would've made for a good test, at least.

Oh well. He didn't even need it anymore, now that he had the Scarf. When he concentrated, he could sense the exact shape of the pitch black room they were in. It was bulbous, though also a bit lumpy and uneven in places. There were only two ways out. One was a large corridor to Hector's right, and the other was the hole above everyone's head--the Warrenhole, as it were.

He still wasn't sure how he felt about that name.

The group made their way to the right and continued onward. They tried to maintain a brisk pace, but Hector could see the hesitation in everyone's movements, too. The footing here was rocky, and their last adventure in the Undercrust was likely still fresh enough in everyone's mind to cause them due concern for what they might encounter next.

As they moved, the corridor began to widen and grow taller, until it was nearly as spacious as a basketball stadium. Eventually, however, they came upon an equally enormous blockage. Truck-sized boulders filled the entirety of the passageway, and it was so dense and deep that Hector couldn't sense any air flowing through it.

"Well, this is quite the setback," said Diego, rapping his knuckles against one of the largest rocks. "How long's it gonna take to get through here, do you think?"

Hector could already see Zeff stretching his arms.

'It won't do to be reckless here,' said Garovel aloud. 'Cave-ins like this are a frequent occurrence in the Undercrust for a reason. If we're not careful, we could end up causing another one, which would only serve to prolong things even more.'

"I am aware," said the Lord Elroy. He looked over at Hector, then at Diego and Manuel. "Hector and I will take care of this. You two give us some space to work."

Diego's brow rose. "I can help."

“Get some rest,” Zeff said. “You look like you could use it.”

“I look like I could use it?” said Diego. “You haven’t looked in a mirror lately, have you?”

“I feel fine,” said Zeff, firmer now. “Rest. Or meditate, if you prefer. But keep your distance.”

Deigo shrugged. “Alright, whatever you say. Let’s go, Mannie.”

“Please do not call me that,” said Manuel.

And they and their reapers ventured off.”

"1641

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

Zeff eyed Axiolis and Garovel as well. “You two should probably keep your distance as well.”

‘Is what you’re going to do really that dangerous?’ said Garovel.

“Only if it goes awry,” said Zeff, eyeing Hector again.

‘Try to be careful, then,’ said Axiolis, and he moved to leave.

Garovel, however, did not. He remained exactly where he was by Hector’s side.

Zeff stared at the reaper, waiting.

Hector could feel the silence growing uncomfortable. ‘Garovel...’

Rather than responding to him in private, the reaper just came right out and said it to Zeff’s face. ‘I’d rather not leave my servant alone with you.’

Zeff met the reaper’s gaze. “Why not?”

‘Because you haven’t been treating him very well, lately, and it annoys me.’

Zeff made no response.

Before the tense silence had an opportunity to return, Hector decided to intervene. "Garovel, please. It's fine. Just--I'm sure there're a lot of things you want to talk to Axiolis about, aren't there?"

Garovel's looked at Hector, and his skeletal face twisted somewhat. He didn't say anything, though.

'Garovel,' Hector tried again, more firmly this time. 'I'll be fine.'

After another silent moment, the reaper seemed to relent and said nothing more as he floated off to join Axiolis.

"I see that I have not endeared myself to your reaper," said Zeff after they were alone.

"He's just... protective of me, I guess."

"Indeed. And that is an admirable quality. But you should be careful not to allow his protectiveness to become an obstacle to your progress. That would be bad for both of you."

"I... don't think I need to worry about that. Garovel likes to get me involved in crazy shit pretty frequently, too."

"All the more reason to keep up with training, then."

"Oh, believe me, I know."

Zeff turned toward the wall of rocks and cracked his knuckles. "Let us stop dawdling, then. How is your precision crafting coming along?"

An odd and rather vague question, Hector felt. "Uh... okay, I guess? What do you mean, exactly?"

"Can you materialize drills yet?"

"Ah--I don't know. I haven't really tried."

"They require careful and continual application of very powerful velocity states. I will demonstrate, and then you--"

Sensing that this could become a rather long conversation, Hector felt he should finally tell Zeff what he had been meaning to. "Ah--uh, b-before we get into that, there's something I should tell you."

Zeff dropped his hands to his sides. "Go on, then."

He took a moment to consider how to phrase his next words. "...I have reason to believe that Asad and the others are currently being held prisoner by someone."

Zeff's face flashed with anger. "What?! How would you know that?!"

"I... spoke to Rasalased again after... uh... well, just before we got back to the surface. And he said that Asad was being held prisoner. By a "lost sheep," whatever that means. That was all he told me, though.""
"1642

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

Zeff shut his eyes, scratched his brow, and breathed slowly and deeply. "Rasalased. I see. Frankly, I wasn't certain I believed that you had ever spoken to him in the first place, but now, I suppose I do." The man sighed with irritation. Then he opened his eyes again and glowered. "Why are you only telling me this now? Why not immediately after we returned to the surface?"

Hector didn't much care for the look the man was giving him. It reminded him of their staring contest on the train. "I didn't want you to worry any more than you already were. It wouldn't have helped anything."

"I would have gotten us to your Warrenhold much more quickly than you did. That would have helped quite a bit."

"Not if someone snapped a picture of your ice flying through the sky."

Zeff scoffed. "Unlikely. It was dark."

"It wasn't worth the risk. The whole point of going to Warrenhold is so that you guys can lay low there. We can't jeopardize that just to save a few extra minutes."

"Hmph. That was not your decision to make."

"Yes, it was. I'm not going to let what happened at Dunehall happen at Warrenhold, too."

Zeff glared at him but made no response.

"The reason I'm telling you now is because I thought if you have a faster way of getting us through this blockage, then you should just do it. Don't waste time training me. Even though I--uh... ah, even though I appreciate the thought and... er..."

Zeff raised an eyebrow in the middle of his scowl, but he still wasn't saying anything.

Hector had lost his momentum, though. Maybe it was a mistake to try to express his gratitude at that particular moment.

Shit.

Zeff's displeasure seemed to diminish, however. "Fine. No training, then. Observe closely and try to pick up what you can. And provide structural support."

Hector wasn't sure what he meant. "Structural support?"

Zeff turned toward the blockage again. "Your iron is much more suitable to construction in this environment. Even if I soul-strengthen my ice, it will eventually melt after we leave the area."

Ah. Hector felt like he understood, but Zeff didn't wait for him to say so.

The Lord Elroy raised both hands in front of him and then pressed them against the rock. Jets of water materialized all around the man. They were small but so numerous that Hector almost mistook them for a single archway. They disappeared into the rock, leaving a visible cut behind, and after a moment, Zeff stepped back from the rock so that ice could push out a huge chunk of freshly carved stone.

And just like that, there was a tunnel, though it had not reached all the way through the other side. With the Scarf of Amordiin, Hector quickly came to understand its current, dead-ended shape.

"Support," reiterated Zeff as he proceeded in to the tunnel.

Hector knew exactly what he was referring to. He could sense the instability in the rocks. There were cracks everywhere among the gigantic boulders and tiny pebbles. The slightest shift could collapse this tunnel in an instant."

"1643

He materialized an iron lining for it, and then added extra layers to it, as well as support beams. Maybe he overdid it a little bit, as the tunnel became much more narrow, with hardly even enough space for two people to walk side by side, but it was better to overdo it than to underdo it, Hector figured. The most important thing was to make sure all the weight over their heads stayed exactly where it was.

Zeff kept digging with his water drills just as he had been, though the narrowed tunnel proved a bit challenging in extricating each new chunk of rock from the blockage. He ultimately decided to just dice up the removed stone so that it could be shoved back through passageway without much concern.

It was taking quite a bit longer than either of them had expected, and even after a solid thirty minutes of working, they were still not through to the other side.

“...How far does this blockage go?” said Hector, beginning to wonder if they were even close to the end yet, because he still couldn’t sense any air flowing all the way through it yet.

“No telling,” said Zeff, though he sounded about as exasperated as Hector felt. “This is the Undercrust. This cave-in could be a mile long, for all we know.”

“Agh...”

“I’m going to try going even faster. Match my pace.”

“...Okay.”

Soon enough, they found a good rhythm. Hector paid close attention to all of Zeff’s movements, making sure to leave space for the man to work for as long as he needed it before filling that space in with iron and pushing onward. He also took over extracting the diced rock from the tunnel so that Zeff could focus entirely on the cutting. Working in unison, they were able to nearly double their tunneling speed.

Yet, even after another half-hour, Hector still could not sense the other side.

At length, Axiolis and Garovel came to check on them. Before the reapers got too close, they asked if it was safe, and Zeff told them it was.

Hector and Zeff didn't slacken their pace at all.

'I suppose this is one more reason why Warrenhold isn't more well-known,' said Garovel privately.

'What do you mean?' said Hector.

'I've mentioned this before, but holes to the Undercrust are precious rare and have historically been highly sought after. Even with Warrenhold's bad reputation, I thought it was strange that it would have been abandoned. But this blockage here must have been helping to keep it a secret all these years.'

Hector was reminded of something he'd been wondering about for a while now. 'Ah... do you know where these holes came from?'

'No, I do not,' the reaper said flatly.

Hector expected some sort of quip or annoyed sass about not knowing something. But it didn't arrive. So Hector decided to push a little.

'...Really? You don't even have any theories?'

"1644

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

'Oh, there are loads of theories regarding their origins,' said Garovel. 'Personally, I'm a believer of the Ancient Drillers Theory.'

'Is that what it sounds like?'

'That people drilled the holes in ancient times? Yeah, pretty much. It's not much of a theory, admittedly, but it does seem the most plausible explanation to me--certainly more so than the Megavolcanoes Theory.'

'Megavolcanoes?'

'Basically, it's the theory that the holes are perfectly natural and simply the result of volcanic activity from long before humankind evolved on the planet.'

‘Hmm.’

‘The reason that makes no sense, by the way, is because of the way the holes are shaped. They’re very even and go straight down. If they were truly natural formations, then they would have a much more irregular path.’

Hector had to agree. ‘Yeah. They’ve gotta be manmade. And couldn’t they have just been made by destruction users?’

‘Yeah. Who those destruction users were, however, remains a mystery. I’ve heard it said that the holes predate reapers, which would also mean that they predate destruction users, but I don’t know if I believe that.’

A beat passed as Hector thought about that. ‘You only “don’t know” if you believe it? I’d have thought you would tell me it was total horseshit or something.’

‘Well, according to the data, it’s a bit foggy. The holes are supposedly as old as five thousand years, give or take a few centuries. But the very first reapers supposedly began to appear around that same time, too. So it’s hard to tell either way.’

‘Seems like a hell of a coincidence.’

‘No kidding.’

‘I can’t even imagine what that must have been like. Being the first reaper, I mean.’

‘Confounding beyond belief, I’m sure. When I became a reaper, I’d at least had a conception that it could happen and what it might be like. But being one of the first ones? Waking up after your death and then having to figure all this shit out with no guidance to speak of? I don’t think I would have handled that very well.’

‘Do you know who the oldest reaper was?’

‘No. The oldest one I’ve ever known was a guy by the name of Heloxos. I met him right after I became a reaper, and he was already over a thousand years old at that point.’

‘Wow. Is he still around?’

‘No. He was killed by his own servant about a hundred years later.’

‘Why?’

‘Never found out. I knew they hadn’t been getting along, but learning the exact reason was impossible once the deed was done.’

That made sense, Hector supposed.

‘The oldest still-living reaper I’ve ever met is actually Axiolis here.’

Hector blinked and glanced over at Axiolis, who was hovering over Zeff’s shoulder. ‘Seriously?’

‘He said he’s over four thousand years old, and I’m inclined to believe him.’

‘Holy shit...’

‘Yeah. I don’t encounter many reapers older than myself anymore.’” "1645

((Triple Monday -- Page 2 of 3))

Another question occurred to Hector. ‘By the way, uh... why do you--I mean, er, why do you guys all have such weird names?’

‘Excuse me?’

‘It’s just, uh. Y’know. Garovel isn’t exactly a normal name...’

‘When I was alive, it was.’

‘Yeah, but you just said that most reapers aren’t as old as you,’ said Hector. ‘But every reaper I’ve met so far has a weird name like yours.’

‘Ah. You’re wondering why you haven’t encountered a reaper with the name “Jeff” or “Bill” yet?’

‘More or less, yeah.’

‘A few of those exist. The main issue, though, is that it’s just very rare to meet a reaper who was born less than five hundred years ago.’

‘What about Bohwanox? Wasn’t he pretty young? Compared to you, at least?’

‘Yeah. He was a curious one. Having a name like that but not the age to go with it is definitely odd. But I suspect it means that, rather than being old himself, Bohwanox was born in an “old place,” so to speak.’

‘What do you mean?’

‘He was probably born in one of the very few reaper enclaves in the world.’

Hector wanted to ask more about that, but he couldn’t formulate a coherent question before Garovel kept talking.

‘Places like that are EXTREMELY traditional. And very wary of outsiders. So much so, in fact, that I can’t even tell you where one of them is right now. I used to know, but they moved, as they often do. They tend to believe that a nomadic lifestyle is the easiest way to keep themselves hidden in the long-term. And they might be right.’

‘...Why do they want to hide themselves?’

‘Because there are a lot of dangerous people who would probably like to get their hands on a “reaper breeding ground,” as it were.’

‘Hmm.’

‘And you think Bohwanox was one of those reapers?’

‘Probably. No idea why he would have left his community, though. Boredom, maybe. He didn’t seem like he had anything in particular that he was trying to accomplish, outside of just reaping souls. Ah, maybe it was a sense of duty that drove him out into the world.’

It sounded like Garovel had more to say, but abruptly, Hector could sense a new air flow through the rock ahead of them.

“We’re almost to the other side,” said Hector.

Zeff stopped, but only briefly. His pace seemed to increase even more, though Hector wouldn’t have thought that even possible a few moments ago.

Sure enough, the last chunk of rock slid free, and rather than pushing it all the way back through the tunnel, Zeff shoved it forward and outward.

Finally, their digging had reached its end, and Hector completed the last bit of the tunnel while Zeff stepped out to shine his lamplight around."

"1646

((Triple Monday -- Page 3 of 3))

It was an absolutely gargantuan chamber that awaited them. Even with the Scarf’s help, the ceiling and walls were too distant for Hector to sense them.

‘Which direction is Capaporo from here?’ said Axiolis.

Garovel floated forward, ahead of the group, and Hector moved to catch up with him. ‘...To be completely frank with you, I am not entirely sure.’

“What?” Zeff did not sound pleased.

Garovel sighed. ‘This was why I had Hector write that letter to Roman. His reaper knows the route better than I do. I only know that Capaporo is close.’

'I see,' said Axiolis. 'And it would appear we have a branching pathway in front of us now.'

Indeed, the Lord Elroy's lamplight was revealing as much in the distance, even though the Scarf wasn't. There were tall divides in the rock, poking out from the ocean of blackness in front of them.

"What should we do?" said Hector.

'First, let us have the others rejoin us here,' said Axiolis.

Zeff didn't wait for anyone else to volunteer. He shot back toward the tunnel on a stream of materialized water and burst through the open passageway, leaving an evaporating trail in his wake.

"...I hope he doesn't break any of those support beams I put up," said Hector.

'I am sure he will be careful,' said Axiolis.

Hector wished he had the reaper's confidence.

'Shall we brainstorm while we wait?' said Garovel.

'Yes. I am thinking that we may need to split up and check the various paths independently.'

'I'd say that depends on how many paths there are. It's hard to tell in all this darkness.'

Hector began to walk. The reapers were as clear as day against the black surrounding them, but of course, despite appearances, their ethereal glow emitted no actual light for him to rely upon. He only had the Scarf to go by, but the chamber was so ridiculously spacious that it wasn't terrifically useful.

'Hector,' said Axiolis. 'Will you please make some light for us?'

Uh.

Hector didn't know what--

Oh. Wait. Of course.

He raised a tower of iron, adding enough heat to it to make it glow orange. He'd wanted to make it white hot, as that would've been brightest, but he supposed his application of heat had been too weak for such a large volume of mass. It served well enough, though, and illuminated the room dimly but satisfactorily.

‘Four paths,’ said Garovel. ‘Five, if we’re counting the way we came from.’

‘One path for each servant, then.’

‘Looks that way.’

Soon enough, Zeff returned with the others, and they began to formulate their next move in more detail. The reapers would remain in this area while the servants scouted ahead and reported back. Then the reapers could act as a kind of a communication hub, sharing information with one another and relaying it all to their respective servants instantaneously."

"1647

There was a minor problem with Manuel Delaguna, however. Just like Hector, the man had lost his lamplight in the fall, and so he would have difficulty trying to navigate one of the paths on his own. Apparently, he didn't think that his argon materialization ability would help him in that regard.

‘...Maybe I should lend him the Scarf,’ thought Hector.

‘Absolutely not,’ said Garovel privately. ‘You’re not lending that thing to anyone, you hear me? You’re not gonna explain what it does to anyone, either.’

Hector could understand the reaper's concern, but at the same time, Manuel was an ally in need, and if Hector was in a position to do something about it... But then again, there was no telling if the Scarf would even help Manuel that much. This cave system was way too huge, and the Scarf's sensory range wasn't even enough for this one chamber that they were all standing in.

Thankfully, Diego intervened with an apparent solution. He handed his lamplight to Manuel. "Here," he said with a sigh.

Manuel took it hesitantly. "Thank you, but... are you sure?"

Diego nodded glumly. "Yeah. Technically, I don't need it." He held up a hand and ignited his own flesh. His face went taught, and his clenched jawline became painfully visible.

Yangéra hovered forward and grabbed the man's shoulder.

Diego's expression relaxed again, and he breathed a sigh of relief. "Whew. This is gonna sting in the morning."

'Sooner than that if you don't return to me within half an hour,' said Yangéra.

"Right."

Manuel gave a grateful nod. "Thank you very much, Lord Diego."

"No sweat. Well. Okay, maybe a little sweat." He doused his hand, and its distorted and charred flesh began to regenerate. "How 'bout you come up with a good nickname for me, and we'll call it even?"

Manuel smiled. "I'm glad you brought that up, because I already have."

"Oh yeah?" said Diego. "Go on, then. Hit me with it."

Manuel pointed at Zeff first. "The Dragon of the Rain." Then he pointed at Hector. "Darksteel Wormsbane." Then at Diego. "And the Red Hunter."

Hector's face scrunched up inside his helmet.

"Huh," said Diego, rubbing his chin. "Red Hunter, eh? Yeah. I like that. Good job, Mannie."

"If you keep calling me that, I will make sure you are never known as the Red Hunter."

"Alright. Geez. Manuel it is, then."

Manuel turned to Zeff. "And you? What do you think of yours? I think the Dragon of the Rain has a much nicer ring to it than simply the Water Dragon, don't you? And it's much more in-tune with the Lion of the Desert, don't you think?"

Zeff's face might as well have been stone. "I could not possibly care less."

Manuel bit his lip. "Oh. I see..." After another moment, he rounded on Hector. "And what of you? Do you like the name I came up with?"

"Uh..." Hector figured he probably shouldn't lie to the man. "I... don't, actually."

"1648

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 1 of 3))

Manuel looked incredulous. "What? Why? What is wrong with it?"

"Sorry, I just--uh--" How was he supposed to explain this, he wondered? "Er--I... I just don't really wanna be called Wormsbane..."

"Why not? You don't think it suits you? It was such an incredible feat! We were all amazed when we watched you fell that monster single-handedly!"

Oh shit, not compliments. He couldn't handle those. And wait, they were all watching? "Um, th-thanks, but, uh--" Hector could feel himself beginning to panic. He didn't want to be rude, but he also really didn't like that name. In desperation, he pointed at Zeff. "It would suit him way better, wouldn't it? I mean, I only killed one worm. He killed like five or something, right?"

Manuel stopped. "I suppose that's true..." He looked at the Lord Elroy. "Perhaps you would--"

"ENOUGH." Zeff turned and began walking away. "Are you men? Or are you children? Everyone is waiting. Stop wasting time."

That seemed to kill the conversation quite thoroughly and without mercy. Probably because Zeff was one hundred percent right, Hector thought. The three remaining servants all exchanged last looks with one another before going their separate ways in silence.

Hector ended up taking the rightmost path. He raised pillars of red-hot iron in order to illuminate everything, but there wasn't much to see. Just an enormous and rocky corridor, one which only seemed to grow taller and wider as he went.

Soon enough, he increased his pace to a steady run. The clinking of his armor seemed louder than ever before, probably because of the echoes, so he tried to stop occasionally and just listen, in case there were any noises he hadn't been hearing.

‘Find anything?’ came Garovel’s echoing voice after a while.

‘Just a bunch of rocks,’ said Hector.

‘Thrilling.’

‘Hey, I don’t mind. I could do with a few LESS thrills in my life, actually.’

‘Mm, is that really true? Or are you just saying that to complain? Not that I’d fault you for that, by the way. Complaining is fun. I’m an aficionado of complaining myself, in case you haven’t noticed.’

‘I have.’

‘Heh. That doesn’t answer my question, though. Do you really wish that your life had fewer thrills? Because I’m pretty sure you love this shit as much as I do, if not more.’

‘What? No. I love helping people stay safe, sure. That’s, uh... that’s like, what I live for, I guess. But--er--I don’t love meeting fuckin’... gods or whatever they are. And I definitely don’t love getting trapped in a room with some sort of... hellish abomination.’

‘Yeah, okay, I could’ve done without that, too. But at the same time, I’m kinda glad it happened.’

‘Seriously?’

‘Oh yeah. We learned a lot in Himmekel, y’know.’

‘That’s... true, I guess.’”

"1649

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 2 of 3))

‘Also, you accidentally brought up an interesting point, just now.’

‘I did?’

‘About worms being hellish abominations, that is.’

‘What do you mean?’

‘I mean, ARE they?’

‘Well. Uh...’ He realized what the reaper was getting at. After the ensuing fight, he’d nearly forgotten, but now he remembered. ‘Hmm.’

‘The worm you killed was born from a Hun’Sho core.’

‘Right...’

‘That was certainly new information to me. I did not know that Hun’Sho could transform into monsters like that.’

‘Do you think... do you think all worms used to be Hun’Sho?’

‘No. Remember the eggs we found in Babbadelo?’

‘Oh, yeah. But, uh, we never actually saw those eggs, did we? They were in those vacuum-sealed boxes the whole time.’

‘Okay, that’s true, but I’VE seen worm eggs before. I know they exist.’

‘Have you seen worms actually being born from them, though? Or, uh, what if there’s a Hun’Sho core inside of every worm egg or something?’

‘Alright, well, that... would be horrifying. But I still don’t believe all worms come from Hun’Sho. Just, historically, it wouldn’t make much sense. There’ve been SO many worms. I don’t think the Hun’Sho ever had those kind of numbers, even at the peak of their civilization.’

‘Hmm.’

‘It seems clear to me that worms have some means of reproduction on their own. However, I’m now tempted to believe that worms as we know them today might have ORIGINATED from the Hun’Sho. And that’s a pretty horrifying thought, too.’

‘How old are the Hun’Sho?’

‘Oh, they’re old as fuck. Older than me, even.’

‘Older than all reapers?’

‘That, I don’t know. I don’t think so, though. It’s a subject I’ve looked into several times before, but recordkeeping in those days was far from ideal, to put it mildly.’

‘I wonder if Axiolis would know. He’s older than you, right?’

‘Alright, I’ll ask him. Hang on a second.’

Hector waited. The empty corridor just kept going. At this rate, he was beginning to hope that he would be the one to find Capaporo just so that he wouldn’t have to make the trek all the way back to everyone.

‘Hmm,’ said Garovel. ‘Axiolis says reapers came first.’

‘Oh, well, there you go.’

‘I don’t know if I believe him, though.’

‘What? Why?’

‘Because I don’t like that he knows more stuff than me. And if it’s bullshit, then that means he DOESN’T know more than me.’

Hector might’ve chuckled if he wasn’t regulating his breath so much as he ran. ‘You’re an inspiration for education everywhere, Garovel.’

‘Thanks, buddy.’

‘But, uh... since we’re talking about the Hun’Sho, um... I’m worried about Himmekel. What do you think’ll happen to them?’

Garovel was silent a moment. ‘Difficult to say. But we can’t do anything for them now. We’re way too far away. And even if we weren’t, we’re probably too late.’

Hector frowned to himself."

"1650

((Triple Wednesday -- Page 3 of 3))

‘On the bright side, though, we don’t have any reason to think that Royo and Malast will harm them.’

Hector wasn’t so sure about that. ‘Well... he did say that he was the one who derailed the train, which nearly killed us all.’

‘Okay, so maybe we have a slight reason to think they might harm them.’

‘Mm.’

‘But the unpleasant truth of the matter is that if Royo intends to kill all of the Hun’Sho, then he probably already has. It’s been several hours since he’s presumably had free reign in Himmekel.’

Hector wished he could argue with that point.

‘I honestly don’t think he’ll hurt them, though,’ said Garovel. ‘He seemed... diplomatic with us, there at the end. And the Hun’Sho would no doubt make for incredibly valuable allies, if he can manage to persuade them.’

‘Hmm...’

‘It’s a shame we couldn’t bring any of the Hun’Sho with us back to Warrenhold, actually. Even just one of them would have been great.’

‘What the--? I thought you didn’t trust them.’

‘Oh, I don’t. But they must know all sorts of good shit. Especially the older ones.’

‘I’d rather not live with people we don’t trust, Garovel. And besides, I feel like a Hun’Sho could very easily kill a non-servant, even just by accident.’

‘Eh, I’m sure we could figure something out. Keep ‘em segregated from all the normies, maybe.’

‘Now you’re making it sound like we’d be keeping the Hun’Sho prisoner.’

‘Maybe we would be.’

‘Garovel.’

‘What? They’re sneaky and barely even human.’

‘...I can’t tell if you’re joking or not.’

‘I just mean that if one or more of them happened to do something criminal, then that would justify us keeping them prisoner.’

Hector wasn’t sure how to respond to that.

‘And hey, I’m three thousand years old. I’m entitled to be a little racist, aren't I?'

'Wow, Garovel.'

'Okay, that one was a joke, just so we're clear.'

'Was it, though?'

'Oh, don't even start. I'm very tolerant of other cultures and ethnicities, I'll have you know.'

'Uh-huh...'

'Like with you, for instance. I decided to take you on as a servant, even though I don't much care for the blacks.'

Hector coughed up a laugh so suddenly that he nearly tripped and so had to stop running. He doubled over and lost control of his cooling armor as he kept cracking up.

'I'd say that's pretty tolerant,' said Garovel, 'wouldn't you?'

When he felt the heat of the Undercrust creeping into his armor, he managed to get hold of himself and fix his armor. 'Holy shit, Garovel.' He started running again, seeing that there was still no sign of Capaporo or anything else around. 'You almost made me fall on my face, just now.'

The reaper laughed."

"1651

It was a relief to hear Garovel joking around again, Hector felt. After what the reaper had told him about his past earlier, Hector was glad to hear him sounding like himself again. 'Has anybody else found anything yet?'

'Nope.'

'Ugh.'

'Don't worry. Capaporo has to be close. Voreese said so. She wouldn't lie. And if she did, well, that's great, too, because then I'll get to give her SO much shit about it later.'

‘Somehow, that doesn’t alleviate my worries.’

‘Mm. Sounds like your problem.’

‘How close is close, anyway? Isn’t that kind of a vague term?’

‘I’m sure we’ll find it sometime within the next twenty-four hours.’

‘Aw, shit...’

‘Hey, at least you’re not Diego. I’m sure he’s gonna be feeling miserable, soon.’

Hector sympathized. He wasn’t entirely without pain himself, at the moment, as his own numbing had worn off already. He’d more or less gotten used to this level of bodily discomfort, so it wasn’t hindering him too terribly. It only felt like he had three or four broken ribs and maybe a few gunshot wounds here and there. It probably wasn’t nearly as bad as what transfiguration users had to deal with. That shit looked like it hurt.

‘Maybe I should’ve let Manuel borrow the Scarf, after all.’

‘No, Hector. I feel bad for Diego, too, but the Scarf is probably your greatest secret, right now. The fewer people that understand how it works, the better.’

‘I guess so...’

‘And besides, he’s not wearing armor, so it wouldn’t look nearly as good on him.’

Hector didn’t respond, but he couldn’t help smirking, either.

‘By the way, have you talked to Emiliana again since we got back?’

‘Oh. Uh. No, I haven’t...’

‘Presumably, you told her that you were in the middle of fighting the last time you spoke, right?’

‘Y-yeah...’

‘Maybe you should tell her you didn’t get eaten.’

‘Ah... I mean... I’d kinda prefer to wait until I know Marcos and Ramira are safe.'

'Why? Just tell her you're alright real quick. It's not that hard, is it?'

'Er, she's, uh... she's not the easiest person in the world to talk to...'

'You mean because she's a girl, and you're you?'

'Actually, no, that's not it. It's more because she's just, uh... well, I don't know if she and I are going to get along very well...'

'...Are you serious? The two of you are fighting?'

'N-not exactly. I don't know.'

'Hmm. Well, even so, she must be worried about you.'

'I don't know about that. If she was really worried, she could use her Shard to call out to me, and I would hear her. But I'm not, so...'

'Oh, don't be a fuckin' baby. Just tell her you're alright real quick. It'll take two seconds.'

'I...' He supposed Garovel was right. 'Alright, fine. Gimme a minute.' He reached inside his armor for the Shard and then called out to her with his mind."

"1652

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 1 of 24))

It wasn't long before she answered. 'Hector?'

'Hi.'

'It is a relief to hear from you again,' she said. 'Allow me to apologize again for laughing at you before. That was inappropriate.'

'Oh, uh... don't worry about it. And, er, I'm sorry for saying that I hoped Gohvis eats you.'

'I did not think you were being serious when you said that.'

'I wasn't.'

‘Good. I am glad I did not misunderstand.’

An awkward silence arrived, which Hector felt like he should’ve seen coming. Why was this girl so difficult to talk to? Was it his own fault?

Probably, Hector figured. He just wished he knew what to do about it.

‘Do you still need me to continue researching worms?’ said Emiliana. ‘Or is that crisis well and truly over now?’

She really didn’t talk like any fourteen-year-olds that Hector had known back when he was that age. Which wasn’t even all that long ago, really, even though it felt like it was. ‘That, uh--that’s over now, yeah. Thanks for your help, by the way.’

‘Oh, was my information actually useful? I was under the impression that it had all been in vain.’

‘Uh... only mostly in vain.’

‘I... see. I think.’

‘The bit about killing worms by destroying ninety percent of their body mass--that was sort of helpful.’ Maybe. He was trying to be generous.

‘Ah. Then, do you have a new subject for me to research?’

He hadn’t even thought about that, but there were definitely a ton of ideas springing to mind. ‘Well, uh. I mean, if you’re offering, then yeah, there are loads of things I’d like to know more about. None of them are immediately pressing, though. In fact, they’re just things I’m generally curious about, I guess. Are you sure you don’t have better things to do with your time?’

‘Um... to be clear, I would appreciate it if you did not have me waste my time researching irrelevant subjects. I want to do whatever I can to help you and everyone else. I do not wish to become your private search engine for trivial questions.’

Hector bobbed his head to the side as he ran. ‘I get that. I wasn’t planning on asking you anything that I could just find out on the internet. But, uh... at the same time, everything’s still kind of... in flux, right now. There’s no way to know what information might prove useful in the future.’

‘...Very well. What would you like me to look into?’

Off the top of his head, Hector already had a list in mind, though he was sure that he was forgetting some things. 'Ancient gods. Particularly in regard to ones named Malast or Ettol. There was also a woman who lived a long time ago named Stasya Orlov. I'd like to know more about her. And about a race of people called the Hun'Sho. And--'

'H-hold on, let me write some of these down...'"

"1653

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 2 of 24))

That thought made Hector stop running. 'Are you sure that's a good idea? What if someone finds what you write down?'

She paused. 'They... wouldn't be able to discern anything important from this list, would they?'

'That's the thing. I don't know. Would they?'

'I...' She didn't finish her thought.

'Maybe I'm just being paranoid, but I think we need to be extremely careful with... whatever this is. Even if it's inconvenient for you, I don't think you should write down anything I tell you.'

'I suppose you are right,' said Emiliana. 'It is better to be safe than sorry.'

And as he thought about it more, Hector began to get a dreadful feeling of familiarity--a feeling that he very much wanted to heed. 'It might be best if we come up with some sort of code, too.'

'A code? Is that really necessary?'

'Maybe. Maybe not. I don't know. I'm just thinking that it would be good if we had an extra layer of... assurance, I guess. Assurance that you and I are really speaking to one another, I mean.'

'What are you talking about? You and I are the only ones who can use the Shards to communicate like this.'

'...As far as we know.' Hector started walking again, then gradually increased his pace. 'I admit that it's unlikely, but... I just... I've had really bad experiences with... a lack of precaution in the past. And I've also seen some really weird shit, lately. Like, people's minds being screwed around with. So...'

'People's minds? As in, mind control?'

'Not sure. Might just be memories getting erased. It's something to that effect, though, so yeah, maybe I'm being a little paranoid, but it's just... it's easy for me to imagine someone trying to use this... link of ours against us.'

'Hmm. But, Hector, I know that I am talking to you. I do not know HOW, exactly, but I can sense that it is YOU who is talking to me. Is it not the same for you?'

'N-no, it is. I do recognize your... "voice" or whatever, but... uh... this is all just guesswork on our part. What if our brains can be tricked into thinking that they're talking to someone else? I mean, I just... I don't have much faith in the human brain, right now.'

'Hmm...'

'And because we can't see each other, all we have to go on is this vague "feeling" of who we're talking to.'

'I see your point, but... if that is what you truly think, then how can you be certain at this very moment that I really am Emiliana Elroy and not some imposter?'

That actually gave Hector pause, though only for a second. 'Because you remembered what we last talked about,' he told her.

'Ah...'

'In fact... maybe that should be our code.'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean... from now on, whenever we start a new conversation with one another, we have to reference whatever we last talked about.'

'Hmm...'

"1654 -- CLXXVIII.

'That way, if one of us doesn't do it, then the other will know that something's wrong.'

'...What if we simply forget?' said Emiliana.

'That... would be a problem,' admitted Hector. 'But, uh... it shouldn't be that hard to remember, should it? Especially if we talk regularly.'

'I suppose...'

'If you're really worried about it, then tell Chergoa something that we said and have her remember it for you.'

'That might work... but this is all extremely hypothetical, isn't it? And if a hypothetical foe could use the Shards to trick us in such a way, what makes you think they would not be able to get around this strategy, too?'

'I... uh...' Eesh, what a question. 'Look, I'm not saying this idea will make us invincible. But it's one more layer of security that an enemy would have to overcome. And it's not too much extra hassle for us, so what's the downside, exactly?'

'I see your point.'

'And maybe we should come up with a backup code, too, in case that fails somehow...'

She sighed. 'This is getting rather tedious, Hector...'

Yeah, okay, maybe that was too much for now, Hector figured. 'Sorry. I just. Ah... well, we can worry about a backup code later, I guess.'

Emiliana made no response.

'How is Chergoa, by the way?' said Hector. 'Garovel doesn't really let it show, but I'm pretty sure he's worried about her.'

'She is... her usual insufferable self.'

'That's... good?'

'Yes. She doesn't seem to mind Gohvis' company very much at all. She may even like him. I cannot tell if she is putting on an act and trying to trick him in some way.'

Hector's brow rose. 'She LIKES Gohvis?'

'Seemingly. Gohvis is rather... curious, in his own way. It may be impossible to describe without making you think I have gone crazy.'

'...I don't know about that,' said Hector. 'I think I've probably got you beat when it comes to seeing crazy shit.'

'Ha. Perhaps I--'

There came a pause, and Hector slowed his run down to a walk again as he waited for her continue.

'...I have to go,' she said.

And before he could even tell her goodbye, he sensed her let go of her Shard.

Well, that was worrying.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Eight: 'To a place of prospect...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It took a few more hours, but indeed, just as Garovel had said, one of the servants discovered Capaporo. Unfortunately, Hector was not that servant. It was Manuel Delaguna, which meant that Hector had to go all the way back to the reapers and then all the way to Manuel.

It gave him a lot of time to think, particularly about how much he hated running. Eventually, when his lungs began to feel like they were both exploding and collapsing with each new breath he took, Hector decided to stop running and start relying on his materialization to carry him."

"1654 -- CLXXVIII.

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 3 of 24))

'That way, if one of us doesn't do it, then the other will know that something's wrong.'

‘...What if we simply forget?’ said Emiliana.

‘That... would be a problem,’ admitted Hector. ‘But, uh... it shouldn’t be that hard to remember, should it? Especially if we talk regularly.’

‘I suppose...’

‘If you’re really worried about it, then tell Chergoa something that we said and have her remember it for you.’

‘That might work... but this is all extremely hypothetical, isn’t it? And if a hypothetical foe could use the Shards to trick us in such a way, what makes you think they would not be able to get around this strategy, too?’

‘I... uh...’ Eesh, what a question. ‘Look, I’m not saying this idea will make us invincible. But it’s one more layer of security that an enemy would have to overcome. And it’s not too much extra hassle for us, so what’s the downside, exactly?’

‘I see your point.’

‘And maybe we should come up with a backup code, too, in case that fails somehow...’

She sighed. ‘This is getting rather tedious, Hector...’

Yeah, okay, maybe that was too much for now, Hector figured. ‘Sorry. I just. Ah... well, we can worry about a backup code later, I guess.’

Emiliana made no response.

‘How is Chergoa, by the way?’ said Hector. ‘Garovel doesn’t really let it show, but I’m pretty sure he’s worried about her.’

‘She is... her usual insufferable self.’

‘That’s... good?’

‘Yes. She doesn’t seem to mind Gohvis’ company very much at all. She may even like him. I cannot tell if she is putting on an act and trying to trick him in some way.’

Hector’s brow rose. ‘She LIKES Gohvis?’

‘Seemingly. Gohvis is rather... curious, in his own way. It may be impossible to describe without making you think I have gone crazy.'

'...I don't know about that,' said Hector. 'I think I've probably got you beat when it comes to seeing crazy shit.'

'Ha. Perhaps I--'

There came a pause, and Hector slowed his run down to a walk again as he waited for her continue.

'...I have to go,' she said.

And before he could even tell her goodbye, he sensed her let go of her Shard.

Well, that was worrying.

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Eight: 'To a place of prospect...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It took a few more hours, but indeed, just as Garovel had said, one of the servants discovered Capaporo. Unfortunately, Hector was not that servant. It was Manuel Delaguna, which meant that Hector had to go all the way back to the reapers and then all the way to Manuel.

It gave him a lot of time to think, particularly about how much he hated running. Eventually, when his lungs began to feel like they were both exploding and collapsing with each new breath he took, Hector decided to stop running and start relying on his materialization to carry him."

"1655

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 4 of 24))

Hector used the opportunity to practice something he'd tried previously back in Gray Rock. He made a seat for himself and pushed it onward. It wasn't nearly as difficult as it had been before, though he didn't attribute that to his most recent emergence. While the emergence might've certainly been helping, the biggest difference was that he wasn't currently in the middle of a city full of innocent bystanders. The path here was straight, more or less, and he didn't have to worry about running into anyone.

So he could really just let rip. He pushed his iron chair as fast as he could get it to go--which, he discovered, was actually quite fast indeed. It was easily faster than he'd ever gone on a motorcycle. Being able to just shoot the iron forward in a straight line without holding back--that really was the key difference.

But it still wasn't nearly as fast as he'd managed to make his orbiting discs go. Granted, those went so fast that he completely lost control of them, but still. It seemed a strange difference. He felt like this should have been able to achieve speed like that, so why wasn't it?

Was his own body weight a factor in it? Or perhaps it was simply a problem with his own perception? Was he limiting himself subconsciously, maybe? It was one thing to make something move that fast; it was another to try to make himself do it. Maybe it was some sort of natural, self-preservation instinct that he had to overcome.

He would be a little surprised if that was the case, though. He wasn't sure how much of that instinct he actually possessed. There was a time when he would've thought he didn't possess it at all, but he'd come to realize that he did have it at least a little. It was almost impossible to fight seriously without a sense of self-preservation, Hector figured.

So maybe that was the problem. Maybe he just had to let go of his brain's very natural and rational fear of going way too fucking fast.

Easier said than done, though. He wasn't sure how he was supposed to go about that.

Even with all the time he had to test things out, he didn't find a solution. And when he made it back to the reapers, Zeff was already there waiting, and Diego arrived not long after. The Lord Elroy didn't hesitate to carry everyone with him. They all shot forth on a wave of ice, moving much closer to the speed that Hector had been trying to achieve.

It was so quick, actually, that Hector's vision went briefly gray, then black, and he felt like he may have lost time and consciousness for a bit.

Which might've answered his earlier question, he figured. He couldn't materialize iron that pushed himself at such a speed that he began to lose consciousness, because the second his focus began to fade, his materialization would no doubt begin to wane."

"1656

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 5 of 24))

But Zeff was obviously doing it just fine, which was probably thanks to the man's passive soul defense being so much greater than Hector's.

He wondered if there might be some way to make up for the difference in soul power with only his materialization skill. And of course, there was still the matter of that drilling technique that Zeff had showed off, too. Hector definitely wanted to try that out, soon.

All in all, it gave Hector plenty to mull over as they rushed toward Capaporo, even if he had to battle to keep his own thoughts clear in his mind. Garovel, for the most part, seemed content to leave Hector to his half-conscious deliberations, apparently finding something to talk about with Axiolis and Yangéra.

Hector couldn't tell how long it took to catch up to Manuel. It was all a bit of a blur by the time his head finally began to clear again, and he found himself already walking on his own two feet.

He concentrated on trying to regain his bearings. According to movement in the air, there was a lot of... empty space around him. Similar to the last cavern they'd been in, he supposed. The walls were too far away for him to sense them.

But the ground ahead was different, he noticed. There was a very steep drop off, like that of a cliff, almost. He searched for greater detail and sensed a narrow staircase far to his right.

'--ector?' came Garovel's echoing voice.

He opened his eyes, not even sure when he'd closed them. The reaper was right there in front of him. 'Yeah?'

'You okay there, buddy?'

'Y-yeah...'

Garovel's bony face twisted a little. 'Did you tune me out again?'

‘N-no.’

‘Yes, you did.’

‘...Yes, I did. Sorry. Didn’t mean to.’

‘How does that even--?’ The reaper’s private words were cut off, however, when Diego Redwater’s voice interrupted.

“What’s the best way to go about this?” he said, seemingly to everyone, though he was standing next to Zeff near the edge of the cliff.

Hector decided to join them and discovered a view that was not what he was expecting.

‘Cautiously,’ advised Axiolis. ‘I know that may not be our forte, at the moment, but if our kin are truly being held prisoner like Hector said, then jumping in without thinking is a good way of getting ourselves captured, too.’

As he listened, Hector couldn’t help marveling a little at the sight of what must have been the entirety of Capaporo. He hadn’t sensed the city at all before seeing it, and now he had an idea of why that was.

It sat in a giant hole. And at the moment, Hector was standing above it, right on the edge. The countless lights of civilization shone like stars in an otherwise pitch black night, not so much illuminating the hole as simply revealing its shape. A massive cylinder, going straight down."
"1657

(TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 6 of 24))

At the bottom of the hole, Hector noticed discernible shapes in the darkness. Buildings, he supposed them to be. They must have been enormous for him to be able to make them out at this distance. Perhaps that was Capaporo’s metropolitan area--a “downtown,” in multiple senses of the word.

“First things first,” said Zeff. “Can any of you tell where our people are?”

‘Not me,’ said Garovel. ‘I’m searching, but there are a lot of souls down there in very close proximity to one another. It’s tough to tell them apart.’

‘I am struggling as well,’ said Yangéra. ‘We need to get closer. I don’t think they should be very difficult to sense. Assuming they didn’t get separated, they’ll all be in one big group. We just have to locate a recognizable cluster of souls.’

“How do we even get down there to start looking?” said Diego. “I have a feeling we’d make a bit of a scene if we just jump and splat our way down.”

Hector supposed that was his cue. He moved toward the staircase that he’d sensed earlier. “Over here.”

When the others drew close enough to illuminate the stairs with their lamplights, Diego blinked a couple times and then turned his light on Hector in order to assess the young lord from Atreya.

“How did you spot this?” the man said.

‘Don’t tell him,’ said Garovel privately.

Hector didn’t need reminding, but he also didn’t know what to say instead. ‘You want me to lie to him?’

‘If you can make it sound both convincing and benign, then yes.’

That was a tall order. Too tall, Hector immediately decided. “I can’t tell you,” he said plainly. “It’s a... trade secret, I guess. Sorry.”

Diego regarded him with a raised eyebrow but said nothing.

‘Taking a page out of Asad and Qorvass’ book?’ said Garovel, again privately.

It was true. That was basically what Qorvass had said to him and Garovel with regard to the functionality of the Shards as powerful catalysts. That felt like quite a while ago now, though. Hector had to wonder if Qorvass might be a little more forthcoming with that information, if they asked him again.

Something to worry about later, he supposed.

The group made their way down the staircase with Zeff leading the way. Thankfully, it had a guardrail, so the drop off wasn’t quite so terrifying as it could have been, but Hector certainly couldn't say he was enjoying the feeling. It was barely wide enough for them to descend in single file.

They soon arrived on an open street, which wasn't all that much wider, really. The architecture here made Hector gawk, partly out of simple curiosity and partly out of genuine bafflement. On this street, the houses--assuming that was what they were--were not actually on the street. At least, not in the traditional sense. Instead, the houses were suspended above the street, attached to the wall of the great hole."

"1658

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 7 of 24))

After a while, though, he supposed the placement of these buildings made sense. The street was narrow enough already, and perhaps it was easier to simply suspend the houses in midair like this than to widen the road--or worse, suspend the houses over the side of the cliff. That seemed like it would be insanely dangerous, especially with how deep this hole went.

The party continued downward, which proved to be a more difficult task than it seemed. After one more instance of struggling to find another staircase leading down, Zeff decided to let Hector take the lead, and even then, it was slow going. On top of not wanting to rush into a bad situation and make it worse, the reapers were also scanning the area constantly, deliberately taking their time with trying not to miss anything.

'There's definitely someone strong in this city,' said Garovel after a while.

'Yes,' said Axiolis. 'Someone near the Salesman's level of strength, unless I am mistaken.'

'Sounds about right,' said Yangéra.

It was a bit early to tell, of course, but Hector supposed that person would be the "lost sheep" whom Rasalased had mentioned.

He had no idea what they were going to do about that. He really didn't want to deal with another person of that caliber, but he probably wasn't going to have much choice, he figured.

As they started reaching the middle tiers of the great hole, the streets began growing wider, and Hector noticed small tunnels and caverns in the wall where more buildings were hiding--even entire side streets. He started seeing many, many more people as well--all of whom were Hun'Kui.

Unlike the Hun'Kui in Babbadelo, however, these ones were not usually wearing goggles, and even less frequently did they appear to be armed. Most of them looked like they were too busy with one thing or another to even give a bunch of surface-dwellers a moment's glance. The way they carried themselves seemed somehow fundamentally different, Hector thought. A kind of a weary resolve, perhaps, like someone who was on their way to do something that they didn't really want to do but knew that they had to.

Hector had seen the like before in high school. Hell, he'd felt the like before in high school.

When they finally began to reach the lower tiers, however, the sights changed even more significantly. Tall, metal tubes ran lengthwise along the roads, and at first, Hector wasn't even sure what they were, until he saw a train pass through them. It wasn't nearly as large or as loud as the ones he'd ridden previously, but it was especially noteworthy to him because he thought he spotted a few regular humans through its windows as it passed.

And indeed, the other areas of the lower only served to confirm that notion for him. The streets became more complexly interconnected, digging into the wall and diverting off into enclosed spaces. Hector and the others even encountered one street which was entirely enclosed and significantly cooled."

"1659

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 8 of 24))

Hector was able to comfortably remake his armor into a non-cooling variant. He drew a few looks from the apparent residents, as they were not even wearing climate suits, despite looking like normal human beings.

The cooled street branched off into several others just like it, Hector saw. He noticed enormous sliding doors at each intersection, and even though they currently stood open, Hector had a hunch as to their purpose. They were probably supposed to seal shut in the event of an emergency. If something went wrong on one street, then the rest of them wouldn't be compromised, too.

An interesting concept, Hector thought. The people here probably used it to help deal with heat leaks or whatever, but he could imagine it being used militarily as well, like to defend against or perhaps even trick a force of invaders.

Hmm.

At length, though, he had to ask Garovel the obvious question. 'How did all these people from the surface get down here?'

'They probably aren't actually from the surface,' the reaper told him privately.

'What?'

'These people were probably born here.'

'Are you serious?'

'Yep. While Hun'Kui are the most common to see out in the open, the Undercrust has always had a rather sizable population of people who aren't at all resilient to the extreme temperatures. And as technology has improved, I imagine that population has only grown.'

'Huh...' Hector recalled Garovel mentioning something to that effect before, but he was still having a rather difficult time believing it, quite frankly. Unfortunately, he didn't know how to articulate that disbelief into a comprehensive line of questioning.

'What a place to grow up in, huh? Gives a new meaning to the idea of an "indoor kid" when going outside means being roasted alive.'

Hector could hardly imagine it. Granted, he and the others had passed two checkpoints when they entered this area, but those checkpoints hadn't looked very well guarded. One of them was empty, and the other had a guy who seemed more interested in the book he was reading than in what they were doing.

'Didn't we hear that there was some kind of civil war going on around here?’ said Yangéra.

‘Some kind, yes,’ said Axiolis.

‘So why do all these people seem so relaxed, then?’ she said.

‘It must not have affected Capaporo very much yet,’ said Axiolis.

‘And perhaps it never will,’ said Garovel. ‘Historically, cities in the Undercrust have been notoriously isolated from one another, even after its comparatively early invention of locomotives.’

‘That is true,’ said Axiolis.

‘Still,’ said Yangéra, ‘this does strike me as rather odd, especially considering the level of strength that we are all sensing, right now.’

‘Hold on a second,’ said Garovel, and he stopped, which made everyone else stop, too. ‘I think I sense our friend Roman.’”
"1660 -- CLXXIX.

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 9 of 24))

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Nine: ‘The Leech’s gambit ...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been an uncomfortable week. Roman Fullister from Atreya liked to consider himself an adaptable man, but his time spent traveling with this Leo from Lava Base had made him reevaluate a great many things.

The journey here to Capaporo had been quiet enough. Leo was rather chatty during it, but so could Roman be, when he wanted to. No, the trouble arose after they got here, when the Rainlords arrived.

Leo had neglected to mention what he had planned for them, and looking back on it now, Roman knew that Leo had indeed planned it all along. At the time, it had seemed like a spur of the moment thing, an impulsive and unprovoked decision, but not anymore.

It hadn’t helped that the Rainlords weren’t particularly friendly during their encounter. A reaper by the name of Mevox had been especially prickly, as it sounded like Mevox knew something about Leo and didn't like him as a result. Roman hadn't gotten the chance to find out what that was, precisely, and even now, he was reluctant to have Voreese go and try to do so in his stead. He wanted to keep her as far away from Leo as he could, at least until he was reasonably confident that the man wouldn't simply snap and go on a killing spree.

He was doubtful that such a time would ever come, however. Sure, Leo was amiable enough towards him, but would he be that way towards Voreese? Or worse, would she provoke him?

Probably. It was Voreese, after all.

Yeah, he'd probably made the right call in not letting the two of them meet. Better safe than exploded into meaty chunks, he figured.

"Tell me something," said Roman as he mulled over the cards in his hand. He already had three fives, and they hadn't even started guessing yet. "And be honest with me."

Leo sat across the steely table from him, observing his own cards. "Yeah?"

"Do you really think that Sai-hee will forgive you? I mean, I know how you feel about negativity, but just--seriously, do you think your plan is going to work?"

"What kind of idiot would I be if I were tryin' a plan that I didn't think was going to work?"

A desperate one, Roman wanted to say. "What if she doesn't, though? I know you said she hates the Rainlords, but handing them over to her as an apology gift... what if she just decides to kill them and then you, too?"

Leo was quiet a moment. Then he looked Roman in the eye and said, "Do you have any twos?"

"Go fish."

"Tsk." Leo grabbed a card off the top of the deck.

"Answer my question," said Roman.

Leo flattened his lips together and kept his eyes on his cards. "It ain't just about getting her forgiveness, man. It's about getting Ericoros', too. And there ain't no way he's gonna agree to not release my soul unless I go back to workin' for her.'" "1660 -- CLXXIX.

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 9 of 24))

Chapter One Hundred Seventy-Nine: 'The Leech's gambit ...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been an uncomfortable week. Roman Fullister from Atreya liked to consider himself an adaptable man, but his time spent traveling with this Leo from Lava Base had made him reevaluate a great many things.

The journey here to Capaporo had been quiet enough. Leo was rather chatty during it, but so could Roman be, when he wanted to. No, the trouble arose after they got here, when the Rainlords arrived.

Leo had neglected to mention what he had planned for them, and looking back on it now, Roman knew that Leo had indeed planned it all along. At the time, it had seemed like a spur of the moment thing, an impulsive and unprovoked decision, but not anymore.

It hadn't helped that the Rainlords weren't particularly friendly during their encounter. A reaper by the name of Mevox had been especially prickly, as it sounded like Mevox knew something about Leo and didn't like him as a result. Roman hadn't gotten the chance to find out what that was, precisely, and even now, he was reluctant to have Voreese go and try to do so in his stead. He wanted to keep her as far away from Leo as he could, at least until he was reasonably confident that the man wouldn't simply snap and go on a killing spree.

He was doubtful that such a time would ever come, however. Sure, Leo was amiable enough towards him, but would he be that way towards Voreese? Or worse, would she provoke him?

Probably. It was Voreese, after all.

Yeah, he'd probably made the right call in not letting the two of them meet. Better safe than exploded into meaty chunks, he figured.

"Tell me something," said Roman as he mulled over the cards in his hand. He already had three fives, and they hadn't even started guessing yet. "And be honest with me."

Leo sat across the steely table from him, observing his own cards. "Yeah?"

"Do you really think that Sai-hee will forgive you? I mean, I know how you feel about negativity, but just--seriously, do you think your plan is going to work?"

"What kind of idiot would I be if I were tryin' a plan that I didn't think was going to work?"

A desperate one, Roman wanted to say. "What if she doesn't, though? I know you said she hates the Rainlords, but handing them over to her as an apology gift... what if she just decides to kill them and then you, too?"

Leo was quiet a moment. Then he looked Roman in the eye and said, "Do you have any twos?"

"Go fish."

"Tsk." Leo grabbed a card off the top of the deck.

"Answer my question," said Roman.

Leo flattened his lips together and kept his eyes on his cards. "It ain't just about getting her forgiveness, man. It's about getting Ericoros', too. And there ain't no way he's gonna agree to not release my soul unless I go back to workin' for her.""

"1661

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 10 of 24))

"Why do you say that?" said Roman. "How do you know that your reaper wouldn't allow you to simply do something else with your time?"

"Because," said Leo with a sigh, "Ericoros is one of those types. You know the ones."

Roman tilted his head. "I do?"

"Yeah, man. One of those super dutiful loyalists. Really believes in the mission 'n whatnot."

"Hmm. Do you have have any fives?"

"Go fish."

Roman drew a king from the deck and frowned. "And what is 'the mission' that Ericoros believes in so strongly?"

"The usual. Y'know. Protecting the Old Law. And the people in our territory. Or her territory, I guess. Never felt like I belonged, personally."

"Why not?"

"Everyone was just way too relaxed, man."

Roman couldn't stop himself from squinting and flattening his lips. "You didn't get along with them because they were too relaxed," he said, wanting to make sure he'd heard correctly.

"Yeah, man, I know. This was before I chilled out a little bit. I was a real square back then."

Roman was having trouble picturing that.

"I mean, I'd always wanted to let loose, y'know? Be myself. Or try to, at least, since I didn't really know who I was, know what I'm sayin'?"

"I... guess? What changed?"

"Nothin', really. But also everything, y'know?"

Roman didn't.

"One day, I just woke up and realized that I hated my life. So I made a change."

"And Ericoros didn't like that, huh?"

"Hmm? Oh, no, Ericoros was fine with it. This was ages ago. We didn't start having our disagreements until way later. Eri was very supportive during that whole process of reinventin' myself. He knew I'd been miserable for a long time and was tryin' to help me work through it."

Leo's eyes glazed over as he observed his cards. "Great guy, my Eri. Really great..."

Roman just waited.

"That's why I gotta make it up to him proper-like. I did him dirty."

"...So this isn't just about making it so that Ericoros won't release your soul, then."

Leo looked up at him but didn't say anything.

"Ah--I just mean, you actually want his forgiveness," said Roman.

"Course I do, man. What kinda question is that?"

Roman raised a hand defensively. "Didn't mean to offend."

Leo wasn't letting go, though. The man's eyes narrowed, and Roman felt an all too familiar pressure surrounding him. "You think I don't have feelings 'r somethin', big cat?"

Roman would've very much liked to not answer that, but that wasn't an option, apparently. "Well, uh... it's just--ergh--I did hear you murder a man and his reaper in cold blood, so..."

The pressure let up, and Leo set his cards face down on the table. "Yeah, but I--that wasn't... ah..." Leo took a long, slow breath while he rubbed his forehead. "I really screwed up this time, didn't I...?"
"1662

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 11 of 24))

Well, it was at least a step in the right direction that the man was showing signs of remorse, Roman thought. And there was also the possibility that Leo hadn't been himself when he'd killed those two. Assuming that what the man had said about someone messing with his head wasn't complete horseshit, then an argument could certainly be made that, deep down, Leo was a nice guy.

And of course, Roman wasn't wholly averse to working with murderers, either. He'd done it many times before while honing his craft as a procurer of things that didn't belong to him.

Still, Roman preferred to know what he was getting himself into, whenever possible. And all things considered, this guy was quite the confused mess, right now. To Roman's mind, a conflicted and unstable killer was probably an even worse companion to have than a killer who was truly cold and calculating.

Roman wasn't quite sure what to say to him now, though. Leo looked like he could use some words of comfort or encouragement, but providing either of those seemed like a very bad idea. That was basically how he'd gotten himself into this mess in the first place.

'Oh shit!' came Voreese's private words from wherever she was. 'I sense Hector! Oh, and Garovel, too! Those wonderful pricks are finally here!'

Roman stopped himself from reacting in front of Leo, who was picking up his cards again to resume the game.

It was good news, of course, and Roman had certainly been wondering where the hell they were, but after witnessing how Leo handled the Rainlords, Roman had also felt a bit of relief that Hector wasn't around to get caught up in this mess. So now he was conflicted. It might've been better if Hector had just never showed up at all.

'How close are they to my position?' said Roman.

'Not very. They're pretty far from you. I'ma go talk to 'em.'

'Tell them to keep their distance for now.'

'Oh, I'm gonna tell them all sorts of stuff. Like how you screwed us all by making friends with a fucking deluded psychopath.'

'It's not my fault! And he's not a psychopath!'

'Sure he isn't.'

"Got any eights, big cat?" said Leo.

Roman handed the eight of clubs to him. For the time being, he supposed he should just focus on keeping Leo busy while the others came up with a plan. Roman did have a plan of his own, sort of, but he'd been very reluctant to take it any further.

According to Leo, getting in contact with Sai-hee was going to take several more days still, so Roman had been procrastinating while he tried to come up with an alternative plan. Not that he had much confidence in this one. He just didn't want to offer Leo a job unless he absolutely had to. It was bad enough that the man already seemed determined to do him a "favor" as a friend. Roman wasn't looking to make this situation permanent."

"1663

(TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 12 of 24))

"So, uh..." Roman was struggling for a subject. He knew he didn't want to guess a card yet, because the longer the game went on, the easier it would be to keep Leo distracted.

"Yeah?"

"Oh, ah, I... I was just wondering about something you mentioned just now. You said that you never felt like you fit in with Sai-hee's people because they were too relaxed, but then you said that you eventually became more relaxed yourself, right?"

"Mmhmm."

"And you've been like that for a while now, haven't you?"

"Yuh."

That meant yes, right? "So, then... did you still not feel like you belonged even after you changed?"

"Totally."

"...I don't know if that answers my question."

"Yeah, man, I still felt totally out of place, even then."

"Why?"

"Because, man... it's like... those people, I mean. Dude. I'm talking about the normal people who live in the Peacemaker's territory. Not the folks who work for her. They're different. The normal people, the non-servants, they're the ones who are just... insufferable, I think is the word I'm lookin' for."

“How do you mean?”

Leo gestured absentmindedly with one hand, revealing his cards without apparently realizing it. “They’re just, y’know--they live in some of the calmest and most well-protected places in the world. And yo, there’s, like, a big difference between relaxing because you’re trying to enjoy your life and relaxing because you just don’t want to contribute. To anything. Ever.

“And then ON TOP OF THAT, they’re so elitist about it, too! As if they’ve accomplished anything! As if they’ve done anything to deserve their easy lives!” Leo shook his head and exhaled a heavy breath. “It was like they’re just determined to be unhappy, y’know? Even when everything is just handed to them, and they barely have to work at all, they don’t appreciate it, man. Most privileged people you ever did see, I swear. Drove me straight up crazy, sometimes.”

“Yeah, that sounds pretty irritating,” said Roman. “Maybe that’s your main problem, then.”

“Hmm? My main problem?”

“It’s gotta be tough to get invested in the goal of protecting a bunch of people you don’t care very much about. Maybe if you explained that to Ericoros, you could come to some sort of an arrangement and look for a new type of work. Something that you both find fulfilling.”

Leo returned a doubtful look.

“Got any sevens?” Roman knew that he did. He’d glimpsed one when Leo showed his hand.

Sure enough, Leo handed him the seven of diamonds. “You make it sound so easy...”

“Not saying it will be. Might take years to convince him. But you’re a servant. You’ve obviously got the time to spare.”

“I don’t think time will be the problem, big cat. You know how stubborn reapers are, right?”

“I most certainly do.””

"1664

"Then I don't need to explain," said Leo. "Eri is up there with the best of 'em, man. Or the worst, I guess. However you wanna look at it."

"Okay, but that doesn't mean it's truly impossible to convince him. Why don't you tell me a little about him? Maybe I can help you find a solution."

Leo blinked dully. "You... you would really try to help me like that?"

"Of course! What do you think I've been doing?"

"...I think you've been trying to keep me preoccupied while your reaper works on something," said Leo.

Roman kept his face perfectly still for a moment. Then he feigned confusion. "What? Why would you think that?"

"Just a feeling. Call it paranoia, if ya like."

"Maybe I will," said Roman. "I've been enjoying our game quite a bit. It's been ages since I was able to sit down and play cards with someone like this."

"Mm. Got any fives?"

"SHIT!" He slapped his three fives down on the table. "Didn't I just ask you for fives?! You're not cheating, are you?!"

"Nah, bruh. Pulled it from the deck just now. I swear."

"Tch..."

Leo took the cards with a faint smile and set them aside with his own five, completing the collection and scoring a point for himself. "You seem a little stressed, big cat. It's just a game, y'know."

"Easy to say that when you're winning. Do you have any jacks?"

"Go fish."

Roman grumbled as he grabbed the topmost card off the deck. It was the ace of spades.

"You one of them super competitive types?" said Leo.

"Maybe. That a problem?"

"Nah, just--I mean, if it means that much to you, I can just let you win."

"No, don't do that! That'd be even worse than losing!"

"Ya sure? It really doesn't make much difference to me, man. And at the end of the day, don't you think friendship is more important?"

"This is how you build friendship. Through healthy competition."

"You really believe that?"

"You don't?"

"Oh, I dunno, man. I always kinda thought that peace and love was the way to go, y'know? Whenever possible, I mean."

Roman held back a laugh. "Peace and love? Isn't that a little vague?"

"Vague? Nah, man. E'erybody knows what peace and love means. Having care and compassion for your fellow humans. Not getting all up in their business. Unless, y'know, you have to."

"Sure, but in my experience, 'love' can be rather aggressive and even rude. Doesn't necessarily jive with the notion of 'peace,' ya feel me?"
Crap, he was starting to pick up some of this weirdo's speaking habits. Roman had always had something of a natural gift for acquiring accents and the like. Usually, it was helpful, but he wasn't appreciating it very much, at the moment."

"1665

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 14 of 24))

"Hmm," mused Leo. "Maybe you're right. I've known a fair few folks who did some bonkers stuff 'cuz of love. Or so they said. Hard to know these things for certain, right?"

Roman only returned a lame shrug and waited for Leo to guess a card.

Leo did not oblige, however. "You really think you can help me with Eri?" he asked.

“Dunno,” said Roman. “But I promise to try, at least.”

“Heh. Arighty, well... Ericoros is what you call... a drama king.”

Roman raised an eyebrow.

“He has a tendency to overreact to things. And sometimes he lets his emotions get the better of him. I mean, he makes an effort to be rational, but y’know...”

“I see. How old is he? Do you know?”

“He’s in his two thousands now.”

“Where is he from originally?”

“Luugh.”

“Where in Luugh? What country?”

“Doesn’t exist anymore.”

“Really? I thought all the countries there were pretty old.”

“They are. Not his, though. The Kingdom of Polura, was what it was called. These days, it’s known as the Republic of Grant. Named after that uppity Vanguardian, y’know.”

Roman did know. Field Marshal Grant. Celebrated hero across the continent of Luugh. Roman had been there a couple times. They had some real nice stuff there. Plenty worth stealing, certainly. And they were big fans of statues, those Luughans. And trees. And water. That was pretty much their entire culture condensed into three things, according to Roman’s admittedly meager experience.

It was too bad he hadn’t spent more time there. Might’ve been helpful, right about now. He considered asking Voreese, but she was probably still busy with the others. And she would probably just distract him, anyway. “Why do you think he’s so dutiful toward Sai-hee?”

“She saved his hometown four hundred years ago or so.”

“Mm, yeah, that’d do it.”

“Wasn’t actually her, though,” said Leo. “It was a group of her followers. Rescued the place from a small time warlord. Not even all that impressive from the sound of it, but to hear Eri talk about it, you’d think she descended from the heavens 'r somethin'."

"Is Ericoros religious at all?"

"Yeah, kinda. He's a follower of Cocora."

"Oh, hey, so he might like it in Atreya, then."

"Yeah, maybe."

"That's a start, right?"

Leo made no response.

Not the kind of reaction Roman was looking for. Probably best to push quickly onward. "So Ericoros doesn't share your reservations about Sai-hee? You mentioned that you thought she was worse than Dozer, even."

"Oh yeah. Eri doesn't see any of that. Thinks the ends justify the means 'n all that."

"Maybe the solution to your problem lies there, then. If we could convince him that Sai-hee isn't as great as he thinks she is, then maybe he'll agree to quit with you and go do something else."

"You think I haven't tried that already? He won't listen, man.""

"1666

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 15 of 24))

"Not even if we show him some real evidence?" said Roman.

"You got any real evidence?" said Leo.

"Well, no, but we could work on that."

Leo looked doubtful. "Got any twos?"

"Go fish. You already asked for those earlier, by the way."

"Did I? Guess I really want some twos, then."

Roman was going to be extremely annoyed if he ended up losing to a guy who was barely even paying attention to the game. Unfortunately, getting a glimpse at the man's cards hadn't even helped much, since he hadn't had any of the ones that Roman needed now. He could only hope that Leo had just drawn something that would be useful. "Also, ah--it would probably be helpful toward repairing your relationship if you told him about how you were brainwashed."

"...Wasn't really brainwashing, though, man."

"What do you mean?"

"I was still myself, man. I still knew what I was doing. I was just... a slightly different version of myself, I guess. That's the best I can put it, I think."

Roman mulled that over for a bit. "You should probably just say you were brainwashed. It's easier to conceptualize--and probably to forgive, which is what you want Ericoros to do, right?"

"Doesn't really matter, because there's no way he'll believe me, man."

"Sure he will! Especially if you've got someone to support your story, like me. In fact, we could just let all these Rainlords leave and then go find your reaper and have a nice, quality chat with him. Where is he, by the way?"

"...See, it's questions like that that make me paranoid, brother."

Roman tensed up as he felt the air in the room do the same. The expression on Leo's face was familiar. Roman had seen it once before, back when they first met. It was an unneeded reminder that this was not someone he wanted to push too far. "Ah... you're worried I'll try to kill Ericoros?"

Leo just kept staring at him.

"Oh, uh, heh, sorry. That thought hadn't even entered my mind. But yeah. Of course you'd be worried about that. We still barely know each other, after all."

Leo seemed to relax a little, though only because his dark eyes went back to his cards.

Roman took a silent breath. He could feel himself sweating, despite his control over particle vibrations making him immune to the heat of the Undercrust.

Roman was a little surprised that Leo didn't simply force the truth out of him again, though. He wouldn't have minded, since he wasn't lying. He certainly didn't plan on trying to kill Ericoros.

He was beginning to run out of ideas. Perhaps he really would have to offer Leo that job after all. Before pulling that trigger, though, he decided to check in with Voreese.

'Hey, you got a plan yet?' he asked her.

'No. And shut up. I'm having a very pleasant conversation with Garovel right now.'

"1667

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 16 of 24))

'I'm going to offer Leo a job.'

'WHAT?! DON'T YOU FUCKING DARE!'

'Then stop dicking around and come up with something!'

"It's your turn," said Leo.

"I know. I'm just... thinking."

"It's not that difficult of a game, chief."

"Okay, how many different nicknames are you gonna come up with for me, exactly? Because it's getting a little ridiculous."

"Bad ridiculous or good ridiculous?"

"I... I don't know. It's just strange."

"Maybe I like being strange."

"Well, at least you don't smell quite so strange, anymore."

Leo just looked at him again.

And Roman was hesitant again, too, but he was also fairly certain that he hadn't actually pissed Leo off just now. After all the time he'd spent in this man's company over the last several days, he'd gotten a decent idea of the kinds of things that would and wouldn't do it.

Mostly.

Indeed, after a moment, Leo put his nose over his shoulder and sniffed. "Never did much care for bathing, if I'm completely honest."

Roman couldn't say he was surprised. Nonetheless, it had certainly been a relief when Leo had started doing it again. Roman didn't know if he would've been able to handle that level body odor throughout the entirety of their journey thus far.

"You got any aces?" said Roman.

"Go fish."

He drew the nine of diamonds from the deck. 'Voreese. Plan. Now.'

'I'm working on it. You can't rush greatness.'

'Not a concern when you're involved.'

'Stop distracting me, you little prick.'

'Do you need more information? Something I can help with, at least?'

'Uh... one sec.'

He'd already told her everything that he'd been able to learn about Leo so far, but he wasn't sure it would be enough.

"Got any clubs?" said Leo.

"Are you being serious, right now?"

"Sorry... I mean diamonds."

"Leo..."

"This game's kinda boring, dude. Maybe we should go do something else."

That was not what Roman wanted to hear. "I want to finish our game. You have no idea how emotionally invested in it I am, right now."

Leo scratched his cheek. "Eh... you sure? Think I saw a movie theater on the third level the other day. Maybe they've got something interesting on."

Ugh. Movie theater or not, there was no telling what Leo would do if he left this room. The man was rather easily distracted, Roman had come to learn, so any number of things out there could catch his eye and make him wander off, which could throw a wrench into any plan the others came up with. "That's--sure, fine. We'll do that after our game, okay?"

"Myeah, alright..."

'Leo's getting antsy...'

'Oh, ah--ask him why he likes Sai-hee so much.'

'He DOESN'T like her! I told you that like six days ago!'

'You did?'

'Yes!'

'I dunno. I'm pretty sure I'd remember if you had...'"

"1668

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 17 of 24))

Roman's brow twitched. 'Have you not been listening to everything I've been saying?'

'Of course I have! I mean. Maybe not "everything," but you know, most of it, for sure.'

'Voreese!'

'Relax, Roman, I got this.'

'I feel like you don't!'

"Got any queens?" said Leo.

Roman did and handed it over to him. He spent the next few minutes reiterating everything that he had thought Voreese already knew, just to make sure everyone was on the same page. Between that and paying close attention to Leo, Roman figured this had to be the most stressful game of Go Fish that he had ever played in his life.

At length, however, Leo set his cards down again, and that glazed look came over him one more time. "I'm just not feelin' this right now, my man."

"What? Why? What's wrong?"

"This is just takin' too long, dude."

"But we're almost done!" They weren't, really, but that was beside the point. He needed to keep Leo here.

"Whatever. You win. I concede." Leo stood up from the table and stretched his arms over his head. "Whew. How about that movie now, eh?"

That was pretty decisive. Not really any space for argument, Roman felt. If he tried to push the game on him any harder, then Leo would probably get suspicious. Which would certainly suck. "I--ah--hold on. Why don't we stay and talk a while. I'm still curious to know more about Ericoros."

"I can tell you about him on the way. Let's go." And he started for the door.

"Wait--uh, actually--" Running out of options, Roman just said the first thing that came to mind. "There's something important that I've been meaning to tell you."

That made Leo stop and turn.

Well, shit. There was only one thing he could think of that would justify saying something like that.

But then, maybe it was time. Maybe it wouldn't be a disaster. Maybe it would even work out well in the end.

Maybe.

'Voreese? Sorry. Gonna offer him a job.'

'I TOLD YOU TO WAIT!'

'Can't. I'm doin' it. Wish me luck.'

‘AGH! FUCK YOUR LUCK!’

Leo was waiting patiently and confusedly.

Roman was slow to pull out the necessary words. “...I think you should quit working for Sai-hee and come work for me, instead.”

Leo was silent a moment. “...‘Scuse me?”

“I know this was only supposed to be a temporary gig, you trying to repay me for helping you. Which, actually, I suppose you’d have to do TWICE over now, considering you’d be turning in my allies for your own gain--but that’s neither here nor there. What I’m saying is that I want to hire you full-time. To help me protect my homeland of Atreya, mainly, though I may come up with other jobs for you, too.”

Leo opened his mouth, then closed it again and puffed out his cheeks. “Hmm.”

"1669

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 18 of 24))

“And look,” said Roman, “I understand that you’re having difficulties with your reaper, right now, but I think you’ll find that I’m a very good employer. I will pay you well for your services, and I’m sure I can bring Ericoros around. Even if he loves Sai-hee, I’ll make him love me more.”

Leo squinted and scratched the tip of his nose. “Uh, how, exactly?”

“What do you mean, how?”

“I mean, how do you plan to make Ericoros love you? He’s, uh... rather difficult to win over.”

“Just leave that to me. I can be very persuasive.”

“Nope. Don’t think so. Appreciate the offer, though, chief.” He turned to leave again.

“Wait! What?! Why not?! It’s a great offer! I’m not lying, you know! Go ahead and check! I’m filthy rich! I’m so rich that sometimes I feel kinda bad about it!”

"That's good to know, but it ain't about money, man. Money don't bring you happiness."

"Yeah, well, not having it certainly brought me sadness. I know what it's like to be poorer than dirt, so don't give me any of that crap about money not being important. It's important as hell."

Leo sighed. "Yo, man, I ain't no sell out."

Oh... fuck. Leo was one of those people. Roman supposed he should've seen that coming, considering everything else he knew about the man.

"I'm--argh, I'm not saying you are, Leo. I'm just saying, I'd be a very good boss to have. Trust me. You'd like working for me. Money is only one aspect of it, alright? I'm not just some money loving psycho. I've got big plans for the future, and I'd like you to be part of them. That's how I plan on convincing Ericoros. By showing him that you and him will be a part of something much greater and more meaningful in the long-term."

Leo's eyes were already glazed over. "Spoken like a real youngin'. You know how many times I've heard people say stuff like that? Lemme guess, you wanna change the world? You upset the balance of power and save loads of people in the process?"

Roman couldn't deny that he wanted those things, but he also didn't want to come across as a starry-eyed child. "My reaper and I have a solid plan."

"Lemme guess that, too. You're gonna take it slow and steady until you can recruit more people like me to your side?"

"That's... one aspect of it, yes, but there are others--"

"Save your breath, bro. Heard it all before. And nothin' you say has any power behind it. Even if you make all the sense in the world, you gotta have that power to back it up. And what, you want ME to be that power for you? I'm not that strong, chief. Not against the likes of Iceheart and the Knife and whoever else might be out there now."

"1670

“What are you talking about?” said Roman. “It doesn’t matter if you’re more powerful than them or not. You’re not the only person who would be working for me.”

“Oh yeah? Who else you got, then? Any names I’d recognize?”

“Well, it’s a work-in-progress.”

Leo snorted. “Course it is. No offense, but you obviously don’t understand a thing. And how can you expect me to work for someone like that, huh?”

Roman frowned, not sure how to argue with that. Maybe by bringing up Voreese and how old she was? Eh...

“Ya gotta understand. I’m old as heck. So I know myself pretty well by now. And I ain’t much of a leader, daddy-o. You know I ain’t ever achieved emergence before? Not even once? Just ain’t me. Don’t have the temperature for it.”

“I think you mean ‘temperament.’”

“Whatever. Not much of an orator, either, okay? Nobody’s perfect.”

“I don’t need you to be perfect. I just need you to do what I tell you.”

Leo rolled his eyes. “And what happens when the day eventually comes that I don’t want do what you tell me, huh?”

“You... exercise self-control and do it, anyway?”

Leo threw up his hands. “You ain’t hearin’ me, man! I’m sayin’ I ain’t got any self-control! I’m a mess! I gotta be kept in line! I don’t do well with rules, dude!”

“Well, we could keep things casual, if that’s what you’d prefer...”

“Oh, just forget it!” Leo spun around and made for the door again. “The answer’s no, man!”

Roman just watched him go.

He supposed the guy had a point, in his own weird way. Leo certainly seemed like a loose cannon if ever there was one. Roman didn’t know how he would keep a handle on someone like that, especially since money didn't seem like it mattered very much to him.

Ugh.

He stood up from the table and started after Leo. Whatever the case, he probably wanted to keep an eye on him. As much as he might've liked to just book it out of here and go meet up with Hector, something told him that the kid wasn't going to be down with leaving all these captured Rainlords behind.

'...Didn't go well,' he told Voreese as he stepped out onto the stony veranda. The view from the bottom of Capaporo was a peculiar one. White and amber lights filled his view, save directly above his head, where the giant pit just kept going.

'What does that mean?' said Voreese.

'He... he turned me down.'

She laughed like a jackass. 'You fuckin' loser!'

'Hey. If I'm a loser, then that makes you one, too, you know.'

'Yeah, whatever. So why'd he turn you down?'

'I think because he doesn't want to work for someone who's weaker than him. It was a little unclear, though.'

'Hmm.'

'I'm following him now.' Roman had already caught sight of him again. The guy wasn't exactly speeding along, what with having the walking posture of a limp noodle."

"1671

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 20 of 24))

'Doesn't wanna work for someone weaker than him, eh?' said Voreese. 'How old-fashioned.'

'Well, he IS pretty old...'

'Psh, that's no excuse. Still a goddamn baby, as far as I'm concerned.

But maybe we can take advantage of that.'

'Oh, do you actually have a plan now?'

'Garovel and I have been swapping intel, and apparently, he and Hector have been getting up to some pretty bonkers shit in our absence. And didn't you say that Leo originally said he wanted to follow you to Capaporo as "protocol?"'

'Uh, yeah? So?'

'He said that whenever there was someone he didn't recognize who had access to a Courier, he was obligated to identify that person, right?'

'Yeah, but that was just bullshit so that he could capture the Rainlords and offer them up to Sai-hee as an apology.'

'Maybe. I think that protocol might be real, though. I've heard of such things before.'

'Okay? What's your point?' Roman observed Leo stopping in front of a Hun'Kui street performer and tossing a few coins at him.

'We're gonna trick him,' said Voreese. 'Our problem so far has been that we can't free the Rainlords and escape, because you're the only one who'd be able to pull it off, and Leo was constantly breathing down your neck. But now we've got a few other people who can do it while you keep him distracted.'

'...He's kinda stopped paying attention to me, actually. He's going to the movies. Maybe I should just leave and go meet up with you.'

'No, I want you stay on him. In fact, I want you to bring up Hector. Talk him up a bit. Tell Leo all about how powerful he is, and how he's actually the one who YOU are working for.'

Roman's expression spoiled. '...Why?'

'Backup plan, just in case Leo shows up while we're busy freeing everyone. I'm assuming it won't be quick work. This way, you'll also be able to warn us if he starts heading our way.'

'...That doesn't explain why I have to pretend to be working for Hector.'

'Because that seed's already been planted with the whole Courier situation. Leo already has an idea who Hector is, so if you nourish that seed a little, let it grow, then Leo might actually come to believe that Hector is powerful enough to leave Sai-hee for. Get it?’

‘...I don’t like this plan.’

‘Well, it’s the best we got. Now go be a good distraction for us. You can run away from him later.’

‘What if I can’t get away later?’

‘Then you can just destroy your brain and escape that way.’

Roman’s brow lowered. ‘Excuse me?’

‘Just use your power and blow your own brains out. I’ll recreate you from scratch at my location, and Leo will have no idea where you went. It’s the perfect escape plan. And a real classic, by the way. Widely used throughout history. Not that you would know, you ignorant piece of shit.’”

"1672 -- CLXXX.

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 21 of 24))

‘Voreese. I don’t know if I can actually do that.’

‘What? Sure you can.’

‘No. I’ve never tried to destroy my own brain before.’

‘Well, why not? What’re you, some kinda pussy?’

‘Voreese.’

‘Look. Just. Figure it out. You’re strong. I’ve got faith in you, Roman.’

‘Liar.’ Leo was on the move again, down a street that curved toward the middle of the city where taller buildings awaited. ‘And my ability doesn’t lend itself well to that sort of thing. I’m sure I could tear my head off with a strong enough concussive blast, but actually destroying it in a single go? I really don’t think I can manage that, Voreese. Especially not without practice.’

‘Ugh. Fine. Well. We’ll cross that bridge if and when we come to it, alright? Hopefully, you'll just be able to slip away normally, once the rest of us are clear.'

There was virtually no way that was going to happen, Roman felt. Even if Leo was being rather inattentive at the moment, the man had very much NOT been that way during the rest of their time together.

But even so, Roman didn't see many other options. 'Alright, fine... What kind of stuff should I tell him? Anything I can say that's not just a straight up lie?'

'Lemme ask for some specifics real quick.' There was a pause. 'Well, um, apparently, he brought down the Salesman of Death.'

'That's hilarious, but I'm being serious here, Voreese.'

'...Hmm. So am I.'

Roman stopped walking to blink a couple times.

'Oh, he HELPED bring down the Salesman of Death. Ah, and I guess Garovel would prefer you not mention that one, unless you absolutely have to. Shit, this Manuel guy sure likes to talk. What is he, president of the Hector fan club or something?'

Roman was beyond confused. 'What the--? Who's Manuel?'

'Ah--whatever. Not important. Gimme a sec.'

And he wanted to protest with a variety of different questions, but he acquiesced. He started walking again, having nearly lost track of Leo.

'Okay, so Hector killed a worm, I guess.'

'So have I. I'm not sure that'll impress--'

'No, this one was the size of a house, apparently. And it shot lightning. Oh, no, it was bigger than just a normal house? More like an office building. Oh, and they met some gods, too.'

'...Okay, what the fuck are you talking about?'

'That's a good question. I'm relaying it now.'

Chapter One Hundred Eighty: 'Old cruelty...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

...171 years ago...

She didn't get the burial she deserved, but it was the best that Parson could manage after hours and hours of digging with only his bare hands. Even if he'd had a shovel, it probably wouldn't have helped much. The ground here was rocky and unforgiving.

By the time he was done, his hands were numb and bloody, and his stomach was so empty that he couldn't vomit anymore, despite his body still trying to."

"1672 -- CLXXX.

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 21 of 24))

'Voreese. I don't know if I can actually do that.'

'What? Sure you can.'

'No. I've never tried to destroy my own brain before.'

'Well, why not? What're you, some kinda pussy?'

'Voreese.'

'Look. Just. Figure it out. You're strong. I've got faith in you, Roman.'

'Liar.' Leo was on the move again, down a street that curved toward the middle of the city where taller buildings awaited. 'And my ability doesn't lend itself well to that sort of thing. I'm sure I could tear my head off with a strong enough concussive blast, but actually destroying it in a single go? I really don't think I can manage that, Voreese. Especially not without practice.'

'Ugh. Fine. Well. We'll cross that bridge if and when we come to it, alright? Hopefully, you'll just be able to slip away normally, once the rest of us are clear.'

There was virtually no way that was going to happen, Roman felt. Even if Leo was being rather inattentive at the moment, the man had very much NOT been that way during the rest of their time together.

But even so, Roman didn't see many other options. 'Alright, fine... What kind of stuff should I tell him? Anything I can say that's not just a straight up lie?'

'Lemme ask for some specifics real quick.' There was a pause. 'Well, um, apparently, he brought down the Salesman of Death.'

'That's hilarious, but I'm being serious here, Voreese.'

'...Hmm. So am I.'

Roman stopped walking to blink a couple times.

'Oh, he HELPED bring down the Salesman of Death. Ah, and I guess Garovel would prefer you not mention that one, unless you absolutely have to. Shit, this Manuel guy sure likes to talk. What is he, president of the Hector fan club or something?'

Roman was beyond confused. 'What the--? Who's Manuel?'

'Ah--whatever. Not important. Gimme a sec.'

And he wanted to protest with a variety of different questions, but he acquiesced. He started walking again, having nearly lost track of Leo.

'Okay, so Hector killed a worm, I guess.'

'So have I. I'm not sure that'll impress--'

'No, this one was the size of a house, apparently. And it shot lightning. Oh, no, it was bigger than just a normal house? More like an office building. Oh, and they met some gods, too.'

'...Okay, what the fuck are you talking about?'

'That's a good question. I'm relaying it now.'

Chapter One Hundred Eighty: 'Old cruelty...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

...171 years ago...

She didn't get the burial she deserved, but it was the best that Parson could manage after hours and hours of digging with only his bare hands. Even if he'd had a shovel, it probably wouldn't have helped much. The ground here was rocky and unforgiving.

By the time he was done, his hands were numb and bloody, and his stomach was so empty that he couldn't vomit anymore, despite his body still trying to."

"1673

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 22 of 24))

It all became a haze as he sat there, looking over the shoddy grave and feeling the evening wind lick at the tears sliding down his face. He'd thought he'd ran out of those multiple times already. Tears. But they just kept coming back like waves.

At length, however, he could sit there no longer. Night was falling again, and his mouth was parched to the point that even just breathing through it was painful. So he finally stood and left his mother behind.

He needed to find water, first and foremost, and he knew exactly where to go. There was a rocky stream not far from town where he would sometimes take the flock to be watered. His mother had gotten angry at him for doing that, saying it was better to water them from the troughs at home, but Parson had kept doing it anyway from time to time, whenever he felt like she wouldn't find out. He just liked going there, and maybe he was wrong, but it seemed like the sheep liked it, too.

Now, though, the sight of it there, babbling down a gentle eastern slope, was not nearly enough to soothe his heart. He knelt down and drank from it until his thirst was quenched.

And then he didn't know what to do.

He cried some more.

He could still smell smoke from the village. The wind was blowing it this way, he noticed. And he thought he heard something, too. Yeah. The distant clapping of horse hooves. If he could hear them, then he was probably still close, he figured. He got up and ran, not even having a destination in mind until a thought struck him.

The hiding spot. The one that he'd dug with Damian and Steven. He wanted to check on it. Maybe one of them was there. And if not, it might still make for a good place to sleep.

In the darkness, he made his way. It might have been more difficult if he didn't know the area so well. He recognized almost every tree in relation to the village, and so it didn't take him very long at all to loop around and find the hideout.

He was the last to arrive, apparently. Damian and Steven were both already there, though neither were their usual selves. Damian, at least, expressed surprise at seeing him, but Steven just remained huddled up in the corner, eyes wide and staring out over his knees.

At length, Parson tried to touch the younger boy's shoulder, to rouse him in some way, but Damian stopped him.

"Better not," said Damian, and he brought Parson around to Steven's other side, the side nestled up close to the wall.

Parson saw a bloodied dagger in Steven's hand, hidden behind his leg.

Damian pulled up one of his own sleeves and revealed a shallow wound. "The little monkey nicked me with it when I tried to move him.""
"1674

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 23 of 24))

"We can't just stay here," said Parson.

"Why not?" said Damian. "It's safe here. Nobody'll find us."

It was true that they had hidden the entrance to this place pretty well behind a makeshift tapestry of leaves, but that was no guarantee, Parson felt. "What about food? Water?"

"I can hunt," said Damian.

Parson knew it. He'd seen the other boy kill snakes before with nothing but a stick and a rock. "It's still too dangerous to run around out there. We need to go somewhere far away from those soldiers. They'll kill us if they catch us."

Damian looked like he wanted to protest, but he didn't. After a moment, he merely nodded grimly. Then he looked over at Steven again. "What about him?"

Parson knew what the other boy was really asking. Should they just leave him here?

And Parson thought about it. Maybe it would be for the best.

But no. They weren't going to do that. Not if he could help it. Not after everything else they'd already lost.

Parson knelt down in front of him, mindful of the blade and the reach of the other boy's arm. "Hey."

Steven just sat there, not reacting at all.

"Hey," Parson tried again, louder this time.

Still nothing.

"Steven."

Again, no response.

"Steven!"

"It's useless," said Damian. "He's useless."

Parson sighed and stood back up. He looked around their hideout for something he could use. A couple blankets, some loose rocks, a few candles, and a whole lot of dirt.

He chose the dirt. He grabbed a handful and chucked it at Steven. "Look at me, you idiot!"

The boy did not. He just let the dirt hit him and kept his wide eyes forward.

"I don't wanna leave him behind, either," said Damian in a more conciliatory tone, "but if we have to--"

"We're not leaving him," said Parson, not even bothering to look at Damian. He grabbed one of the rocks next and wrapped it in a blanket. "Steven," he tried again as he readied his throw. "Steven. Look at me, Steven."

Steven did not.

Parson scowled and threw it, using perhaps a little more strength than he meant to.

The wrapped rock hit Steven in the side of the stomach. It had to have hurt, and yet even still, the boy did not react.

Parson growled angrily. "Say something!"

"I told you," said Damian.

Parson took a breath, looking around again. Should he try burning him with a candle?

No, probably not.

Parson took a breath and tried to think. His own hands were starting to ache something terribly as the numbness wore off. Maybe that was Steven's problem. He was just numb to pain.

In that case, maybe some other kind of stimulation would have more of an effect. The smell of food, maybe?

It was possible, Parson supposed. But even if they went out right now and caught something, would it be safe to cook it here, in their hideout? Or would the soldiers notice the smoke, like he had noticed from the town?

Why was everything so terrifying?

Parson rubbed his face, trying not to cry again. Not in front of these two. He couldn't let them see something like that. They'd humiliate him."

"1675

((TZKS 5th Anniversary -- Page 24 of 24))

Wait a minute. Humiliation? Maybe that was another solution.

Once Parson was sure that he wasn't going to start crying, he walked over to Steven again and crouched down. There was only one thing he could think of that might set the other boy off.

"Steven," he tried one last time, to no avail as expected. That was fine. "...Jonah."

No reaction.

Parson wasn't ready to give up, though. After all these months, he'd almost forgotten Steven's actual name and was therefore briefly concerned that he'd said the wrong one, but after a moment, he became certain again. "Jonah," he said more forcefully.

Steven's eyes twitched, then moved to meet Parson's.

"Finally," said Parson. "Get up, Jonah."

"...My name's not Jonah."

"Hmph." On any other day, that might have been enough to make Parson laugh. "Yes, it is, Jonah."

"No, it isn't...!"

"Well, then get up if you want us to start calling you Steven again."

"My name's not Steven, either."

Parson would've sighed, if he wasn't so relieved just to hear the other boy's voice again. "Oh yeah? What's your name, then?"

"It's... it's Damian."

The actual Damian scoffed. "No, it isn't, you ass! Pick a different one!"

"F-fine... my name's Germal."

"Germal?" said Damian. "Is that even a real name?"

"It is! I read it in a book once!"

"Liar. You can't read."

"Can so!"

"What was the book about then, huh?"

"It was about a hero who brings light to the whole world!"

"Yeah, sure, it was."

"It's true, idiot! He saved everyone from the darkness!"

"Uh-huh."

"Whatever! My name's Germal now! You have to call me Germal!"

Parson stood back up. "Fine, whatever you say." He held out his hand. "But you have to give me the knife, if you want me to start calling you Germal."

The boy hesitated. "...It's my mother's."

And at the look on his face, Parson couldn't help hesitating, too. He had to be strong, though, he told himself. "...I'll give it back to you, just as soon I'm sure that you won't use it against either of us."

"What? I wouldn't... uh..."

"Yeah, you would," said Damian, showing his cut again.

"...Okay, but you better give it back soon." And he gave the weapon to Parson.

Parson wiped the blood off of it with his tunic. Some of it had dried and required a few extra passes and hard scrubbing, but he managed to get it all and return it to its accompanying leather scabbard. That was when he noticed an engraving thereon. He didn't know how to read, though. He looked over at the newly dubbed Germal. "Hey. You really know how to read?"

"Yeah!"

Parson showed the engraving. "What does this say, then?"

"It says, 'Courage before Evil, Preparedness before Courage.' It's a quote from a famous guy."

"Hmm."

"What famous guy?" said Damian, still sounding doubtful.

"Arkos," said Germal, though his expression diminished into a frown. "That's what my mother said, anyway..."

"1676

((Triple Saturday -- Page 1 of 3))

"I've heard of him," said Damian. "He built a bridge or something. With a quote like that, you'd think he was a warrior. What would he know about courage, anyway?"

"He'd know more about it than you," said Parson.

Damian folded his arms. "I'm braver than both of you combined."

A part of Parson wanted to keep arguing, but he just didn't have the energy for it. Not today. Everything hurt, and he was tired.

So he didn't say anything. He just grabbed a blanket and sat down quietly on the dirt floor.

Damian just frowned and watched him for a time. When Germal grabbed another blanket and joined him, Damian did the same.

Soon enough, they blew out the candles and tried to go to sleep. They didn't have anything to eat, but no one wanted to go out in the middle of the night to try to find something. Eventually, they huddled together for warmth.

Parson found it difficult to sleep, though. In the too-quiet hours of the dark--when there was nothing for his eyes or his ears to latch onto save his own breathing and his own heartbeat--all he could think about was his mother lying there in the dirt. That image wouldn't leave his mind. It was burned there.

"...Hey, guys?" came Germal's voice in the pitch blackness.

"What?" said Damian.

"...Why is there war?"

Damian didn't know what to say to that, apparently.

And neither did Parson.

"...Why is there war?" the boy repeated, perhaps thinking they hadn't heard him.

"How the hell should we know?" said Damian.

"It's just the way the world is," said Parson.

"But wouldn't it be better if there was no war?" said Germal.

"Who knows?" said Parson. "But if that were really true, then everyone would've stopped fighting a long time ago."

"People are stupid," said Damian. "That's all it is. We're weak and scared and stupid. Even the grownups. They act like they know what they're doing, but they don't."

Parson didn't know whether to agree or disagree.

And there was more silence, until Germal revived the conversation, "Do you think anyone else from the village survived?"

"Probably not," said Damian.

"Both of you, shut up," said Parson. "Go to sleep. We'll need our strength tomorrow."

And mercifully, they listened to him. And after a while, he realized that he could hear their breathing, too.

That helped a little.

Parson had a nightmare. He was being chased by a howling wind in the distance. It was far away, then all around him. The specter of death. Toying with him, like in so many Melmoorian fairy tales.

He was the first to awaken, and though he still felt tired, he didn't want to go back to sleep.

Germal seemed to be having a nightmare, too, from the way he was twitching and sweating. Parson couldn't stand looking at him, so he shook him awake. It wasn't much longer until Damian got up as well, and then the Trio set out from their little cave to find breakfast."

"1677

((Triple Saturday -- Page 2 of 3))

The sky was as clear and blue as it ever was. It made Parson angry, somehow. Like it didn't know or didn't care. The sun, too, was bright and obnoxious.

Maybe it would've been better to go out at night, after all, Parson thought.

It wasn't long before Damian tracked down a nice, plump jackrabbit, but even though all three of them chased it down, the quick little bastard still managed to escape into a burrow. The Trio was discouraged for a while, until Parson finally plopped down on a wide boulder and heard a high-pitched and familiarly terrifying shhk sound.

A rattlesnake, he noticed. Barely a foot away from him.

A hefty rock sailed in from outside Parson's vision and smashed into the coiled body of the snake.

"Get it!" yelled Damian. "Go for the neck!"

Parson watched it flail there in the dirt and grass for a second before he remembered the knife. Then he pounced on it, somehow managing to grab its neck and slice its head off. He was surprised to find that the rattling did not immediately cease.

They wasted no time building a campfire. Parson and Damian did most of the work, while Germal just watched and hopefully learned something, what with all the questions he was asking.

They peeled its skin off and roasted its meat. It wasn't going to be enough to feed three hungry boys, but it was something, at least. And for the first time in a while, Parson actually felt marginally happy about something. A successful hunt. Being alive.

"I didn't know snake tasted this good," said Germal with a mouthful.

"It doesn't," said Damian. "That's just because you're so hungry. Everything tastes better when you're hungry."

"Huh, really?"

"We need to talk about what we're gonna do next," said Parson. "We can't just stick around here and hunt snakes forever."

"What, you want to go back to the village?" said Damian. "There's nothing there for us."

"No," said Parson. "The soldiers came from the south, so I think we should head north.”

“Hmm.” Damian scratched his face while he chewed. “Yeah, okay. Sounds good to me.”

Germal bobbed from side to side as he listened to the two older boys. “There’s another village up that way, isn’t there?” he said.

“Yeah,” said Parson. “The soldiers are probably headed there, too. If we get there first, maybe we warn everybody.”

“We won’t get there first,” said Damian. “They’ve got horses.”

That was true, Parson supposed. Damn. “But maybe they’ll stay here for a few more days. And then we can--”

There was a noise from behind. The boys all went dead silent, listening.

More noises. Rustling in the bushes. Scraping metal? A sword being pulled from its sheath, Parson knew at once.

No words were needed. Parson ran away from the noise, and the other two boys followed. He glimpsed back in time to see a pair of uniformed soldiers convening on their campfire.

The boys kept running and didn’t look back again.”

"1678

((Triple Saturday -- Page 3 of 3))

They reached the open green of the eastern hills and just kept going. There wasn’t much to hide behind out here, save maybe the hills themselves. Only the occasional wild brumby or flock of sheep dotted the landscape.

Some or even all of those sheep had probably belonged to the village a couple days ago, Parson figured.

At length, Germal started to lag behind, and the Trio finally stopped running.

“Already tired?” said Damian, though he sounded out of breath himself.

"No--I'm--just--" Germal dropped to his hands and knees. "Just--one minute..."

Nobody seemed to be chasing them, as far as Parson could tell, but they were still fairly exposed out here. He looked around for a place to stop but didn't see a particularly good spot. Only the nearest hill offered any kind of visual cover from the treeline in the distance.

It would have to do, he supposed. "Over here," he said, and he helped Germal back to his feet so that the three of them could conceal themselves behind the hill's slope.

He could still see a few slender trails of smoke beyond the treeline, which at least helped him keep track of where the village was. The eastern mountains that were now at their back did not look particularly inviting, as usual. The Storm Mountains always lived up to their name, and the Trio was close enough now to even see flashes of lightning within the dark clouds that perpetually concealed the mountain peaks.

"Now what?" said Damian, keeping an eye out over the hilltop.

Parson was still tired. And hungry. That snake hadn't been nearly enough. His only solace was the blanket that he'd managed to bring with him from their hide out. He was glad that he'd told everyone to take theirs.

"I said, now what?"

Parson heard him the first time. He just didn't want to answer him. But he supposed he had to. Germal was giving him that expectant look that Parson had seen a dozen times before. "...I still say we go north," said Parson. "If we go south, we'll have to cross a river. If we go west, we'll probably run into more soldiers. And if we go east, we'll run into that."

The other two boys eyed the storm for a moment, and then appeared to agree.

And so, after an hour or so of rest, they headed north.

They spotted more sheep along the way. Damian tried to kill one so they could eat it, but he only managed to wound it before it ran off. Then the hunt turned into a rather long chase, as the boys were already a bit tired from earlier. Parson was the one that finally caught up to the beast and finished it off. At that point, killing it was a mercy.

They made another fire while Parson stripped the animal for its meat. He'd seen his mother do it a hundred times but never done it himself."
"1679

He didn't do a very good job. Not like she would've done, anyway. Blood got everywhere, and some meat definitely went to waste, but it was the best he could manage. There would still be more than enough for the three of them, though.

They started cooking it immediately, and soon enough, the smell was making Parson's mouth water. He tried to wipe his hands clean onto his clothes and the grass, but it didn't work all that well.

They ate together. It was wonderful. Damian was absolutely right, Parson felt. Everything did taste better when you were hungry.

Parson gave Damian some crap for botching the kill. Damian defended himself by saying that he'd never hunted an animal that big before. Germal just ate in silence.

With their bellies finally full, they kicked dirt onto the fire and moved on, leaving most of the sheep for the worms or vultures or whatever else wanted it.

They still had a few hours of daylight left, and if they kept a good pace, Parson thought they might be able to reach the next village. Whether it would be a safe place to stay for the night was another story.

The hills just kept going, on and on along the foot of the mountains, but there was no shelter to speak of here, and Parson was worried it might rain, too. When they eventually started to see lights among the treeline, they knew they were close to the next village and so left the hills behind to go investigate.

They were wary, of course, and took their time approaching. The darkening twilight helped, though the lowering temperature did not.

From the concealing safety of the treeline, the Trio found a good view of the center of the village. Parson had been here a couple times before with his mother. It was called Lhustol, this place, and it had a nice creek running through it with a cobblestone bridge connecting the two sides.

Everything seemed calm enough at a glance. No burning houses or shrieking villagers.

But then a band of horsemen appeared at the far end of the town and rode over the bridge and right past where the boys were hiding.

Parson was frozen with fear as he watched, but he also got a good look at them. It wasn't just soldiers on those horses. There were kids, too. Girls.

Girls from Trintol.

Parson thought he saw Alisa Brandt among them. Her hands were bound; her brown hair was mussed; she had a black eye; and it was hard to tell in the evening light. But it could've been her. That torn dress looked kinda familiar.

Something stirred in the pit of his stomach. Anger like he'd never felt before. He wanted to just leap out of the shadows and attack the soldiers head on, but thankfully, his fear was keeping him in check.

He watched the horsemen ease to a stop in front of the tavern, tie their horses next to a trough, and then carry the girls inside with them.

Parson looked to the other two boys. They were already looking back at him."

"1680

((Triple Monday -- Page 1 of 3))

"What should we do?" whispered Germal.

"We kill 'em," snarled Damian.

"How?" said Germal.

Damian didn't have an answer to that. He looked at Parson again.

Parson wished he could've agreed. He scratched his head, trying to think. Six soldiers versus the three of them? Maybe they could've taken one or two, but six? And all armed?

Impossible.

"We've gotta do something," said Damian.

"Yeah, but what?" said Germal.

Parson got an idea. "If we fight, we don't stand a chance, but... maybe we can at least rescue the girls."

"How?" said Germal again.

"The horses," said Parson. "We let 'em loose. The soldiers'll chase 'em. Then we go in and free the girls."

The other two mulled it over for few moments.

"Sounds good to me," said Damian.

"Yeah," said Germal.

"Okay, let's go," said Parson.

They moved closer, sticking to the treeline for as long as they could before finally stepping out onto the dirt road. They darted across the open street, mindful of the tavern windows, and snuck up to the horses.

Parson had never much cared for horses. Big, scary beasts was all he'd thought they were. And these ones weren't proving much otherwise. The first horse he touched was immediately hostile and swung its huge head at him, nearly knocking him over. It whinnied angrily, and the high-pitched noise cut through the otherwise quiet village like shattering glass.

He immediately heard a commotion from inside the tavern, and he just barely managed to pull Damian and Germal behind the corner of a house with him before a man's head appeared in the tavern window, no doubt checking on the horses.

Parson watched from just beyond the corner, and when it seemed like the man was about to look in his direction, Parson yanked his head back. He could feel his heart pumping just as hard as it had after all that running they did earlier.

After a while, he chanced another peek and saw that the man was gone from the window again.

He breathed a little easier.

“Don’t touch the horses yet,” whispered Damian. “Go for the reins first. Then we’ll spook ‘em.”

“I don’t know if they can be spooked,” said Germal. “They’re warhorses, right?”

